As soon as the general's order to this effect was promulgated, both the Spaniards and the allies were filled with satisfaction. The first saw in it the only method of bringing the siege to a final and successful issue; and the second, longing for revenge, felt that now indeed they could retaliate upon their former oppressors. In spite of the energetic exertions of the besieged, the breaches in the causeway were soon filled so solidly that they could not again be opened. The suburbs were then laid bare of buildings, thus creating an open space around the city. Cortez, wishing to spare the beautiful city, offered terms of capitulation; but the Mexicans replied by a furious sortie of their whole army. On they rushed in countless masses, pouring out of the city at every gate, and advancing to the intrenchments of the besiegers, they assailed them with myriads of missiles, and threatened to crush them beneath their very weight; but the fire of the artillery, which thundered along the causeways, and from the brigantines, sweeping through the ranks of the Mexicans, mowing them down by scores, checked them in their career. They recoiled before the terrific fire, and like the receding tide they rushed back in a disordered mass to the city. For several weeks Cortez pursued operations with complete success. Although at every point he met with obstinate resistance on the part of the enemy, yet he made steady progress in the work of destruction. The Mexicans, held in strict blockade, were in a starving condition, feeding upon the most loathsome substances, and drinking the brackish water of the soil. To add to their misfortunes, a terrible disease, engendered by the unwholesome odors of unburied corpses, and the putrid substances on which they fed, swept away thousands, until the population was reduced to a dismal concourse of wan and gaunt-visaged men, women, and children. Yet with an almost superhuman endurance, and with a patriotism unsurpassed in the annals of history, the Mexicans battled with the enemy. But the Spaniards gradually worked their way into the very heart of the city, destroying the buildings as they advanced, until the Mexicans were driven into the quarter of Tlatelolco, now called the Barrio de San Jago. This district comprised about one eighth of the city; the remaining seven eighths were in the hands of the Spaniards, and were laid in ruins, and strewed with corpses. Words can not depict the terrible condition of the besieged. Crowded together in a small portion of the city, without food or water, they died by hundreds. A terrible plague stalked through their midst; and the houses and streets were heaped with dead bodies, lading the air with pestilential vapors. And here in the midst of death, the heroic Aztecs made their last stand for liberty. Cortez again offered terms of capitulation, and again were they indignantly refused. The Spanish commander now ordered his forces to advance. They were received by a rapid volley of arrows and stones; but steadily advancing through the storm of missiles, the Spaniards marched on, pouring destructive discharges of musketry and cross-bows in the dense mass of the enemy, and the guns of the fleet, which commanded the opposite side of the Mexican quarters, aided the efforts of the army by repeated volleys; placing the Mexicans between two fires. Thus exposed to the concentrated fire of the enemy, the Aztecs fell in heaps. It was no longer a battle; it was a butchery. Like demons the allies rushed into the midst of the Mexicans, and slaughtered men, women, and children indiscriminately. The roar of the musketry, the fierce yells of the savage slayers, the screams of women and children, the moans of the wounded and dying, and the crash of falling buildings, all together created an uproar and confusion so infernal that the very contemplation of the scene sends a shudder of horror to the heart. The blood in a crimson torrent gushed through the streets, running into the canals, even reddening their waters. At length the Spanish general, to put an end to the horrible carnage, ordered a retreat; and the Spanish army, sated with slaughter, retired from the bloody scene, leaving the ground burdened with 40,000 corpses. The next morning, which was the 13th of August, 1521, Cortez again advanced from his quarters, and moving through the blood-stained ruins of the city, entered the Mexican precincts. He again offered them terms; but the Aztec monarch refused to accept his conditions. Cortez, bursting with rage at the unexpected refusal, ordered his men to renew their work of death. It was like putting a lighted match to gunpowder.

The Spaniards and their confederates again commenced the butchery of the almost powerless Indians. Thousands fell beneath their hands; no quarter was given. Neither sex nor age was respected. Meanwhile many of the Aztecs were endeavoring to effect their escape by means of their canoes; but they were invariably intercepted by the brigantines, and the battle raged on the lake as well as on the land. One of the canoes, larger and better manned than the others, avoided the brigantines, and would have gained the shore, had it not been discovered in season. The swiftest brigantine was sent in pursuit, and rapidly overtaking the canoe, the Spaniards were about to discharge their weapons into it, when its occupants shouted that their king was with them. The brigantine quickly came alongside the canoe, and the emperor was taken on board. With the capture of Gautemozin the resistance of the Mexicans ceased. On the following day Cortez, at the request of the captured emperor, directed his officers to allow his men to depart from the city in peace. The evacuation commenced on the same day, and continued for the three succeeding ones. The whole number of Mexican warriors remaining is variously estimated at from thirty to seventy thousand. They were accompanied by a great number of women and children. And thus terminated the famous siege of Mexico, after a continuance of three months. The number of those who perished during the siege is variously stated. Cortez himself states that the enemy lost in the three assaults, 67,000, and he supposed that 50,000 died from disease and famine, thus giving a total of 117,000. Other accounts range from 120,000 to 240,000. The Spanish loss, when compared with the enormous loss of the enemy, was small. Their allies, however, must have suffered greatly, as 30,000 Tezcucans alone were slain during the siege. Of the loss of the Tlascalans and the other confederates of the Spaniards, no account is given. The satisfaction of the Spaniards at this brilliant termination of the siege was great. They found but a small amount of treasure in the captured city, yet they felt that by their own arms they had won a land for their sovereign, which was equal to the richest countries of Europe. Yet after some time had elapsed, they bitterly felt their disappointment at not finding a greater amount of gold, and Gautemozin, the Mexican emperor, being suspected of knowing where it was concealed, they placed him and one of his ministers upon a bed of glowing coals in order to extort a confession from him. His attendant, overcome by the extreme torture, groaned aloud, and Gautemozin rebuked him in words which speak the firmness of his character: "Am I then enjoying my bath?" Cortez must himself have been struck by the fortitude displayed in this answer; for he caused the king to be removed from the fire before he was seriously injured. Yet afterward the unfortunate monarch was hung by the general's own command.—Prescott's Conquest of Mexico.

A.D. 1847.—The modern city of Mexico stands on a plain near Lake Tezcuco. Although it occupies the same site with the ancient city, which stood on several islands in the lake, yet, owing to the drainage and more rapid evaporation, produced by the removal of the forests, and other causes, the lake has receded, and the present city is about two and a half miles west from its shore.

The battle of Molino del Rey had been fought and won; the castle of Chapultepec had been captured, and on the 13th of September 1847 the American army had cut its way through all obstacles, and stood upon the two principal causeways which lead to the gates of the city of Mexico. General Scott immediately after the capture of Chapultepec, ordered General Worth to press forward in pursuit of the fugitives on the San Cosmé road to the capital, and General Quitman to do the same on the Chapultepec road. The road of San Cosmé does not run in a straight line to the city, but makes an abrupt bend to the north. The Chapultepec road runs to the city in a straight line. The roads are broad, and are flanked on either side by deep and marshy grounds. In the center of each runs an aqueduct, supported by heavy stone arches, which divide each causeway therefore into two avenues, affording great facilities both for attack and defense. These roads, like those in the time of Cortez, afforded the Americans easy access to the city.

The Chapultepec road in fact is connected with both conquests of Mexico. Quitman had not advanced far along the causeway of Chapultepec before his troops were checked by a breastwork and ditch which the Mexicans had thrown across the road. The Americans, however, opened a destructive fire of cannon within 400 yards of the breastwork, which soon compelled the Mexicans to withdraw. Quitman pushed forward his men vigorously, and pursued the fugitives to the gate of Belau, which was carried after a brief resistance on the part of the Mexicans, where he fortified himself. Meanwhile General Worth advanced along the causeway of San Cosmé. This advance was considerably delayed by sending Duncan's battery to the assistance of Quitman, when checked by the Mexican works on the causeway to Chapultepec. As soon as his forces were united, the gallant general pushed forward, carrying breastwork after breastwork until he arrived at the Campo Santo (or English burying-ground, near which the causeway and aqueduct of San Cosmé turn to the right. From this place the road runs in a direct line to the city. Here Worth was joined by General Cadwallader, and Colonel Riley, whom General Scott had sent to his assistance. Worth posted Cadwallader with his troops at the Campo Santo, to protect his flank and rear, and pushed on toward the city. A strong battery soon appeared to oppose their progress, and behind the battery stood the last defense of the Mexicans, the garita of San Cosmé. Here the Mexicans seemed determined to make a stand; and swept the road to these defenses with an incessant storm of grape, cannister, and shells; and from the adjacent houses and churches was maintained a constant fire of musketry. Worth, at once, took the most efficient measures to dislodge the enemy. Garland's brigade was thrown to the right, with instructions to dislodge the enemy from the buildings in his front, and endeavor to reach and turn the left of the garita. At the same time, Clark's brigade was ordered to take the buildings on the left of the road, and with crow-bars, and pick-axes to burrow through from house to house, until he reached the right of the garita. While these orders were being executed, a howitzer was planted on the azotea of the church of San Cosmé on the right, and another on a lofty building on the left. While Clark's sappers and miners were patiently boring their way through the houses, a brisk skirmish took place between detached parties of Americans, under such cover as they could find, and the enemy; and the two howitzers maintained a brisk and effective fire. The Mexicans had abandoned the breastwork, which was covered by the garita, and Worth sent Lieutenant Hunt of Duncan's battery with orders to plant a piece of artillery on the deserted works. The gallant lieutenant with nine men advanced his piece through a tempest of balls to the desired spot, with a loss of one killed, and four wounded. Clark's "borers," meanwhile, had worked their way through the houses to a convenient position, whence they could assail the last stronghold of the enemy. They sprang to the house-tops, into which they had made their way unsuspected by the enemy, who were still busily engaged with their guns at the gate, and opened upon them within easy range a most deadly fire of musketry. The Mexicans stood aghast at the fearful havoc committed among them by the fire of a foe which had sprung upon them as if by magic. Their gunners dropped their sponges and rammers, and fled, and loud cheers from the Americans announced that they were in possession of the garita of San Cosmé, and were already within the gate of the city. General Worth slept that night with his staff, and most of his division, a short distance within the gates of the city. "He had fought his way to the city," says Lieutenant Semmes, a gallant officer, and the talented author of that admirable work "Afloat and Ashore," "over the celebrated causeway of Tacuba, by which Cortez had retreated on the memorable Nocte Triste. We had passed through the once populous quarter, (now a mere suburb) of Tlaletolco, where according to Cortez and Old Bernal Diaz, 40,000 people had been wont to traffic in the market place, and we had identified amid the whistling of balls, and the shout of battle, the famous 'leap of Alvarado.' No wonder that we were agitated by strange and indiscribable feelings as we lay down to rest, that night; waking we were in a land of poetry and romance; sleeping, in a land of dreams."

Worth had no sooner reached the gate of San Cosmé, than he advanced a twenty-four pounder and a ten-inch mortar, under Captain Hughes, to the garita, and opened them upon the grand plaza and palace. The guns were opened at nine o'clock on the evening of the 13th, and at one o'clock a commission from the municipal authorities came to General Worth's advanced post, announcing that immediately after the heavy guns opened, Santa Anna, the officers of the national goverment, and the army, had commenced evacuating the city; and that the commission was deputed to confer with the general-in-chief, to whose head-quarters it was passed under Assistant Adjutant General Mackall. At five o'clock on the morning of the 14th, Worth's troops and heavy guns advanced into the city, and occupied the Alameda, to the point where it fronts the palace, and there halted at six o'clok to await the further orders of General Scott. The American troops, 6,000 in number, entered the city on the morning of the 14th of September, in triumph. General Scott, arrayed in his full uniform, and surrounded by his numerous staff, all clothed in like manner, was escorted to the National Palace, by Harney's dragoons. Thousands upon thousands of spectators thronged the streets, and housetops, and balconies, to witness the novel spectacle. Scarcely had the American general reached this place, than the scene was suddenly changed. A Mexican fired from a housetop among a group of officers of Worth's division, and seriously wounded Colonel Garland. The events which followed are thus described by Semmes: "Reports of small arms were heard simultaneously in various other directions, and soon it became evident that there was a fermentation among the populace, and that our work had, as yet, been but partially done. We were 6,000 all told, and were in the midst of a city of 200,000 inhabitants! There were apparently men enough in the streets to have crushed us with the paving-stones, if they had possessed the tithe of the patriotism or valor which had inspired their noble ancestors at the siege of Saragossa, under the brave Palafox. But this was no uprising of a great and indignant people in defense of their fire-sides. Alas, for poor Mexico! the people were a dead and unlearned mass, as incapable of the sentiment of patriotism as of the other noble virtues. Still our position was somewhat critical. We were exposed in the midst of streets that were flanked on either side by massive stone houses, (some of them three or four stories high), with flat roofs and parapets, answering all the purposes of fortifications, and unless energetic measures were adopted, we might lose many valuable lives before the insurrection could be quelled. In a moment, therefore, every thing was in motion. The quick movement of troops in various directions, the rattling of artillery at full speed through the streets, the galloping hither and thither of aids and orderlies, the shouts of the women as they disappeared in haste from the balconies, and the firing from the house-tops, which increased every moment, indicated that more blood was about to flow, and that we could not as yet sit ourselves down quietly in the city of Mexico."

Batteries were planted in favorable positions to command the several streets, and detached parties of skirmishers, were sent in various directions with instructions to pursue the enemy into their hiding places and shoot down all who should be found with arms in their hands. Throughout the whole day the skirmishing was maintained; night put an end to the contest. The next day the insurgents who proved to be a number of prisoners whom Santa Anna had released from the several jails of the city on the night of his evacuation, resumed their firing; but by the vigorous efforts of the Americans, who were aided by the authorities, they, after many were slain, succumbed to the powers that were, and order was restored to the city. The Americans remained in possession of the city of Mexico, until peace was declared between the United States and the Republic of Mexico. The terms of a treaty of peace were concluded upon by the American commissioner, Mr. Trist, and the Mexican government, on the 2d of February, 1848; and this treaty, after having been modified somewhat, was adopted by the American Senate on the 10th of March, and ratified by the Mexican Congress on the 30th of May, in the same year.

MILAN, A.D. 338.—Uraïas, nephew of Vitiges, besieged Milan in 338. That city, then a magnificent one, was esteemed the second of the West. With the assistance of 10,000 Franks, furnished by Theodebert, king of Austrasia, Uraïas pressed the siege warmly during six months. The Goths, masters of the city, delivered it up to pillage, made the garrison prisoners, put the inhabitants to the sword, and carried off the women into captivity.

SECOND SIEGE, A.D. 1159.—In this year the inhabitants of Milan revolted against Frederic Barbarossa. The angry emperor immediately laid siege to that city. The cruel conqueror drove out all the inhabitants, razed the most beautiful of the edifices with the ground, demolished the gates, its triumphal arches, its baths, its most magnificent houses, and sowed salt upon its ruins to denote that it should never be rebuilt. His cruel design was disappointed; Milan soon rose again from her ashes.

Third Siege, A.D. 1499.—During the wars of the French with the Milanese, in the reign of Louis XII., the Chevalier Bayard fell in with an Italian party in the neighborhood of Milan, and attacked it warmly. On his arriving at the gates of Milan, a French gendarme, cried out to him with a loud voice, "Turn, man-at-arms, turn!" Bayard, transported by the desire of conquering, was deaf to these repeated cries, and entered the city at full gallop, as if, says an historian, he meant to take that capital alone. Soldiers, people, even women fell upon him. Cajazzo, whom his valor astonished, ordered his men-at-arms to cover him from these assaults, and made him his prisoner. He took him to his own house, and afterward to sup with the Duke of Milan. Ludovic, who had witnessed the extraordinary feats of the Chevalier from his palace windows, spoke of the brave Frenchman with great admiration, and with a view of ascertaining his character, conversed freely with him. "My brave gentleman," said the duke, "what brought you hither?" "The desire of conquering, my lord," replied Bayard. "And pray did you think of taking Milan alone?" "No," rejoined the knight, "but I reckoned upon being followed by my companions." "They and you together," said Ludovic, "could not do it." "Well," said Bayard, with his characteristic frankness, "I must admit they are wiser than I have been; they are free, and I am a prisoner, although to one of the bravest and most generous of men." The prince then asked him, with an air of disdain, "What is the strength of the French army?" "For our parts," replied Bayard, "we never think of counting our enemies; but what I can assure you is, that my master's soldiers are all picked men, before whom yours will have no chance." Ludovic, very much piqued, replied, "that effects gave a very different idea of his troops, and that a battle would very soon proclaim both his right and their courage." "Would to God," cried Bayard, "that it were to-morrow, and I were free." "You are free," replied the prince; "I like your frankness and your courage, and, to the first benefit, I beg to add whatever you desire." Bayard, penetrated with so much kindness, threw himself on his knees before the duke, and begged him to pardon, in favor of his duty, all that might have appeared too bold in his speech. He then requested to have his horse and his arms, and returned to the French camp, to give a highly favorable account of the generosity of Ludovic.

Fourth Siege, A.D. 1706.—Prince Eugene had made himself master of Milan, but he could not be sure of keeping it without occupying the citadel. The Marquis de la Florida was the governor of it. Prince Eugene summoned him to surrender, at the same time threatening to grant no quarter if he did not capitulate within four-and-twenty hours. "I have defended twenty-four places for my masters, the kings of Spain," replied the governor, "and I have made up my mind to be killed on the breach of the twenty-fifth." This bold reply, which was known to be the expression of a strong mind, caused the prince to renounce the project of attacking the castle by force, and he was satisfied with blockading it.

Milan was besieged by the King of Sardinia in 1733, by Don Philip of Spain in 1745, by Bonaparte in 1796, by Suwarrow in 1799, and by Bonaparte in 1800; but there is nothing interesting in the details of any of these sieges.—Robson.

MINDEN, A.D. 1759.—In 1759, the French army was defeated by troops of the Duke of Brunswick, in an action near Minden, a fortified town of Prussia.

MOCKERN, Oct. 16, 1813.—See Leipsic.

MOESKIRCH, A.D. 1800.—The battle of Moeskirch, in Baden, was fought on the 5th of May, 1800, between the French under General Moreau and the Austrians under Kray.

On the fourth of May the Austrian army, under Kray, occupied a strong position in front of Moeskirch; the whole front of their line was covered by a deep ravine; the horse, and a reserve of eight battalions of grenadiers, were stationed on the heights of Rohrdorf. The chaussee which approached the village, was commanded by powerful batteries, and by their fire in every direction, seemed to render all access impossible. In this formidable position were collected 40,000 foot, 12,000 splendid horse, besides more than 200 pieces of cannon.

Moreau, the commander of the French army, receiving intelligence that the Austrians were trying to concentrate all their scattered forces at this point, resolved to improve the present advantage and attack them before any more reinforcements arrived. He ordered Lecourbe to join him with all his disposable forces in order to take part in the general action; still he did not arrange his plan so as to bring his forces all at the same time into the field. The consequence of this was, that Lecourbe, with that portion of his corps which had not been in the action of the previous day, commenced the attack. He advanced with the greatest intrepidity to the assault against the Prince of Lorraine; but so tremendous was the fire from the cross batteries of Kray, on the heights, that his artillery were instantly dismounted, and he himself compelled to take shelter in the neighboring woods. Upon this, Moreau came forward with the division of Loyes, and assailed the position by its left and the village of Hendorf; but the attacking columns having been assaulted by the enemy's masses, who suddenly came upon them from behind their batteries, were thrown into disorder and completely routed. Kray, encouraged by this success, made a sally with his right wing, and advanced into the plain; but he was received in so resolute a manner by the left of the French, that he was soon not only obliged to retire, but the victorious republicans regained all the ground they had lost, and the village was carried by their pursuing columns, who entered at the same time with the fugitives. At the same time, Vandamme with the republican right, advanced against the imperial left, and attacked the village of Moeskirch; it was defended by the Austrians with great intrepidity and it was taken and re-taken several times. Lecourbe at length formed his division into four columns and advanced to the attack. Their impetuosity was so great nothing could resist it; they rushed down the sides of the ravines, up the opposite banks, and chased the imperialists from the plateau, while Molitor drove them out of Moeskirch, and their victorious columns met in the center of the town. Kray seeing the position of his left forces, executed a change of position in the very middle of the battle. He drew back his left from the plateau, and took up a position parallel with the Danube, with his center still resting on Rohrdorf. This brought him on the flank of the division of Loyes, who was unsupported on that side. Kray took advantage of this, and charged the exposed division, overthrew it, and drove it back in confusion, and had it not been for the arrival of Delmas with six fresh battalions, the French line would have been entirely broken at that point. Both sides now were making great efforts, the Austrians to improve the advantage they had gained, and the French to re-establish their line. Moreau changed his front, arranged his army parallel to the enemy, and during this change, the French division of Delmas was furiously assailed, but the utmost efforts of the imperialists were of no avail against his admirable infantry.

BATTLE OF MOLINO DEL REY (KING'S MILLS).

The combat continued for two hours. Kray redoubled his efforts, till at length on the arrival of Richepanse with a fresh division, the Austrian general concluded to retire, which was done before night, and in good order, to the heights of Buchern and Rohrdorf. In this action, so well contested by both parties, the loss was nearly equal, amounting to about 6,000 men on each side. The Austrians, occupied at evening the plateau of Rohrdorf; the French slept on a great part of the battle-field: and on the next day the imperial army retired across the Danube.

MOHACZ, A.D. 1526.—Two great battles were fought near this place, a village of Hungary, which our limited space will allow us to mention only. On the 29th of August, 1526, a large army of Turks under Solyman the Magnificent, encountered the Hungarian army, and after a desperate battle defeated and put them to rout. Louis, King of Hungary, two archbishops, and six bishops, many noblemen, and over 22,000 private soldiers were slain during the battle and flight. This battle may be said to mark the commencement of Turkish rule in Hungary; their power was terminated by the battle of 1687, in which the Turks were signally defeated by the imperialists under the Duke of Lorraine.

MOHRUNGEN, A.D. 1807.—The village of Mohrungen is in East Prussia, 62 miles south-west of Königsberg. The division of the republican army commanded by Bernadotte, was concentrated at Mohrungen, when he was assailed by the Russians under Benningsen, with a force far superior to his own. The French troops, 18,000 strong, were posted on the hilly ground, two miles in front of the town. General Makow attacked them with the advanced guard of the Russians, and after a bloody conflict he suffered the penalty of his rashness by being repulsed toward Leibstadt. In this action both sides lost 2,000 men, and the Russian general, Aurepp, was killed.

MOKHAUSE, A.D. 1717.—The village of Mokhause is famous for the gallant defense of its garrison against the Tartars of the Kooban, in 1717.

MOLINO DEL REY, A.D. 1847.—Molino del Rey is the name of a group of strong stone buildings which form the western side of the inclosure of Chapultepec, with its groves and fields, rocks and castles. These buildings are about two miles south-west of the city of Mexico; and in the month of September, 1847, were occupied by about 14,000 Mexican troops, to intercept the march of the American army against that capital. The American force designated to attack Molino del Rey moved out of Tacuba early in the morning of the 8th of September. They numbered about 3,500 men, and were commanded by General Worth. The right wing consisted of Garland's brigade, with Huger's battery; the center of five hundred picked men, under Major Wright, of Worth's regiment, and the left of McIntosh's brigade, with Duncan's battery. Cadwallader's brigade formed a reserve in the rear of the American line. The sun arose and shone brightly upon the advancing columns of the Americans, and upon the grim walls of Molino del Rey. The battery of Huger opened the battle, and the Mexicans, aroused suddenly from their slumbers, were slow to reply; but at length they opened their guns, and the roar of heavy cannon shook the air. When Huger's guns had sufficiently shaken the walls of Molino, Wright's storming party, under the direction of Mason and Foster, rushed furiously to the assault. The Mexicans received them with a terrible fire of grape-shot and cannister; but the Americans advanced steadily through the fearful tempest, driving the enemy before them at the point of the bayonet. The ground over which the assailants advanced formed a gradual slope unsheltered by rock or tree, while the main body of the Mexicans lay concealed behind dikes and maguey plants, or were protected by the walls and parapets of the molino. The Mexicans abandoned their field-pieces to the Americans, who immediately turned the guns upon the retreating masses; but before they could be discharged, the Mexicans, perceiving the weakness of the force that had dispossessed them of their guns, rallied and returned to the charge with the utmost fury. Hurling a tempest of bullets within pistol-shot upon the enemy, the Mexicans rushed furiously forward, driving back the Americans with great slaughter, and bayoneting the wounded with savage glee. Major Wright and ten officers, and a great number of the rank and file of the gallant five hundred, were slain in this murderous conflict over the Mexican guns. General Worth immediately ordered Smith's light battalion, under Captain Kirby, and the right wing of Cadwallader's brigade to advance to the support of the repulsed storming party. The Americans advanced firmly amidst a fearful fire of musketry and artillery from the Mexicans, and assailed the enemy with such fury that they gave way, and for a second time the battery was captured. Meanwhile Garland's brigade, supported by Duncan's battery, assaulted the Mexican left, and after a bloody struggle drove the enemy from the strong works of the molino. Huger's battery-guns were now advanced to the captured position, and with the enemy's captured guns were opened upon the broken and retreating lines of the Mexicans. Duncan's battery in the mean time was opened on the Mexican right, and the 2d brigade, under McIntosh, was ordered forward to assail this point. This brigade crossed the front of Duncan's pieces, and the firing of those guns were discontinued for the moment. McIntosh gallantly led his men to the assault of the Casa Mata, a strong stone building a short distance from the molino. While McIntosh was advancing to assail this work, 4,000 Mexican cavalry, under General Alvarez, advanced toward the American left, with a view of attacking them in flank. Duncan's battery immediately changed its front, and Colonel Andrews, with the Voltigeurs, was ordered to support the battery. Major Sumner, with his 270 dragoons, was also directed to place himself in the vicinity of Duncan's guns, in order to profit by events, and pursue, when an opportunity was afforded, the enemy's retreating force. In making this movement, the dragoons were exposed to the fire from the Casa Mata, which inflicted considerable damage upon them. Two thousand of the Mexican cavalry, under the command of General Alvarez in person, advanced boldly toward Duncan's battery. Duncan reserved his first fire until the enemy had come within good cannister range, when he opened a terrible fire upon them, which threw them into confusion, which ended in disorderly flight. The flying cavalry precipitated themselves into the midst of the other division of two thousand, and the whole four thousand rushed like frightened sheep from the field. "Tell General Worth," said Duncan to an order from that officer, directing him to hold the Mexican cavalry in check, "to make himself perfectly easy; I can whip twenty thousand of them." Meanwhile McIntosh with his brigade steadily advanced against the Casa Mata. As his troops came within range the Mexicans opened a destructive fire upon him, cutting down officers and men in fearful profusion. Yet through this storm the gallant McIntosh urged his men, until he sank to the ground mortally wounded. The command devolved upon Martin Scott, a brave officer, who led the brigade until it reached the slope of the parapet that surrounded the citadel, when he also fell. Major White, his second in command, was badly wounded, and the Americans recoiled, and fell back for support upon Duncan's battery, which, having repulsed the Mexican horse, had resumed its former position. Duncan opened his guns upon the Casa Mata, and maintained a furious cannonade until the enemy abandoned the place, and fled wildly across the fields. The Mexicans were now in full retreat at all points. The Americans were everywhere victorious. The battle of Chapultepec followed shortly afterward, and the road to the city of Mexico was opened to the advance of the American army. The Americans lost in this battle 9 officers killed and 49 wounded, and 729 rank and file, killed and wounded. The Mexicans lost 1,500 killed and wounded, and 800 made prisoners.—Semmes's Service Afloat and Ashore.

MOLWITZ, A.D. 1741.—On the 10th of April, 1741, a battle was fought between the Prussians and Austrians, near Molwitz, a village of Prussian Silesia, in which the Austrians were defeated.

MONDOVI, A.D. 1796.—The battle of Mondovi, in Piedmont, was fought on the 21st of April, 1796, between the French under Napoleon, and the Sardinian troops under Colli. The Sardinians were defeated, and Colli retired to Cherasco with a loss of 2,000 men, 8 cannon, and 11 standards. General Dictrat was killed when the engagement was at its height, by a cannon-ball; his death created a great panic among his troops, which contributed greatly to the defeat of the entire army.

MONMOUTH, A.D. 1778.—Freehold, near which the famous battle of Monmouth Court-House was fought, is situated on a plain about thirty miles east of Trenton, N. J., and is the capital of Monmouth county.

The American army remained inactive in its encampment at Valley Forge, until, in 1778, when receiving intelligence that the British under Sir Henry Clinton had evacuated Philadelphia, Washington broke up his camp, and with his army commenced a pursuit. Sir Henry Clinton's destination was New York. To reach New York by land, it was necessary to traverse New Jersey, which, exhausted by a long war, and alive with enemies, afforded the British general but little opportunities to forage; and therefore he felt constrained to take with him a long train of carriages laden with provisions. The British left Philadelphia, on the 18th of June, and commenced the passage of the Delaware at Gloucester Point, about three miles below the city. Washington broke up his camp at Valley Forge immediately on receiving intelligence of the departure of the British; and having detached General Arnold with a small body of troops to occupy Philadelphia, crossed the Delaware with his army at Congyell's Ferry on the 20th and the two succeeding days. A council of war had been held at Valley Forge prior to the breaking up of the camp, in which it was decided to hang upon the rear of the enemy, and watch his movements without hazarding a battle. Washington, however, was of a different opinion. He could not make up his mind to see the enemy retreat with impunity; yet as the majority of the officers were against attacking, Washington felt constrained to submit. General Dickinson had been sent into New Jersey to assemble the militia under arms; and General Maxwell, with a considerable corps, was sent to their support. The New Jersey militia and Maxwell's corps were mutually to embarrass by every impediment in their power, the retreat of the British; to destroy the bridges; to break up the roads, and to fell trees, and to plant them in abattis. They were directed, however, to avoid hazardous movements and unexpected actions. The American army under Washington, after having crossed the Delaware, advanced as far as Hopewell, five miles from Trenton, where they halted, and Washington called a second council of war. The question of the chief, "Will it be advisable to hazard a general engagement," was decided in the negative. General Lee especially opposed it. The council recommended that Morgan's corps should gain the rear of the enemy's right flank; that Maxwell's brigade should hang on their left; and that Brigadier General Scott, with about 1,500 picked troops, should harass their rear and flanks. These troops were augmented by the New Jersey militia under General Dickinson, and some volunteer troops under General Cadwallader. Meanwhile the British army advanced toward Allentown. Their train of baggage-wagons and pack-horses, together with the soldiers, formed a line nearly 12 miles in length; and as they were obliged to construct bridges, and remove obstacles placed in their path by the New Jersey patriots, their progress was slow. Clinton finally reached Allentown, and finding that the American army under Washington was nearly in his front, changed his course, taking the road which led to Monmouth Court-House, whence he resolved to proceed to Sandy Hook, at which point Howe's fleet was waiting to convey the troops to New York. Washington at this time resolved upon a general action, notwithstanding the opposition of the majority of his officers; and he was warmly seconded in this decision by Generals Lafayette, Greene, and Wayne. Accordingly he immediately commenced making his dispositions for a battle. The Americans had now advanced as far as Kingston, on the Millstone river. Washington detached 1,000 men under General Wayne to reinforce the troops of Cadwallader; and as the simultaneous action of the several corps of Wayne, Cadwallader, Dickinson, Maxwell, and Morgan, was of the utmost importance, the American commander-in-chief intrusted General Lafayette with the command of the whole. They numbered in all about 4,000 men. The entire American army consisted of about 15,000 men; that of the British of nearly 20,000.

Early on the morning of the 27th of June, Lafayette proceeded with the advanced guard to Englishtown, about five miles west of Monmouth Court-House. The day was intensely hot, and the troops were excessively fatigued by their march. Sir Henry Clinton, on being informed of the movements of the enemy, changed his order of march, placing his baggage and provision wagons in front, and protecting his rear by his best troops. Having thus disposed his army, he took up a strong position near Monmouth Court-House. The baggage of the army was intrusted to the care of General Knyphausen; while Clinton himself, took command of the rear guard, which consisted of the Hessian grenadiers, the light infantry and chasseurs of the line. These movements on the part of the enemy, obliged Washington to support the American vanguard by other troops. He ordered General Lee, to push forward with two brigades. Lee, as a senior officer, took command of all the regular troops on his arrival at Englishtown, leaving to Lafayette that of the militia and light horse only. The main body of the American army, on the same day (June 27,) marched from Kingston, and encamped within three miles of Englishtown. The relative positions of the two armies were now as follows: Washington with the main army was encamped three miles from Englishtown, which was occupied by Generals Lee and Lafayette; the British army lay near Monmouth Court-House; Morgan's troops were hovering on the British right; and Dickinson with about 700 men threatened their left. Washington fearing lest Clinton should move his whole army to the heights of Middletown, which would afford him a position of increased strength, had on the previous evening resolved on an immediate attack.

Early on the morning of the 28th, Knyphausen, with the British vanguard and baggage train, moved into the valley and advanced toward Middletown; and was soon at a considerable distance from Monmouth Court-House. Clinton with his picked troops still maintained his position, to cover the removal of his baggage to the heights. It was a bright and beautiful Sabbath morning; the whole country hushed in the light of a June sun, and all nature was at rest, that peaceful rest which hovers over the country on a Sabbath day. But soon the rude noise of battle was to fill the balmy air, sulphurous clouds were to dim the rays of the sun, and the green earth was to be cumbered with mutilated corpses, and profaned by the life blood of men. The weather was hot and sultry, not a breeze disturbed the calmness of the groves, or subdued the intensity of the heat.

Washington's order of battle had been resolved upon the previous evening. Lee was to attack the enemy in front, while Morgan and Dickinson were to descend into the valley on both his flanks in order to assail the columns of Knyphausen. Early in the morning they moved toward the enemy. Clinton resumed his march at eight o'clock, and descended the heights of Freehold into the plain, where, perceiving that the Americans were in motion, and finding that Knyphausen was in great danger, he resolved to fight. Lee's whole force, exclusive of Morgan's and Dickinson's troops, amounted to about 4,000 men, and to these troops were now opposed the flower of the British army, led by Clinton and Cornwallis in person. The artillery began to play, and the Queen's dragoons charged furiously upon the American light horse, driving them back to the main line; and then retreating under a furious fire from the American guns. And now Lee gave an order which threw his whole army into confusion; and that order was to retreat. Bewildered by the strange conduct of their general, the Americans fled before the British in the utmost disorder. The enemy pursued them as far as the Court-House, where they halted, while the Americans continued their flight. Meanwhile Washington with the reserve was pushing forward to the support of Lee; and his astonishment and indignation knew no bounds when he found that general in full retreat. Spurring forward his horse, he rode up to Lee, and sternly inquired what was the cause of all the disorder and confusion? Lee retorted sharply, and harsh words passed between them. But time was too precious to be wasted. Washington wheeling his horse, hastened to the rear, and rallied a large portion of the regiments of Ramsay and Stewart, and then ordered two pieces of cannon under Oswald to be placed on an eminence and opened on the enemy. The fire of Oswald's guns deterred the enemy from pursuing; and the presence of Washington revived the drooped spirits of the soldiers, and in a few moments something like order again reigned in the American army. The British grenadiers maintained an incessant fire upon the broken ranks of the Americans; but under cover of Oswald's guns, and the well-directed musketry of Stewart and Ramsay's troops, the Americans re-formed, and in half an hour stood drawn up in battle order. Then advancing to Lee, he said, "Will you, sir, command these troops?" "I will," exclaimed Lee, eager to wipe out his disgrace. "Then forward and check the enemy immediately." "I shall obey," replied Lee.

Lee disposed his troops on more advantageous ground, and received the assault of the British with firmness. Like two contending tides they fought man to man, breast to breast. The rattle of musketry, the roar of artillery, the shouts of the infuriated soldiers, and the screams of the dying, loaded the air. The flashing scarlet of the British uniforms was mingled with the somber hue of their antagonists; and the strife was hot and furious. At length, the Americans, overwhelmed by superior numbers, fell back and withdrew, but in good order, behind Englishtown, to rally anew. The American rear guard, mean time, had arrived at the field of action. Washington planted these troops partly in a neighboring wood and partly upon a hill, on the left. On this eminence some pieces of cannon had been planted by Lord Stirling, and their fire severely annoyed the enemy. The infantry were drawn up in the center, at the foot of the hill in front of the enemy. The left wing was commanded by Lord Stirling, the right by General Greene. Washington took his station in the center. Wayne, with some light infantry, was posted upon an eminence, in advance of the main line; and upon a height on his right was a battery which commanded the elevation occupied by the enemy, and committed cruel havoc upon their left wing. The English, meeting with such a warm reception in front, endeavored to turn the left flank of the Americans, but were repulsed. They next turned toward the American right; but, met by a perfect tornado of iron from Knox's battery upon an elevated piece of ground, occupied by General Greene, they were obliged to fall back. Meanwhile, the Americans in the center, under Wayne, maintained an incessant fire, repulsing the repeated assaults of the royal grenadiers, commanded by Colonel Monckton. Monckton saw that unless Wayne should be driven from his position the day was lost. Spurring his horse through the ranks, he harangued his men, in a voice so clear that it reached the ears of the patriots; then forming them in a solid column, led on his troops with the utmost gallantry. The grenadiers advanced toward Wayne's troops, with the precision and regularity of a parade. Onward came that brilliant line of scarlet, with glittering weapons poised, and banners fluttering; on came the British grenadiers, with measured tread and lips compressed. A calm ensued. It was the prelude of the storm. "Forward!" shouted the gallant Monckton, and like bloodhounds trained to the fight, his men rushed madly on to the bayonet charge. The Americans were silent. Suddenly Wayne—Mad Anthony Wayne—gave the signal, and the American line blazed with lightnings which cast a tempest of lead into the bosoms of the advancing Britons. Almost every British officer fell. The brave Monckton was among them. The Americans rushed forward on their foes, and over the body of the prostrate Monckton a terrible conflict ensued; and along the entire line the battle raged furiously. The grenadiers were finally driven back, and the whole British army retreated to the heights occupied in the morning by General Lee. The new position of the British army was strong; woods and deep marshes covered their flanks, and their front was protected by a ravine narrow and deep, through which the enemy must pass before reaching it. Washington, however, resolved to renew the engagement; but the nature of the ground prevented him from gaining any decided action. Night fell upon the combatants. The roar of artillery died away. Washington postponed his attack until the following morning, and on the field the American army sought repose in sleep, after the fatigues of the day. Washington passed the night with his suite, under the branches of a huge oak. Morning dawned, and the Americans prepared for battle; but during the night Clinton had withdrawn his army; and Washington, taking into consideration the extreme heat of the weather, the fatigue of his troops, and the distance which the enemy had gained upon him during the night, relinquished the thought of pursuing the British. Thus terminated the battle of Monmouth, in which the honor of victory clearly belongs to the Americans, although the British dispute their claim. The Americans lost, on this occasion, in killed, six officers and sixty-one non-commissioned officers and privates, and 160 in wounded. The British lost 300 killed, and nearly the same number wounded, together with about 100 taken prisoners, and a great number of deserters.

Lee was court-martialed for his behavior at the commencement of the battle of Monmouth; and was found guilty of disobedience in not attacking the enemy when ordered to do so; for having made an unnecessary and disorderly retreat; and for disrespect to the commander-in-chief. He was sentenced to be suspended from his command for one year. Whether this sentence was too severe or too mild is a question of opinion; certain it is, however, that Lee's conduct at the commencement of the battle was such as to warrant the belief that he preferred seeing the Americans disgraced by a defeat, rather than Washington should be honored by a victory. His conduct during the balance of the day, was that of a brave and skillful officer.

MONS, A.D. 1425.—Mons, a fortified town of Belgium, has sustained several sieges. In 1425 it was taken by Jean IV., aided by Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy; in 1691, after an obstinate defense it was taken by Louis XIV., and was occupied by Eugene and Marlborough in 1709. It fell alternately into the hands of the French, Austrians, and Spaniards, until in 1794, it was taken by the French, who retained it until 1814, when it was finally united to Belgium.

MONTEBELLO, A.D. 1800.—Montebello is an Italian village, situated twenty-three miles north-east of Alexandria. Marshal Lannes, by his victory over the Austrians, near this place, won the title of Duke de Montebello.

The battle of Montebello occurred on the 9th of June, 1800, between the republican army of France and the imperialists. The advanced guard of the French was commanded by Lannes, while the main body of the Austrians, concentrated at Montebello, was under the supervision of Ott. He had stationed his forces, numbering some 15,000 chosen men, in the most advantageous position on the heights, their right resting on the eminences that form the roots of the Apennines, and commanded the road to Tortona, which wound round their feet, their left, extending into the plain, where their cavalry could act with effect. Lannes was, for a moment, startled at the sight of such an array, but seeing the disastrous effect which the slightest backward movement would have on a force with its rear resting on the Po, he resolved on instantly attacking the enemy. His army did not number more than 9,000 men, while those of his enemy were over 15,000 strong; but the division of Victor was not more than six miles in the rear and was soon expected. The French infantry, with great heroism, advanced in echelon, under a shower of grape-shot and musketry, to storm the hills on the right of the position of the Austrians, where strong batteries had been placed, which commanded the whole field of battle.

They were successful in carrying the heights of Revetta, but, being disordered by this success, they were assailed by six fresh regiments, and driven down into the plain. In the center, on the great road, the French division under Watrin maintained itself with the utmost difficulty against the vehement attacks of the imperialists; and, notwithstanding Lannes made such desperate efforts, defeat would have been certain, had not the arrival of a part of Victor's division enabled the republicans to rally their troops and prepare for a fresh attack. They immediately formed new columns to assail the heights on the left, while Watrin commenced a furious onset in the center. The Austrians were driven back at all points, and the victory of the French seemed sure, when Ott brought up his reserves from the second line, and victory again seemed the Austrians'. The republicans gave way, and the loud shouts of the imperialists announced a total overthrow, when the balance of Victor's division arrived, and the victory was again theirs. The Austrians would not yield, however, without a desperate struggle; they fought to gain time for a concentration of their forces to meet this new enemy, the republicans to avoid being driven back into the Po. The last reserves, on both sides, were soon engaged, and the contending parties fought hand-to-hand, with the most heroic gallantry. At length, Napoleon's arrival with the division Gardane, decided the victory. The right of Ott's division was turned, the center and left was now giving way, he therefore reluctantly gave the signal of retreat, and the imperialists, in good order, retreated toward St. Juliano, after putting a garrison of a thousand men into the fortress of Tortona. In this battle, the Austrians lost 3,000, killed and wounded, and 1,500 prisoners. The loss of the French, in slain and disabled, was nearly equal.

MONTENACKEN, A.D. 1213.—A great battle was fought in the vicinity of Montenacken, a town of Belgium, in 1213, between the Brabançons and the Liegeois, which resulted, after a most obstinate and bloody contest, in the total destruction of the Brabançons, who lost in the battle 3,000 men killed, and 4,000 made prisoners.

MONTENOTTE, A.D. 1796.—Montenotte is a village of Sardinia, in the Apennines, twenty-six miles west of Genoa.

The armies of the French and Austrians, while marching through the Alps, on their route to the sea coast, came in contact at Montenotte, in the early part of April, 1796. The Austrian general advanced his center to this place for the purpose of falling on the left flank of the French, and thus intercept, by occupying Savona, the road they were pursuing from Provence to Genoa. The imperialists, numbering some 10,000 men, commanded by Roccavina, encountering Colonel Rampou, at the head of 1,200 men, forced him to retire to an old redoubt; but he, knowing that much depended upon the possession of this important post, gallantly defended the fort, again and again repulsed the Austrians, and, in the midst of the fire, made his soldiers swear to conquer or die. With great difficulty he maintained his position until night, and thus by his bravery saved the French army, which would have been cut in two had this battle been lost. Roccavina was severely wounded, and forced to be removed. Before he left, he urged his successor, D'Argenteau, to renew the assault during the night, and gain possession of the fort, before the republicans could come to the aid of Colonel Rampou; but this advice he did not incline to obey. If he had, all would have been changed. While this attack at Montenotte was taking place, Napoleon was at Savona; but as soon as the intelligence became known to him, he resolved to crush the whole Austrian force which had thus pushed into the center of his line of march. Accordingly, he left Savona after dark, with the two divisions of Massena and Serrurier, and crossing the ridge of Calibane, occupied the heights in the rear of Montenotte. The darkness of the night entirely concealed their movements, and at daybreak, the Austrians found themselves surrounded on all sides. Their front was soon attacked by Rampou and La Harpe, while Messina and Joubert pressed their rear. Their resistance was long and brave, but the French force being so much more superior, they were completely routed, with the loss of five pieces of cannon, 2,000 prisoners, and 1,000 killed and wounded.

MONTEREAU, A.D. 1814.—This town is situated at the confluence of the rivers Seine and Yonne in France, forty-two miles south-east of Paris, and about ten miles south of Fontainebleau, in the famous forest bearing the name of the latter place.

The overwhelming forces of the allied armies of England, Prussia, Russia, and Austria, had entered France. In the month of February 1814, the whole plain between the Seine and the Loire, as far as Fontainebleau, was inundated with troops on their way to Paris. Paris was in consternation; it was reported in the capital that hordes of uncouth men, with long beards and barbarous manners, were approaching to lay waste the metropolis of science and the arts. Oudinot and Victor with 20,000 French troops had unsuccessfully but obstinately endeavored to check the advance of the allies; but borne back by the overwhelming tide of the enemy, they had gradually retreated, and the capital was in imminent danger, when Napoleon, at the head of his Guards and cuirassiers advanced across the valley of the Seine by Guignes through the forest of Brie. Having formed a junction with the forces of Victor and Oudinot at the cross roads of Chalons, the whole army halted, and the advance of the enemy was checked. The next day, Napoleon, assuming the offensive, marched against the enemy, and a combat between Wittgenstein's Russian advanced guard, and the French near Margis took place, which resulted in the defeat of the latter, with a loss of 3,000 men killed, wounded and made prisoners, with fifty-one pieces of artillery. At the same time, a conflict also took place between the Bavarians and the French near Montereau, in which the Bavarians were defeated with a loss of 2,500 men; but the French were unable to expel the enemy from that village, the town of Montereau. The rivers Seine and Yonne are here crossed by bridges of stone, which were in the possession of the allies. Napoleon immediately advanced against Montereau and on the evening of the 18th, the French troops were assembled in imposing masses on the heights of Surville, which overhang the town on the northern bank. Napoleon had not gained this position without a struggle; Branchi with the troops of Wirtemberg had during the night of the 17th, occupied them in force; but the French attacked them with such vigor that they retreated in the utmost disorder over the bridge into the town. Napoleon immediately established himself on the abandoned heights, and soon sixty pieces of cannon opened a close and concentric fire on the dense masses which were crowding over the bridge. The French cavalry protected by the fire of such a powerful battery on the heights above them, the mere discharges of which shivered every pane in the neighboring chateau of Surville to pieces, pressed so rapidly on the last column of the Wirtembergers, that there was no time to fire the trains with which the bridge was undermind; the pursuing horsemen crossed over, pell-mell, with the fugitives, the division of Duchesne rapidly pressed after them, and amid the shouts of the inhabitants, drove the enemy entirely out of Montereau, the allies retiring after having destroyed the bridge over the Yonne, which stopped the pursuit in the direction of Lens.

In this battle, the French lost about 2,500 men in killed and wounded. The allies lost 3,000 men killed and wounded, and 3,000 made prisoners. Six guns and four standards fell into the hands of the victors.

MONTEREY, A.D. 1846.—Monterey is situated on the Tigre, at the head of an extensive and beautiful valley, in Mexico, eighty-five miles east of Saltillo. In the year 1846, Monterey was taken by the United States army, under General Taylor. The following detailed account of the siege is taken from General Taylor's official account:

From information received while on the approach of the American army toward Monterey, General Taylor was induced to believe that the Mexicans were prepared to defend that place. Upon reaching the neighborhood of the city on the morning of the 19th of September this belief was fully confirmed. It was ascertained that the enemy occupied the town in force; that a large work had been constructed commanding all the northern approaches; and that the Bishop's Palace and some heights in the vicinity near the Saltillo road had also been fortified and occupied with troops and artillery. It was known from information previously received, that the eastern approaches were commanded by several small works in the lower edge of the city. The configuration of the heights and gorges in the direction of the Saltillo road, as visible from the point attained by the advance of the United States army on the morning of the 19th, led General Taylor to suspect that it was practicable to turn all the works in that direction, and thus cut the enemy's line of communication. After establishing his camp at the "Walnut Springs," three miles from Monterey, the nearest suitable position, General Taylor ordered a close reconnoisance of the ground in question, which was executed on the evening of the 19th by the engineer officers under the direction of Major Mansfield. A reconnoisance of the eastern approaches was at the same time made by Captain Williams of the topographical engineers. The examination made by Major Mansfield proved the entire practicability of throwing forward a column to the Saltillo road, and thus turning the position of the enemy. Deeming this to be an operation of essential importance, orders were given to Brevet Brigadier-General Worth, commanding the second division, to march with his command on the 20th; to turn the hill of the Bishop's palace; to occupy a position on the Saltillo road; and to carry the enemy's detached works in that quarter, where practicable. The first regiment of Texas mounted volunteers under command of Colonel Hays was associated with the second division on this service. Captain Sanders, engineers, and Lieutenant Meade, topographical engineers, were also ordered to report to General Worth for duty with his column.

At two o'clock, P. M., on the 20th, the second division broke up its march. It was soon discovered, by officers who were reconnoitering the town, and communicated to General Worth, that the movement had been perceived and that the army was throwing reinforcements toward the Bishop's Palace and the height which commands it. To divert his attention as far as practicable, the first division, under Brigadier-General Twiggs, and a field division of volunteers under Major-General Butler, were displayed in front of the town until dark. Arrangements were made at the same time to place in battery during the night, at a suitable distance from the enemy's works, the citadel, two 24 pounder howitzers, and a 10 inch mortar, with a view to open a fire on the following day, when General Taylor proposed to make a diversion in favor of General Worth's movement. The 4th infantry covered this battery during the night. General Worth had in the mean time reached and occupied for the night a defensive position just without range of a battery above the Bishop's Palace, having made a reconnoisance as far as the Saltillo road. General Taylor in his report, mentioned in detail only those operations which were conducted against the eastern extremity of the city or elsewhere under his immediate direction; the operations of General Worth were entirely distinct from those of Taylor, and for the particulars of his movements we are obliged to consult his own report.

Early on the morning of the 21st, Taylor received a note from General Worth, written at half-past nine o'clock the night before, suggesting, what he had already intended, a strong division against the center and left of the town to favor Worth's enterprise against the heights in rear. The infantry and artillery of the first division, and the field division of volunters were ordered under arms and took the direction of the city, leaving one company of each regiment as a camp-guard. The 2d dragoons under Lieutenant Colonel May, and Colonel Wood's regiment of Texas mounted volunteers, under the immediate command of General Henderson, were directed to the right to support General Worth, if necessary, and to make an impression if practicable, upon the upper quarter of the city. Upon approaching the mortar battery, the 1st and 3d regiments of infantry and battalions of Baltimore and Washington volunteers with Captain Bragg's field battery—the whole under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Garland—were directed toward the lower part of the town, with orders to make a strong demonstration, and carry one of the enemy's advanced works, if it could be done without heavy loss. Major Mansfield's engineers, and Captain Williams, and Lieutenant Pope's topographical engineers, accompanied this column; Major Mansfield being charged with its direction, and the designation of points of attack. In the mean time the mortar, served by Captain Ramsay, of the ordnance, and the howitzer battery under Captain Webster, 1st Artillery, had opened their fire upon the citadel, which was deliberately sustained and answered from the work. General Butler's division had now taken up a position in rear of this battery, when the discharges of artillery mingled finally with a rapid fire of small arms, showed that Lieut. Col. Garland's command had become warmly engaged. To support this attack, Taylor ordered the 4th infantry and the regiments of Butler's division to march at once by the left flank in the direction of the advanced work at the lower extremity of the town, leaving one regiment (1st Kentucky) to cover the mortar and howitzer battery. By some mistake, two companies of the 4th infantry did not receive this order, and consequently did not join the advanced companies until some time afterward.

Garland's command had approached the town in a direction to the right of the advanced work (No. 1) at the north-eastern angle of the city, and the engineer officer, covered by skirmishers, had succeeded in entering the suburbs and gaining cover. The remainder of this command now advanced and entered the town under a heavy fire of artillery from the citadel and the works on the left and of musketry from the houses and small works in front. A movement on the right was attempted with a view to gain the rear of No. 1, and carry that work; but the troops were so much exposed to a fire which they could not effectually return, and had already sustained severe loss, particularly in officers, that it was deemed best to withdraw them to a more secure position. Captain Bacchus, 1st infantry, however, and a portion of his own and other companies, had gained the roof of a tannery which looked directly into the gorge of No. 1, and from which he poured a most destructive fire into that work and upon the strong building in the rear. This fire happily coincided in point of time with the advance of a portion of the volunteer division upon No. 1, and contributed largely to the fall of that strong and important work.

The three regiments of the volunteer division under the immediate command of Major General Butler, had in the mean time, advanced in the direction of No. 1. The leading brigade, under Quitman, continued its advance upon that work, preceded by three companies of the 4th infantry, while Butler with the 1st Ohio regiment, entered the town to the right. The companies of the 4th infantry had advanced within shot range of the work, where they were received by a fire that almost in one moment struck down one third of the officers and men, and rendered it necessary to retire and effect a conjunction with the two other companies then advancing. General Quitman's brigade, though suffering most severely, particularly in the Tennessee regiment, continued its advance, and finally carried the work in handsome style, as well as the strong building in its rear. Five pieces of artillery, a considerable supply of ammunition, and thirty prisoners, including three officers, fell into their hands. Butler, with the first Ohio regiment, after entering the edge of the town, discovered that nothing was to be accomplished in his front, and, at this point, yielding to the suggestions of several officers, Taylor ordered a retrograde movement; but learning almost immediately, that the battery No. 1 was captured, the order was countermanded, and he determined to hold that battery, and defenses already gained. General Butler, with the 1st Ohio regiment, then entered the town, at a point further to the left, and marched in the direction of battery No. 2. While making an examination, with a view to ascertain the possibility of carrying this second work by storm, the general was first wounded, and soon after compelled to quit the field. As the strength of No. 2, and the heavy musketry fire flanking the approach, rendered it impossible to carry it without great loss, the 1st Ohio regiment was withdrawn from the town. Fragments of the various regiments engaged, were now under cover of the captured battery, and some buildings in its front on the right. The field batteries of Captains Bragg and Ridgely were also partially covered by the battery. An incessant fire was kept up on this position from battery No. 2, and other works on its right, and from the citadel on all our approaches. General Twiggs, though quite unwell, joined me at this point, and was instrumental in causing the artillery captured from the enemy to be placed in battery, and served by Captain Ridgely against No. 2, until the arrival of Captain Webster's howitzer battery, which took its place. In the mean time, Taylor directed such men as could be collected of the 1st, 3d, and 4th regiments, and Baltimore battalion, to enter the town, penetrating to the right, and carry the 2d battery if possible. This command, under Lieutenant-Colonel Garland, advanced beyond the bridge "Purisima," when, finding it impracticable to gain the rear of the 2d battery, a portion of it sustained themselves for some time in that advanced position; but as no permanent impression could be made at that point, and the main object of the general operation had been effected, the command, including a section of Captain Ridgely's battery, which had joined it, was withdrawn to Battery No. 1. During the absence of this column, a demonstration of cavalry was reported in the direction of the citadel. Captain Bragg, who was at hand, immediately galloped with his battery to a suitable position, from which a few discharges effectually dispersed the enemy. Captain Miller, 1st infantry, was dispatched with a mixed command, to support the battery on this service. The enemy's lancers had previously charged upon the Ohio and a part of the Mississippi regiment, near some fields at a distance from the edge of the town, and had been repulsed with a considerable loss. A demonstration of cavalry on the opposite side of the river was also dispersed in the course of the afternoon by Captain Ridgely's battery, and the squadrons returned to the city. At the approach of the evening, all the troops that had been engaged were ordered back to camp, except Captain Ridgely's battery, and the regular infantry of the 1st division, who were detailed as a guard for the works during the night, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Garland. One battalion of the 1st Kentucky regiment was ordered to reinforce this command. Intrenching tools were procured, and additional strength was given to the works, and protection to the men, by working parties during the night, under the direction of Lieutenant Scarritt, engineers.

The main object proposed in the morning had been effected. A powerful diversion had been made to favor the operations of the 2d division, one of the enemy's advanced works had been carried, and we now had a strong foot-hold in the town. But this had not been accomplished without a heavy loss, embracing some of our gallant and promising officers. The number of killed and wounded incident to the operations in the lower part of the city on the 21st was 394.

Early in the morning of the 21st, the advance of the second division encountered the enemy in force, and after a brief but sharp conflict, repulsed him with heavy loss. General Worth, then succeeded in gaining a position on the Saltillo road, thus cutting off the enemy's line of communication. From this position the two heights south of the Saltillo road were carried in succession, and the gun taken in one of them turned upon the Bishop's Palace. These important successes were fortunately obtained with comparatively small loss; Captain McKavett, 8th infantry, being the only officer killed.

The 22d day of September passed without any active operations in the lower part of the city. The citadel and other works continued to fire at parties exposed to their range, and at the work now occupied by our troops. The guard left it in the preceding night, except Captain Ridgely's company, which was relieved at mid-day by General Quitman's brigade; Captain Bragg's battery was thrown under cover in front of the town to repel any demonstration of cavalry in that quarter. At dawn of day, the height above the Bishop's Palace was carried, and soon after meridian, the Palace itself was taken and its guns turned upon the fugitive garrison. The object for which the second division was detached had thus been completely accomplished, and General Taylor felt confident that with a strong force occupying the road and heights in his rear, and a good position below the city in our possession, the enemy could not possibly maintain the town.

During the night of the 22d, the enemy evacuated nearly all his defenses in the lower part of the city. This was reported to me early in the morning of the 23d, by General Quitman, who had already meditated an assault upon those works. Taylor immediately sent instructions to that officer, leaving it to his discretion to enter the city, covering his men by the houses and walls, and advance carefully as far as he might deem prudent. After ordering the remainder of the troops as a reserve, under the orders of Brigadier General Twiggs, Taylor repaired to the abandoned works, and discovered that a portion of General Quitman's brigade had entered the town, and were successfully forcing their way toward the principal plaza. The second regiment of Texas mounted volunteers was then ordered up, who entered the city, dismounted, and, under the immediate orders of General Henderson, co-operated with General Quitman's brigade. Captain Bragg's battery was also ordered up, supported by the 3d infantry; and after firing for some time at the cathedral, a portion of it was likewise thrown into the city. Our troops advanced from house to house, and from square to square, until they reached a street but one square in rear of the principal plaza, in and near which the enemy's force was mainly concentrated. This advance was conducted vigorously, but with due caution, and although destructive to the enemy, was attended with but small loss on our part. Captain Ridgely, in the mean time, had served a captured piece in battery number one, against the city, until the advance of our men rendered it imprudent to fire in the direction of the cathedral. Taylor was now satisfied that he could operate successfully in the city, and that the enemy had retired from the lower portion of it to make a stand behind his barricades. As General Quitman's brigade had been on duty the previous night, he determined to withdraw the troops to the evacuated works, and concert with General Worth a combined attack upon the town. The troops accordingly fell back deliberately in good order, and resumed their original positions, General Quitman's brigade being relieved after nightfall by that of General Hamer. On his return to camp, Taylor met an officer with the intelligence that General Worth, induced by the firing in the lower part of the city, was about making an attack at the upper extremity, which had also been evacuated by the enemy to a considerable distance. He regretted that this information had not reached him before leaving the city, but still deemed it inexpedient to change his orders, and accordingly returned to the camp. A note from General Worth, written at eleven o'clock, P.M., informed him that he had advanced to within a short distance of the principal plaza, and that the mortar (which had been sent to his division in the morning) was doing good execution within effective range of the enemy's position.

Desiring to make no further attempt upon the city without complete concert as to the lines and mode of approach, Taylor instructed that officer to suspend his advance until he could have an interview with him on the following morning at his head-quarters.

Early on the morning of the 24th, Taylor received, through Colonel Moreno, a communication from General Ampudia, proposing to evacuate the town; which, with the answer, were forwarded with my first dispatch. He arranged with Colonel Moreno a cessation of firing until twelve o'clock, at which hour he would receive the answer of the Mexican general at General Worth's headquarters, to which he soon repaired. In the mean time, General Ampudia had signified to General Worth his desire for a personal interview with him, to which he acceded, and which finally resulted in a capitulation, placing the town and the material of war, with certain exceptions, in our possession.

Upon occupying the city it was discovered to be of great strength in itself, and to have its approaches carefully and strongly fortified. The town and works were armed with forty-two pieces of cannon, well supplied with ammunition, and manned with a force of at least 7,000 troops of the line, and from 2,000 to 3,000 irregulars. The force under Taylor's orders before Monterey, was 425 officers, and 6,220 men. Our artillery consisted of one ten-inch mortar, two twenty-four pounder howitzers, and four light field-batteries, of four guns each—the mortar being the only piece suitable to the operations of a siege. Our loss was twelve officers and 108 men killed; thirty-one officers and 337 men wounded. That of the enemy was not known, but is believed considerably to exceed our own.

General Worth's operations against the western side of the town were briefly as follows: on the 20th of September he moved toward the Saltillo road, and having discovered that the heights west of the Bishop's Palace, were strongly occupied and fortified, and that besides these two, the eminence on which the palace stands was occupied above that building, which, with a fort adjoining it, was also strongly defended, he resolved that the two heights first mentioned should be taken the next day, before assailing the Palace itself. On the next day, therefore, the Texan rangers, and Louisiana volunteers, with the regular troops, were ordered to the assault, and the heights were carried in fine style. The United States troops immediately took possession of the heights, and the guns of the one nearest the palace were immediately turned upon that edifice and its defenders.

Early the next morning, a detachment consisting of artillery, infantry, and Texans, under the general command of Colonel Childs, was ordered to take possession of the heights above the Palace. With such secresy was this movement made, that the troops had arrived within 300 feet of the enemy's works before they were discovered.

The assailants carried the works gallantly, and the Mexicans fled in dire confusion down the steep declivity to the palace. A howitzer, with great labor, was dragged to the summit of the eminence above the Palace, and was opened upon the building, which was now crowded with Mexicans. The Mexicans made a gallant charge up the hill against the enemy, but were repulsed, and the howitzer sent its lightning upon the Palace with visible effect, while volley after volley of musketry was poured upon its defenders. At about twelve o'clock, the Mexican cavalry advanced before the Palace and charged the skirmishers furiously; but Captain Vinton, with some light troops, received them with so much warmth, that they were hurled back, and many endeavored to re-enter the palace, in vain. At this moment, Colonel Childs ordered a general assault. The Americans rushed down the hill, and through a breach made by the howitzers, and attacked the Mexicans with a fierceness which they could not withstand. In a short time, the assailants were in full possession of the Palace, with the adjoining fort. On the morning of the 23d, General Worth opened the guns of the Palace and fort upon the city. Having driven the Mexicans from their works outside the city, General Worth now entered the city from the western side. The Mexicans met the Americans in the street, contesting every inch of ground with the utmost pertinacity. From windows and house-tops, the Americans were assailed by their numerous foes; but they fought their way over every obstacle, until they reached a square, where they remained for the night, occupying the houses on both sides, and pouring forth incessant and destrucrive showers of grape-shot, shell and musketry. The Mexican defensive works were all in the hands of the Americans, except the citadel near the center of the town. The Mexican troops were concentrated in or around the grand plaza, near the citadel. Worth now set his sappers and miners at work, and in the same manner that was afterward so successfully pursued by the same general in the capture of the city of Mexico. The Texans and Mississippians, with pick-axe and crow-bar, worked their way through the houses, until they had reached the vicinity of the enemy. A battery was erected, unknown to the enemy, and nothing remained but to hurl down a slight wall which masked it, to enable the Americans to pour a tempest into the unsuspecting Mexicans, which would undoubtedly have astonished them; but at this point, further operations were suspended by the conference between Taylor and the Mexican general.

MONTGOMERY, A.D. 1294.—Montgomery, a town of north Wales, formerly contained a castle, which, from its size and strength, was frequently an object of contention during the wars between England and Wales. The last battle, which decided the fate of Wales, was fought near Montgomery, between the English and Welsh, in 1294.

MONTMIRAIL, A.D. 1814.—A battle was fought near Montmirail, in France, on the 11th and 12th of February, 1814, between the French army under Napoleon, and the allied Russian and Prussian army under Olsoofief and Sacken, which resulted in the total destruction of the allies, with a loss of 6,000 men, in the battle and retreat, seventeen guns, and five standards. The French lost about 1,000 men.

MONTMORENCI.—See Quebec.

MOODKEE, A.D. 1845.—Near Moodkee, a village of western Hindostan, in 1845, was fought the first battle between the Sikhs and the British forces, in which the latter were victorious.

MOORE'S CREEK BRIDGE, A.D. 1776.—Moore's Creek is a small stream in North Carolina, running from north to south, and emptying into the South river, about twenty miles above Wilmington.

Donald McDonald, an influential and loyal Highlander, at Cross Creek (now Fayetteville), North Carolina, having received from Martin, the British governor of the province, a brigadier-general's commission, with a large number of copies of a proclamation calling on all the loyal subjects of the King of England, in North Carolina, to join his standard, set up a recruiting-station at Cross Creek, and issued the proclamation. The loyal Scotchmen of the district answered the call in considerable numbers; and in a few days more than 1,000 had enrolled themselves under his colors. Some other of the inhabitants joined them, so that McDonald's force consisted of about 1,500 men. At this time, Colonel James Moore of Hanover, had under his command a body of regular troops, and a detachment of New Hanover militia, in all about 1,100 men; and having received intelligence of the gathering of the loyalists under McDonald, advanced toward Cross Creek, and encamped about twelve miles south of the enemy's head-quarters. The patriots fortified their camp, and by exercising the utmost vigilance, cut off all means of communication between McDonald and Governor Martin, who was at Wilmington. McDonald saw the necessity of dislodging the enemy, and marched with his troops to attack them. Upon arriving within about four miles of the patriots, he halted, and sent a proclamation and a letter to Colonel Moore. In the letter he firmly, but in a friendly manner, urged the patriot commander to prevent bloodshed by joining the royalists; at the same time assuring him that refusal would subject him to the treatment due to rebels. Moore replied in the same spirit; inviting McDonald to espouse the holy cause of Freedom, and threatening, in case of non-compliance, to attack him at once. McDonald, on this, thought fit not to hazard an engagement, but to attempt to join Martin at Wilmington. He hastily decamped, and pushed forward rapidly toward the South river, closely pursued by the patriots under Moore. As the royalists approached the mouth of Moore's Creek, they stumbled upon the camp of Colonels Littington and Caswell, who, with the minute-men of Wake, Craven, Johnson, and Dobbs counties, and battalions from Wilmington and Newbern, were seeking for McDonald's army. The patriots were about 1,000 strong. McDonald was thus placed in an awkward position. Before him were the minute-men, whose very name struck terror to the heart of the Tory; and his rear was threatened by Moore with his regulars. On the night of the 26th of February, both parties were in sight of each other. They awaited the dawn before commencing the action. During the night the patriots strengthened their position by casting up a breast-work, and removing the planks from the bridge across the creek, and prepared to dispute the passage to the last. The day broke, and from the Scottish camp arose the clear blast of a score of bag-pipes calling the Highlanders to arms. The command of the royalists was intrusted to Captain McLeod, McDonald being too ill to leave his tent. The Highlanders rushed gallantly toward the river; but when arriving within thirty paces of the enemy's works, they were greeted by a fire of musketry which checked them in their career, and the Americans, leaping from behind the breastwork, sprang into the midst of the enemy, and for ten minutes a bloody conflict raged. Captain McLeod was killed at the very first attack; and the second in command, Captain John Slocum, fell mortally wounded. At this moment an American detachment gained the rear of the Highlanders, and assailed them so fiercely that they were put to rout and dispersed, and many were made prisoners. The royalists lost 70 killed and wounded. The American loss was trifling; one man killed and one wounded. Soon after the close of the engagement, Captain Moore arrived, and the united forces spent the day in rejoicing over their victory.

MORAT, A.D. 1476.—On the 22d of June, 1476, a bloody battle was fought in the immediate vicinity of Morat, in Swizerland, between the Swiss and the army of Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy. The invaders were defeated with great loss. Byron thus celebrates this victory:

> "Morat! the proud, the patriot field, where man
> May gaze on ghastly trophies of the slain,
> Nor blush for those who conquered on that plain,
> Here Burgundy bequeathed his tombless host,
> A bony heap through ages to remain, > Themselves their monument."—Childe Harold.

The losses of the Burgundians were enormous; 15,000 soldiers, it is said, were left on the field, exclusive of those who were drowned in their flight, in the lake of Morat. The bones of the slain were afterward collected in memory of the battle, in a square building called the ossuary. This strange monument stood three hundred years, when, in 1798, it was destroyed by the Burgundian soldiers in the French army. But though nothing could surpass the courage and devotion exhibited by the Swiss at Morat, it is evident that the defeat of Charles on this occasion was owing quite as much to his rashness and folly as to the bravery of his enemies. The principal strength of the duke's army consisted in his cavalry; and yet he chose for his field of action a ground so rugged and broken that they could not operate.

MORELLA, A.D. 1838.—Morella, in Spain, in 1838, was taken by surprise by the troops of Cabrera, during a violent snow-storm; and in 1840 it was recaptured by Espartero, after a very gallant resistance.

MORGARTEN, A.D. 1315.—On the 15th of November, 1315, a battle took place on Morgarten, a mountain of Switzerland, between the Swiss and the Austrians. The Austrian army consisted of 20,000 men, and was commanded by the Archduke Leopold; the Swiss army numbered only 1,300 men, yet this gallant little band attacked the Austrians with such vigor that the troops of Leopold were defeated and put to flight. This was the first battle fought for Swiss independence. In 1798 a French force was also defeated at this place by the Swiss.

MOSCOW, A. D. 1812.—Moscow in Russia is one of the largest cities of Europe. It was taken by Tamerlane in 1382, and afterward fell into the hands of the Tartars, whose last attack upon it was in 1571, when they set it on fire.

The disasters of Napoleon's campaign in Russia have been portrayed by French writers, who were eye-witnesses of this signal defeat of the once favored child of fortune. With an immense army Napoleon entered the Russian territory in June, 1812. The battle of Borodino was fought on the 7th of September; on the 9th of September Moscow was burned, and on the 6th of November commenced the horrors of that retreat which were so awfully increased by the bloody passage of the Beresina. The following account of the burning of Moscow, and of the retreat, is taken from the narrative of Segur, who was an eye-witness of the one, and a participant in the other:

At day-break our corps left the village, where it had encamped, and marched upon Moscow. As we drew near the city, we observed that it had no walls, and that a simple parapet of earth was the only work which formed the outer inclosure. We had hitherto seen nothing to indicate that the capital was inhabited, and the road by which we arrived was so deserted that we did not see a single Muscovite, nor even a French soldier. No noise, no cry, was heard amid this imposing solitude; anxiety alone guided our footsteps, which was redoubled when we perceived a column of thick smoke arising from the center of the city. At first we imagined that it only proceeded from some magazines, to which the Russians, as usual, had set fire in their retreat. Eager to know the cause of this conflagration, we sought in vain for some one who could tranquillize our restless curiosity; but the impossibility of satisfying it redoubled our impatience and increased our alarm.

In conformity with the desolating plan of the campaign, the ruin of the ancient capital of the czars had been determined. The criminals confined in the different prisons received their liberty on condition of setting fire to the city, as soon as it should be in the possession of the French army. In order to insure its destruction, the engines, and every means by which the fire might have been extinguished, were removed or destroyed. The exchange was the first building that fell a prey to the flames. The stores contained an immense quantity of the most valuable commodities of Europe and Asia; the cellars were filled with sugar, oils, and resin, which burned with great fury. The French endeavored to check the progress of the devouring element, but they soon discovered that their efforts were useless. The fire breaking out in different quarters of the city, and increased by a high wind, spread with dreadful rapidity. So great a calamity impressed even the most hardened minds with the presentiment that the wrath of divine justice would one day fall on the first authors of this frightful devastation.

A great part of the population had concealed themselves in their houses, from the terror caused by our arrival, but they left them as the flames reached their asylums. Fear had rendered their grief dumb, and as they tremblingly quitted their retreats, they carried off their most valuable effects, while those who were possessed of more sensibility, actuated by natural feelings, sought only to save the lives of the parents or the children. On one side we saw a son carrying a sick father; on the other, women who poured the torrent of their tears on the infants whom they clasped in their arms. They were followed by the rest of their children, who, fearful of being lost, ran crying after their mothers. Old men, overwhelmed more by grief than by the weight of years, were seldom able to follow their families; many of them, weeping for the ruin of the country, lay down to die near the houses where they were born. The streets, the public squares, and especially the churches, were crowded with these unhappy persons, who mourned as they lay on the remains of their property, but showed no signs of despair. The victors and the vanquished were become equally brutish; the former by excess of fortune, the other by excess of misery.

The hospitals, containing more that 12,000 wounded, began to burn. The heart, frozen with horror, recoils at the fatal disaster which ensued. Almost all these wretched victims perished. The few who were still living were seen crawling half burned, under the smoking ashes, or groaning under the heaps of dead bodies, making ineffectual efforts to extricate themselves.

It is impossible to depict the confusion and tumult that ensued when the whole of this immense city was given up to pillage. Soldiers, sutlers, galley-slaves, and prostitutes ran through the streets, penetrated the deserted palaces, and carried off every thing that could gratify their insatiable desires.

Dismayed by so many calamities, I had hoped that the shades of night would vail the dreadful scene; but darkness, on the contrary, rendered the conflagration more terrible. The flames, which extended from north to south, burst forth with greater violence, and agitated by the wind, seemed to reach the sky. Clouds of smoke marked the track of the rockets that were hurled by the incendiary criminals from the tops of the steeples, and which at a distance resembled falling stars. But nothing was so terrific as the dread that reigned in every mind, and which was heightened in the dead of the night by the shrieks of the unfortunate creatures who were massacred, or by the cries of young females, who fled for refuge to the palpitating bosoms of their mothers, and whose ineffectual struggles only served to inflame the passions of their violators. To these heart-piercing groans were added the howlings of the dogs that were chained to the gates of the palaces, according to the custom of Moscow, and were unable to escape the flames that enveloped them.

Many of our soldiers fell victims to their own rapacity, which induced them, heedless of the extreme risk, to brave every danger; excited by the love of plunder, they rushed into the midst of the fire and smoke; they waded in blood, trampling on the dead bodies, while the ruins and pieces of burning wood fell upon their murderous hands. Perhaps all would have perished had not the insupportable heat at length compelled them to take refuge in their camp.

On the 6th of November the sky declared itself. Its azure disappeared. The army marched enveloped in cold vapors, which soon thickened into a vast cloud, and descended in large flakes of snow upon us. It seemed as if the sky were coming down and uniting with this hostile land and people to complete our ruin. All things are indistinguishable; while the soldier struggles to force his way through the drifting whirlwind, the driven snow fills up all hollows, and its surface conceals unknown depths which yawn under our feet. The men are swallowed by them, and the weakest, resigning themselves to fate, there find a grave. Those who follow turn aside, but the storm dashes in their faces the snow from heaven and the drift from the earth, and seems to oppose itself rancorously to their march. The Russian winter, under this new form, attacks them from all sides; it pierces their thin dress and torn shoes. Their wet clothes freeze on them, a sharp and strong wind impedes their breath, which at the instant of expiration forms round the mouth icicles depending from the beard. The wretches, shivering, still draw themselves on, till the snow which clogs their feet, or some chance obstacle, causes them to stumble and fall. There they groan in vain; the snow soon covers them; slight elevations alone distinguish them; behold their graves! Everywhere the road is strewn with these undulations like a burial-ground; the most fearless, the most unfeeling are moved, and turn aside their eyes as they pass in haste. But before, around, every thing is snow—the sight is lost in this immense and sad uniformity; the imagination is astounded; it is like a huge winding-sheet, with which nature envelopes the army, The only objects which appear from out it, are sombre pines, trees of the tombs, with their funereal verdure, and the gigantic fixedness of their black trunks, and their deep gloom, completes this desolate aspect of a general mourning, and of an army dying amid the decease of nature. * * * Then comes the night, a night of sixteen hours! But on that snow which covers all things, one knows not where to stop, where to rest, where to find roots for food, or dry wood for firing. However, fatigue, darkness, and repeated orders stop those whom their own physical and moral force, and the efforts of their officers have retained together. They seek to establish themselves; but the ever active storm scatters the first preparations for a bivouac. The pines, laden with hoar frost resist the flames; and the snow upon them, mixed with that which falls continually from the sky, and that lying on the earth, which melt with the efforts of the soldier, and the first effect of the fires, extinguishes those fires and the strength and courage of the men.

When the flame at length is raised, officers and soldiers prepare around it their sad meal, composed of lean and bloody fragments of flesh, torn from worn-out horses, and, for a very few, some spoonfuls of rye flour diluted with snow-water. The next day soldiers, laid stone-dead in circles, mark the bivouac, and the ground about them is strewed with the bodies of many thousand horses.

From this day, men began to reckon less upon each other. In this army, lively, susceptible of all impressions, and inclined to speculate from its advanced civilization, disorder soon gained footing, discouragement and insubornination spread rapidly, the imagination wandering without bounds in evil as well as good. Henceforward at every bivouac, at every difficult passage, some portion of the yet organized troops detached itself, and fell into disorder. Yet there were some who resisted this mighty contagion; they were the officers, subalterns, and seasoned soldiers. These were extraordinary men; they encouraged themselves by repeating the name of Smolensk, which they felt they were approaching, and where every thing had been promised to them.

Thus since this deluge of snow, and the redoubled cold which it announced, all, officers and soldiers alike, preserved or lost their strength of mind, according to their age, their character or temperament. He of our chiefs, whom till then we had seen the strictest in maintaining discipline, now found himself no longer in his element. Thrown out of all his fixed ideas of regularity, and method, he was reduced to despair by so universal a disorder, and judging sooner than others that all was lost, he felt himself ready to abandon all.

The Russians upon the evacuation of Moscow by the French army, re-entered the city. It has been since rebuilt.

MOTYA, B.C. 404.—In the year 412, B.C. Dionysius the tyrant, made a treaty of peace with the Carthaginians, with no other object than to make the necessary preparations for the war which he meditated against them. He turned all Syracuse, as it were, into a common workshop. In all parts of the city men were to be seen making swords, helmets, shields, and military engines, and the enormous ship-yards were active with carpenters busily engaged in building vessels for the fleet. In the year 404, B.C., after all things were ready, Dionysius opened the campaign with the siege of Motya, a city in Sicily which the Carthaginians occupied as a magazine. The Syracusans advanced upon the city with huge battering-rams, and with towers six stories high. Each story of these towers was crowded with armed men, who discharged furious volleys of arrows, and stones from catapults, upon the inhabitants of the city. At length after a long and desperate resistance, the city was taken by storm, and its inhabitants put to the sword, except those who took refuge in the sanctuary. The city was then plundered by the soldiers, and Dionysius, after strongly garrisoning it, left it to the governship of one whom he could trust, and returned to Syracuse. In the following year the Carthaginians under command of Imilcon re-took Motya by force of arms.

MOUNT TABOR, A.D. 1799.—On the 9th of April, Kleber, at the head of a division of the French army, resolved to make an attack on the Turkish camp at Tabor, in Egypt. His intention was to take them by surprise, but his design was anticipated by the enemy, and they advanced to meet him with 15,000 horse, and as many infantry, as far as the village of Fouri. Kleber instantly formed his little army in squares, with the artillery at the angles, and he had hardly done this, when the immense number of the Turks came thundering down, threatening to trample the handful of French under their horses' feet. The steady aim and the rolling fire of the French brought down the foremost of the assailants, and a rampart was soon formed of dead bodies of men and horses, behind which they fought bravely for six hours, until Napoleon arrived with a fresh division, on the height which overlooked the field of battle, and among the multitudes with which the field was covered, distinguished his troops by the regularity of the fire which came from the ranks, forming steady flaming spots amid the moving mass by which they were surrounded. His plans were formed in a moment.

General Letourcq was dispatched with the cavalry and two pieces of light artillery, against the Mamelukes who were in reserve at the foot of the mountain of Naplouse, while the division of Bon, divided into two squares, advanced to the attack of the flank and the rear of the large force which was surrounding Kleber's division; and Napoleon, with the cannon and guides, pressed them in front. A twelve-pounder was fired from the heights, to convey the intelligence that relief was at hand; and Kleber, resuming the offensive, extended his ranks, and charged the mass that had so long annoyed him, with the bayonet. The immense superiority of European discipline was then apparent; the Turks, attacked in so many quarters at once, and exposed to a concentric fire from all the squares, were unable to make any resistance; no measures to stop the enemy or secure a retreat were taken, and the confused troops, mowed down by the discharges of grape-shot, fled in great disorder behind Mount Tabor; and finding the Bridge of Jacob occupied by Murat, rushed in desperation, in the night, through the river Jordan, and many were drowned. This great victory gained by 6,000 veterans over a brave but undisciplined mass of 30,000 oriental militia, completely secured the flank and rear of Napoleon's army. The defeat was complete; the Turkish camp, with all their baggage and ammunition, had fallen into the hands of the victorious army, and the Mamelukes were dispersed, never again to return.

MOWBRAY, A.D. 1644.—In 1644, during the civil war, a battle occurred at Melton Mowbray, in England, between the royalists and the troops of parliament, in which the latter, after a bloody action, were signally defeated.

MOXACAR, A.D. 1488.—This place, a city of Spain, was captured from the Moors by the army of Ferdinand and Isabella in 1488.

MUNDA, B.C. 45.—Munda is the ancient name of a town of Spain 28 miles west of Malaga.

In the month of March in the year 45 B.C., the armies of Cæsar and Pompey were drawn up in hostile array in the plain of Munda, about five miles from each other. The army of Pompey was composed of natives of Spain, Roman citizens, and many veterans of the Roman legion. They were all filled with the courage of men who expected no mercy from a victorious army, and awaited Cæsar's approach with a firm countenance. At the first onset the troops of Cæsar were routed and put to flight. In this extremity that general ran into the ranks of his own men crying "You are giving me up to boys!" and wresting a sword and shield from a soldier, and saying that here he should end his life and services, he took a place in the ranks as a common soldier. His men animated by these words and the undaunted bearing of their general returned to the fight with such impetuosity that the enemy were put to flight with fearful slaughter: 30,000 fell on the field and in the flight. Among them were 3,000 Roman citizens of high condition, with Sabienus and Accius Varus at their head. Seventeen officers of rank were taken, with thirteen Roman eagles. Cæsar lost 1,000 men killed, and 500 men wounded.

MUOLTA, A.D. 1799.—The village of Muolta stands in the valley of Muoltan in Switzerland, in which in 1799 a bloody battle was fought between the French army, under Massena, Mortier, and Lecourbe, and the Russians under Suwarrow. The Russians were nearly surrounded by their enemies; but by a master-stroke on the part of their general they cut their way through, and succeeded in effecting a retreat in good order.

MYCALE, B.C. 479.—On the same day that the Greeks won the battle of Platæa, their naval forces obtained a memorable victory in Asia over the Persian fleet. The Persians had retreated with their fleet to Mycale, a promontory of the continent of Asia, where their land army consisting of 100,000 men, who were the remainder of those that Xerles had carried back from Greece the year before, was encamped. Here they drew their vessels ashore, which was a common practice among the ancients, and surrounded them with a strong rampart. The Grecians followed them to the very place, and with the help of the Ionians defeated their land army, forced their rampart, and burned all their vessels.

MYLÆ.—In the year 259 before Christ, the Roman and Carthaginian fleet met near the coast of Mylæ and prepared for an engagement. As the Roman galleys, by their being clumsily and hastily built, were neither nimble nor easy to work, this inconvenience was supplied by a machine invented for the purpose, and afterwards known by the name of Corvus (crow or crane), by the help of which they grappled the enemy's ships, boarded them and immediately came to close engagement. The signal for fighting was given. The Roman fleet consisted of 100 galleys of five benches of oars, and twenty of three benches, while the Carthaginian fleet consisted of 130 ships of war, under the command of Hannibal, who was on board a large galley of seven benches of oars. The Carthaginians boldly advanced toward the enemy, little thinking that they should meet with resistance. They were surprised that their first appearance did not cause the enemy to fly, but their astonishment was increased when they saw men stationed at the prow of each Roman galley, waiting for an opportunity of casting the corvuses. As soon as the Carthaginian vessels had arrived at a proper distance, the grappling-hooks were thrown upon them, and in spite of all resistance the vessels were drawn together. Now the Romans leaped into the enemy's vessels, and engaged them in a close hand-to-hand engagement. The Carthaginians were unable to sustain the attack of the Romans, and a terrible slaughter ensued. The Carthaginians lost eighty ships, among which was the admiral's galley. Hannibal, however, barely escaped in a small boat.

NAMUR, A.D. 1692.—Namur, in Belgium, like other cities in the Low Countries, has frequently suffered from the ravages of war. In modern times it has sustained several sieges worthy of mention. In 1692 it was taken by the troops of Louis XIV. of France; in 1695 it was re-taken by the English and Dutch, under William III., and in 1701 and 1746 it was again taken by the French. In 1792 it was again taken by the French, who were compelled to evacuate it the following year, but they regained possession of it in 1794. In 1814, however, they delivered it up to the allies. The siege of 1692 is the subject of Boileau's famous ode, "Sur la Prise de Namur."

NANTES, A.D. 445.—The celebrated city of Nantes, in France, has sustained two memorable sieges. In 445 it was besieged by the Huns; but it was so gallantly defended that after a siege of sixty days, the Huns were obliged to withdraw with great loss. In the middle of the ninth century it was taken and sacked by the Normans.

NANCY, A.D. 1475.—Nancy, in France, has sustained several sieges. In 1475 it was besieged and taken by Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy. On the 6th of October, 1476, Nancy surrendered to the army of the Duke of Lorraine, and Charles at the first information of this event, marched to take the city from its new captors. The Count of Campo-Basso was intrusted with the first attack; but this officer proved a traitor, and protracted the siege, so that Rene, with 20,000 French troops had time to come up. On the approach of this army the count deserted, leaving Charles an army of only 4,000 men. On the 5th or 6th of Jan., 1477, (historians differ respecting the day) the two armies met; the shock was terrible; the wing of the Burgundian army was pierced, and the French attacked the center with the utmost impetuosity. As Charles was fastening on his helmet, the golden lion which served as a crest, dropped to the ground, and in surprise he exclaimed: "Ecce magnum Signum Dei!" The Burgundians soon fell back in disorder before the repeated and furious attacks of the enemy, and Charles was carried along with the fugitives until his horse fell, and he was precipitated into a ditch, where he was slain by the thrust of a lance. His head, covered with blood and filth, was not found until the third day after the battle. It was so much disfigured, that it was not recognized. The body at length, however, was recognized by the length of his hair and nails, which he had allowed to grow since his defeat by the Swiss at Morat, as well as by the scar of a sword-cut which he had received in another battle. In 1634, Nancy was taken by the troops of Louis XIII.

NAPLES.—First Siege, A.D. 537.—Belisarius besieged Naples. That city, admirably situated, was defended by good ramparts and a numerous garrison. Its inhabitants had resolved to perish rather than surrender, and for twenty days all the assaults of the Roman general were in vain. He was about to abandon the enterprise, when a happy chance offered him the success he had ceased to hope for. An Isaurian soldier was curious to see the structure of an aqueduct which Belisarius had caused to be cut off at a considerable distance from the city, and there found a rock pierced with a channel large enough to allow water to flow through it, but not sufficiently wide to enable a man to pass. He thought that by enlarging this channel it would be possible to gain entrance into the city, and hastened to inform his general of the discovery. Belisarius secretly charged some Isaurians with the task, which they performed in a few hours, making a passage for an armed man. Belisarius, with his usual humanity, anxious to save life, had an interview with one of the principal citizens, and in vain endeavored to persuade him to escape the cruelty of the soldiery by a surrender. Reduced to employ force, the Roman general selected that evening a body of four hundred men, completely armed, and as soon as it was dark led them, each being provided with a lantern, toward the aqueduct. They were preceded by two trumpets, which were to be sounded as soon as they were in the place. Belisarius ordered the ladders to be ready for an escalade at the same time, all the troops being under arms. When the detachment had entered the aqueduct, the greater part of them were seized with a panic, and retraced their steps, in spite of the efforts of their conductors to urge them on. Belisarius had them replaced by 200 of the bravest men of his army, when the others, ashamed of their cowardice, followed close upon their heels. The aqueduct, covered by a brick vault, penetrated far into the city; and the soldiers, without knowing it, were already beneath the streets of Naples, when they arrived at the mouth of the channel, in a basin, whose sides were high, and impracticable to armed men. Their embarrassment was extreme; more continued coming, and there was not sufficient room for them in so small a place. One of the soldiers, more active and bold than the rest, took off his arms, climbed to the top, and found himself in the miserable ruins of an old building, inhabitated by an old woman: he threatened to kill her if she opened her mouth. He then threw a cord down, the end of which he fastened to an old olive-tree, and by this species of ladder the band of soldiers gained the top of the basin two hours before day. They advanced toward the wall on the northern side, surprised the guards of two towers, and put them to the sword. Masters of this part of the wall, they gave the signal agreed upon with the trumpets, and Belisarius immediately had the ladders planted. They were found to be too short; but he ordered two to be tied together, and by that means reached the parapets. The Romans spread themselves through the city, where they met with little resistance. The soldiers gave themselves up to blind indiscriminate cruelty. Belisarius succeeded at length in putting a stop to this frightful course, by threatening some, and entreating others. After having abandoned the booty to them as a recompense for their valor, he re-established quiet in the city, and caused children to be restored to their parents, and wives to their husbands.

Second Siege, a.d. 543.—Totila laid siege to Naples. To intimidate the garrison, the King of the Goths caused Demetrius, the Roman general, taken prisoner in a convoy, to be led close to the walls, loaded with chains and a cord about his neck, and compelled him to cry aloud to the besieged, that the emperor was not in a condition to send them any succors. This speech, but still more the famine which raged in the city, induced the Neapalitans to surrender.

Third Siege, a.d. 818.—Sicon, the Prince of Beneventum, declared war against the Neapalitans, and after a long siege, reduced them to the rank of tributaries.

Fourth Siege, a.d. 1253.—Naples had yielded itself up to the Pope, upon which, the Emperor Conrad laid siege to it, and shortly brought it back to a sense of its duty.

Fifth Siege, a.d. 1381.—Pope Urban VI. having excommunicated Joan, the first Queen of Naples, intrusted the execution of the sentence to Charles de Duras, whom that queen, a few years before, had declared her legitimate heir. The prince appeared at the gates of Naples, in which city he had many partisans. A great number of the inhabitants came over the walls to bring refreshments to his troops, by whom he learned that the city was divided into three factions, the most powerful of which demanded him for king. Two Neapolitan knights serving in Charles's army, took a novel means of obtaining entrance to a besieged city. It had always been deemed that the sea formed a sufficient defense at what was called the Gate Conciara, and it was neither closed nor guarded. The knights, under the guidance of some deserters, swam close under the ramparts, and entered the open gate without obstruction. They then advanced into the market-place, crying aloud, "Long live Charles Duras and Pope Urban!" Followed by the populace, they opened the market gate, and admitted Charles and his army. The next day he laid siege to the castle, in which the queen had taken refuge. Joan, reduced to the last extremity by famine, having no vessel in which to escape, and no resource but in her husband, Otho of Brunswick, who was made prisoner by Charles, was obliged to surrender.

Sixth Siege, a.d. 1442.—Alphonso, King of Arragon, the implacable enemy of René of Anjou, who was a kind of titular king of Naples, laid siege to the capital of that country. This René is a character somewhat associated with English historica recollections, being the father of Margaret of Anjou, one of the most remarkable of their queens. Alphonso was pressing the siege warmly, when a mason, named Anello, informed him that he was acquainted with an aqueduct by which it would be possible to penetrate to a house close to the gate of Capua; and if a number of soldiers and officers were introduced into that house, they could easily render themselves masters of that gate. The king determined to make the attempt, and appointed two companies of infantry for the service. Anello, stimulated by the hope of a great reward, placed himself at their head, and conducted them to the regard (opening) of the aqueduct, more than a mile from the city. They proceeded in single files, with large lanterns, and armed with crossbows and partisans. Whilst Alphonso drew nearer to the walls to watch the event of this expedition, Anello and his troops followed the aqueduct till it brought them to the house of a tailor, near the gate of St. Sophia, where they issued, by means of a dry well, to the number of forty. Not daring to force the guard, they were compelled to terrify the wife and daughter of the owner of the house, in order to keep them quiet. While they were so engaged, the tailor came home, and, surprised at seeing his house filled with soldiers, he turned sharply round and ran out, exclaiming, "The enemies are in the city!" The forty adventurers then, judging they could no longer hesitate, attacked the guard of the gate of St. Sophia; but they met with such resistance, that René had time to come up, when he killed part of them and forced the rest to retreat. Alphonso, not seeing the signal agreed upon, imagined that the enterprise had failed, and was returning to his camp, when he heard the noise of a conflict carried on in the city, and retraced his steps toward the walls. René had reinforced the guard and placed the gate of St. Sophia in safety; but 300 Genoese charged with the defense of that of St. Januarius, abandoned their post the moment they heard the enemy was in the city. A gentleman named Marino Spezzicaso, a partisan of the house of Arragon, threw down several cords from the walls, by means of which, Pierre de Cardonna, general of the army of Alphonso, climbed up the walls, and was soon followed by a great number of his bravest men. While he was traversing the streets, shouting the war-cry of Arragon, he met an officer named Brancazzo, going on horseback to join King René. He stopped him, made him prisoner, took from him his horse, and mounting it, led on a party of Arragonese to attack Remé. That prince, on beholding him, believed that the enemy really had possession of the city, and listening to nothing but the dictates of his courage, he attacked the advancing troop and put them to flight. But they soon rallied and returned to the charge. René, obliged to give way to numbers, opened with his sword a passage for himself to the New Castle. So the King of Arragon made himself master of Naples by means of an aqueduct, as Belisarius had done when he took it from the Goths, ten centuries before. René, being without hope or resources, embarked for Provence, while Alphonso entered Naples in triumph, in imitation of the ancient Romans—in a chariot drawn by four white horses. All paid homage to his good fortune and his valor, and the kingdom of Naples was reunited to that of Sicily, from which it had been separated a hundred and sixty years.

Seventh Siege, A.D. 1503.—Ferdinand, King of Castile and Arragon, having, in contempt of treaties of the most solemn kind, invaded the part of the kingdom of Naples and Sicily that beloged to France, charged his great captain, Gonsalvo, with the siege of the capital of that state. At the approach of the Spaniards, the French, who placed no confidence in the inhabitants, retreated to the fortresses of the Château-neuf and the Œuf. Gonsalvo attacked the first of these, and it made a vigorous resistance. The garrison had resolved to bury themselves under the ruins of the place rather than surrender; and without doubt the Spanish general would have failed in his enterprise if he had only employed ordinary means. But he had in his army a soldier called Peter of Navarre, from the name of his country, who opened the gates and destroyed the ramparts of the castle by the help of a new species of thunder, if we may so term it. This soldier, a very intelligent man, had been, in 1487, with an expedition in which the Genoese employed, but without success, those terrible volcanoes called mines. He examined the fourneau of one of these mines, and observed that the want of effect in this invention did not arise from any fault in the art, but from that of the workmen, who had not taken their dimensions correctly. He perfected this secret, and communicated it to Gonsalvo, who begged him to put it to the test. Peter of Navarre took his measures so well, that his mine had all the effect he could expect; he then pierced several others, which succeeded with such precision that the New Castle was blown up, and all its defenders were either cut to pieces or buried under the ruins of the walls. The governor of the castle of the Œuf, a brave gentleman from Auvergne named Chavagnac, was not discouraged by the melancholy fate of his compatriots; he was in vain summoned to surrender: he replied that nothing more glorious could happen to him than to die for his master, with his sword in his hand. Peter then commenced some fresh mines, which were sprung with the same terrible consequences as the former: the walls crushed the greater part of the soldiers, and the rest perished in sight of a Genoese fleet which came to their succor.

Eighth Siege, A.D. 1557.—The greatest captains have often been reproached with avoiding engagements. Their firmness in despising the railleries of the multitude and the scoffing opinions of their rivals, have in almost all cases placed the seal upon their reputations. Francis, Duke of Guise, at the head of a French army and some troops furnished by Pope Paul IV., undertook the conquest of Naples. This general, too skillful not to be certain that the expedition could not succeed if it were not begun with some complete advantage, did all in his power to bring the Spaniards to a general action: he offered them so many favorable opportunities, that their officers could not pardon their leader, the Duke of Alva, for neglecting them. The duke called a council of war, in which he said, in an animated yet haughty tone, "I have always prayed God, gentlemen, to inspire my soldiers with a determined firmness and a fiery courage, so that, without fearing or reasoning, they would rush headlong to meet death, and expose themselves to any danger when commanded to do so. But I ask other qualities of officers: much prudence and great phlegm, to moderate the impetuosity of the soldiers—that is the way by which they attain the rank of great captains. I will not conceal from you that I have been displeased with your ardor, because I have thought it immoderate and opposed to reason. To point out to you the occasions on which a great general should give battle, I will tell you it is when his object is to succor a strong place reduced to extremity, which may form the security of a province; when he knows that the enemy must receive succors which will render them his superior, or even his equal; when, at the beginning of a war, it is desirable to give reputation to his arms, to strengthen the fidelity of wavering subjects, retain allies, and prevent covert enemies from declaring themselves; when fortune, not discontinuing to favor us, our enemies are in such consternation that they dare not stand before us; and, lastly, when, pressed by famine and disease, and hemmed in on all sides, we must either conquer or die.

"A great captain will never hazard a considerable action if he is not sure of drawing great advantages from it, or unless he is forced into it: tell us what the dangers are which surround us, or what fruit our country can derive from the loss of our lives or of our blood? Suppose we are victorious over the Duke of Guise, and the French are cut to pieces, what shall we be the better for it? Is it that the cities of the dominions of the Pope will be united to those of Philip? Is it that the baggage of the French will enrich us? If, on the contrary, the always uncertain fate of arms should prove to be against us, what misfortunes would not our rashness bring upon us? Do not, then, let us trouble ourselves about conquering Guise; he is flying before us. Could a murderous battle procure us any thing more solid or more glorious? We gain a complete victory without shedding a drop of blood. Our name alone serves as a defense and a rampart to all Italy.

"If this manner of making war did not appear to me suited to circumstances, I should remember what I did in Saxony; I would cross the greatest rivers, I would not shrink from wetting my feet with the sea; but while I find victory in the retreat of my enemy, I will remain faithful to my maxims, and will endeavor to combat your audacity and rashness. In a word, I will not risk a kingdom against a cassock of cloth of gold, which is all Guise can lose."

The conjectures of the Spanish general were all verified. The French expedition had the most fatal issue.

It may be said that this speech contains the history of no siege; but Fabius Maximus was no less admirable than Scipio; and he who consumes his enemy in vain enterprises, is not a less able general than he who annihilates him in a battle. Military men will find more instruction in the motives which determined the Duke of Alva not to risk a battle, than they would by the description of a siege.

Since the commencement of the French revolution, Naples has been the scene of several important political events, and has more than once succumbed to the power of the French; but there has been no regular siege. —Robson.

NAISSUS.—In the year 269, A.D., a battle was fought between the Romans, under Claudius, and the Goths, in which the former were victorious. The Goths numbered 320,000. Fifty thousand men are reported to have been slain in the battle of Naissus.

NARVA, A.D. 1700.—Narva is a town of European Russia, eighty-one miles southwest of St. Petersburg, and is memorable only on account of the famous battle fought in its vicinity, on the 30th of November, 1700, between Charles XII., King of Sweden, and the army of Peter the Great, Emperor of Muscovy. We can furnish our readers no better account of this battle than that given by Voltaire, in his History of Charles XII.

With an army of 80,000 men, Peter Alexiowitz, Emperor of Muscovy, appeared on the 1st of October, 1700, before the city of Narva, in Ingria. The season at that time of year is more severe in that climate than the month of January in Paris. The czar, who in such weather would sometimes ride post for four hundred leagues, to see a mine or a canal, was not more sparing of his men than of himself. He also knew that the Swedes, ever since the days of Gustavus Adolphus the Great, could make war as well in the depths of winter as in the summer, and he desired to accustom the Russians likewise to forget all changes of seasons, and to render them one day equal to the Swedes. Thus, in a time when frost and snow compel other nations in a more temperate climate to agree to a suspension of arms, the Czar Peter besieged Narva, within thirty degrees of the pole, and Charles XII. advanced to its relief. The czar no sooner arrived before the place than he put into practice what he had learned during his travels. He marked out his camp, fortified it on all sides, raised redoubts at certain distances, and opened the trenches himself. He had given the command of his troops to a German, the Duke de Croi, who was an able general, but who was at that time little assisted by the Russian officers. As for himself, he had no other rank in the army than that of a private lieutenant. He thereby gave an example of military obedience to his nobility, hitherto unacquainted with discipline, and accustomed to march at the head of ill-armed slaves, without experience and without order. There was nothing strange in seeing him who had turned carpenter at Amsterdam, in order to procure himself fleets, serve as lieutenant at Narva, to teach his subjects the art of war.

The Muscovites are strong and indefatigable, and perhaps as courageous as the Swedes; but it requires time and discipline to render troops warlike and invincible. The only regiments that could be depended upon were commanded by some German officers, but their number was very inconsiderable. The rest were barbarians forced from their forests, and covered with the skins of wild beasts, and others with clubs. Few of them had fusees; none of them had ever seen a regular siege; and there was not one good cannoneer in the whole army. A hundred and fifty cannon, which one would have thought must have soon reduced the little town of Narva to ashes, were hardly able to make a breach, while the artillery of the city mowed down at every discharge whole ranks of the enemy in their trenches. Narva was almost without fortifications; the Baron de Hoorn, who commanded there, had not a thousand regular troops; and yet this immense army could not reduce it in ten weeks.

It was now the 5th of November, when the czar learned that the King of Sweden had crossed the sea with two hundred transports, and was advancing to the relief of Narva. The Swedes were not above 20,000 strong. The czar had no advantage but that of numbers. Far, therefore, from despising his enemy, he employed every art in order to crush him. Not content with 80,000 men, he resolved to oppose to him another army still, and to check his progress at every step. He had already given orders for the march of about 30,000 men, who were advancing from Pleskow with great expedition. He then took a step that would have rendered him contemptible, could a legislator who had performed such great and glorious actions incur that imputation. He left his camp, where his presence was necessary, to go in quest of this new army, which might have arrived well enough without him, and seemed by this conduct to betray his fear of engaging in his intrenchments a young and inexperienced prince who might come to attack him.

Be that as it will, he resolved to shut up Charles XII. between two armies. Nor was this all: a detachment of 30,000 men from the camp before Narva were posted at a league's distance from the city, directly in the King of Sweden's road; 20,000 Strelitz were placed further off, upon the same road; and 5,000 others composed an advanced guard; and he must necessarily force his way through all these troops before he could reach the camp, which was fortified with a rampart and double fossé. The King of Sweden had landed at Pernau, in the Gulf of Riga, with about 16,000 foot, and little more than 4,000 horse. From Pernau he made a flying march to Revel, followed by all his cavalry, and only by 4,000 foot. He always marched in the van of his army, without waiting for the rear. He soon found himself with his 8,000 men only, before the first posts of the enemy. He immediately resolved, without the least hesitation, to attack them, one after another, before they could possibly learn with what a small number they had to engage. The Muscovites, seeing the Swedes come upon them, imagined they had a whole army to encounter. The advanced guard of 5,000 men, posted among rocks, a station where 100 resolute men might have stopped the march of a large army, fled at their first approach. The 20,000 men that lay behind them, perceiving the flight of their fellow-soldiers, took the alarm, and carried their terror and confusion with them into the camp. All the posts were carried in two days; and what upon other occasions would have been reckoned three distinct victories, did not retard the king's march for the space of one hour. He appeared then at last with his 8,000 men, exhausted with the fatigues of so long a march, before a camp of 80,000 Muscovites, defended by 150 pieces of cannon, and scarce allowing his troops any time for rest, he instantly gave orders for the attack. The signal was two fusees, and the word in German, Mit Gottes Hülfe! A general officer, having represented to him the greatness of the danger, "What," said he, "do you not think that with my 8,000 brave Swedes I may easily beat 80,000 Russians?" But soon after, fearing that what he had said might savor too much of gasconade, he ran after the officer; "And are not you," said he, "of the same opinion? Have not I a double advantage over the enemy? One, that their cavalry can be of no service to them; the other, that the place being narrow, their number will only incommode them; and thus, in reality, I shall be stronger than they." The officer did not care to differ from him; and thus they marched against the Muscovites, about midday, on the 30th of November, 1700.

As soon as the cannon had made a breach in the intrenchments, the Swedes advanced with screwed bayonets, having a furious shower of snow on their backs, which drove full in the faces of their enemy. The Russians stood the shock for half an hour without flinching. The king made his attack upon the right of the camp where the czar's quarters lay, hoping to come to a renconter with him, as he did not know he had gone in quest of the 40,000 men, who were daily expected to arrive. At the first discharge of the enemy's muskets he received a shot in his neck; but as it was a spent ball, it lodged in the folds of his black neck-cloth, and did him no harm. His horse was killed under him. M. de Spar told me that the king mounted another horse with great agility, saying, "These fellows make me go through my exercises," and continued to fight and give orders with the same presence of mind. After an engagement of three hours, the intrenchments were forced on all sides. The king pursued the right of the enemy as far as the river Narva, with his left wing; if we may be allowed to call by that name about 4,000 men, who were in pursuit of near 40,000. The bridge broke under the fugitives, and the river was immediately filled with dead carcases. The rest returned to their camp, without knowing whither they went; and finding some barracks, they took post behind them. There they defended themselves for a while, as they were not able to make their escape; but at last their generals Dolgorouky Gollofkin, and Federowitz, surrendered themselves to the king, and laid their arms at his feet; and, while they were presenting them to him, the Duke de Croi came up and surrendered himself with thirty officers.

Charles received all these prisoners of distinction with as much civility and politeness as if he had been paying them the honors of an entertainment in his own court. He detained none but the general officers. All the subalterns and common soldiers were disarmed and conducted to the river Narva, where they were supplied with boats for passing over, and allowed to return to their own country. In the mean time night came on, and the right wing of the Muscovites still continued the fight. The Swedes had not lost above 600 men. Eight thousand Muscovites had been killed in their intrenchments; many were drowned; many had crossed the river; and yet there still remained in the camp a sufficient number to cut off the Swedes to the last man. But the loss of battles is not so much owing to the number of the killed as to the timidity of those who survive. The king employed the small remains of the day in seizing upon the enemy's artillery. He took possession of an advantageous post between the camp and the city, where he slept for a few hours upon the ground, wrapped up in his cloak, intending at daybreak to fall upon the left wing of the enemy, which was not yet entirely routed. But at two o'clock in the morning, General Wade, who commanded that wing, having heard of the gracious reception the king had given to the other generals, and of his having dismissed all the subaltern officers and soldiers, sent a messenger to him, begging he would grant him the same favor; the conqueror replied, that he should have it, provided he would come at the head of his troops, and make them lay their arms and colors at his feet. Soon after the general appeared with his Muscovites, to the number of about 30,000. They marched, both soldiers and officers, with their heads uncovered, through less than 7,000 Swedes. The soldiers, as they passed the king, threw their guns and swords upon the ground, and the officers presented him with their ensigns and colors. He caused the whole of this multitude to be conducted over the river, without detaining a single soldier. Had he kept them, the number of prisoners would at least have been five times greater than that of the conquerors.

After this, he entered victorious into Narva, accompanied by the Duke de Croi, and other general officers of the Muscovites. He ordered their swords to be restored to them all; and, knowing that they wanted money, and that the merchants of Narva would not lend them any, he sent a thousand ducats to the Duke of Croi, and 500 to every Muscovite officer, who could not sufficiently admire the civility of this treatment, of which they were incapable of forming the least conception. An account of this victory was immediately drawn up at Narva, in order to be sent to Stockholm, and to the allies of Sweden: but the king expunged with his own hand every circumstance in the relation that tended too much to his honor, or seemed to reflect upon the czar. His modesty, however, could not hinder them from striking at Stockholm several medals to perpetuate the memory of these events. Among others they struck one which represented the king on one side, standing on a pedestal, to which were chained a Muscovite, a Dane, and a Polander; and on the reverse a Hercules, holding his club, and treading upon a Cerberus, with the inscription: Tres uno contudit ictu.

Among the prisoners taken at the battle of Narva, there was one whose fate exhibited a remarkable instance of the great inconstancy of fortune. He was the eldest son and heir of the king of Georgia; his name the czarafis Arteschelou. This title of czarafis, among the Tartars, as well as in Muscovy, signifies prince, or son of the czar; for the word czar, or tzar, signified king among the ancient Scythians, from whom all these people are descended, and is not derived from the Cæsars of Rome, so long unknown to these barbarians. His father Mittelleski, czar, and master of the most beautiful part of the country, lying between the mountains of Ararat and the eastern coasts of the Black Sea, having been expelled from his kingdom by his own subjects, in 1668, had rather chosen to throw himself into the arms of the Emperor of Muscovy, than to apply to the Turks for assistance. His son, a youth of nineteen years of age, followed Peter the Great in his expedition against the Swedes, and was taken fighting by some Finland soldiers, who had already stripped him, and were upon the point of killing him. Count Renschild rescued him from their hands, supplied him with clothes, and presented him to his master. Charles sent him to Stockholm, where the unfortunate prince died in a few years after. The king, upon seeing him depart, could not help making in the hearing of his officers, a very natural reflection on the strange fate of an Asiatic prince born at the foot of Mount Caucasus, and going to live a prisoner among the snows of Sweden. "It is just," says he, "as if I were one day to be a prisoner among the Crim Tartars." These words made no impression at that time; but, in the sequel, there was but too much occasion to remember them, when the event had proved them to be a prediction.

The czar was advancing by long marches with a body of 40,000 Russians, in full hopes of surrounding his enemy on all sides; but before he had proceeded half way, he received intelligence of the battle of Narva, and of the dispersion of his whole army. He was not so foolish as to think of attacking with his 40,000 raw and undisciplined troops, a conqueror, who had lately defeated 80,000 men in their intrenchments. He returned home with a determined resolution of disciplining his troops, at the same time that he civilized his subjects. "I know," says he, "that the Swedes will beat us for a long time; but, at last, they will teach us to beat them." Moscow, his capital, was in the utmost terror and consternation at the news of this defeat. Such was the pride and ignorance of the people, that they actually imagined they had been conquered by a power more than human, and that the Swedes were so many magicians. This opinion was so general, that public prayers were ordered to be put up to St. Nicholas, the patron of Muscovy, on the occasion. The form of these prayers is too singular to be omitted. It runs thus:

"O thou who art our perpetual comforter in all our adversities, great St. Nicholas, infinitely powerful, by what sin have we offended thee, in our sacrifices, kneelings, bowings, and thanksgivings, that thou hast thus abandoned us? We implored thy assistance against these terrible, insolent, enraged, dreadful, unconquerable destroyers, when like lions and bears robbed of their young, they fell upon, terrified, wounded, and slew by thousands, us who are thy people. As it is impossible that this should have happened without sorcery and witchcraft, we beseech thee, O great St. Nicholas, to be our champion, and standard-bearer, to deliver us from this troop of sorcerers, and to drive them far from our frontiers, with the recompense they deserve."

While the Muscovites were thus complaining of their defeat to St. Nicholas, Charles XII. returned thanks to God, and prepared himself for new victories.

NASEBY, A.D. 1645.—This little town, in Northampton county, England, will be ever memorable in British history for the battle fought near it, on the 14th of June, 1645, between the royalists, under Charles I., and the army of Generals Cromwell and Fairfax. Early in May Charles, with an army of 10,000 men, marched from Oxford, toward Chester, for the purpose of relieving that place, which was closely besieged by the parliamentary forces under Sir Willian Bereton. On the approach of the royalists, the besiegers raised the siege and withdrew; and the king having effected his purpose with regard to Chester, returned southward, and in his way sat down before Leicester, an important place garrisoned by the enemy. Having made a breach in the wall, he stormed the town on all sides; and, after a furious assault, the soldiers entered sword in hand, and committed all those disorders to which their natural violence, especially when inflamed by resistance, is so much addicted. A great booty was taken and distributed among them; 1,500 prisoners fell into the king's hands. This success, which struck a great terror into the parliamentary army, determined Fairfax to abandon Oxford, which he was beginning to approach; and he marched toward the king with an intention of offering him battle. On the evening of the 13th of June, his van overtook the rear of the royalists at Naseby, between Daventry and Harborough. Fairfax and his officers hailed with joy the prospect of a battle. They longed to refute the bitter taunts and sinister predictions of their opponents in the two Houses; to prove that want of experience might be supplied by the union of zeal and talent; and to establish, by a victory over the king, the superiority of the independent over the presbyterian party. Charles, on the contrary, had sufficient reason to decline a combat. His numbers had been diminished by the necessity of leaving a strong detachment in Leicester, and several reinforcements were still on their way to join the royal standard. But in the presence of the round-heads, the cavaliers never listened to the suggestions of prudence. Early in the morning of the 14th of June, the royal army formed in order of battle about a mile south of Harborough. They patiently waited until eight o'clock, the expected charge of the enemy; but Fairfax refused to move from his strong position at Naseby, and the king, yielding to the importunities of his officers, gave the word to advance. The hostile armies were about equal in point of numbers. The main body of the royalists was commanded by the king in person; the right wing by Prince Rupert; the left by Sir Marmaduke Langdale. Fairfax, seconded by Skippon, placed himself in the main body of the opposite army; Cromwell in the right wing; Ireton, Cromwell's son-in-law, in the left. The battle was opened by Prince Rupert, who, at the head of his men, charged furiously on the right wing of the enemy; Ireton made a stout resistance, and even after he was run through the thigh with a pike, still maintained the combat till he was taken prisoner, when his troops broke and fled precipitately, and six pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the victors. Prince Rupert, whose boiling ardor prevented him from heeding the lessons of experience, urged the pursuit with his characteristic impetuosity, and as at the battle of Marston Moor, by wandering from the field, suffered the victory to be won by the masterly conduct of Oliver Cromwell. Charles led on the main body of his army, and displayed in this action, all the conduct of a prudent general and all the valor of a stout soldier. Fairfax and Skippon encountered him with the main body of the parliamentary army, and supported that reputation which they had acquired. Skippon being dangerously wounded, was desired by Fairfax to leave the field; but he declared that he would remain there as long as one man maintained his ground. The infantry of the parliament was broken and pressed upon by the troops of the king; till Fairfax, with great presence of mind, brought up the reserve, and renewed the combat. Meanwhile the troops of Cromwell received the charge of the royalists under Sir Marmaduke Langdale. By both the fight was maintained with obstinate valor, but superiority of numbers enabled the former to press on the flanks of the royalists who began to waver, and at last turned their backs and fled. Cromwell prudently checked the pursuit, and leaving three squadrons to watch the fugitives, directed the remainder of his force against the rear of the royal infantry which was engaged with the troops of Fairfax and Skippon. That body of men, only 3,500 in number, had hitherto fought with the most heroic valor: but this unexpected charge broke their spirit; they threw down their arms and entreated quarter. One regiment alone preserved its order unbroken, though twice desperately assailed by Fairfax; and that general, excited by so steady a resistance, ordered Doyley, the captain of his Life Guard, to give them a third charge in front, while he himself attacked them in rear. The regiment was broken, Fairfax, with his own hands, killed an ensign, and having seized the colors, gave them to a soldier to keep for him. The soldier afterward boasting that he had won this trophy, was reproved by Doyley who had seen the action. "Let him retain that honor," said Fairfax, "I have to-day acquired enough beside." Prince Rupert, sensible too late of his error, abandoned the pursuit and joined the king, whose infantry was now totally discomfited. Charles exhorted this body of cavalry not to despair, and cried aloud to them: "One charge more, and we recover the day." But the disadvantages under which they labored were too evident, and they could not be induced to renew the combat. Charles was obliged to quit the field and leave the victory to the enemy. The slain on the side of the parliament exceeded those on the side of the king; they lost 1,000 men; he not over 800. But Fairfax made 500 officers, and 4,000 private men, prisoners; took all the king's artillery and ammunition, and totally dissipated his infantry. The victory was complete and decisive. The king retreated with that body of horse which remained entire, first to Hereford; then to Abergavenny, and remained some time in Wales, in the vain hope of raising a body of infantry in those harassed and exhausted quarters. Fairfax, having first retaken Leicester, which was surrendered upon articles, began to deliberate upon his future enterprises.

NAVAS DE TOLOSO, A.D. 1212.—Near this village in Spain was fought, in 1212, a famous battle between the armies of the kings of Castile, Arragon and Navarre, and the Moorish army under Mahomet Ibn Abdallah, King of Morocco. The Spaniards were aided by over 100,000 foreign crusaders, chiefly French and English. The battle was most terrific; blood flowed in torrents, and the Moors were totally defeated and put to rout. Nearly 200,000 Infidels were slain, while the Christians lost only 725 men.

NAXERA, A.D. 1367. — On the 2d of April, 1367, an obstinate battle was fought between the troops of Peter the Cruel, and those of his brother Henry, at Naxera, a town of Spain, on the Naxerilla.

NAZARETH, A.D. 1799.—See Acre, St. Jean d'.

NEERWINDEN, A.D. 1693.—Neerwinden in Belgium, has witnessed two important battles. The first was fought on the 29th of July, 1693, between the army of William III., of England, and the troops of the Marechal de Luxembourg. The battle was fiercely contested; but after an obstinate struggle, victory declared itself against the troops of the English monarch; and added another laurel to the many trophies which Luxembourg had already won.

The second battle of Neerwinden, was fought on the 18th of March, 1793, between the French and the Austrians. The Austrian army consisted of 39,000 men, of whom 9,000 were cavalry. They occupied a position about two leagues in length near the village of Neerwinden. Their left wing, under the command of the Archduke Charles, was posted across the causeway leading to Tuèlemont; their right, under Clairfait, extended toward Landau, and their center directed by General Colleredo and the Prince of Wirtemberg was drawn up in two lines, in front of the village.

The French army, commanded by General Dumourier, consisted of 35,000 foot and 5,000 horse. It was divided into eight columns; three of which, on the left under General Valence, were to fall upon the Austrian right; two columns under the Duke of Chatres were to force the center, and the three on the right commanded by Miranda were to crush the left. Miranda's troops commenced the attack. In dense columns they advanced toward the left wing of the enemy, and falling upon the troops that were stationed in the villages in front of the army, speedily dislodged them; but the Austrians opening a heavy fire from all points upon the French, the latter were forced to retire with great loss. Meanwhile the troops of the Duke of Chatres, rushing forward to the assault with the utmost vigor, carried the village of Neerwinden in the center of the Austrian army. The Austrians, determined to regain the lost village, assaulted the French so furiously that they were compelled to relinquish the ground they had won. Again they advanced to the assault; again the Austrians were driven back, and again with renewed energy they attacked the French and drove them back. Thus the village was taken and re-taken several times.

At length placing their immense artillery in position, the Austrians opened such a tremendous fire upon the French in the village of Neerwinden, that they were compelled to evacuate finally. Dumourier now formed his line a hundred yards in the rear of the village, and opened a terrific fire of musketry and grape upon that quarter. And now two immense columns of Austrian cuirassiers advanced toward the French line. They were received by volley after volley, and recoiled before the withering tempest of deadly missiles. Again they advanced to the charge: but like a bolt from the bow, a body of French horse in a solid mass, rushed upon them, overwhelming them, and putting them to flight. The Austrians made no further attempts on the right and center; but on the left they were making rapid progress. The French, under Miranda, after occupying the villages, were unable to debouch from the position they had won; for as fast as the heads of their columns presented themselves, they were exposed to the fire of the Austrian artillery, posted on the heights in the rear, and melted away before the iron tempest. Upon this, the Archduke Charles, at the head of two battalions, stormed the village, and the Prince of Coburg, perceiving this to be the important point, fell upon the French columns with a large body of foot and horse. The left wing of the French attacked by superior numbers gradually fell back; and their whole army distracted at this repulse, slowly retired and reoccupied their former position. Thus ended the battle; neither party claiming the victory. The French lost about 3,000 men, killed, wounded, and made prisoners; the Austrians lost nearly the same number.

NEHAWUND, A.D. 638.—Nehawund, a town in Persia, was in 638 the scene of a terrible battle between the Arabs and Persians. The Persians were defeated.

NERO AND ASDRUBAL, B.C. 203.—One unforeseen event ruined all the measures, and blasted all the hopes, of Hannibal with regard to Italy. The Roman consuls, for this year, the eleventh of the second Punic war, were C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius. The latter had for his province the Cisalpine Gaul, where he was to oppose Asdrubal, Hannibal's brother, who, it was reported, was preparing to pass the Alps. The former commanded in the country of the Britans, and in Lucania, that is, the opposite extremity of Italy, and was there making head against Hannibal. After Asdrubal had crossed the Alps, he dispatched couriers with letters to Hannibal, informing him that he was hastening to join him in Umbria. These letters were intercepted by Nero. In a conjunction of so important a nature as this, Nero thought himself set at liberty to dispense with the established rule, that no general should leave his own province to go into that of another, and at once determined to march and join his colleague, in order that they might charge Asdrubal unexpectedly with their united forces. From his army, which consisted of 42,000 men, he drew out 7,000, the flower of his troops, for his own detachment, leaving the balance to guard his camp, which was advantageously situated and strongly fortified. Nero set out without giving his soldiers the least notice of his design. But when he had advanced so far that he could communicate it to them without danger, he told his soldiers that he was leading them to certain victory; that the bare rumor of their arrival would disconcert all the measures of the Carthaginians, and that the whole honor of the battle would fall to them.

The soldiers, stimulated by his words and by the hope of a speedy and glorious victory, marched with extraordinary diligence. They joined the army of the other consul in the night. The better to impose upon the enemy, they did not pitch separate camps; but the newly arrived troops encamped with those of Livius. The army of Porcius the prætor was encamped near that of the consul. In the morning the generals held a council of war, and it was decided that the army should immediately march to give battle to the enemy. Asdrubal had felt himself prepared to engage the forces under the command of Livius, which had been sent to contest his entrance into Italy; but when he discovered by several circumstances that fresh troops had arrived, he did not doubt but that they belonged to the other consul, and he feared that his brother had sustained a heavy defeat, and that he had come too late to his assistance. He now caused a signal for retreat to be sounded, and his army began to march in great disorder. Night came on, and his guides deserting him, he was uncertain what way to go. He marched at random along the banks of the river Metaurus, now called Metaro, and was preparing to cross it, when the three armies of the enemy overtook him. He saw that it would be impossible for him to avoid coming to an engagement, and therefore at once prepared for the battle. Choosing an advantageous post, he drew up his army on a narrow spot, by which he gained the opportunity of posting his left wing (the weakest part of his army) in such a manner that it could neither be attacked in front nor charged in flank. He thus gave to his main battle and right wing a greater depth than front. He now placed himself in the center of his army, and knowing that all was at stake, he gave the signal of battle to his soldiers, and charged upon the Roman army which was drawn up in battle array to receive them. The fight that followed was most obstinate and bloody. Asdrubal signalized himself by the most daring personal exploits. He animated his soldiers by voice and example—he cheered on the brave and menaced the cowardly. But the most of his soldiers were dispirited: they trembled when they saw the superior force of the enemy. The carnage committed on their ranks by the Romans was terrible. At length Asdrubal seeing that victory belonged to the Romans, and being unable to survive the loss of so many thousands of his countrymen, rushed at once into the midst of a Roman cohort, and there died in a manner worthy of the son of Hamilcar, and the brother of Hannibal. In this most bloody battle, the Carthaginians lost 55,000 men slain on the field of strife, and 6,000 were taken prisoners. The Romans lost 8,000. They were so weary of slaying, that upon Livius being told that he might very easily cut to pieces a body of the enemy who were flying, he replied: "It is fit that some should survive in order that they may carry the news of this defeat to the Carthaginians." Nero immediately after the battle set out upon his march. He arrived in his camp on the sixth day; Asdrubal's head was thrown into the Carthaginian camp, and it was shown to Hannibal. "All is over," said he, "I shall no longer send triumphant messages to Carthage. In losing Asdrubal I have lost at once all my hope, all my good fortune."—See Battle of Cannæ.

NEWARK, A.D. 1643.—Newark stands on a lateral stream of the Trent in Nottingham co., England. It was one of the chief garrisons of the royalists during the civil wars of Charles I. It was besieged by the parliamentary forces in 1643; but both the town and castle were held by the royal army till the 11th of May, 1646, when it was surrendered to the Scotch, by order of the king who was then a prisoner. The castle was then demolished by order of parliament.

NEWBURY, A.D. 1643.—This town stands on the river Kennett, in Berks co., England, 53 miles west of London. The vicinity is remarkable for the two battles fought during the civil wars between the royalists and parliamentary forces, Charles I., commanding the royal army in person. The first was fought on a common called the Wash, on the 20th of September, 1643; the second on the 27th of October in the following year; but neither had any decided results.

NEW LONDON, A.D. 1781.—New London is situated on the west bank of the Thames river, three miles from its mouth, in New London co., Conn.

On the evening of the 5th of September, 1781, a British fleet, consisting of 24 sail, under Captain Beasley, bearing a strong land and marine force, under the general command of Benedict Arnold, the traitor, set sail from the eastern extremity of Long Island, and at daybreak on the following morning appeared off the harbor of New London. The troops were landed in two divisions of about 800 each; the first under Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre, landed on the east or the Groton side of the Thames; and the second, commanded by Arnold himself, on the New London side. The American militia hastened in small bodies to oppose them; but were not of sufficient strength to produce much effect, and the British advanced almost unmolested to the town. The torch was immediately applied, and nearly the whole of the place was laid in ashes. Several vessels were also burned. Meanwhile the American militia were aroused on all sides, and collected in great numbers. Arnold, perceiving his danger, hastily retreated to his boats, closely pursued by the enraged inhabitants. The British lost 5 killed and about 20 wounded. The Americans lost 4 killed and 10 or 12 wounded.

Colonel Eyre meanwhile advanced against Fort Griswold, a strong work on the west bank of the Thames, which was garrisoned by about 150 men, under Colonel Ledyard. After a desperate conflict, the assailants forced their way into the fort, which was surrendered unconditionally. Colonel Eyre was mortally wounded in the assault, and Major Montgomery was slain while mounting the parapet. The British lost 187 men killed and wounded. The Americans lost about 12 men killed before the fort was carried. When that was effected, Colonel Ledyard ordered his men to cease firing, and lay down their arms. The gates were opened, and the Tories and Hessians, led on by Major Bromfield, on whom the command had devolved, rushed into the fort. "Who commands this fort?" cried Bromfield. "I did, sir," replied Ledyard, "but you do now;" and he presented his sword to the victor. Bromfield seized the weapon, and murdered Ledyard by running him through the body with the sword he had just surrendered. The victors gave no quarter, but kept up the work of destruction until 70 men were killed, and 35 mortally or dangerously wounded. The victors then plundered the fort and garrison of every thing valuable; and after treating the survivors with every indignity and cruelty which their barbarous natures could invent, they departed, taking away about 40 of the inhabitants prisoners.

NEW ORLEANS, A.D. 1815.—The city of New Orleans is situated on the east bank of the Mississippi river, about 100 miles from its mouth. The city is built around a bend of the river, from which circumstance it has been called the "cresent city."

New Orleans, at the time of the second war with England, contained a population of nearly 30,000 inhabitants. The city had been recently purchased by the Government of the United States from France, and the people were mostly of Spanish and French origin. It was not a military place; but it was a wealthy city, and lured by the anticipations of a rich booty, the Britith resolved to capture it. Accordingly the expedition, which had been defeated at Baltimore, was directed against New Orleans. The city was accessible through the various mouths of the river Mississippi, and also with small vessels through lakes Borgue and Ponchartrain. Jackson, with the American army, was at Mobile, when he received intelligence of the intentions of the enemy, and instantly hastened to the protection of New Orleans, where he arrived on the 2d of December, 1814. The city was a scene of universal alarm and excitement; but by vigorous measures he soon quieted the inhabitants and put the city in a state of comparative security. The English fleet entered lake Borgue, and on the 9th of December, captured a flotilla of American gun-boats, which had been sent to oppose the landing of the troops. The attack on these boats was made by a detachment of 1,200 British seamen and marines, in forty barges, under Captain Lockyer. The American boats, six in number, endeavored to escape from the enemy, but after a hard chase of nearly thirty-six hours, the British flotilla came up with the enemy, and an obstinate conflict ensued. The Americans numbered 200 men, and were commanded by Lieutenant (afterward commodore) Jones. The Americans at length, after inflicting on the enemy a loss of about 300 in killed and wounded, yielded to the superior numbers of their assailants, with a loss of about forty men killed and wounded; and the six gun boats with their crews fell into the hands of the English. The British now were in complete possession of lakes Borgue and Ponchartrain; and on the 23d of December, about 2,400 British troops effected a landing on the levee, about eight miles from New Orleans. This levee is an embankment raised in order to prevent the river from overflowing the island, which is considerably lower than the surface of the water. It is lined on the west side by the river, and on the east by an impassable swamp; and varies in width from a few hundred yards to two or three miles. Jackson no sooner heard of the landing of the British, than he resolved to attack them before they could bring forward their heavy artillery, and the main body of the army. On the same day of the landing of the invaders, he put his column in motion, and arrived by evening within two miles of the enemy. His dispositions for the attack were soon made. He ordered the schooner of war Caroline, under the command of Commodore Patterson, to drop down the river after dark, and anchor opposite the British position. Six hundred men, under General Coffee, were ordered to advance along the edge of the swamp, and gain unobserved the rear of the enemy; while Jackson himself with 1,300 troops, was to advance along the levee, and attack the enemy in front. The first gun fired from the Caroline was to be the signal for a general attack. The schooner glided quietly down the river, and having gained her position, anchored, and opened a cannonade upon the enemy. Coffee advanced silently, when he was suddenly met by a body of the enemy, which was retiring before the shot of the schooner. A hot conflict ensued, and the British, after a desperate struggle, were driven down the levee, behind which they made a stand in spite of the most strenuous efforts of the Americans to dislodge them.

Jackson, meanwhile, advanced in front, and soon came upon the enemy, intrenched behind a deep ditch. A deep fog had arisen since nightfall, and although the moon was out, yet the misty clouds arising from marsh and river soon enveloped all objects in deep obscurity. After repeatedly charging the enemy, and driving them from one ditch to another, Jackson halted. The guns of the Caroline had nearly ceased their fire; Coffee's volleys were feeble and few, and Jackson, finding his troops crowded in confusion on the levee in the darkness, concluded to withdraw. The Americans lost in this attack in killed, wounded, and prisoners 240 men, the British about 400. The American general now posted his troops (about 3,000 in number) behind a deep ditch which stretched across the levee from the river to the swamp, and commenced strengthening his position by every means in his power. The ditch was deepened and widened; and where it entered the marsh, the trees were cut down, thus extending the line further into the swamp. Coffee with his troops, was stationed on this, the left of the American line, General Morgan was detached with a strong body of troops, with orders to take and fortify a position on the west bank of the Mississippi, opposite Jackson's line; and Major Reynolds was dispatched to obstruct and defend the pass of Barotaria—the channel through which the enemy would probably attempt to approach. The Americans labored diligently in strengthening their breastwork. The earth was thrown up still higher on the edge of the ditch, and cotton-bales were added to the work to increase its breadth and depth. The British, meanwhile, were not idle. All hands had been set to deepen a canal in rear of the British position, by which boats with the heavy artillery might be brought up to the Mississippi. A battery was erected opposite the Caroline, and on the morning of the 27th of December, was opened on the schooner with shells and red-hot shot. The vessel was soon wrapped in flames; the crew abandoned her, and escaped to the shore, and shortly afterward her magazine exploded with terrific violence.

On the 28th Sir Edward Packenham, the British general, ordered his columns to advance against the American works. The British troops, with their artillery, advanced in excellent order, and having arrived within half a mile of the American line, opened their batteries, sending bomb-shells and Congreve rockets in rapid succession among the Americans; but the latter worked their guns admirably, and their shot told with fearful effect upon the exposed ranks of the enemy, and the sloop of war, Louisiana, swinging broadside to the advancing columns, sent forth such destructive volleys upon them that they were obliged to retire with a loss of over one hundred men. The Americans lost seven killed and eight wounded. Among the slain was Colonel Henderson of the Tennessee militia. Until the 1st of January the British occupied their whole time in bringing forward heavier artillery. At length, having completed their arrangements, they resolved on another attack on the enemy's line. Under cover of a dense fog the British column advanced to the attack; but the muffled tread of the soldiers aroused the Americans, and every man was ready. The sun at length partially dispersed the fog, and the British having advanced their batteries within six hundred yards of the American line, opened them with the utmost vigor. The Americans replied with equal spirit, and the cannonade was maintained on both sides till noon, when the British ceased their fire and withdrew to their camp. The British suspended hostilities for a week. Meanwhile Jackson was reinforced by nearly three thousand Kentuckians; so that his army now consisted of almost six thousand men. At length the British general resolved on an attack on the American works with his entire army, which now consisted of more than twelve thousand men. At this time the Americans were drawn up as follows: Coffee with his troops was posted in the swamp, on the left; the center was composed of the Tennesseeans, under Carroll; and Jackson, with the regulars, occupied the right, resting on the river. The Kentuckians were posted behind Carroll; and on the opposite bank of the river, General Morgan, with his detachment, occupied a strongly fortified position. The British general's plan of attack was as follows: A detachment under Colonel Thornton was to cross the river in the night to attack Morgan, and if successful, to advance up the west bank of the Mississippi, till he came opposite the city of New Orleans. The main attack on the breast-work in front was to be made in two columns, the first under General Gibbs, the second under General Keane. Under cover of the night the British erected heavy batteries within eight hundred yards of the American works.

Morning came; it was the Sabbath. A thick fog enveloped both armies; but the rising sun soon lifted the misty curtain, and disclosed to the eyes of the Americans the preparations of the enemy. Every American was at his post, awaiting in deep silence the approach of the enemy. The rising of the fog was the signal of battle, and instantly every gun of the British battery opened its grim mouth, and vomited forth flame and smoke. The iron tempest swept madly across the plain, and plunged into the American works. The thunders of the artillery shook the ground and aroused the people of New Orleans from their slumbers. Two fiery rockets, the one from the shore, the other from the edge of the swamp, gave the signal for the attack, and two deep columns, each nearly five thousand strong, advanced toward the American line. The first was directed against the center, the second against the left of the American line. The Americans greeted the approach of the enemy with three loud cheers, and then all was silent save the measured tread and clanking weapons of the advancing columns. The levee at this point was contracted to four hundred yards in width, and as the British troops crowded over this causeway the Americans opened a concentrated fire of all their batteries upon the moving wall of crimson. The murderous tempest swept through the mass of flesh, making frightful gaps in its passage, and covering the earth with dead and wounded. But on, on, through the terrific storm the British pressed, closing up their ranks with admirable coolness. As they neared the ditch the columns swiftly deployed, and under cover of a tremendous fire from the batteries, rushed to the assault. The American troops had reserved the fire of their musketry; but now the word, "Fire," ran along their line. Instantly the breast-work was illumined with a vivid sheet of flame, and a hurricane of bullets rushed into the bosoms of the assailants, scattering them to the earth like seed from the sower's hand. But amid the blaze of musketry, the leaden sleet, the thunders of cannon, the fiery tempest of shells and rockets, and the whirling storm of grape and round-shot, came loud and distinct over the roar of battle, the orders of command, and the assailants recovering from their momentary confusion again advanced. But falling like leaves in autumn, the British troops again wavered. Their officers urged them forward. They nobly obeyed, but unable to breast the fiery blast, sunk down by hundreds.

Packenham galloped to the front; he urged his horse in the very face of the fire, calling upon his men to falter not. For a moment the gallant Britons moved through the storm; but their brave general sank dead before their eyes, and Generals Gibbs and Keane also falling, the assailants turned and fled in wild confusion, leaving behind them gory evidences of their valor. General Lambert, on whom the command now devolved, vainly endeavored to rally the fugitives; they fled madly to a ditch, where, safe from the fire of the enemy, they halted. Lambert at length succeeded in reviving the hopes of his troops, and strengthened by a reserve, the British columns again advanced to the attack. They entered the fearful tempest; they took the enemy's fire into their very bosoms, but sank beneath it in bloody heaps. Again they halted; they wavered, turned, and fled in wild despair. Lambert saw that it was impossible to carry the enemy's works, and wishing to spare the lives of his soldiers, withdrew his army.

Meanwhile, Colonel Thornton, with the British division on the west bank of the Mississippi, had been eminently successful; the Americans, under General Morgan, were defeated after a short struggle, and retired from their works, which fell into the possession of the British. This stroke of good fortune on the part of the invaders, might have proved very disastrous to the Americans, but for the fearful slaughter of the British on the opposite shore, for the guns of the captured fort commanded the interior of Jackson's line. But after the overthrow of the main body of the army, Thornton's detachment was withdrawn to the east bank, and the troops at all points returned to their camp. The British were allowed to retreat unmolested; they embarked in their fleet, and set sail for England with all possible speed.

The Americans lost in this battle 7 killed, and 6 wounded, on the east side of the river, and 58 killed and wounded on the west side. The British lost 700 killed, and nearly 1,500 wounded. Among the slain was General Packenham; and Generals Gibbs and Keane were both severely wounded. The battle of New Orleans was the last battle of moment of the second war between the United States and England, commonly known as the war of 1812.

NIAGARA, A. D. 1814.—The Americans rested but two days after the battle of Chippewa, and then crossed the Chippewa river with the determination to pursue the British who had retreated to Burlington Heights, near the head of lake Ontario. On the 25th of July intelligence was received that 1,000 of the enemy's troops had crossed the Niagara river to Lewiston, for the evident purpose of seizing the American magazines at Fort Schlosser, and the supplies on the way to the American camp, from Buffalo. Brown, in order to force them to return, detached Scott with about 1,200 men to threaten the forts at the mouth of Niagara river. Scott had proceeded but two miles when he came in sight of an army of 2,000 men, drawn up in order of battle. The British were under the command of General Riall, and were posted just below the Falls, on a ridge at the head of Lundy's Lane.* Their left was in the highway, and separated from the main body by an interval of two hundred yards, covered with brushwood, etc. General Drummond had landed a short time before with reinforcements, which were rapidly marching up to the aid of Riall. Scott, however, would not turn his back on the enemy, and gallantly led in person his little army into the fire. His bearing and words inspired confidence, and officers and men forgot the odds that were against them. Major Jessup was ordered to fling himself in the interval between the British center and left, and turn the latter. In the mean time, the enemy discovering that he outflanked the Americans on the left, advanced a battalion to take them in rear. The brave McNeil stopped, with one terrible blow, its progress, though his own battalion was dreadfully shattered by it. Jessup had succeeded in his movement, and having gained the enemy's rear, charged back through his line, captured the commanding general Riall, with his whole staff. When this was told to Scott, he announced it to the army, and three loud cheers rang over the field. The English replied with a destructive discharge from their battery of seven pieces.

It was night now, and a serene moon rose over the scene, but its light struggled in vain to pierce the smoke that contained the combatants. The flashes from the batteries that crowned the heights, and from the infantry below, alone revealed where they were struggling. Scott's regiment were soon all reduced to skeletons—a fourth of the whole brigade had fallen in the unequal conflict. The English battery of twenty-four pounders and howitzers, sent destruction through his ranks. He, however, refused to yield a foot of ground, and heading almost every charge in person, moved with such gay spirits and reckless courage through the deadliest fire that the troops caught the infection. But the British battery, now augmented to nine guns, made frightful havoc in his uncovered brigade. Lawson's few pieces being necessarily placed so much lower, could produce but little effect, while the enemy's twenty-four pounders, loaded with grape, swept the entire field. The 11th and 22d regiments, deprived of their commanders, and destitute of ammunition, were withdrawn, and Leavenworth, with the gallant 9th, was compelled to withstand the whole shock of the battle. With such energy and superior numbers did the British press upon this single regiment, that it appeared amid the darkness to be enveloped in flame. Its destruction seemed inevitable, and in a short time one half of its number lay prostrate on the plain. Leavenworth sent to Scott, informing him of his critical condition. The latter soon came up at a gallop, when Leavenworth, pointing to the bleeding fragment of his regiment, said, "Your rule for retreating is fulfilled," alluding to Scott's maxim that a regiment might retreat when every third man was killed. Scott, however, answered buoyantly, cheered up the men and officers by promising victory, and spurring through a tempest of bullets, animated them by his daring courage and chivalric bravery to still greater efforts. Still, he could not but see his case was getting desperate, and unless aid arrived soon, he must retreat. Only 500 or 600 of the 1,200 he at sunset had led into battle, remained to him. General Brown, however, was hurrying to the rescue. The incessant cannonading convinced him that Scott had a heavy force on his hands; and without awaiting the arrival of a messenger, he directed Ripley to move forward with the second brigade. Meeting Scott's dispatch on the way, he learned how desperate the battle was, and immediately directed Porter with the volunteers to hurry on after Ripley, while he, in advance of all, hastened to the field of action. The constant and heavy explosions of artillery, rising over the roar of the cataract, announced to the excited soldiers the danger of their comrades, and no sooner were they wheeled into marching order than they started on a trot along the road. Lieutenant Riddle, who was off on a scouring expedition in the country paused as he heard the thunder of cannon, and waiting for no dispatch, gave orders to march, and his men moving at the charge de pas, soon came with shouts on the field. At length the head of Ripley's column emerged into view, sending joy through those gallant regiments, and a loud huzza rolled along their line. Brown, seeing that Scott's brigade was exhausted, ordered Ripley to form in advance of it. In the mean time, Drummond had arrived on the field with reinforcements, swelling the English army to 4,000 men. At this moment there was a lull in the battle, and both armies prepared for a decisive blow. It was evident the deadly battery on the heights must be carried, or the field be lost, and Brown, turning to Colonel Miller, asked him if he could take it. "I will try, sir," was the brief reply of the fearless soldier, as he coolly scanned the frowning heights. Placing himself at the head of the 21st regiment, he prepared to ascend the hill. Major McFarland with the 23d was to support him. Not having arrived on the field of battle till after dark, he was ignorant of the formation of the ground, or the best point from which to commence the ascent. General Scott who had fought over almost every foot of it since sunset, offered to pilot him. Passing by an old church and grave-yard, that showed dimly in the moonlight, he took the column to the proper place, and then returned to his post. In close order and dead silence the two regiments then moved straight for the battery. It was by their heavy muffled tread that General Drummond first detected their approach. But the moment he caught the dark outlines of the swiftly advancing columns, he turned his battery upon them with terrible effect. The 23d staggered under the discharge, but soon rallied and pressed forward. Smitten again it reeled backward down the hill; but the 21st never faltered. "Close up, steady, men!" rung from the lips of their leaders, and taking the loads of grape-shot unshrinkingly into their bosoms, they marched sternly on, their bayonets gleaming red in the fire that rolled in streams down the slope. Every explosion revealed the whole hill and that dark column winding through the flame and smoke up its sides. At length it came within range of musketry, when the carnage became awful; but still on through the sheets of flame, over their dead comrades, this invincible regiment held its stubborn course toward the very vortex of the battle. The English gazed with amazement on its steady advance. No hesitation marked its movement; closing up its ranks after every discharge, it kept on its terrible way, till at last it stood face to face with the murderous battery, and within a few steps of the gunners. A sudden flash, a deafening explosion, and then "close up, steady, charge," rung out from the sulphurous cloud that rolled over the shattered regiment, and the next instant it swept with a thrilling shout over guns, gunners and all. The struggle became at once close and fierce—bayonet crossed bayonet—weapon clashed against weapon; but nothing could resist that determined onset. The British were driven down the hill, and the remnants of that gallant regiment, together with McFarland's which had again rallied, formed between the guns and the foe. Ripley then moved his brigade to the top of the hill, in order to keep what had been so heroically won.

* The vivid description of the battle which follows, is extracted from J. T. Headley's admirable work, "The Second War with England."

Stung with rage and mortification at this unexpected defeat, Drummond resolved to retake the height and his guns, cost what it might; and soon the tread of his advancing columns was heard ascending the slope. With their uniforms glittering in the bright moonlight the excited troops came on at the charge step, until within twenty yards of the American line, when they halted and delivered their fire. "Charge!" then ran along the line but the order had scarcely pealed on the night air before they were shattered and torn in fragments by the sudden and destructive volley of the Americans. Rallying, however, they returned to the attack, and for twenty minutes the conflict around those guns was indescribably awful and murderous. No sounds of music drowned the death cry; the struggle was too close and fatal. There were only the fierce tramp and the clash of steel, the stifled cry and wavering to and fro of men in a death grapple. At length the British broke and disappeared in the darkness. Major Ripley again formed his line, while Scott who had succeeded in getting a single battalion out of the fragments of his whole brigade was ordered to the top of the hill. In about half an hour the sound of the returning enemy was again heard. Smote by the same fierce fire Drummond with a desperate effort, threw his entire strength on the center of the American line. But there stood the gallant 21st, whose resistless charge had first swept the hill; and where they had conquered they would not yield. Scott in the mean time led his column so as to take the enemy in flank and rear, and but for a sudden volley from a concealed body of the enemy, cutting his command in two, would have finished the battle with a blow. As it was, he charged and charged again with resistless energy, and the disordered ranks of the British for the second time rolled back and were lost in the gloom. Here Scott's last horse fell under him, and he moved on foot amid his battalion. Jessup was also severely wounded, yet there he stood amid the darkness and carnage, cheering on his men. The soldiers vied with the officers in heroic, daring, and patient suffering. Many would call out for muskets as they had none, or for cartridges as theirs were all gone. On every side from pallid lips and prostrate bleeding forms came the reply, "Take mine, and mine, my gun is in good order, and my cartridge-box is full." There was scarcely an officer at this time unwounded, yet, one and all refused to yield the command while they could keep their feet. Jessup's flag was riddled with balls, and as a sergeant waved it amid a storm of bullets, the staff was severed in three pieces in his hand. Turning to his commander, he exclaimed as he took up the fragments, "Look, colonel, how they have cut us?" the next moment a ball passed through his body. But still he kept his feet, and still waved his mutilated standard, until faint with loss of blood he sunk on the field. After being driven the second time down the hill, the enemy for a while ceased their efforts, and sudden silence fell on the two armies, broken only by the groans of the wounded and dying. The scene and the hour combined to render that hill-top a strange and fearful object in the darkness. On one side lay a wilderness, on the other rolled the cataract, whose solemn anthem could again be heard pealing on through the night. Leaning on their heated guns, that gallant band stood bleeding amid the wreck it had made. It was midnight—the stars look quietly down from the sky—the summer wind swept softly by, and nature was breathing long and peacefully. But all over that hill lay the brave dead, and down its sides in every direction the blood of men was rippling. Nothing but skeletons of regiments remained, yet calm and stern were the words spoken there in the darkness. "Close up the ranks," were the heroic orders that still fell on the shattered battalions, and they closed with the same firm presence, and dauntless hearts as before. It was thought that the British would make no further attempt to recover their guns, but reinforcements having arrived from Fort George, they, after an hour's repose and refreshments, prepared for a final assault. Our troops had all this time stood to their arms, and faint with hunger, thirst and fatigue, seemed unequal to a third conflict against a fresh force. But as they heard the enemy advancing, they forgot their weariness and met the onset firmly as before. But this time the ranks of the enemy did not yield under the fire that smote them, they pressed steadily forward, and delivering their volleys as they advanced, at length stood on the summit of the hill breast to breast with the American line. The conflict now became fearful, and more like the murderous hand-to-hand fights of an old than a modern battle. Battalions on both sides were forced back till the ranks became mingled. Bayonet crossed bayonet, and men lay transfixed side by side. Hindman, whose artillery had been from the first served with surpassing skill, found the enemy amid his guns, across which he was compelled to fight them. The firing gave way to the clash of steel, the blazing hill-top subsided into gloom, out of which the sound of this nocturnal combat arose in strange and wild confusion. Scott, charging like fire at the head of his exhausted battalion received another wound which prostrated him, but his last words to Leavenworth were "Charge again! Charge again, Leavenworth," he cried, as they bore him apparently dying from that fierce foughten field. General Brown, supported on his horse, and suffering from a severe wound, was slowly led away. Jessup was bleeding from several wounds; every regimental officer in Scott's brigade was killed or wounded. Only one soldier out of every four stood up unhurt.

The annals of war rarely record such a slaughter in a single brigade, but it is rarer still a brigade has such a leader. The ghosts of regiments alone remained, yet before these, the veterans of England were at last compelled to flee, and betake themselves to the darkness for safety. Sullen, mortified, and badly wounded, Drummond was carried from the field, and all further attempts to take the hill were abandoned. The Americans, however, kept watch and ward around the cannon that had cost them so great a sacrifice till near daybreak, when orders were received to retire to the camp. No water could be obtained on the heights, and the troops wanted repose. Through the want of drag-ropes and horses the cannon were left behind. This was a sad drawback to the victory, and Major Ripley should have detailed some men to have taken at least the lightest ones away. Trophies won with the blood of so many brave men were worth more effort than he put forth to secure them. A bloodier battle in proportion to the number engaged, was never fought than this. Nearly 800 Americans, and as many English had fallen on and around that single hill. It was literally loaded with the slain. Seventy-six officers were either killed or wounded out of our army of some 3,000 men, and not a general on either side remained unwounded.

The Americans, after the battle of Niagara, retired to Fort Erie, and set about strengthening its defenses. In the month of August the British advanced to Fort Erie, and commenced a regular siege of that fortification. See Chippewa and Fort Erie.

NICE, A.D. 1097.—The siege of Nice is only memorable from the fact that this city was the first conquest of the Crusaders in the East. It was taken in the year 1097.

NICOPOLIS, A.D. 1396. — Nicopolis, in Turkey, is memorable for the great battle fought in its vicinity on the 28th of September, 1396, between the Ottoman army, under Bojazet, and the Hungarians and their allies, under King Sigismund. The Hungarians were totally defeated. Their defeat is ascribable as much to the rashness and presumption of the Count de Nevers, and other French officers, as to the bravery of the Turks.

NINEVEH, B.C. 747.—We now turn our eyes upon a city, the name of which will ever be famous on its own account, and from its connection with the Scriptures. And yet the siege of Nineveh furnishes but few particulars for narration: it is, however, a remarkable circumstance, that, according to the best chronologers, Rome was founded the very year that Nineveh was destroyed.

Sardanapalus, King of Assyria, surpassed all his predecessors in effeminacy, luxury, and cowardice. He never went out of his palace, but spent all his time among his women, dressed and painted in the same manner as they were, and employed, in imitation of them, in the labors of the distaff. His whole glory consisted in his treasures, and all his time was devoted to the indulgence of infamous and criminal pleasures.

JACKSON AT NEW ORLEANS.

Arbaces, governor of Media, having found means to get into his palace and behold Sardanapalus in the midst of his infamous seraglio, was so disgusted with the idea that so many brave men should be subject to such an effeminate being, that he immediately formed a conspiracy against him. Belesis, governor of Babylon, and several others entered into it. On the rumor of this revolt, the king hid himself in the innermost recesses of his palace. Being afterward obliged to take the field with some forces his captains had got together, he at first gained three successive victories over the enemy, but was in the end overcome and pursued to the gates of Nineveh. He here shut himself up, convinced that the rebels would never be able to take a city so wonderfully fortified by nature and art, and so abundantly stored with provisions. The siege proved of very great length. It has been declared by an ancient oracle, that Nineveh could never be taken unless the river became an enemy to the city. This buoyed up Sardanapalus, because he looked upon the thing as impossible. But when he saw that the Tigris by a violent inundation had thrown down twenty stadia of the city wall, and by that means opened a passage to the enemy, he understood the meaning of the oracle, and looked upon himself as lost. He resolved, however, to die in such a manner as, in his opinion, would cover the infamy of his scandalous life. He ordered a vast pile of wood to be collected in his palace, and setting fire to it, burned himself, his women, his eunuchs, and his treasures. Athenæus makes these treasures amount to a thousand myriads of talents of gold, and ten times as many talents of silver (about fourteen hundred millions sterling), which, without reckoning any thing else, appears to exceed credibility.

We can not wonder that the Assyrian empire should fall under such a man; but it was not till after it had passed through various augmentations, diminutions, and revolutions, common to most great states during a course of ages. This empire had subsisted above 1,450 years. Of the ruins of this vast empire were formed three considerable kingdoms: that of the Medes, which Arbaces, the head of the conspiracy, restored to its liberty; that of the Assyrians of Babylon, which was given to Belesis, governor of that city; and that of the Assyrians of Nineveh, whose first king took the name of Ninus the Second.

One hundred years after the death of Sardanapalus, under the reign of Saracus, named Cyndauladanus, Nebopalassar, general of his armies, revolted against him, for the purpose of obtaining his throne. He allied himself with Cyaxares, king of the Medes. Their united forces besieged Saracus in Nineveh; they took the city, killed the monarch, and entirely destroyed that celebrated place, B.C. 648.

NISIB, A.D. 1839.—Near Nisib, a village of northern Syria, in June, 1839, the army of Ibrahim Pacha defeated a Turkish force under Hafiz Pacha.

NORDLINGEN, A.D. 1634.—In 1634, during the celebrated Thirty Years' War, a battle was fought near Nordlingen, in Bavaria, between the Austrian and Bavarian army under the Archduke Ferdinand, and the Swedes and their allies under the famous Bernard, Duke of Weimar. The latter were defeated, with considerable loss. In 1796, a battle was also fought here, in which the French defeated the Austrians. The town hall of Nordlingen is ornamented with fresco paintings of the first battle.

NORFOLK, A.D. 1776.—Norfolk is situated on the right or north bank of the Elizabeth river, eight miles from Hampton roads, and thirty-two miles from the sea, in the State of Virginia.

In the latter part of the year 1775, Norfolk was occupied by Lord Dunmore, with a force of about 600 men, consisting of British regulars, Tory volunteers, negroes, and vagrants. Dunmore, with this motley army, had ravaged the country along the shores of the Elizabeth river, and had endeavored to bring the Indians upon the American colonists. When this was made known, the people burned with fierce indignation. Colonel Woodford was sent with a detachment of minute-men into Norfolk county, and the militia of that section were called to arms. Dunmore became alarmed on learning of these preparations, and constructed batteries and intrenchments at Norfolk. Learning that the patriots were approaching by way of the great bridge, which crosses the Elizabeth river about nine miles from that point, Dunmore resolved to dispute the passage of the river at Norfolk. The bridge crosses the main stream from two islands, which are connected with the main land by causeways and smaller bridges. Dunmore cast up breastworks upon the island on the Norfolk side of the river, and furnished them with a sufficient number of cannon. The patriots could only approach the batteries upon the narrow causeway, and therefore constructed a breastwork at its western extremity. On the 9th of December, 1775, before daybreak, Dunmore, who remained in Norfolk, having heard that the patriots were weak in numbers, ordered Captains Fordyce and Leslie to attack the American redoubt. Early in the morning of that day, Captain Fordyce, at the head of about sixty British grenadiers, and a corps of regulars, advanced across the bridge, and made an attack upon the breast-work. The Americans received him with a warm fire, which threw the assailants into disorder. Fordyce rallied his troops, and having brought forward two pieces of cannon, placed them in a position to command the enemy's works, and under cover of a heavy fire from the cannon, led his men, about 120 in number, across the causeway. The British maintained a constant fire of musketry as they advanced; but the Americans reserved their fire until the British troops came within fifty yards of the breast-work. Then, Lieutenant Travis, who commanded in the redoubt, the main body of the patriots being posted about 400 yards in the rear, gave the signal, and the breast-work was instantly encircled by a blaze of fire. Volley after volley was poured upon the assailants. Captain Fordyce, who was the especial target of the Virginia riflemen, fell, pierced with fourteen bullets, within fifteen feet of the American works. His men fled in wild terror, followed by a scathing tempest of bullets. Captain Leslie, who, with about 230 Tories and negroes, had remained at the west end of the bridge, now rallied the regulars, and kept up the firing of the two cannon. Woodford, with the main body of the patriots, advanced to the relief of Travis, and Colonel Stevens of the Culpepper battalion outflanked the enemy on the left. The Virginians steadily advanced along the causeway, and attacked the British with such impetuosity that they were soon put to flight, leaving their cannon, spiked, behind. The loss of the British in this affair, in killed and wounded, was sixty-two. The patriots lost none in killed, and one man only was slightly wounded. On the 14th of December, Woodford entered Norfolk in triumph. Dunmore, meanwhile, had abandoned the intrenchments at Norfolk, with twenty pieces of cannon, which were spiked, and with the Tories and their families had retreated to the ships of the British fleet. The Americans in the town kept up a desultory fire upon the ships. Distress soon prevailed in the fleet; famine stared them in the face. The foraging parties were cut off by the Virginians, and the sufferings of the British became intolerable. At this juncture, the frigate Liverpool, from Great Britain, entered the harbor of Norfolk, and Dunmore, emboldened by her presence, sent a flag to Colonel Howe, who commanded in the town, commanding him to cease firing upon the fleet, and supply the ships with provisions, or he would bombard the town. Colonel Howe returned a decided refusal, and Dunmore prepared to put his threat into execution. On the morning of the 31st of December, Dunmore gave notice of his intention, in order that the loyalists still remaining in Norfolk might retire to a place of safety; and, early in the morning of the 1st of January, 1776, the Liverpool, the Dunmore, and two sloops of war, opened a heavy cannonade on the town, and bodies of marines and sailors were sent on shore and set fire to the warehouses.

The wind was blowing from the water, and soon the greater part of the town was in flames. The conflagration lasted fifty hours, and during its continuance the fleet maintained an incessant cannonade upon the place. Parties of British troops were sent on shore; but were immediately driven back by the patriots with loss. In these repulses Colonel Stevens was peculiarly conspicuous. During the three days of terror, while the flames spread devastation on all sides, and the air was filled with cannon-balls, not one of the patriot army was killed, and only three or four women and children were slain in the streets. Seven persons were wounded. Colonel Stevens and his little band remained in Norfolk until February 1776, when, having removed the families, and appraised the dwellings still remaining, he caused them to be destroyed, in order that they might not shelter the enemy; and thus the most flourishing town of Virginia was turned into a barren waste. Howe divided his troops; some were stationed at Kemp's landing, some at Great Bridge, and others in Suffolk while most of the fugitives from the city fled. After Howe abandoned the site of Norfolk, Dunmore erected barracks there, but being prevented from obtaining supplies from the adjacent country, he destroyed them, and sailed down the Elizabeth river, finally landing upon Groyn's Island in Chesapeake Bay, near the mouth of the Piankotank river. Norfolk, phenix-like, has arisen from its ashes, and is now one of the most beautiful and flourishing cities of Virginia.

NORTHMEN, BATTLES OF THE—In order to diversify the contents and add to the general interest of this volume, the editor has thought fit to give an account of the discoveries and battles of the Northmen on this continent, prior to the advent of Columbus. This account, although not strictly historical, has nevertheless a strong foundation for belief. Mr. J. A. Blackwell, who edited Mallet's Northern Antiquities, believes that however little faith may be placed on the truth of the account, it can be said with certainty that the Northmen were tolerably well acquainted with the coast of America from Labrador to Massachusetts; and had a vague tradition that it extended much further south.

Almost at the very time of the massacre of the Danes in England, their brothers of the north were prosecuting their discoveries in the western continent. This may appear a startling assertion, yet there are proofs to be brought forward, which are sufficient almost to convince the most skeptical. At the time of the conquest of Britain by the Danes, the Scandinavian race was the most powerful of the nations of Europe. Enterprising, and ambitious for territorial acquisition, they spread themselves throughout all Europe.

They carried their arms from the North, to the South and East; why, therefore, should they have not extended themselves toward the West. That they did so seems almost verified; not only by analogy, but by history.

It is universally acknowledged that in the year 860 the Norwegians discovered and setled in Iceland; and it was proved beyond a doubt that the Icelanders, about a century after the island was first settled, discovered Greenland,

The accounts of the discovery of Iceland, Greenland, and also of a western continent, are preserved in Old Icelandic sagas, which were committed to written form from oral tradition, two, or three, or even four generations after the events narrated are said to have taken place. The sagas relating to Iceland and Greenland have been fully corroborated. This warrants the conclusion that those which tell us in the same artless manner of the discovery of a western continent are also true, though their statements have not as yet been confirmed by the same kind of palpable evidence.

In the year 1705 Torfacus published a history of the discoveries of the Northmen in the western hemisphere. Other writers have also given ample information on the subject; but still the world refuses to believe the startling assertion. In the year 1837, the Royal Society of Northern Antiquarians of Copenhagen, published, under the able supervision of Professor Rafn and Finn Magnusen, the original narratives of the voyagers, under the title of "Antiquitates Americanæ." So clear and concise are the arguments used by the talented editors to corroborate the accounts given in the sagas, and thus substantiate the claims of the Northmen as the first discoverers of America, that the unprejudiced reader can not but acknowledge them to be true.

The sagas of Eirek the Red, and of Thorfirm Karlsefui, are the two most important, published by Mr. Rafn. They were first committed to writing in the twelfth century, about four generations after the events recorded took place. The manuscript of the latter saga, made use of by Mr. Rafn as the basis of his text, is written on vellum, and bears internal evidence of having been written at the close of the thirteenth or the beginning of the fourteenth century. The saga of Eirek the Red forms a part of the beautiful "Codex Flatoiensis," which is a collecton of sagas transcribed from olden manuscripts, between the years 1337 and 1395; that is to say, a century before the discovery of America by Columbus.

Eirek the Red, according to the sagas relating to Greenland, was the son of Thorvard, a Norwegian chieftain, who, being banished for the crime of homicide, about the year 975, retired to Iceland. Several years afterward, probably in 982, Eirek the Red, having committed the same crime, was banished from Iceland. He manned a vessel, and set sail toward the West, in search of a country which—according to tradition—had been descried by a former navigator. His search proved successful. He landed on an island west of Cape Farewell. There he passed his first winter. In the spring he visited the mainland for the purpose of exploring it. He found the land clothed with verdure, and he named it Greenland, for, said he, a good name will attract emigrants hither. He spent his term of banishment in Greenland, and then returned to Iceland, where he represented the excellent qualities of the newly discovered country in the most glowing terms. Attracted by the descriptions given by Eirek, many were persuaded to accompany him thither, and, accordingly, in the year 986, he again set sail for Greenland with a number of emigrants, and settled there. Constant accessions were made to the colony; new settlements sprang up along the coast, and a thriving trade was driven between the colonies and the northern countries.

Among the emigrants who accompanied Eirek the Red to Greenland was Herjulf, whose son Bjarni, at the time of his departure, was on a trading voyage to Norway. Upon his return to Iceland, Bjarni, finding that his father had emigrated with his family, resolved to follow them, although neither he nor any of his crew were acquainted with the Greenland seas. But his course was pointed out to him by those with whom Eirek had conversed, and he was told that he could recognize Greenland by its lofty snow-capped mountains. He had been out of port but a short time when a heavy gale from the north, accompanied by thick fogs, sprang up, and drove his vessel he knew not whither. At length the storm abated, and the weather cleared, and in a short time he discovered land, moderately elevated, and covered with wood. He was convinced that it was not Greenland, and therefore changed his course, leaving the land to his right, and standing out to sea. After sailing two days, he again discovered land, lower than the former, but also covered with wood.

Proceeding on his voyage, with a south-west wind, he, three days afterward, descried a lofty island, whose shores presented numerous icebergs and glaciers. The barren and unattractive appearance of the country prevented him from landing, and he again stood out to sea, and arrived at a colony in Greenland where his father was settled, four days afterward. Several years subsequent, Bjarni again visited Norway. While there he related his adventures to Eirek, one of the principal chieftains of the country, who blamed him exceedingly for not having more closely examined the country which he had discovered. After his return to Greenland, the chief topic of conversation was the newly discovered country toward the south-west. Thus was the spirit of enterprise kept awake, and the desire to visit the strange lands increased.

In the spring of the year 1000, Leif, the son of Eirek the Red, purchased Bjarni's vessel, which he fitted out with every requisite for a long voyage; and set sail toward the west with a crew of thirty-five men. He first descried the country which Bjarni had seen last. Having landed with his crew, he found no herbage of any kind, but a bare, rugged plain of broad flat rocks, extending from the foot of a chain of ice and snow-clad mountains to the sea side. He called this country Helluland, or Shistland, the land of stones.*

Returning to their vessel the navigators proceeded on their voyage, and arrived at a low, level coast with numerous white sandy cliffs, and thickly covered with wood, from which circumstance he called it Markland, which means the land of wood.†

With a north-east wind the voyagers again continued on their way, and after sailing two days, they came to an island between which and a point projecting northward from the mainland, was a channel. They entered the channel, and holding their course westwards along the shores of the mainland, they observed that a great extent of ground was left dry at ebb-tide. After proceeding thus a short distance, they landed near the mouth of a river, which rising in a lake emptied into the sea. They were so well pleased with the appearance of the country, that they brought their vessel up the river with the flood-tide and moored her in the lake. They found the country exceedingly productive; the soil appeared fruitful; both the river and the lake afforded them an abundant supply of salmon; and the pasturage was excellent. Struck with the beauties and fruitfulness of the spot, they determined to make it their winter abode, and erected some large and commodious dwellings or booths, known afterward under the appellation of Leifsbudir, or Leifsbooths.*

After completing his buildings, Leif divided his crew into two companies to be employed alternately in exploring the country and guarding the dwellings. On one occasion, a German, returning from an exploring expedition, announced with a countenance beaming with satisfaction that he had been feasting on grapes. His companions eagerly requested him to lead them to the spot, which, upon examination, they found covered with wild vines. It was soon ascertained that wild grapes grew in abundance in most parts of the country. From this circumstance Leif was induced to give it the appropriate name of Vineland. Having spent the winter in this delightful place, Leif and his companions in the spring set sail for Greenland, where they arrived in safety.†

* Helluland was probably the south-eastern extremity of Newfoundland, which is nearly separated from the main by two deep bays, so as easily to be mistaken for an island. The distance from Cape Broil on this coast, to Cape Farewell in Greenland, is 600 nautical miles, which, with a fair wind, might easily be run in four days. The description given by modern travelers of the coast of Newfoundland fully corresponds with that of the sagas; and Anspach, a modern German writer, speaks of the bare and large flat rocks without a tree or shrub. In the old Icelandic geographical treatises Newfoundland is called Little (Litta) Helluland, and the name of Helluland, hit mik'a, or Great Helluland, is given to Labrador and the whole coast of the American continent west of Baffin's Bay. The Helhland of Thorfirm was probably the south-western extremity of Labrador. A writer in the "Philosophical Transactions" says: "The surface is everywhere uneven, and covered with large stones, some of which are of amazing dimensions. The mountains are almost devoid of every sort of herbage; a blighted shrub and a little moss is sometimes to be seen upon them, but in general the bare rock is all you behold. In a word, the whole country is nothing more than a prodigious heap of rocks. This writer also notices the great number of foxes that are found in the country.—Blackwell.

† Markland can be no other than Nova Scotia. The following descriptions of the coast from modern works on navigation correspond to the letter with those of the Northman: "The land is low in general, and not visible twenty miles off. Aspotogon hills have a long level appearance. Between Cape La Have and Port Medway, the coast to the seaward is level and low, and the shores marked with white rocks, with low barren points; from thence to Shelburne and Port Roseway are woods. From Port Haldimand to Cape Sable the land is low with white sandy cliffs, particularly visible at sea. Cape Sable is a low woody island at the south-eastern extremity of a range of sand-cliffs, which are very remarkable at a considerable distance in the offing."—New American Pilot.

"From Port Haldimand to Cape Sable the land appears level and low, and on the shore are some cliffs of exceedingly white sand, particularly in the entrance of Port Haldimand, and on Cape Sable, where they are very conspicuous from sea."—Laurie and Whittle's New Sailing Directions for the Coasts of North America.—BLACKWELL.

* Mr. Rafn supposes that the course here described was through Nantucket Bay and Vineyard Sound; and thence up the Seaconnet reach and Pocasset river to Mount Hope Bay, where Leif fixed his booths on the Taunton river.

† It should be observed that in all the sagas relating to America, they invariably state that the ships of the Northmen first passed Helluland, the land of stone; next Woodland, and finally arrived at Vinland, the land of vines. These facts of themselves seem sufficient to prove that the countries so designated, were respectively the projecting lands of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and Upon arriving in Greenland, Leif and his companions circulated glowing descriptions of the beauties and fertility of the newly discovered country. Thorwald, the brother of Leif, was excited in a high degree by the favorable accounts; and thought that the country had not been sufficiently explored. Therefore, in the year 1002 he set sail for Vinland, with a crew of thirty men. He passed Helluland and Woodland, and finally arrived without accident in the lake on the shores of which Leif had erected his winter buildings. The booths were in an excellent condition, and Thorwald and crew passed the winter in them comfortably.

Upon the coming of spring they set forth on an exploring expedition toward the south. Their road led them through a beautiful and well-wooded country, diversified by hills and dales, and watered by gushing streams and rivulets. Along the coast they observed numerous shoals and islands. Having satisfied their curiosity, the explorers returned to Leif's booths, where they spent the winter. During the succeeding summer, 1004, Thorwald sailed toward the east from Vinland, and then northerly past a remarkable headland, which with an opposite headland inclosed a bay. They here encountered a violent gale of wind which drove the vessel upon a shoal, by which its keel was so much damaged that it was found necessary to make a new one. To do this they were obliged to remain here a considerable season. Thorwald planted the old keel upon one of the headlands, which, from this circumstance, he called Cape Keel.*

After repairing the vessel the voyagers proceeded along the coast eastwardly until they arrived at a finely wooded headland. They landed and Thorwald, struck with admiration by the beauty of the spot, exclaimed, "Here should I like to make my home!" Near the shore they discovered three canoes, under which, upon closer examination, they found concealed several Exquimaux, or Skraellings, as they are styled in the saga. Thorwald's men endeavored to capture the natives, and in the struggle which ensued three or four of the Exquimaux were slain. The remainder hastily launched a canoe, sprang into it, and swiftly paddled away. "Now," continued the saga, "a deep sleep fell upon Thorwald and his crew; but suddenly he was awakened by a voice saying: "Arise, Thorwald, hasten to thy ship, and if thou wilt save thine own, and the lives of thy crew, delay not in sailing.'" Hastily awaking his men, Thorwald bade them to return to the vessel with the utmost speed. They had scarcely gained the deck when a swarm of canoes, filled with natives, issued from the interior of the bay, and rapidly approached the ship. Arriving within a proper distances the canoes stayed their course, and the savages arising, discharged a great cloud of arrows into the ship. Then resuming their paddles they retreated precipitately. The Northmen did not pursue; they had met with an irretrievable loss. Their brave companion and commander, Thorwald, was mortally wounded. Before he died he directed his comrades to cause his body to be buried on the spot which he had so prophetically desired as his abiding-place. He died, and his crew obeyed him. They buried him in a beautiful spot of ground on the headland, and erected a cross at either extremity of the mound which covered the remains of the first European buried in the soil of the western hemisphere. The headland was named by Thorwald's crew, Cape Cross. Thus sadly ended the first battle fought in America by Europeans. Thorwald's men returned to Vinland, where they spent the winter, and early in the spring of 1005 they set sail for Greenland with a cargo of timber and vine cuttings. The burial-place of Thorwald is not precisely indicated, but it may perhaps have been the bluff head of Alderton, at the south-east of Boston Bay.

During the absence of Thorwald and his companions, Christianity had been introduced into the Greenland colonies from Iceland. In the fall of 1006 two ships, the one commanded by Thorfinn, who was surnamed Karlsefni, the man of ability, and the other by Thorhall Gamlason, and Bjarni Grimolfsson, left Iceland for Greenland where they arrived in due season. Thorfinn was a man of great power and wealth, belonging to a distinguished family who traced their origin to Danish, Swedish, Norwegian, Irish and Scotch ancestors. He was accompanied by Snorri Thorbrandsson, also of good extraction. Thorfinn and his companions spent the winter at the hospitable house of old Eirek the Red. Upon the arrival of Yule, or Christmas, the festivities were celebrated by old Eirek and his guest with a magnificence never before witnessed in Greenland. During this festal season, and the long winter nights that succeeded, Thorfinn and his companions were regaled with accounts of the newly discovered country. The beauties, fertility, and especially the finely grained woods, excellent salmon, and delicious wild grapes, which Vinland produced in such Massachusetts. Modern geographers, as before observed, describe these countries in almost the same language used by the Sagasman. That vines grow in the New England States spontaneously, is a fact well attested. The island of Martha's Vineyard obtained its name from the first English settlers, on account of their finding wild grapes growing there in abundance.

* Cape Keel was probably the headland now called Cape Cod. The opposite headland, Garnet Point, which with Cape Cod forms the entrance to Cape Cod Bay.

abundance formed the topics of the conversation on all occasions. Animated by the narratives and eager to develop the resources of this country of apparently inexhaustible fertility, Thorfinn, who appears to have been one of the most enterprising merchant rovers of his day, determined to found a colony there. Accordingly, in the spring of 1007, he caused his own vessel and that belonging to Bjarni and Thorhall to be fitted out for a voyage to Vinland. A third ship belonging to Thorvard, a son-in-law of Eirek the Red, was also fitted out. Thorvard, who commanded this vessel, was accompanied by Thorhall the huntsman. Thorhall the huntsman was a favorite of old Eirek, because he was a pagan; for Eirek himself had not adopted Christianity.

The three vessels were manned with a crew of more than fifty men each, numbering in all one hundred and sixty men, the greater number of whom were accompanied by their wives and children. A suitable supply of cattle and other live stock was taken on board, and amid the good wishes of their friends the emigrants set sail. Arriving at the forest crowned shore of Woodland, some of the men landed on an island near the coast. While on this island they killed a bear, from which circumstance they named it "Bear's Island."*

Leaving this place they continued on their voyage toward the south-west, and passing Cape Keel, they touched at an island at the mouth of a bay. The island swarmed with eider-ducks, whose eggs covered the ground to such an extent that the seamen could scarcely walk without treading upon them. A strong current ran past this island, from which circumstance they named it Stream Isle. Further up the Bay there was also a strong current. The Northmen hence named the bay Stream Frith.†

The ships were here unladen, and the voyagers spent the winter on the island. Upon the arrival of spring, their provisions being exhausted, famine stared them in the face. The weather was too stormy for fishing; and had driven away the eider-ducks. At length, however, after enduring great privation, the weather became milder, and they were no longer in want of provisions, being able to hunt, fish, and gather eggs in the island. Shortly afterward Thorhall the huntsman, with eight men, left Thorfinn and sailed northward in search of Vinland; but after passing Cape Keel, they were driven out to sea, and were, according to the account of traders, cast on the coast of Ireland, where they were made slaves.

Thorfinn and his companions now sailed south, and came to a river that flowed through a lake on its way to the sea; and the mouth of which was so beset with sand-banks as to be only accessible at high water. To this place Thorfinn gave the name of Hóp (Eastward).* Pleased with the general aspect of the country, Thorfinn resolved to make it his winter quarters. The rivers and creeks actually teemed with fish; and corn grew wild on the low grounds, and vines on the hills. The settlers erected their winter buildings at a short distance from the lake or bay.

One morning a short time after their arrival, a number of natives in skin canoes came up the bay, brandishing their poles, and making a great noise. The Northmen responded to them by elevating a white shield in token of peace. The natives approached the shore, and landed without evincing any signs of hostility. They were of a sallow and swarthy appearance, with long coarse hair, and high cheek bones. After gazing for some time at the strangers in mute amazement, the natives re-entered their canoes, and rowed away around the headland. The settlers spent the winter without molestation; but early in the spring the natives came again. So great were their numbers that the surface of the bay seemed actually covered with their canoes. The Northmen immediately elevated a white shield, and, thus encouraged, the natives landed in scores. Their canoes were loaded with fine gray fur, and squirrel skins, which they eagerly bartered with the Northmen for bits of red cloth, and milk porridge, which they seemed to relish highly. The swords and spears of the Northmen attracted their strongest attention; but Thorfinn prudently forbade his people to sell them. While this lucrative traffic was going on, and the Northmen were dealing out their cloth in smaller shreds, a bull which they had brought with them, suddenly issued from the woods and began to bellow vigorously. The natives, terrified at the unusual, and to them unearthly sound, rushed precipi-

* Probably Cape Sable Island, now called.

† Stream Bay is supposed to be Buzzard's Bay, and Stream Isle, either Martha's Vineyard or the islands of Cuttyhunk and Nashewenna, which, in the eleventh century, were probably connected. The gulf stream will sufficiently account for the strong currents noticed above.

* If Thorfinn passed the first winter at Buzzard's Bay, Hóp may possibly be the present Mount Hope Bay. This locality in fact perfectly corresponds to the description given in the narrative. There is a river—the Taunton river—flowing through a lake—Mount Hope Bay might almost be termed a lake—on its way to the sea—by the Pocasset river and Seaconnet reach, which owing to their sandy shoals are only navigable at high water. It would appear that this Mount Hope is only a corruption of the Indian name haup (pronounced like the Icelandic hóp), which the place bore when the first English settlers arrived there. Haup was the residence of the famous Metacomet, or king Philip, as he was called, the last sachem of the Wampanoag Indians. And some of the Rhode Island antiquarians have hazarded the supposition that the name may have been transmitted to the Indians by the descendants of the Northmen who had settled in the place, and were gradually merged into the tribe of the Wampanoags.—Blackwell.

tately to their canoes, and rowed off in the utmost trepidation.

Three weeks afterward, they again appeared in numbers even greater than before. This time their visit was evidently no friendly one. As they approached the shore, they brandished their poles, and with wild gesticulations shouted forth their defiance to the invaders of the soil. The Northmen perceiving their hostile intentions, elevated a red shield; and the exasperated savages beached their canoes and hastened on to the attack. A hot skirmish ensued. The natives used their slings with such dexterity that the Northmen were obliged to give ground. Showers of stones fell upon them, killing and sorely wounding them, and throwing them into complete confusion. Fancying themselves surrounded, they were at length seized with a panic, and turning from the furious discharges of the enemy, they fled ingloriously. With a shout of triumph the savages would have pursued; but at this critical moment Freydisa, the wife of Thorvard, rushed from one of the boats, exclaiming in a voice that resounded above the tumult of the battle,

"Valiant men, why do you run before such caitiffs, you should knock them down like cattle! Give me a sword, I can wield it better than the best of you."

The fugitives heeded her not; but continued their flight into the forest. Freydisa endeavored to follow them; but being in feeble health was overtaken by the natives. Picking up the sword of Thorband Snorrason, who had been killed by a stone, she suddenly turned around and faced her enemies. They rushed on to slay her; but she wielded her sword with such deadly effect, and gesticulated and screamed so frantically, that the natives were terrified or bewildered, and turning from her they hastily retreated toward the canoes. The Northmen recovering their courage at the sight of the bravery of their countrywoman, resumed the offensive, and eagerly pursued the flying savages, killing great numbers of them. The balance regaining their canoes, hastily put off from shore and paddled away in the utmost terror.

After this engagement Thorfinn and his people were convinced that it would be impossible for them to remain in the country in which they would be constantly exposed to the attacks of the natives. They therefore returned to Stream Frith, where they spent the third winter, and in the ensuing spring they sailed homeward, touching at Woodland where they captured two native children whom they carried off with them. On the voyage Bjarni's ship was driven westward into a sea so infested with worms, which penetrated the bottom until it was in a sinking condition. The small boat was not of sufficient capacity to hold the whole crew, and they had therefore no other alternative but to cast lots who should enter it. Bjarni himself was among the fortunate. The bottom of the boat was smeared with blubber-oil to preserve it from the ravages of the worms, and the fortunate ones were about to push off from the vessel, and leave their companions to their fate, when a man from the ship reminded Bjarni that he had sacredly promised his father, when he left Ireland, that they should both share the same fate, whatever it might be. The noble Bjarni could not resist this appeal; he mounted the vessel's side and gave his place in the boat to the young man. The vessel was never heard of afterwards. Those in the boat succeeded in reaching Dublin where they related what had taken place. Thorfinn and his companions reached Greenland in safety in 1011.

Freydisa, the woman whose heroism had saved the Northmen, in their last battle with the natives, visited Vinland again during the year 1011, in company with two Norwegian brothers Helgi and Finnbogi. They spent the winter at Leifsbooths, but a coolness sprung up between Freydisa and the two brothers, and she persuaded her husband Thorvard to murder them while they were asleep. But as she could not prevail either on her husband or any of his men to lay their hands on the five women of the Norwegian party, she seized a hatchet and killed them herself. After the perpretration of this base deed, they returned to Greenland in 1013, when Leif, having heard of the crime, he put three of Freydisa's followers to the torture and obtained a full account of the sanguinary transaction. Freydisa was left unpunished but became an object of great abhorrence.

"Such is the account transmitted to us," says Mr. Blackwell, "of the discovery of Vinland, which we have attempted to show in the explanatory remarks, there is every reason to suppose, was that part of the American continent that, six centuries later, became known under the appellation of New England."

NORWALK, A.D. 1779.—Norwalk, on the Norwalk river, in Connecticut, was burned by the British and Tories, under Governor Tryon, on the 12th of July, 1779. Two houses of worship, 80 dwellings, 87 barns, 17 shops, 4 mills, and 5 ships were laid in ashes in the course of a few hours. Only six houses were spared.

NOVI, A.D. 1799.—Novi, a town of Italy, is situated at the foot of the Apennines. On a plain adjoining a battle took place in 1799, between the French republican army, and the Austro-Russian army. Suwarrow, on the 4th of August concentrated his army near Novi, and assigned them the following positions: Kray, with the divisions of Bellegarde and Ott, was encamped in two lines on the right, near the road from Novi to Bosco; the center, comprising the divisions of Forster and Schwiekousky, commanded by Derfelden, were in the rear of Pozzolo-Formigaro, while Melas, with the left, consisting of the Austrian divisions of Traelich and Lichtenstein, occupied Rivolta. The French army of Joubert occupied the plain in the rear of Novi, his right on the Scrivia, his center at Novi, and his left at Basaluzzo; a position which enabled him to cover the march of his columns, detached from his right, which were to advance by Cassano. The French also occupied a semicircle on the northern slopes of the Monte Rotondo; the left, composed of the divisions of Grouchy and Lemoine, under the command of Perignon, extended in a circular form around Pasturana; in the center, the division Laboissière, under St. Cyr, covered the heights on the right and left of Novi; while the division of Watrin, on the right, guarded the approaches to the Monte Rotondo from the side of Tortona, and Dombrousky, with the division of Poles, blockaded Seravalle. Their position was one of great strength, and the concentrated masses of the French presented a formidable front among the woods, ravines, slopes, and vineyards with which the foot of the Apeninnes was covered. On the side of the republicans, 43,000 men were assembled; while the allies numbered 55,000; the French were desirous to engage upon the rugged ground at the foot of the hills, on account of the superiority of the enemy, while the allies were anxious to draw their opponents into the plain, where their cavalry might give them a decisive advantage. Joubert, who had entirely disbelieved the rumors of the fall of Mantua, and gave no thought to the repeated assertions of St. Cyr, that he would have the whole allied army to contend with, was astonished to behold the immense force of Kray encamped opposite his left wing. His situation was one of great perplexity. Retreat was difficult in presence of such an army, and to engage with a force so much superior he deemed the height of temerity. Consequently, he resolved, late on the night of the 14th, after much irresolution, on retiring into the fastnesses of the Apeninnes, and only waited for the arrival of his scouts in the morning to give orders for carrying it into effect, when the commencement of the attack by the Austrians obliged him to accept battle in the position in place he then occupied. The plan of Suwarrow, was to force back the right of the French by means of the corps of Kray, while Bagrathion was to turn their left, and unite in their rear, being covered by the cannon of Serravalle, while Derfelden attacked Novi in the center, and Melas commanded the reserve, ready to support any part of them which might need his aid. In accordance with these orders, Kray commenced the attack at five in the morning; Bellegarde attacked Grouchy, and Ott, Lemoine; the republicans were at first taken by surprise; and their masses, in great part in the act of marching, or entangled in the vineyards, received the fire of the Austrians without being able to deploy or return it. Some of the brigades resisted heroically, yet the imperialists gained ground, and the heads of their columns were already advancing upon the plateau, when Joubert hurried in person to the spot, and received a ball in his breast when in the act of waving his hat, and encouraging his men. He instantly fell, and with his last breath exclaimed. "Advance, my friends, advance!" The confusion occasioned by his fall would have proved fatal to the French army, probably, had the rest of the allies been so far advanced as to have been aware of it; but by a strange fatality, though the attacks of the Austrians were all combined and concentric, they were calculated to take place at different times; consequently, while this advantage on their left was obtained, the Russians in the center were at Pozzolo-Formigaro, and Melas had only dispatched a detachment from Rivolta to observe the course of the Scrivia. This, combined with the arrival of Moreau, who assumed the command, restored order, and the Austrians were at length driven to the foot of the hill, on their second line. While this encounter was taking place, Bellegarde endeavored to gain the rear of Pasturana by a ravine which encircled it, and nearly succeeded in doing so, when he was charged so furiously by the grenadiers of Partonneaux and the cavalry of Richepaun, that they were driven back in disorder, and the whole left wing rescued from danger. As yet, the right of the republicans had not been attacked, and St. Cyr employed the time in completing his defensive arrangements. Kray, finding the whole weight of the engagement on his hands, pressed Bagrathion to commence an attack on Novi; and though he was desirous to wait till the hour assigned by his commander for his moving, he agreed to commence, when it was evident that, unless soon supported, Kray would be compelled to retreat.

The Russians advanced with great gallantry to the attack; but a discharge from the division Laboissière, of musketry and grape, at half gunshot, threw them into confusion; and after a severe engagement they were finally broken by a charge by Watrin, with a brigade of infantry on their flank, and driven back with great loss to Pozzolo-Formigaro.

All their partial attacks having failed, it seemed evident on the part of the imperialists, that a combined effort of all the columns was necessary. It was now the middle of the day, and the French line was unbroken, notwithstanding the superiority of numbers on the part of the allies was nearly 15,000 men. Suwarrow now determined to combine all his forces for a decisive movement. Kray, who was never intimidated, received orders to prepare for a fresh attack; Derfelden was to support Bagrathion on the center, Melas was directed to break up from Rivolta to form the left of the line, while Rosenberg was commanded to advance as soon as possible from Tortona to support his movement. The battle, after a pause, began again furiously at all points. It was for a long time most obstinately maintained. Although Kray exerted his utmost in opposing the enemy, returning as many as ten times to the charge, the imperialists could not make any impression on the French left; in vain, column after column advanced to their death; nothing could break the firm array of the republicans, while Bagrathion, Derfelden, and Milaradowitch in the center were compelled to fall back before the incessant fire of the infantry and batteries which were disposed around Novi. For more than four hours the combat raged with great fury, without the French infantry being anywhere displaced, till at last the fatigue on both sides caused a temporary pause, and the two armies rested on their arms amid a field covered with the dead and dying.

Suwarrow was a man of indomitable courage, or he would have been disheartened by so terrible a combat without any result. At four o'clock, the left wing of the allies came up, under Melas, and preparations were instantly made to take advantage of this reinforcement. Melas was ordered to attack the republicans' right, and by turning it, to menace the road from Novi to Genoa, while Kray again assailed the left, and Suwarrow himself, with the whole weight of the Russians pressed the center. The resistance on the left was so great, that although Kray led on his troops with the utmost courage, he could not gain a foot of ground; but the center was more successful, and succeeded in driving the French into Novi, where they kept up a murderous fire from the old walls and ruined towers. During this time, Melas on the right was making rapid progress. While one of his columns ascended the right bank of the Scrivia, and reached Serravalle, another, by the left bank, had already turned the Monte Rotondo, and was fast ascending its sides; while the general himself, with a third, was advancing against the eastern flank of the plateau of Novi. To guard against so many dangers, Moreau ordered the division of Watrin to move toward the threatened plateau; but, finding itself attacked during its progress, both in front and rear, by the divisions of Melas, it fell into confusion, and fled in great disorder, with difficulty cutting its way through the enemy on the road in the rear of the republicans' position.

It now seemed absolutely necessary for a retreat on the part of the French, for Lichtenstien, at the head of the imperial horse, and three brigades of grenadiers, was established on the road to Gavi; his triumphant battalions, with great noise, were sweeping round the rear of the republicans, while the glittering helmets of horsemen were beheld on every hill, behind their lines, and no other line of communication remained open, but that which led by Pasturana to Ovada. Suwarrow, who saw this advantage, was on the point of making a last and simultaneous assault on the front and flank of his enemy, when Moreau anticipated him by retreating. At first it was conducted in good order, but the furious attacks of the allies soon changed it into a rout. Novi, being left nearly defenseless, could no longer withstand the Russians, who, sure of victory, and seeing the standards of the allies in the rear of the French position, rushed forward with great fury, over the dead bodies of their fellow soldiers, to the charge; Lemoine and Grouchy sustained themselves with great difficulty, in retiring, against the attacks of the unwearied Kray, when the village of Pasturana, in their rear, was carried by the Russians, and the only road practicable for their artillery was thus cut off. They were now filled with despair; infantry, cavalry, and all, disbanded, and fled in the greatest disorder across the vineyards and orchards, which adjoined the line of retreat. The whole brigade of Colli were made prisoners; and Perizion and Grouchy, nearly cut to pieces with saber-wounds, were taken prisoners. The army reached Gavi in great confusion, where, by the efforts of Moreau it was rallied, the imperialists being too much fatigued to continue the pursuit. The battle of Novi was fought with great obstinacy. The loss of the allies was 1,800 killed, 5,200 wounded, and 1,200 taken prisoners; that of the French was somewhat greater, amounting to 1,500 killed, 5,500 wounded, and 3,000 prisoners, besides thirty-seven cannon, twenty-eight caissons, and four standards.

NYEBORG, A.D. 1659.—A battle was fought between the Danes and Swedes at Nyeborg, a strong town in Denmark, in which the Swedes were defeated, and Denmark liberated from the dominion of a foreign power, in 1659.

OCTOLOPHOS.—See Cynocephalœ.

ODESSA, A.D. 1854.—The city of Odessa is situated on the north-west shore of the Black Sea, in Russia. It is inclosed by a wall and a fosse, and is otherwise strongly fortified. The line of cliffs upon which the town of Odessa stands has a slight curve inward, forming a shallow bay with a radius of some three miles. These cliffs face the north-east, and toward the north they sink into low sandy mounds and steppes. Stretching out from below them, at the lower or south-eastern end of the town runs a long fortified mole, at the end of which is a light-house. This is called the Quarantine mole, and it usually shelters a crowd of trading-vessels of all nations. The bombardment of Odessa by the allied fleet in 1854, although in itself an action of no great magnitude, is nevertheless worthy of record as being the first scene in the bloody drama which followed.

On the afternoon of the 21st of April, 1854, the French and English fleet, consisting of six three-deckers, thirteen two-deckers, and nine steam frigates under Admirals Hamelin and Dundas, cast anchor at a distance of two miles from the town of Odessa. At four o'clock, P.M., a flag of truce was sent from the fleet, demanding the surrender of the Russian, English, and French ships lying in Quarantine harbor. To this summons the Russians not only refused to reply, but, it is asserted, fired on the flag of truce. Osten Sacken, the commander of the Russian garrison at Odessa, however, positively denied having fired upon the flag. The allies, at all events, received no reply to their summons, and at once made preparations to bombard the town. At half past six on the morning of the 22d, nine steamers of the fleet advanced toward the town. On that day the harbor was very much crowded, and each vessel had her colors at the mast-head, as if appealing for succor and protection against cannon-balls intended for the Russians. The attacking force had orders to give the Quarantine mole as wide a berth as possible, in order to be out of reach of its fire, and so as to avoid the necessity of returning the fire and injuring any of the vessels within. The attack was strictly confined to the forts, batteries, and military store-houses. In addition to the works on the Quarantine mole, the town was defended by four batteries, and there were three other batteries in the suburbs which could sweep the bay with a cross fire. The citadel on the west side of the town also commands the fort, and mounts some very heavy guns. The following steamers formed the attacking force: Mogadore, Vauban, Descartes, Caton (French); Sampson, Terrible, Tiger, Retribution, Furious (English); and a detachment of rocket-boats. The Sanspariel and Highflyer acted as a reserve. This force proceeded to the northern extremity of the cliffs, called the Imperial mole, incasing a mass of Russian ships of all sorts, and some very large barracks. The steamers had orders to go as far as possible in shore so as to rake and destroy the Imperial mole and the shipping it covered. About twenty minutes before seven they opened their fire; the Sampson taking the lead. When within 2,000 yards each steamer delivered the fire of her enormous guns, then wheeled round in a circle of about half a mile in diameter, each taking up the fire in succession. "Thus," says an eye-witness, "they kept wheeling and twisting about like so many waltzers without ever touching or getting into scrapes. The guns on the mole answered steadily, and for a long time the terrific fire from the steamers could not silence the Russian batteries. Toward one, P.M., a shed at the rear of the battery took fire, and in a few minutes the whole of that part of the Russian works blew up. The Russian fire then slackened, while the steamers continued to ply the ships within the mole with shot and shell until they were nearly all either on fire or riddled and sinking. Suddenly the Russians opened a battery of six horse artillery guns from behind some sheds on the low sandy shore, upon the British rocket-boats, which were at the moment within musket-shot. None of the British were hurt, though a shower of balls fell around them, knocking the oars about and plowing up the water in all directions around them. As soon as the steamers opened upon this artillery it speedily retired. A few minutes after their disappearance the buildings which had afforded them cover burst into flames. The steamers kept up their sharp practice until about five o'clock. Some of them were damaged considerably by the Russian shot. Only one Englishman was killed; nine were wounded. The French lost two men, killed by the bursting of a gun. The Russians lost four men killed.

OGDENSBURG, A.D. 1812.—This city is situated on the river St. Lawrence, at the mouth of the Oswegatchie, in St. Lawrence county, N. Y., directly opposite Prescott, in Canada. On the 2d of October, 1812, the British, having erected batteries at Prescott, commenced a cannonade on Ogdensburg, which they maintained for two days without effect. Finding their cannonade ineffectual, they resolved upon an assault. 600 men were embarked, in forty boats, and under cover of the battalion, pulled steadily across the river. General Brown, with 400 militia, was waiting to receive them, and posted his men so advantageously that they were able to keep up a deadly fire on the enemy, which effectually prevented them from landing, and the whole detachment was withdrawn to the Canada shore, with considerable loss. Another attack was planned, and was carried into effect in February following. On the 21st of that month, the British, 1,200 strong, advanced against the place in three columns. The Americans, under Captain Forsyth, after a gallant resistance, were driven out, and the British took possession of the village. The Americans lost twenty, in killed and wounded, the British about sixty.

OLDMUTZ, A.D. 1758.—Oldmutz, in Moravia, was taken by the Swedes during the Thirty Years' War, and in 1758 was unsuccessfully besieged by Frederic the Great.

OLPÆ, B.C. 424.—In the sixth year of the war, a battle was fought between the Peloponnesians and the Athenians, near Olpæ, a city situated on an eminence on the seaside, about two miles and a half from the city of Ayos. The Peloponnesians, although more numerous, were defeated with great loss, and their commander, Eurylochus, was slain.

OLTENITZA, A.D. 1853.—Oltenitza, a town of European Turkey, on the Danube, was the witness of a bloody encounter between the Turks and Russians, on the 4th of November, 1853. The Turks numbered about 13,000 men, and were commanded by Omar Pacha. They had succeeded in intrenching themselves at Oltenitza, on the 2d of November, and were attacked on that day by 8,000 Russians, whom they easily repulsed. On the 3d, the Russians made a second attack on the Turkish lines, but were again repulsed. On the 4th, however, the third and greatest attack was made. Both parties had received reinforcements; the Russians now numbered 30,000 men, the Turks 18,000; but the position of the latter was strong, and was protected by a number of field pieces. An obstinate struggle ensued, but the Russians were again driven back with loss. On the 11th of November, the Russians again attacked the stubborn works, and were again repulsed. All the attempts of the Russians proved fruitless, and they were obliged to fall back and look more to defense than attack.

OTUMBA, A.D. 1520.—For seven days after their disastrous defeat on the causeway,* the Spaniards advanced on their painful journey toward the territory of the Tlascalans, under the guidance of their faithful allies. On the seventh day (July 7th), they arrived at a ridge of mountains that rose like a barrier between them and the plain of Olumba, which, stretching far away toward the land of the Tlascalans, held in their bosom the beautiful Indian city from which they derived their name. During the march of the Spaniards, the Mexicans, in strong bodies, had hung upon their rear, harassing them by occasional discharges of stones and arrows, but without making any decided movement. The Spaniards, however, were reduced to such extremity by the want of provisions, that they were obliged to feed on the carcases of such of their horses as were killed by the enemy, and on roots, berries, and the stalks of Indian corn. They found every Indian village in their path deserted, and the inhabitants, anticipating their approach, had carried away all the provisions. As the army was ascending the mountain, Cortez was informed by the videttes that an immense body of the enemy was encamped in the valley of Otumba, and when the army reached the summit, a spectacle met their gaze which filled them with astonishment and dismay. As far as the eye could reach, the plains were covered with armed men. Determined to strike a decisive blow, the Mexicans, drawing levies from the adjacent territories, had concentrated their forces in the valley of Otumba, where they were awaiting the approach of the enemy. Cuitlahua, Montezuma's successor, had adopted the most effectual measures for the entire destruction of the invaders. The standards of all the noted chieftains of the empire were unfurled in the cause of patriotism, and the thousands of their followers gladly enrolled themselves in the service of the new emperor.

The number of warriors thus called together is estimated at 200,000; and to oppose this mighty host Cortez could count upon only about 1,500 men, of whom 400 were Spaniards. His cavalry was greatly weakened, consisting only of twenty men, but the horses, however, were in tolerable condition. Having lost their muskets, artillery, and crossbows, in their late disastrous retreat, the Spaniards now were armed only with the sword, and as they gazed upon the masses of the enemy before them, they felt that their doom indeed was sealed. Cortez, going from man to man, exhorted them with encouraging words, and reminding them of their former glorious victories, bade them go into the fight with the determination to conquer or die. As he spoke, the eyes of his brave soldiers kindled with renewed animation, and at his signal they followed with a firm tread as he led them toward the enemy. As the Mexicans saw the little band approaching, they rushed forward in a mass to meet them, darkening the air as they came with incessant volleys of deadly missiles.

* See Mexico.

Cortez, at the head of his little troop of horse, dashed into the very faces of the front ranks of the enemy, which, recoiling before the charge, fell back upon their companions in disorder. The charge of the cavalry was followed up by the advance of the infantry, which, piercing into the swaying mass, with sturdy strokes mowed its way toward the center. The Mexicans fell back on all sides before the desperate charges of the Spanish horse and foot, until a wide line was opened in their ranks; but in a moment they returned, and the Christians were engulfed in an overwhelming flood of enemies; yet they stood firm, wrestling with their foes like a giant pine which the hurricane vainly strives to uproot. Their Tlascalan allies fought with the ferocity which despair can only arouse. Hour after hour passed, and yet the battle raged. The noonday sun poured his scorching rays upon the battle-field, yet the Christians, though weakened by loss of blood, and from hunger, maintained their ground. At length, however, completely worn out by fatigue, they began to relax in their exertions. The cavalry fell back on the infantry, which in turn crowded back, vainly seeking a passage through the dense throngs of the enemy who now closed up their rear. Victory seemed about to declare in favor of the Mexicans. At this crisis, Cortez, rising in his saddle, glanced rapidly round the field in search of some egress of escape. His eye flashed with joy as it fell on the banner, which he at once recognized as that of the Mexican commander. He quickly called Alvarado, Sandoval, Olid, and others of his officers to his side, and pointing out the chieftain, cried in a voice of exultation, "Follow and fight for me!" Then with a shout which rose above the din of battle, he dashed into the thickest of the enemy, and with his lance and horse opened a path before him. Close behind him followed his brave companions, dealing deadly blows on all who strove to stay their progress. On like a whirlwind they dashed, while the Mexicans fell in bloody swathes before their terrible strokes. They neared the person of the Indian commander. He was sitting in a litter borne on the shoulders of six men, and was surrounded by a body-guard of Indian nobles. As he approached the object of his desires, Cortez dashed over the guards, and spurring his horse upon the very litter, hurled the Mexican chieftain to the ground, and transfixed him to the sod with a single thrust of his lance. A cavalier sprang to the ground, and tearing away the banner from the chieftain, gave it to Cortez. The Mexican guards, panic-stricken at the fate of their commander, fled in all directions, conveying the dismal tidings to their companions. Like wild-fire the news spread over the plain. The Mexicans, struck with terror, turned to fly.

The Spaniards, reinvigorated by the sudden change in the aspect of affairs, renewed the fight with their former vigor. The Indians in the wildest disorder, rushed pell-mell across the plain. The Tlascalans, panting for vengeance, glutted themselves in the blood of the fugitives. The Spaniards, equally as vengeful, pursued the enemy for miles, regardless of their wounds and their fatigue. Hunger, thirst, and pain, were all forgotten in their insatiable longing for the blood of their enemies. The fugitives crowded together in a confused mass, and unprotected by defensive armor, offered no resistance to the thrust of the lance or the sword; and the horrible carnage was kept up until they were driven from the plain, and the ground groaned beneath thousands of the slain. Then returning from the pursuit the Spaniards found in the abundant booty with which the bloody field was strewn, partial indemnification for their recent disasters. They halted a brief season for repose, and then resumed their march toward Tlascala.

In this furious battle, the Mexicans lost in killed alone 20,000 men. Of the Spaniards, a few only were killed; but they were to a man wounded more or less seriously. The Tlascalans, less experienced than their European allies, suffered a heavy loss in killed, and like the Spaniards, none escaped without wounds.—Prescott.

OPORTO, A.D. 1805.—Oporto, the second city of Portugal, stands on the right bank of the Douro, 175 miles north-east of Lisbon.

Oporto in 1805 was taken and sacked by the French, in whose possession it remained until 1809. On the 11th of May, 1809, the English, under Wellesley, crossed the Douro, and after a brief conflict the French were obliged to retire, with a loss of 500 men in killed and wounded. The inhabitants of Oporto having sided with Don Miguel, the city was besieged in 1831–32. The siege lasted over a year, and during its continuance a large portion of the city was destroyed, and its trade for the time was annihilated.

ORISKANY.—See Fort Schuyler.

ORLEANS, A.D. 451.—The city of Orleans is situated on the right bank of the Loire in France, fifty-eight miles south-west of Paris.

Attila, King of the Huns, entered Gaul in 451, with fire and sword, followed by a countless host of barbarians. After spreading everywhere terror, death, and carnage, he appeared before Orleans. The only defense of this city consisted in the valor of its people and the active zeal of Saint-Agnan, its bishop. Before the Huns had crossed the Seine, he hastened to raise the walls on that side, he collected as much provision as possible, flew to Arles to press the Roman general Ætius to succor Orleans, and then shut himself up within its walls, determined to perish with his flock if the Romans did not second their courage. The Huns arrived and attacked the part of the city situated on the right bank of the Loire, with fury. They reiterated their assaults, they multiplied their efforts, while Agnan, having employed all human means, was prostrate at the foot of the altar, imploring the All-powerful. Heaven appeared to listen to his prayers; a tempestuous rain, which lasted three days, interrupted the attacks. When it had ceased, the barbarians recommenced their assaults, and were already rushing into the city, when the Roman trumpets were heard. Ætius and Theodoric entered Orleans from the other side of the Loire at the same instant that Attila entered the opposite gate. The Huns, imagining they were conquerors, dispersed themselves in the wild disorder of pillage, through the streets and houses. The barbarians were stopped, surrounded, pursued, and massacred in all directions. In vain Agnan endeavored to excite pity for these ferocious men; their character was too well known; they gave none; they met with none. Attila, conquered at the moment he thought himself victorious, retired darting upon the prey which had escaped him, furious but powerless glances of disappointment and rage.

Second Siege, A.D. 1428.—The miserable condition into which France had fallen at the period of the unjust invasion of Henry V., of England, can scarcely be conceived. An insane king, ambitious, grasping princes, bold, poor, and selfish nobles, all conspired to oppress a sunken and degraded people.

At the period of this siege, the two great actors in the late events, Henry V. of England and Charles VI. of France, were dead. Henry's son was an infant; Charles's was still worse: the infant was under the good tutelage of his uncles, while Charles's son, for a long time called only the dauphin, was a weak, dissipated, indolent youth, a willing prey to mistresses and favorites. By the treaty of Troyes, signed by Henry V. and Charles VI., the crown belonged to Henry VI.; but the bulk of the French nation deemed such a compulsory engagement binding upon no one, and all eagerly waited the opportunity for throwing off the odious foreign yoke.

For a long time the council of the King of England, to assist in ruining the party of Charles VII., disinherited, as they said, by the treaty of Troyes, had fixed their eyes upon Orleans; but numberless considerations had retarded the siege of that city. At length, on the 8th of October, 1428, 10,000 English approached to reconnoiter the environs of the place, after having rapidly conquered Château-Neuf, Rambouillet, Bétancourt, Rochefort, and all the neighboring places. Gaucourt, the governor of the city, made a vigorous sortie, and repulsed the enemy. They went and sacked some more places, and on the 12th of the same month reappeared before Orleans, on the side of the Sologne. The garrison was weak, but it had as leaders intrepid warriors, the Gaucourts, the Dunois, the Lahires, the Xaintrailles, a crowd of noblesse of that name and merit, who all inspired the lowest soldiers with the heroic valor which animated them. The inhabitants even, resolved to bury themselves under the ruins of their city rather than submit to a foreign yoke, had become so many heroes. The women partook of this martial ardor, and devoted themselves enthusiastically to the service of their country.

The tête-du-pont, on the side of Sologne, was defended by a fortress called Les Tourelles, in front of which a bulwark had been commenced. It was by this intrenchment the Earl of Salisbury, the general of the English army, made his first attacks. The faubourgs, set fire to on the approach of the enemy, were not yet entirely consumed. This barrier stopped them at first, but they soon elevated a bastille upon the ruins of the convent of the Augustines, and erected batteries, which kept up a constant discharge against the walls of the city, the Tourelles, and the boulevard, of which they wished to make themselves masters. The cannon made a large breach, and it was resolved to mount it sword in hand. On the 21st of October, the trumpets sounded the signal, and, as if by one motion, the warriors planted their ladders at the foot of the ramparts. They sprang up with incredible intrepidity; but they were received with a firmness equal to it, and both sides fought with the same fury. National hatred and a desire for vengeance added to the natural desire to conquer. While the besieged hurled their foes into the fosses, launched fire-pots, rolled stones of an enormous size upon them, encircled them with rings of red-hot iron, poured torrents of boiling oil, and burning ashes, the women of the city, not less active, in the words of a chronicler, "brought them every thing that could assist in the defense; and to refresh their great labor, bread, wine, meats, fruits, and vinegar, with white towels to wipe them. Some were seen, during the assault, repulsing the English with lance-thrusts from the entrance to the boulevard, and beating them down into the fosses." Such a furious resistance disconcerted Salisbury; he sounded a retreat, and ordered a mine to be instantly commenced. It was soon finished, and they were preparing to spring it. The besieged perceived it, and despairing of maintaining a post threatened on all sides, they set fire to it in the sight of the English, and retired into the fortress of the Tourelles. To defend this for a short time, they raised a new boulevard on the bridge even, of which they destroyed two arches. Notwithstanding all this, they could not long withstand the multiplied efforts of the English. The fort of the Tourelles was carried, and that advantageous post offered the besiegers a commodious and redoubtable position. The Orléannais then directed all their batteries against that part of their city for which they had so boldly fought. The enemy, on their side, neglected no means to maintain it, and both exhausted, in attack or defense, all the resources the most heroic valor could furnish.

It was then the middle of autumn. Salisbury foreseeing that the siege would be long, resolved to encircle the place with a belt of many forts, which, placed at regular distances, would render the entrance of succors or convoys next to impossible. To draw up his plan according to the situation of the city, he repaired to the Tourelles, from whence a view could be obtained of the whole environs of Orleans. He was earnestly employed on this examination, when a cannon-ball carried away one of his eyes and half of his face. After having exhorted the principal officers to continue the siege according to the plan he had traced for them, he was transported to Meun, where he soon after died. The Earl of Suffolk, the Lord Pole his brother, Talbot, Glansdale, and other leaders, were clothed with his authority; and these captains, full of respect for their general, continued their operations according to the instructions he had given them.

Every day the besiegers and the besieged received reinforcements. The garrison, which at first scarcely amounted to 1,200 men, was now composed of 3,000 combatants; and the English army, which at the commencement only reckoned 10,000 warriors, was increased to 23,000 soldiers, who thought themselves invincible. The city, which had been attacked on the side of the Sologne alone, was now invested almost entirely on that of the Beauce. Opposite to the principal avenues of Orleans were erected six large bastilles, which communicated with each other by sixty less considerable redoubts; constructed in the intervals. It was impossible to enter the place without passing under the artillery of the forts. More than once the French leaders forced the quarters of the enemy's army to introduce convoys. The rigor of the season did not at all interrupt the works. Only on Christmas-day the English proposed a suspension of arms, and begged the besieged to send them some musicians, to celebrate that great festival with proper solemnity. The generals made each other presents. The Earl of Suffolk sent the Bastard of Orleans some refreshments in exchange for a plush robe which he had given him. Up to the beginning of Lent nothing remarkable took place. Having desolated the country round, the English began to be in want of provisions. In the early part of February, the Duke of Bedford sent a convoy, escorted by 2,500 men, under the conduct of the brave Fastolfe. The Count de Clermont having collected nearly 3,000 soldiers, to whom he added a detachment of the garrison of Orleans, resolved to carry off this convoy. He came up with the English at Rouvray, a village of the Beauce. Fastolfe* halted, made an intrenchment of the wagons which contained the provisions, and only left two issues, at one of which he placed his archers. The French army, more courageous than prudent, wished that same night to force this intrenchment, with an impetuosity that has often proved fatal to their countrymen. The French insisted upon fighting on horseback; the Scots would only fight on foot. This deficiency of discipline produced the effect that might have been expected. After an obstinate conflict, the English were conquerors. A hundred and twenty nobles of high rank were left dead upon the field; and the other leaders returned to the city, quite crest-fallen, with scarcely 500 followers. This battle was called "La journée des harengs," because the convoy conducted by Fastolfe consisted principally of barrels filled with this fish, which, being broken by the French artillery, their savory contents were strewed over the field of battle.

In proportion with the triumph of the English in this little battle was the depression of the feeble and voluptuous Charles, then lying encamped at Chinon. Despairing of his fortunes, the timid monarch deliberated whether he had not better seek refuge in Dauphiny. It was his own opinion, and his servile counselors concurred in it. He was already about to carry this resolution into effect, when two heroines roused the courage of the prince from its effeminate slumbers. The queen, a princess above her sex and her rank, and the fair Agnes Sorel, employed the influence their charms had over him to detain the king, who could but blush to think he had less magnanimity than his wife or his mistress.

In the mean time Orleans seemed daily

* Following Hale and Holinshed, Shakspeare has made Fastolfe a coward, and, it is supposed, borrowed from him the name for his inimitable Falstaff. But the historical Fastolfe vindicated his good name, and was restored to his honors. Dr. Heylin, in his "St. George for England," says, "Without doubt, this Sir John Fastolfe was a valiant and wise captain."

sinking into the last extremity. The besieged could no longer look for relief to a prince who was in no condition to assist them, and who, indeed, scarcely preserved a shadow of royalty. There only remained one chance of saving the city, and that was to place it in sequestration in the hands of the Duke of Burgundy. The envoys, among whom was Xaintrailles, went at once to the duke, who agreed to the proposal, and came with them to Paris, with the design of persuading the Duke of Bedford to accept it. But the regent replied that he would only treat with the city upon the condition of its surrender to the English. This intelligence roused the indignation and revived the courage of the Orléannais; they resolved to defend themselves to the last breath.

While terrified France looked for nothing but the blow which was to consummate its ruin, that Invincible Power which sometimes seems to attach the greatest events to the most apparently weak causes, prepared her an avenger. A girl, of about seventeen years of age, was strongly persuaded that God destined her to be the preserver of her country. Born near the banks of the Meuse, at Dom-Remy, a village of Lorraine, her poor but honest parents had given her an education conformable to the simplicity of her situation. Jeanne d'Arc, or, as she is called Joan of Arc, had from her childhood been brought up with a horror for the English; she constantly made it the subject of her prayers that the monarchy should be delivered from the eternal enemies who tyrannized over it. Her zeal becoming more ardent with her years, at thirteen she had trances, in which she declared she had conversed with St. Michael, St. Marguerite, and St. Catharine, who told her that God had appointed her to drive out the English, and bring about the coronation of the dauphin. With this enthusiasm she possessed all the virtues of which a simple mind is susceptible: innocence, piety, candor, generosity, and courage. Her rustic life had strengthened her naturally robust frame; she had the exterior, and even the natural graces of her sex, without experiencing the infirmities which characterize the weakness of it.

After several years of revelations, Joan, urged more and more by that inward voice which excited her to arm for her country, formed the resolution of presenting herself to Baudricourt, governor of Vaucouleurs, a small city of the neighborhood:—"Master captain," said she, "know that God has for some time past often given me to know, and has commanded me to go to the gentil dauphin, who ought, it is true, to be King of France, and that he should place under me men-at-arms, and that I should raise the siege of Orleans, and lead him to be crowned at Rheims." The astonished Baudricourt supposed her to be mad, and wanted to have her exorcised by the curé of the place. Joan continued to urge him for six months, and at length the governor, subdued by her importunities, armed her at all points, gave her in charge to two gentlemen with their servants, and dismissed her, saying, "Go, come of it what may!" Toward the end of February she arrived at Chinon, where the dauphin then was. It was precisely the moment when the vacillating Charles appeared to be sinking under the weight of his ill fortune. She announced herself at the court of the monarch. During two days it was deliberated whether she should be heard or not; but at length curiosity prevailed, and she was admitted. The king, without any mark of superior dignity, mingled with the crowd of courtiers, on purpose to prove her. Joan distinguished him, pointed him out, and in spite of the cries "You are mistaken! you are mistaken!" continued to exclaim, "That is he! that is he!" They all admire her noble boldness; they surround her, and gaze on her with astonished looks. Charles himself can not explain what passes in his heart at the aspect of this unknown girl: "Gentil dauphin," said the heroine, without being the least disconcerted, "my name is Jeanne la Pucelle. The King of Heaven has sent me to succor you; if you will please to give me men of war, by divine grace and force of arms I will raise the siege of Orleans, and will lead you to Rheims to be crowned, in spite of all your enemies. This is what the King of Heaven has ordered me to tell you, and it is His will that the English should return to their own country, and leave you peaceful in yours, as being the only true and legitimate heir of it; that if you make this offering to God, He will make you much greater and more flourishing than your predecessors have ever been; and He will take it ill of the English if they do not retire."

Thus spoke La Pucelle; the fire of her words, the naïveté of her manner, her simple but precise replies, convinced every body. The king caused her to be examined by matrons, by theologians, and by his parliament. Yoland of Arragon, Queen of Sicily, accompanied by the ladies De Gaucourt, De Tiénes, and several others of the first distinction, visited Joan, and pronounced her to be as pure as she had described herself. The theologians, after many interrogations, decided that she was inspired. The parliament of Poitiers, after the most scrupulous observations, required that she should manifest the truth of her revelations by some prodigy. "I did not come to Poitiers," she haughtily replied, "to perform miracles; but conduct me to Orleans, and I will give you certain signs of my mission." This firm reply so astonished her judges, that all with one voice declared that this heavenly instrument which the All-powerful had sent to their country ought to be instantly employed. Charles ordered a splendid and complete suit of armor to be made for her, gave her a standard, squires, pages, an intendant, a chaplain, and a train becoming the state of a great warlike leader. The new Amazon placed herself at the head of a considerable convoy destined for Orleans; and her warriors soon felt themselves inspired with her enthusiasm. She set out, followed by Marshal De Boussac, Gilles de Rais, the Admiral De Couland, Ambroise de Loté, and Lahire, and arrived on the 29th of April, within sight of the place. Dunois came to meet her; he begged her to satisfy the desire the inhabitants had to behold their liberator: she yielded to his entreaties, and she entered the city as if in triumph. A thousand cries of joy were heard; at that moment the Orléannais believed themselves invincible, and in fact were so. Every thing was changed; the English trembled at the name of Joan of Arc; they as firmly believed her to be a sorceress, as the French believed her to be celestially inspired. "English," wrote the heroine to them, "you who have no right to this kingdom of France, God commands you by me, Jeanne la Pucelle, to abandon your forts and to retire." The couriers were arrested, and no reply was made to this awful summons but insults. Joan, outraged, but dreaded, now prepared to prove her mission. On Wednesday, the 4th of May, she selected a body of troops, and, filled with an ardor more than human, she precipitated herself upon the enemy's forts, and carried them after an assault of four hours. She then thought of gaining possession of the boulevard and fort of the Tourelles, where the élite of the English were cantoned, under the orders of the celebrated Glansdale. After having made her dispositions during the night, she gave the signal as the first rays of day appeared. The ready troops follow her, mount with her to the breach, fight with ardor, press, pierce through, and overthrow the English, who, nevertheless, defend themselves with great courage. The French were on the point of carrying all before them, when Joan, wounded in the neck, was obliged to retire to put a dressing to her wound. Her absence extinguished the courage of the assailants; the soldiers missed the warlike illusion which rendered them victorious. Each began to desire to place himself in safety: even Dunois judged it most prudent to do so. All at once La Pucelle reappears! She rushes to the foot of the fort, and there plants her standard. Her intrepidity passes into all hearts; the efforts of her followers are redoubled, their fatigues and fears are forgotten, the English fly, the boulevard is carried!

On the morrow the vanquished English draw up in order of battle on the side of La Beauce; the French, still led on, still animated by their heroine, present themselves in the same order, resolved to fight, although inferior in numbers. But their enemies, till that time so proud and so terrible, did not dare to stand before them; they precipitately retreated, leaving behind them their sick, their baggage their provisions, their artillery, and nearly five thousand dead. Thus, contrary to all hopes and expectations, the city of Orleans was relieved on the 8th of May, 1419. Public gratitude exhausted itself, so to say, to prove to Joan of Arc how deeply the greatness of her benefits was felt; the king ennobled her, with her father, her three brothers, and all her posterity. A statue was erected to her on the bridge of the city she had saved, and, to eternize the memory of this fortunate event, a festival was established, which is still celebrated every year on the 8th of May. At this festival a eulogy is pronounced on Joan of Arc, who, from the period of the raising of the siege, has been styled the Maid of Orleans. During the troubles of the Revolution, ignorant and barbarous men overthrew, in Orleans, the statue of a heroine who had preserved their city from the yoke of the English, and roused the spirit in France which shortly afterward expelled the invaders from their soil; it was, however, reinstated by Bonaparte, during his consulship. See Compiegne.

THIRD SIEGE, A.D. 1563.—During the civil wars which agitated France in the time of the Huguenots, the Duke of Guise laid siege to Orleans, one of the strongest cities of their party. A first attack made him master of the faubourg of Portereau, and of the boulevard which protected it; he gained possession of the bridge, approached the Tourelles, and cannonaded that fortress warmly. The duke was flattering himself with the certainty of a speedy success, when a gentleman named Poltrot, a fanatical Calvinist, shot him with a pistol, and he died of the wound, in a very short time. The king, very much disconcerted, made peace with the Huguenots. —Robson.

ORTHES, A.D. 1814.—Near Orthes in France, the French army under Marshal Soult was defeated by the Anglo-Saxon army under the Duke of Wellington, on the 27th of February, 1814. Wellington's army consisted of 37,000 men, of whom 4,000 were cavalry with forty-eight guns; the French army consisted of about 35,000 men, with forty guns. In this battle the French lost 3,900 men, killed and wounded, and prisoners, and the allies lost 2,300.

OSTEND, A.D. 1601–1604.—On the shore of the North sea, in Belgium, lies Ostend, famous for one of the most memorable sieges recorded in history. In a work of this kind it would be impossible for us to pass over this siege in silence; but our space forbids us from doing the subject justice; the details of this siege would make a volume of themselves.

This celebrated siege, undertaken by the Spaniards, lasted three years and seventy-eight days, and, up to the moment of its termination, doubts were entertained of their success. The besieged, constantly succored both by sea and land, were unable to tire out the courage and patience of the besiegers, who pushed on their attacks without relaxation, amid the greatest obstacles. It would be difficult to count the number of batteries they erected, the assaults they made, or the mines they sprung. The last was so frequent, that they might be said to work more beneath the earth than upon its surface. All the resources of art were exhausted in the attack and defense. Machines were invented. The earth and the ocean by turns favored the two parties, seconding and destroying alternately the works of the Spaniards and the Dutch, who advanced no work upon the land which the sea did not appear to hasten to destroy. The slaughter was terrible on both sides. Both parties were more eager to inflict death upon their enemies than to save their own lives. At length the besieged, after having seen nine commanders perish successively, did not abandon the little heap of ruins on which they had concentrated themselves, and which they contested foot by foot, until it seemed to disappear from under them: an honorable capitulation was granted. The enemy was surprised to see march from untenable ruins more than 4,000 vigorous soldiers, whom the abundance they had lived in during the whole siege had kept in the best health. In addition to a numerous artillery, a prodigious quantity of provisions and munitions was found in the city. The archduke, who had begun this celebrated expedition, with the infanta his wife, had the curiosity to go and view the melancholy remains of Ostend. They found nothing but a shapeless heap of ruins, and could trace no vestige of the besieged place. Spinola, who had taken it, was loaded with honors and elevated to the highest dignities. The Dutch, who during the siege had taken Rhenberg, Grave, and Ecluse, very easily consoled themselves for their loss; and to mark by a public monument that they thought they had received full amends, had a medal struck, with the inscription, Jehova plus dederat quam perdidimus:—God has given us more than we have lost.

This siege cost the Dutch 50,000 men, and 10,000,000 of French money. The besiegers lost over 80,000 men.

OSTROLENKA, A.D. 1831.—Ostrolenka, a village of Poland on the Narew, 86 miles north-east of Plock, was on the 26th of May, 1831, the scene of a terrible conflict between the Poles under Skrzynecki, and the Russians under Diebitch. After a most desperate fight the Russians withdrew to the opposite side of the river with a loss of 10,000 men. The Poles lost 7,000 men killed and wounded. See Warsaw.

OSTROK, A.D. 1768.—The siege of Ostrok, a convent of Montenegro, is memorable from the fact that it was defended in 1768 by 30 men against 30,000 Turks.

OSTROVNO, A.D. 1812.—On the 25th or 26th of July, 1812, a battle was fought near Ostrovno between the French under Murat, and the Russians under Count Ostermann, in which the latter were defeated.

OSWEGO, A.D. 1755.—This beautiful city is situated upon the shore of Lake Ontario, occupying both banks of the Oswego river, in the State of New York.

In the month of August, 1755, Oswego was occupied by 1,500 British troops under General Shirley of Massachusetts. Shirley strengthened the place by repairing the old fort and erecting two new ones. He also constructed a fleet, and made active preparations to proceed against Niagara, then in the occupation of the French. The weather, however, prevented him from carrying his intended operations against Niagara into effect; and leaving a number near to garrison the forts at Oswego, he returned to Albany, where the remainder of his army was disbanded. During the winter, the garrison at Oswego occupied themselves in strengthening their works In the spring of 1758, the Marquis de Montcalm, the French governor of Canada, made active preparations to resume the offensive; and early in the month of August he set sail from Fort Frontenac, with about 5,000 men, and, unobserved by the enemy, landed at a woody point a few miles below Oswego. Meanwhile, Shirley, at Albany made vigorous preparations to reinforce Oswego; and soon an army of 7,000 men, was gathered at that city, waiting the arrival of the commander-in-chief, Lord Loudon. He did not arrive at Albany, however, till late in the summer; too late to be of any assistance to the garrison at Oswego. The French under Montcalm were on the point of marching against Fort Ontario, in Oswego, when they were discovered by the English. The British commandant, Colonel Mercer, sent out three vessels to annoy the French; and was driven ashore in a heavy gale, and the others were forced to return to the harbor by the heavy guns of the enemy. The French steadily advanced through the woods, and at noon, on the 11th of August, appeared before Fort Ontario, and invested it with about 40 pieces of cannon. Montcalm's force consisted of about 2,500 Canadians, and the same number of Indians. The British garrison consisted of about 1,400 men; the greater portion of whom were stationed under Mercer himself, in the fort on the west side of the river. The troops of Montcalm commenced the assault with small arms, but they were forced to retire by a severe fire from the guns of Fort Ontario, and from the mortars of the small fort on the opposite side of the basin. Finding it impossible to carry the place by an open assault, Montcalm, during the night of the 11th, commenced making regular approaches by parallels. The next day he maintained a brisk fire of musketry upon the fort, and on the following morning, having completed his last parallel, within 60 yards of the work, opened a battery of cannons upon it. Upon this Mercer sent word to the garrison, to destroy their cannon, ammunition, and provisions, and retreat to the west side of the river. This movement was effected without the loss of a single man. On the morning of the 14th, Montcalm, opened a battery of 12 guns on the fort on the west side of the river, and under cover of these pieces, 2,500 French and Indians crossed the stream, in three divisions. The British garrison assailed the enemies with constant discharges of cannon and musketry; and the French replied vigorously both from their battery and their army. The British commandant, Colonel Mercer, was killed; and the besiegers having erected a mortar battery, and disposed their forces so that the works of defense were completely enfiladed, Colonel Littlehalls, on whom the command of the garrison had devolved, called a council of war, in which it was decided that a defense was no longer practicable. A parley was beaten by the drums of the fort, and the firing ceased on both sides. A capitulation was agreed upon, on honorable conditions; and the fort, the whole garrison, 120 cannons, fourteen mortars, three chests of money, and the whole British fleet, consisting of six vessels of war, in the harbor, were surrendered to the victors. The forts were dismounted, the prisoners were placed on vessels, and Montcalm, without garrisoning the place, set sail for Fort Frontenac.

The British lost 45 killed, and a number wounded. Twelve of the killed were slain by the savages when endeavoring to escape through the woods.

On the 5th of May, 1814, the British fleet under Sir James Yeo, appeared before Oswego, and began to bombard the place. Fort Oswego was garrisoned by about 300 Americans, under Colonel Mitchell, with five guns, two of which only were in a serviceable condition. Oswego at that time contained about 500 inhabitants. Finding that the bombardment produced no effect, about 300 seamen and marines, under General Drummond, in fifteen barges, led by gun-boats, were sent forward to carry the fort by storm. When the boats came within range of the American artillery, a spirited fire was opened on them, driving them back finally to seek shelter under the guns of the ships. The next day the fleet approached nearer the shore, and a furious cannonade was opened on the place. Under cover of this bombardment, 2,000 troops under General De Watteville were landed, and advanced in perfect order toward the fort. Colonel Mitchell seeing that resistance was hopeless, retired, throwing volley after volley upon the enemy as he withdrew, with terrible effect. He retired to Oswego Falls, where the naval stores had all been removed, demolishing the bridges as he went. The British took possession of the fort, and having raised the Growler, a schooner which the Americans had sunk in the harbor, retired to Sackett's Harbor. In this affair the British lost about 200 in killed and wounded.

OTCHAKOV, A.D. 1737. — Otchakov, a town of Russia, was besieged and taken from the Turks by the Russians in 1737; and in 1788 was again besieged and taken by the Russians.

OTRANTO, A.D. 1480.—Otranto, a seaport town of Naples, was taken and sacked by the Turks in 1480.

OTRICOLLI, A.D. 1798.—In the vicinity of Otricolli, in Italy, in 1798, the French, under Marshal Macdonald, gained a complete victory over the Neapolitan army, under General Mack.

OTTERBURN, A.D. 1388.—The battle of Otterburn was fought on the 15th of August, 1388, between the English under the Earl of Northumberland and his two sons, and the Scots under Sir William Douglas, who was slain by Henry Piercy, surnamed Hotspur. The victory remained undecided; but the two Piercys were made prisoners. On this battle the ballad of Chevy-Chase is founded.* According to the ballad the English brought 1,500 to the battle field, and the Scotch 2,000. The English kept the field with fifty-three; the Scotch with fifty-five: all the rest on each side being slain. Douglas challenged Hotspur to decide the day by single combat. "One of us two," said he, "must die. I am an earl as well as yourself, so that you can have no pretense for refusing the combat; however," said he, "'tis a pity and indeed would be a sin that so many innocent men should perish for our sakes, rather let you and I end our quarrel in a single fight."

* Walsingham.

"Ere thus I will out-braved be,
One of us two shall die;
I know thee well, an earl thou art,
Lord Piercy, so am I.

"But trust me, Piercy, pity it were,
And great offense, to kill
Any of these harmless men
For they have done no ill.

"Let thou and I the battle try,
And set our men aside.
Accurst be he, Lord Percy said,
By whom this is deny'd."

The two earls instantly engaged in a single combat; they ceased awhile, and during a generous parley full of heroic sentiments,

"There came an arrow keen
Out of an English bow,
Which struck Earl Douglas to the heart
A deep and deadly blow;

"Who never spoke more words than these
'Fight on my merry men all.
For while my life is at an end,
Lord Piercy sees me fall.'"

Hotspur was deeply grieved at the unfortunate death of his antagonist.*

"—— Earl Piercy took
The dead man by the hand,
And said, 'Earl Douglas, for thy life
Would I had lost my land.

"'O, Christ! my very heart doth bleed
With sorrow for thy sake:
For sure a more renowned knight
Mischance did never take.'"

Both parties then prepared for the battle which followed.

OUDENARDE, A.D. 1708.—On the 11th of July, 1708, a battle was fought between the army of Prince Eugene of Savoy, and the forces of the Duke of Burgundy, near Oudenarde, or Audenarde, on the Scheldt in Belgium. After a desperate struggle the latter were defeated with great slaughter.

PALERMO, B.C. 250.—Palermo, the capital of Sicily, called by the ancients Panormus, was founded by the Phœnicians. It afterward fell into the hands of the Carthaginians, and in the year 250 B.C., shortly after the commencement of the first Punic war, it was captured by the Romans. In 1072 Palermo was taken by the Normans, and in 1282 it was the scene of the massacre called the "Sicilian Vespers." Charles of Anjou had established himself by his influence with the pope in possession of Naples in Sicily. The unfortunate Conradin, had died on the scaffold, on the 29th of October, 1268; and the haughty Charles ruled the people with an iron rod. In vain did the inhabitants plead for relief to the pope. At length John of Procida, a distinguished nobleman of Palermo, resolved to liberate the Sicilians. He planned the massacre of the French, and on the 30th of March, 1282, at the hour of vespers, on Easter Monday, the inhabitants of Palermo fled to arms, and fell upon the French and massacred them all—women or children were not spared, and even Sicilian women with child by Frenchmen, were murdered. Before the end of April, Messina followed the example of Palermo, and the French were either murdered or driven from the city. This massacre put an end to the sway of the Duke of Anjou.

PALMYRA, A.D. 273.—Palmyra, the Tadmor of Scripture, is a ruined city in an oasis of the Syrian deserts. The siege of Palmyra forms one of the most interesting chapters in the history of the Roman empire.

After the victories of Trajan, the little republic, grown wealthy by its commerce, sank peacably into the bosom of Rome, and flourished more than one hundred and fifty years in the subordinate though honorable rank of a colony. It was during that peaceful period, if we may judge from a few remaining inscriptions, that the wealthy Palmyrenians constructed those temples, palaces, and porticoes of Grecian architecture, whose ruins, scattered over an extent of several miles, have deserved the curiosity of our travelers. The elevation of Odenathus and Zenobia appeared to reflect new splendor on their country, and Palmyra, for a while, stood forth the rival of Rome; but the competition was fatal, and ages of prosperity were sacrificed to a moment of glory.

Modern Europe has produced several women who have sustained with glory the weight of empire; but if we except the doubtful achievements of Semiramis, Zenobia is perhaps the only female whose superior genius broke through the servile indolence imposed on her sex by the climate and manners of Asia. She claimed her descent from the Macedonian kings of Egypt, equaled in beauty her ancestor Cleopatra, and far surpassed that princess in chastity and valor. Zenobia was esteemed the most lovely as well as the most heroic of her sex. She was of dark complexion (for in speaking of ladies such things are not trifles), her teeth were of pearly whiteness, and her large black eyes sparkled with uncommon fire, tempered with the most attractive sweetness. Her voice was strong and harmonious; her understanding was strengthened and adorned by study; she was not ignorant of the Latin tongue, but possessed in equal perfection the Greek, the Syriac, and the Egyptian languages. She had drawn up for her own use an epitome of oriental history, and familiarly compared the beauties of Homer and Plato, under the tuition of the sublime Longinus.

* Hotspur was killed at the battle of Shrewsbury by an unknown hand.

This accomplished woman gave her hand to Odenathus, who, from a private station, raised himself to the dominion of the East. She soon became the friend and companion of a hero. In the intervals of war, Odenathus passionately delighted in the exercise of hunting; he pursued with ardor the wild beasts of the desert—lions, panthers, and bears—and the ardor of Zenobia in that dangerous amusement, was not inferior to his own. She had inured her constitution to fatigue, disdained the use of a covered carriage, generally appeared on horseback in a military habit, and sometimes marched several miles on foot at the head of the troops. The success of Odenathus was, in a great measure, ascribed to her incomparable prudence and fortitude. Their splendid victories over the Great King, whom they twice pursued as far as the gates of Ctesiphon, laid the foundation of their united fame and power. The armies which they commanded, and the provinces which they had saved, acknowledged not any other sovereigns than their invincible chiefs. The senate and people of Rome revered a stranger who had avenged their captive emperor; and even the insensible son of Valerian accepted Odenathus for his legitimate colleague.

After a successful expedition against the Gothic plunderers of Asia, the Palmyrenian prince returned to the city Emessa, in Syria. Invincible in war, he was there cut off by domestic treason, and his favorite amusement of hunting was the cause, or at least the occasion of his death. His nephew Mæonius presumed to dart his javelin before that of his uncle; and, though admonished of his error, repeated the same freedom. As a monarch and as a sportsman, Odenathus was provoked, took away his horse, a mark of ignominy, and chastised the rash youth by a short confinement.

The offense was soon forgotten, but the punishment was remembered; and Mæonius, with a few daring associates, assassinated his uncle in the midst of a great entertainment. Herod, the son of Odenathus, though not of Zenobia, a young man of a soft and effeminate temper, was killed with his father. But Mæonius obtained only the pleasure of revenge by this bloody deed. He had scarcely time to assume the title of Augustus, before he was sacrificed by Zenobia to the memory of her husband.

With the assistance of his most faithful friends, she immediately filled the vacant throne, and governed with manly counsels, Palmyra, Syria, and the East, above five years. By the death of Odenathus, the authority was at an end, which the senate had granted him only as a personal distinction; but his martial widow, disdaining both the senate and Gallienus, obliged one of the Roman generals who was sent against her to retreat into Europe, with the loss of his army and his reputation. Instead of the petty passions which so frequently perplex a female reign, the steady administration of Zenobia was guided by the most judicious maxims of policy. If it was expedient to pardon, she could calm her resentment; if it was necessary to punish, she could impose silence on the voice of pity. Her strict economy was accused of avarice; yet on every proper occasion she appeared magnificent and liberal. The neighboring states of Arabia, Armenia, and Persia, dreaded her enmity and solicited her alliance. To the dominions of Odenathus, which extended from the Euphrates to the frontiers of Bithynia, his widow added the inheritance of her ancestors, the populous and fertile kingdom of Egypt. The Emperor Claudius acknowledged her merit, and was content that, while he pursued the Gothic war, she should assert the dignity of the empire in the East. The conduct, however, of Zenobia, was attended with some ambiguity, nor is it unlikely that she had conceived the design of erecting an independent and hostile monarchy. She blended with the popular manners of Roman princes the stately pomp of the courts of Asia, and exacted from her subjects the same adoration that was paid to the successors of Cyrus. She bestowed on her three sons a Latin education, and often showed them to the troops adorned with the imperial purple. For herself she reserved the diadem, with the splendid but doubtful title of Queen of the East.

When Aurelian passed over into Asia, against an adversary whose sex alone could render her an object of contempt, his presence restored obedience to the provinces of Bithynia, already shaken by the arms and intrigues of Zenobia. Advancing at the head of his legions, he accepted the submission of Ancyra, and was admitted into Tyana, after an obstinate siege, by the help of a treacherous citizen. The generous though fierce temper of Aurelian abandoned the traitor to the rage of the soldiers; a superstitious reverence induced him to treat with lenity the countrymen of Apollonius, the philosopher. Antioch was deserted on his approach, till the emperor, by his salutary edicts, recalled the fugitives, and granted a general pardon to all who, from necessity rather than choice, had been engaged in the services of the Palmyrenian queen. The unexpected mildness of such a conduct reconciled the minds of the Syrians, and, as far as the gates of Emessa, the wishes of the people seconded the terror of his arms.

Zenobia would have ill deserved her reputation had she indolently permitted the emperor of the West to approach within a hundred miles of her capital. The fate of the East was decided in two great battles, so similar in almost every circumstance, that we can scarcely distinguish them from each other except by observing that the first was fought near Antioch, and the second near Emessa. In both, the Queen of Palmyra animated the armies by her presence, and devolved the execution of her orders on Zabdas, who had already signalized his military talents by the conquest of Egypt. The numerous forces of Zenobia consisted, for the most part, of light archers and of heavy cavalry, clothed in complete steel. The Moorish and Illyrian horse of Aurelian were unable to sustain the ponderous charge of their antagonists. They fled in real or affected disorder, engaged the Palmyrians in a laborious pursuit, harassed them by a desultory combat, and at length discomfited this impenetrable but unwieldy body of cavalry. The light infantry, in the mean time, when they had exhausted their quivers, remained without protection against a closer onset, their naked sides exposed to the swords of the legions. Aurelian had chosen these veteran troops, who were usually stationed on the Upper Danube, and whose valor had been severely tried in the Alemannic war. After the defeat of Emessa, Zenobia found it impossible to collect another army. As far as the frontier of Egypt, the nations subject to her empire had joined the standard of the conqueror, who detached Probus, the bravest of his generals, to possess himself of the Egyptian provinces. Palmyra was the last resource of the widow of Odenathus. She retired within the walls of her capital, made every preparation for a vigorous resistance, and declared with the intrepidity of a heroine, that the last moment of her reign and her life should be the same.

In his march over the sandy desert between Emessa and Palmyra, the emperor Aurelian was perpetually harassed by the Arabs; nor could he always defend his army, and especially his baggage, from those flying troops of active and daring robbers, who watched the moment of surprise, and eluded the slow pursuit of the legions. The siege of Palmyra was an object far more difficult and important, and the emperor, who with incessant vigor pressed the attacks in person, was himself wounded with a dart. "The Roman people," says Aurelian, in an original letter, "speak with contempt of the war which I am waging against a woman. They are ignorant both of the character and the power of Zenobia. It is impossible to enumerate her warlike preparations, of stones, of arrows, and of every species of missile weapons. Every part of the walls is provided with two or three balistæ, and artificial fires are thrown from her military engines. The fear of punishment has armed her with a desperate courage. Yet still I trust in the protecting deities of Rome, who have hitherto been favorable to all my undertakings." Doubtful, however, of the protection of the gods and of the events of the siege, Aurelian judged it more prudent to offer terms of an advantageous capitulation; to the queen, a splendid retreat; to the citizens, their ancient privileges. His proposals were obstinately rejected, and the refusal was accompanied with insult.

The firmness of Zenobia was supported by the hope that famine would soon compel the emperor to repass the desert; and by the reasonable expectation that the kings of the East, and particularly the Persian monarch, would arm in defense of their most natural ally. But fortune, and the perseverance of Aurelian, overcame every obstacle. The death of Sapor, which happened about this time, distracted the councils of Persia, and the inconsiderable succors that attempted to relieve Palmyra, were easily intercepted, either by the arms or the liberality of the emperor. From every part of Syria, a succession of convoys safely arrived in the camp, which was increased by the return of Probus, with his victorious troops, from the conquest of Egypt. It was then that Zenobia resolved to fly. She mounted the fleetest of her dromedaries, and had already reached the banks of the Euphrates, about sixty miles from Palmyra, when she was overtaken by the pursuit of Aurelian's light horse, seized, and brought back a captive to the feet of the emperor. Her capital soon after surrendered, and was treated with unexpected lenity. The arms, horses, and camels, with an immense treasure of gold, silver, silk, and precious stones, were all delivered to the conqueror, who, leaving only a garrison of six hundred archers, returned to Emessa, and employed some time in the distribution of rewards and punishments at the end of so memorable a war, which restored to the obedience of Rome those provinces that had renounced their allegiance since the captivity of Valerian.

When the Syrian queen was brought into the presence of Aurelian, he sternly asked her how she had presumed to arise in arms against the emperors of Rome? The answer of Zenobia was a prudent mixture of respect and firmness. "Because I disdained to consider as Roman emperors an Aureolus or a Gallienus. You alone I acknowledge as my conqueror and my sovereign." But as female fortitude is commonly artificial, so it is seldom steady or consistent. The courage of Zenobia deserted her in the hour of trial; she trembled at the angry clamors of the soldiers, who called aloud for her immediate execution; she forgot the generous despair of Cleopatra, which she had proposed as her model; and ignominiously purchased life by the sacrifice of her fame and her friends. It was to their counsels, which governed the weakness of her sex, that she imputed the guilt of her obstinate resistance; it was on their heads she directed the vengeance of the cruel Aurelian. The fame of Longinus, who was included among the perhaps innocent victims of her fear, will survive that of the queen who betrayed, or the tyrant who condemned him. Genius and learning were incapable of moving a fierce unlettered soldier, but they had served to elevate and harmonize the soul of Longinus. Without uttering a complaint, he calmly followed the executioner, pitying his unhappy mistress and bestowing comfort on his afflicted friends.

Returning from the conquest of the East, Aurelian had already crossed the straits which divide Europe from Asia, when de was provoked by the intelligence that the Palmyrenians had massacred the governor and garrison which he had left among them, and again erected the standard of revolt. Without a moment's deliberation, he once more turned his face toward Syria. Antioch was alarmed by his rapid approach, and the helpless city of Palmyra felt the irresistible weight of his resentment. We have a letter of Aurelian himself, in which he acknowledges that old men, women, and children, and peasants had been involved in that dreadful execution, which should have been confined to armed rebellion; and although his principal concern seems directed to the re-establishment of a temple of the Sun, he discovers some pity for the Palmyrenians, to whom he grants the permission of rebuilding and inhabiting their city. But it is easier to destroy than to restore. The seat of commerce, of arts, and of Zenobia, gradually sunk into an obscure town, a trifling fortress, and at length a miserable village. The present citizens of Palmyra, consisting of thirty or forty families, have erected their mud cottages within the spacious court of a magnificent temple.

Since the foundation of Rome, no general had more nobly deserved a triumph than Aurelian, nor was a triumph ever celebrated with superior pride and magnificence. The pomp was opened by twenty elephants, four royal tigers, and above 200 of the most curious animals from every climate of the north, the east, and the south. They were followed by 1,600 gladiators, devoted to the cruel amusements of the amphitheater. The wealth of Asia, the arms and ensigns of so many conquerered nations, and the magnificent plate and wardrobe of the Syrian queen, were exposed in exact symmetry or artful disorder. The embassadors of the most remote parts of the earth—of Ethiopia, Arabia, Persia, Bactriana, India and China, all remarkable by their rich or singular dresses, displayed the fame and power of the Roman emperor, who exposed likewise to the public view the presents that he had received, and particularly a great number of crowns of gold, the offerings of grateful cities. The victories of Aurelian were attested by the long train of captives who reluctantly attended his triumph—Goths, Vandals, Sarmatians, Alemanni, Franks, Gauls, Syrians, and Egyptians. Each people was distinguished by its peculiar inscription, and the title of Amazons was bestowed on ten martial heroines of the Gothic nation who had been taken in arms. But every eye, disregarding the crowds of captives, was fixed upon the Queen of the East and the Emperor Tetricus. The latter, as well as his son, whom he had created Augustus, was dressed in Gallic trousers, a saffron tunic, and a robe of purple. The beauteous figure of Zenobia was confined by fetters of gold; a slave supported the gold chain which encircled her neck, and she almost fainted under the intolerable weight of jewels. She preceded, on foot, the magnificent chariot in which she once hoped to enter the gates of Rome. It was followed by two other chariots, still more sumptuous, of Odenathus and of the Persian monarch. The triumphal car of Aurelian (it had formerly been used by a Gothic king) was drawn on this memorable occasion either by four stags or by four elephants. The most illustrious of the senate, the people, and the army, closed the solemn procession. Unfeigned joy, wonder, and gratitude, swelled the acclamations of the multitude; but the satisfaction of the senate was clouded by the appearauce of Tetricus; nor could they suppress a rising murmur that the haughty emperor should thus expose to public ignominy the person of a Roman and a magistrate.

The triumph over, Aurelian behaved generously to his beautiful and royal captive. He presented Zenobia with an elegant villa at Tibur or Tivoli, about twenty miles from the capital; the Syrian queen insensibly sunk into a Roman matron, her daughters married into noble families, and her race was not extinct in the fifth century.—Gibbon.

PALO ALTO, A.D. 1846.—The battle-field of Palo Alto is situated near the southern extremity of Texas, between Matamoras and Point Isabel, about nine miles north-east of the former. At this place the American army under General Taylor, encountered the Mexican army, under General Arista, and the first battle of the late Mexican war ensued.

The American army, consisting of about 2,300 men, occupied an intrenched camp on the north bank of the Rio Grande, opposite the city of Matamoras, in which was concentrated about 6,000 Mexicans, under the command of General Arista. The Mexican general resolved to cut off General Taylor's communication with Point Isabel, his dépôt, and striking to right and left, overwhelm both positions by numbers. For this purpose, he crossed the river in force, and took up a position between the American camp at Matamoras and Point Isabel. But General Taylor had anticipated his design, and leaving the camp on the Rio Grande under the command of Major Brown, set out in person with the greater part of his force for Point Isabel, where he arrived on the 2d day of May. The next day the sound of cannon was heard from the direction of the camp opposite Matamoras, and Captains May and Walker were sent to gain intelligence.

On the 6th Captain Walker returned with the information that the position of Major Brown was secure, being entirely uninjured by the enemy's fire. The Mexican general now hastened the movements of his army, and concentrated his force across the work at Palo Alto about twenty-five miles from Point Isabel. On the 7th of May, General Taylor with his little army advanced from Point Isabel, and the next day arrived within sight of the enemy at Palo Alto. Here the American general halted and made his dispositions for the approaching battle. The right wing of his army was composed of Major Ringgold's artillery, and the third and fifth infantry; the left consisted of Duncan's battery and the fourth and 8th infantry. The Mexican right was composed of light artillery and the infantry; the left consisted of the heavy artillery supported by a strong body of infantry. The Americans advanced in two columns, the right under Major Ringgold moving along the road. As the Americans approached, the Mexicans opened their artillery upon them. Ringgold's battery replied with terrible effect. The cannonade was maintained on both sides incessantly; the infantry standing idle. The Mexican cavalry in attempting to attack the right flank of the Americans, were repulsed with considerable loss by Lieutenant Ridgely, with a detachment of Ringgold's artillery, the fifth infantry, and Captain Walker's Texans. Meanwhile the guns of Ringgold told with fearful effect upon the enemy. At length the gallant major fell, mortally wounded; but Lieutenant Shover, on whom the command devolved, skillfully managed the batteries during the day. Captain Duncan, meanwhile, on the American left, worked his battery incessantly and with good effect. During this time the infantry on both sides stood firm, the battle being almost entirely in the hands of the artillery. The tall grass of the prairie having taken fire from the discharges of the cannon, soon enveloped both armies in a cloud of smoke which produced a temporary cessation of hostilities. In the interval, the Mexican artillery retreated before the fire of Ringgold's artillery, and Shover pushed forward his pieces to the ground they had abandoned. The fourth regiment was ordered to support these guns, and while making this movement suffered severely from the fire of the enemy. Captain Page was mortally wounded, and a number of men were struck down. The Mexican cavalry now made a strong demonstration on the American right; the artillery of Lieutenant-Colonel Childs was pushed forward to that quarter, and a heavy fire was opened upon the advancing column of the enemy. The infantry was formed in square, to receive the charge; but the Mexicans could not withstand the tempest of cannister-shot which was hurled through their ranks, and turned and fled, followed by a destructive fire of musketry. Night was rapidly approaching, and the Mexicans made no further attempt on the American right.

Meanwhile, the Mexicans on their right made a sudden movement against the American left; but they were met promptly by a detachment of Duncan's artillery under Lieutenant Belknap, and were forced to halt before they had fired a single shot. A strong body of Mexican infantry supported by two squadrons of horse, at the same time debouched from the chapparel and advanced to the attack. The Americans opened a section of their battery upon them, with such effect, that the whole advance, foot and horse, fell back in disorder to the bushes; the Mexican cavalry which had come to a halt were also greeted with a destructive fire from the other section, which although it tore through their ranks, making frightful gaps, was unable to shake them. The column of infantry and cavalry, having re-formed in the chapparel, again advanced to the attack. But they had scarcely emerged from the bushes, ere they were greeted by a fire from the American battery which hurled them back to their cover; and the Americans uniting the two sections of Duncan's battery, followed up their flight with such destructive discharges, that the Mexicans, both horse and foot, retreated tumultuously and could not be rallied. The Americans pursued their advantage with the utmost energy, and maintained their fire until the Mexicans had disappeared. The action was now at an end. The American army bivouacked on the ground occupied by the enemy, while the Mexicans were dispersed in various directions in the chapparel in the rear of their former position. In this battle the Americans lost four men killed, and forty wounded, several of the latter mortally. Major Ringgold died sixty hours after the battle. Lieutenant Luther was slightly wounded, Captain Page survived to reach the United States, but died from the effects of his wound soon after his arrival.

PAMPELUNA, A.D. 1813.—In the year 778, Pampeluna, in Spain, was taken by the army of Charlemagne the Great. In June, 1813, a battle took place for the possession of Pampeluna, between the English and French armies, at the close of the Peninsular war. While on their retreat from Vittoria, the French army hastily garrisoned and provisioned this fortified town. It was immediately invested by the British; but the approach of Marshal Soult, with an army, toward the close of July, promised it an early deliverance. On the 27th and 29th of July a series of obstinate conflicts took place near this place, but the French were finally driven across the Pyrenees, and the garrison of Pampeluna, cut off from all supplies, was forced to surrender on the 31st of October. See Pyrenees.

PARIS, A.D. 52.—We now come to treat of one of the most conspicuous cities the world has ever seen. Upon opening such a subject, we feel strongly tempted to dilate upon all that belongs to this great city; but our business is with battles and sieges, and we shall find enough of them to fill more than the space allotted to us.

Julius Cæsar had made the conquest of a part of Gaul, and Labienus, his lieutenant, keeping along the banks of the Seine, determined to take possession of Lutetia, the capital of the Parisians. It was not then the vast city which astonishes by its extent, its population, its wealth, its luxury, and its pleasures. Confined to that which is now called L'Ile du Palais, or Le Cité, it then presented nothing to the eye but a collection of rustic cabins; but its situation, in the middle of a river; its natural fortifications, which made the approach to it difficult and dangerous, with the well-known valor of its inhabitants, who preferred death to slavery, rendered it quite worthy of the efforts of the Romans. At the report of their approach, all the neighboring peoples assembled in arms, under the orders of a distinguished personage, named Camulogenes. Notwithstanding his extreme old age, he knew and practiced all the duties of a great captain. He at first avoided a pitched battle, in order to give his troops, who were much more courageous than disciplined, time to be formed. He took every advantage of his knowledge of the ground, to make himself master of favorable opportunities. There was at that time upon the left bank of the Seine, above Lutetia, a large marsh, whose waters flowed into the river, of which he made a rampart. Labienus endeavored to force him, but was repulsed; he might, indeed, have lost all his legions there, had he not made a speedy retreat. Irritated at this check, the Roman general fell upon Melun, whose inhabitants were in the army of Camulogenes, sacked that hamlet, crossed the Seine there, and following the right bank of the river, presented himself again before Lutetia. The Gaulish general, in order to prevent his taking the city and fortifying himself in it, set fire to it, and destroyed the bridges. Protected by the marsh, he remained in his camp opposite to the Romans, from whom he was separated by the river. In the mean time the nations who peopled the frontiers of the Parisii took up arms, for the purpose of overwhelming the Romans at once. Labienus had brought 50 large boats with him from Melun. At nightfall he dispatched them, with orders to descend the river as silently as possible till they came below Lutetia, nearly at the spot where now stands the village of Anteuil, and to wait there without making the least movement. His design was to cross the Seine at that place. In order to deceive the Gauls, he sent toward the confluence of the Seine and the Maine five cohorts, who had charge of all the baggage, and were attended by some barks filled with sailors. These soldiers marched with as much noise as possible, and the rowers struck the water with all their strength, in order to attract the attention of the Gauls. This stratagem was successful, and the Parisians had no idea of the movement of Labienus, until at daybreak they perceived that general advancing toward them on their side of the river. They were immediately in motion, and rushed forward to meet the Romans. The battle was fought in the plain where now stand the villages of Issi and Vangirard. It was warm and obstinate. The Gauls fought with a courage worthy of greater success. Camulogenes set them the example; though bent beneath the weight of years, this hero appeared, in the midst of his warriors, to regain all the vigor of youth; he was ever found at the post of danger, and threw himself fearlessly into the thickest of the mêlée. This first defender of Parisian liberty met with the death great men desire; he expired fighting for his country, amid a heap of dead which his arm had immolated. The victory of the Romans was complete, and Labienus derived much glory from his achievement.

Second Siege, a.d. 885.—From that time Lutetia, or Paris, became a famous city. Rome brought thither its intelligence and its errors, its wisdom and its vices, its wealth and its luxury, its laws and its abuses. But the Parisians, formerly so simple and so brave, changed all at once into sages, lost with their rustic virtue that intense love of liberty which had animated them. During nearly nine centuries they were no longer known than by the different masters they submitted to, and by the consideration they enjoyed among the peoples of Gaul. They were the head of them. Paris was the center of the Roman dominions in that part of the empire; the Roman governors resided there. Emperors even preferred Lutetia to the most brilliant cities; Julian the Apostate, who embelished it with monuments, never called it any thing but his "dear Lutetia." When Clovis had laid the foundation of the French monarchy, Paris became the capital of his states. Under the reign of this prince and his successors, its extent was so enlarged as to comprise all the space contained between the two arms of the Seine. The irruptions of the barbarians rendered the fortification of it necessary. No entrance could be had to it but by two bridges: each of these was defended by a strong tower, situated nearly where the great and little Châtelet have since been built. In 885 the importance of these precautions was recognized; a swarm of Normans, eager for booty and thirsting for blood, besieged Paris, which they had often before uselessly attacked. Their army consisted of 40,000 men, and more than 700 boats covered the Seine for two leagues; fire-ships, towers, cavaliers, all the machines invented for the destruction of cities, were employed by these barbarians. They gave six assaults. The Parisians received them with the greatest courage, were animated by the example of the Count Eudes, whose great qualities afterward raised him to the throne of the Franks, and by the exhortations of Bishop Gauzlin. This prelate, with helm on head, a quiver at his back, and an axe in his girdle, fought in the breach, within sight of a cross he had planted upon the rampart. He met with death while immolating a host of enemies. Anscheric, who succeeded him upon the episcopal seat, inherited his courage and his love of his country. He continued to lead the besieged, ably seconded by Ebole, the nephew of Gauzlin. This intrepid abbot spread astonishment and terror wherever he directed his arms, nature having endowed him with prodigious strength. In the second assault he rushed to the breach, armed with a javelin which looked like a great spit, with which he pierced the Normans, crying out to his compatriots, "Take these to the kitchen, they are all ready spitted." At length, after eighteen months of successless efforts, the barbarians made a last attempt; they came in crowds to the foot of the walls; they were not expected, and many had already gained the parapets, and were crying victory. At that moment a soldier of moderate height, but of extraordinary valor, named Gerbaut, followed only by five men as brave as himself, killed the first, hurled the others into the ditch, snatched up the ladders, and saved the city. Charles le Gros, who had made but little effort to succor his faithful subjects, treated with the Normans, and induced them to retire, upon promising to pay them 700 pounds' weight of silver in the course of a few months. This cowardly composition, made by a king at the head of an army, excited the general disgust of the Franks. He allowed the Normans to pillage his finest provinces. He was deposed at the diet of Tibur, in 888, and died the same year in indigence, deserted by every body.

Third Siege, a.d. 1411.—Paris became in after-ages the sanguinary theater of civil wars, which under the reign of weak princes, desolated the kingdom. These unhappy times commenced under the administration of Charles VI. The hatreds which divided the nobles broke out openly: France was divided into two factions, almost equally powerful—that of the Duke of Orleans, which was called the Armagnacs; and that of the Duke of Burgundy, called the Burgundians. Almost all of the Parisians were of the latter party. The first wore, as a distinctive mark, a white cross at right angles; the second a red cross oblique, called the cross of St Andrew. These two parties soon made cruel war upon each other. The Armagnacs marched toward Paris: the hopes of plundering that great city excited the ardor and cupidity of the troops. Every thing yielded to their first efforts: at their approach, most of the garrisons distributed in the neighboring places sought safety in flight. St. Denis was the only city that defended itself for a few days. Jean de Châlons, Prince of Orange, commanded in the place; the fear of its being carried by assault obliged him to capitulate; he marched out with his garrison, under a promise of not bearing arms for four years. The treachery of Colonel De Paysieux rendered the Orléannais masters of St. Cloud, and of the passage of the Seine above Paris. That city entirely closed in on the north side, already experienced a scarcity of provisions; the troops spread about the environs daily perpetrated the most horrid cruelties. Houses of pleasure, villages, fields of corn, were all on fire; massacres and violences of every kind, the most horrible sacrileges, the most guilty excesses, were the sports of these pitiless destroyers. Among these brigands was Montagu, archbishop of Sens, who, instead of a mitre, wore a bassinet; for a dalmaique, a habergeon; for a chasuble, a steel gorget; and instead of a cross, carried an axe. Nevertheless, with the danger from without, the fury of the Parisians increased daily, excited above all by the fanaticism of the priests of the capital. All the pulpits resounded with declamations against the Armagnacs. The besiegers were excommunicated. The Orléannais, in reply to this anathema, struck the Duke of Burgundy and his adherents with excommunication. The Archbishop of Sens, the bishops of Paris, Orleans, and Chartres, with several doctors of this age of ignorance, had dictated this dreaded decree. It was thus they sported with religion to justify the horrors committed on both sides. People did not dare to appear in the streets without the red scarf and the cross of St. Andrew. They carried their madness so far as to make the sign of the cross according to the form of the crucifixion of St. Andrew. The people murmured at being shut up within the walls, while the enemy triumphed at their gates; seditious cries announced that they wanted to fight; and it became necessary to obey this blinded populace. The Count de St. Paul and the prevôt Des Essarts, at the head of a detachment of Parisians, badly armed and without order, made a sortie by the gate of St. Denis; they were beaten, although six times more numerous than their adversaries, and precipitately re-entered the city by the gate of St. Honoré, after having lost 400 of their men. This humiliating disgrace completed the despair of the vanquished: in a transport of rage, they made a second sortie from the other side of the city.

Goi, one of the officers of militia, led them to the castle of Wicestre (now Bicêtre), a pleasure-house, which the Duke de Berry prided himself with having ornamented with all the embellishments the art of that age could furnish. As no troops appeared to stop these contemptible warriors, they gave free way to the madness which governed them: the gates of this palace were broken open; they plundered the valuable furniture; they even took away the glass windows, which were then an object of luxury reserved for the houses of the great. This brutal exhibition was crowned by the firing of the building. Among the inestimable loss caused by the conflagration, persons of taste particularly regretted a chronological series of the portraits of the kings of France of the third race, most of them original.

While both parties were giving themselves up to these horrible excesses, the Duke of Burgundy formed the idea of delivering the capital. This prince, at the head of his own troops, and a few companies of English, headed by the Earl of Arundel, crossed the Seine at the bridge of Melun, where 3,000 Parisians awaited him, and made his entrée into Paris, surrounded by 15,000 horsemen. The streets, filled with an innumerable multitude, resounded with acclamations; all were eager to load him with honors and to evince their gratitude. Amid their transports of joy, however, the Parisians beheld with much pain, squadrons of English mixed with the French troops. Secretly indignant at seeing the conservation of the capital, the security of the king, and the safety of the state, committed to the suspicious protection of a rival nation, not one of them would give lodging to these foreigners, who were obliged to pass the night upon their horses. The next day they were distributed with much trouble among the bourgeois, and principally among those whose attachment was doubtful. The appearance of every thing was changed by the arrival of the Burgundian prince. The numbers of the Orléannais diminished daily; in the frequent sorties that were made, they hardly sufficed to guard their posts, till at length St. Cloud, the most important of them, was carried by assault. In this affair they lost 900 of their best soldiers, while only 20 of the Burgundians were killed. The Duke of Orleans lost all hopes of entering Paris: his army was melting away; winter was coming on, and he had nothing left but a disgraceful retreat. He called a council of war, in which the necessity for raising the blockade was acknowledged by all. On the very evening of the day of the taking of St. Cloud, the Orléannais army loaded themselves with all the booty they could carry away, they pillaged the treasures of the queen, deposited for safety in the abbey of St. Dĕnis, which they had till that time respected, crossed the Seine, and marched without halting to Etampes. Information of this nocturnal retreat was not conveyed to Paris till it was too late to pursue them.

Fourth Siege, A.D. 1429.—Paris, which, since the invasion of the English, had been a prey to their tyranny, did not dare to declare in favor of Charles VII., who had just been crowned at Rheims. The king attempted to enter the capital, followed by his whole army. All the small neighboring places vied with each other in their eagerness to receive him. He took possession of St. Denis, and occupied the posts of La Chapelle, Aubervilliers, and Montmartre. His generals, confiding in the intelligence they maintained with some in the city, resolved to attempt an assault on Sunday, 8th of September, 1429. They approached the gate of St. Denis with the design of persuading the English that they meant to attack the capital at that point; at the same time, a considerable detachment presented itself before an intrenchment which the enemy had raised before the rampart of the hog-market, upon which is built the quarter now called La Butte-Saint-Roch. The boulevard was carried at once. While the English, led by the Bishop of Thérouanne, L'Ile-Adam, Crequi, and Bonneval, were hastening thither, numerous voices shouted out in various quarters of Paris, for the purpose of terrifying the people—"All is lost! all is lost! The royalists are masters of the city! Let every one look to himself." This ruse produced the effect the English had expected; the people, in a state of consternation, precipitately sought refuge in their houses, and delivered the English from the suspicions they had conceived. In the mean time, the royalists, finding the people made no movement in their favor, judged it prudent to retreat. Joan of Arc, who had joined the party in order to animate the French by her presence, accustomed by her successes never to recede, would not consent to give up the affair; she persisted in wishing to fill up the ditch filled with water, of which she did not at all know the depth. She was crying aloud for fascines to be brought to her, when she was wounded by an arrow from a cross-bow, in the thigh. Obliged by the pain of the wound and the quantity of blood she lost, to recline behind the shelter of a little eminence, she remained there till evening, when the Duke of Alençon was compelled to force her to return to St. Denis. Charles, conceiving the capture of Paris impossible, thought it best to retreat. His army decamped, and took the road to Lagni-sur-Marne, which had declared for him.

Fifth Siege, A.D. 1465.—The Duke de Berry, brother of Louis XI., at the age of sixteen, escaped from the court, and joined the Duke of Brittany, for the purpose of exciting a revolution which might prove favorable to him. The princes of the blood and the nobles, who waited for some outbreak to make war against the king, immediately issued manifestoes, in which they invited the noblesse, and all good citizens "to take up arms to obtain relief for the poor distressed people!" This specious pretext procured for this union of rebels the name of "The League for the Public Good." The princes soon found themselves at the head of a pretty considerable army; and in order to commence by something brilliant, capable of giving credit to the revolt, after having gained several small places, they resolved to make a general assault upon the capital. But Paris was too well fortified to make the success of such an enterprise at all probable. The Count de Charolais, the head of the leagued troops, drew up his soldiers in order of battle within sight of the ramparts. He believed this display would disconcert the zeal and fidelity of the inhabitants; but nothing could shake them. The Marshal De Rohan made a sortie, and did not return until he had skirmished long and successfully. Some days after, the enemy attacked the faubourg Saint Lazare, the barriers of which were upon the point of being forced, when the citizen-militia coming up, courageously repulsed the rebels, who, harassed at the same time by the artillery from the ramparts, retired in disorder.

The battle of Montlhéry suspended for a time the project of the princes. But scarcely was that celebrated contest decided, than the Count de Charolais made fresh attempts upon the capital. Our readers will the better understand the hardihood and persistency of the count's attacks, when reminded that he was the son of the Duke of Burgundy, and was afterward known as "Charles the Bold." As the royalists were masters of St. Cloud and Charenton, the leader of the enemy's troops caused bridges of boats and casks tied together to be hastily constructed, upon which his army crossed the Seine at various times. He thus inclosed within a half-circle all the northern part of the environs of Paris, extending from St. Cloud to Charenton, of which he took possession without much trouble. Louis XI. and his troops were encamped on the southern side. The loss of Charenton might have intercepted the supply of provisions to the capital, but such prudent measures had been taken, that during the whole of the siege no deficiency in food was felt. The princes at first had recourse to negotiations, but they proved useless; and both sides renewed hostilities, which were warm and frequent. Sorties were made every day, and these combats generally terminated in favor of the king's troops. The honor of this was principally due to the fair sex of the capital; "for the warriors," says Philip de Commines, "beheld the ladies at all times; giving them a desire to show their prowess in their sight." The enemy had placed their advanced posts at Bercy, which was then called "La Grange-aux-Merciers." They were obliged to abandon them, and retire to Conflans, the headquarters of the Count de Charolais. The royal army occupied the opposite bank of the Seine. Several batteries which defended the access to it, were erected there. The leagued princes undertook to throw a bridge of boats across the river, opposite the Port-à-l'Anglais. The king immediately constructed a bulwark, from which artillery, incessantly hurling its mortal thunders, prevented them from advancing. At the same time, a Norman archer, whose name history ought to have preserved, threw himself into the Seine, and contrived to reach the head of the bridge, of which he cut the cables that fastened it to the shore, and abandoned it to the current. This series of ill-fortune induced the League general to resume the interrupted negotiations, and at length, after numerous contentions and delays, a treaty of peace was concluded at Conflans, which delivered Paris from its besiegers. The capital signified its joy by brilliant festivals. The king, to reward its fidelity, confirmed all its privileges; he honored with his presence a banquet at the Hotel de Ville, at which many citizens and their wives were admitted to the table of the monarch with the princes and nobles.

Sixth Siege, A.D. 1589–1594.—The flame of civil war, of which Francis II. had beheld the first sparks, had set all France in a blaze during the minority of Charles IX. Religion was the motive of these wars among the people, and the pretext among the great. The queen-mother, Catherine de Medici, who joined to the most boundless ambition the artful policy of her country, had more than once hazarded the safety of the kingdom to preserve her authority; arming the Catholics against the Protestants, and the Guises against the Bourbons, that they might destroy each other. In this age of troubles, the great, who had become too powerful, were factious and formidable; and the French, animated by that party fury which a false zeal inspires, were, for the most part, fanatics and barbarians. Passions or interests armed every hand: one half of the nation made war against the other half. The greatest cities were taken, retaken, and sacked, in turn. Prisoners of war were put to death in a manner till that time unheard of. The churches were reduced to ashes by the Reformers, the temples by the Catholics. Poisonings and assassinations were looked upon as only the legitimate vengeance of clever enemies. The crowning horror of all these excesses was the massacre of St. Bartholomew. On that ever-execrable day, a young king of twenty-three commanded, in cool blood, the death of more than a million of his subjects, and himself set the example of murder. Charles IX. did not long survive this abuse of sovereign power. Henry III. quitted furtively the throne of Poland, to return to his country and plunge it once more into troubles. Of the two brothers, notwithstanding what we have said of Charles IX., Henry III. was the worse: there is no more detestable character in history than this prince, who rather resembles a Heliogabalus or a Commodus, than a king of chivalric France: in the great massacre he had been, if possible, more active than his brother.

He found in his states two dominant parties; that of the Reformers, reviving from its ashes, more violent than ever, and having at its head Henry the Great, then King of Navarre; and that of the League, a powerful faction, formed by the princes of the house of Guise, encouraged by the pope, fomented by Philip II. of Spain, whose dangerous policy procured him the name of the Demon of the South, increasing every day by the artifices of the monks, under the vail of zeal for the Catholic religion, but whose principal aim was rebellion. Its leader was the Duke of Guise, surnamed le Balafré, from a scar on his cheek, a prince of a brilliant reputation, and who, having more shining qualities than good ones, seemed, in this season of confusion, born to change the destinies of France. Henry III., who perhaps might have crushed both these parties by a judicious exercise of the regal power, absolutely strengthened them by his own weakness. He thought to exhibit a great feat of policy by declaring himself the head of the League; whereas he only proved himself the slave of it. He was forced to make war for the interests of the Duke de Guise, whose object was to dethrone him against the King of Navarre, his brother-in-law and presumptive heir, who only wished to re-establish him in all the rights of his rank. Some successes against the Reformers carried the credit of the too-powerful Balafré to its height. This prince, inflated with his own glory, and strong in the weakness of the king, came to Paris in opposition to the royal command. Then arrived the celebrated day of the barricades, in which the people defeated the guards of Henry, and obliged him himself to fly from his capital. Guise did still more; he forced the king to hold the States-General of the kingdom at Blois, and took his measures so well, that he was near sharing the royal authority, with the consent of the representatives of the nation, and with an appearance of the most respectable formalities. Roused by a danger so pressing, Henry III. caused this redoutable enemy, and the Cardinal de Lorraine, his brother, still more violent and ambitious than the duke, to be assassinated at the castle of Blois. That which happened to the Protestant party after the St. Bartholomew, now happened to the League; the death of the leaders reanimated the faction. On all parts the leaguers threw off the mask. Paris closed its gates: nothing was thought or talked of but vengeance. Henry III. was considered as the assassin of the defenders of religion, as an odious, insupportable tyrant, and not as a king who had punished too audacious subjects. The king, pressed on all sides, was at length obliged to seek a reconciliation with Henry of Navarre; in the course of 1589 these two princes encamped in conjunction before Paris.

Words can scarcely describe the excesses to which the capital gave itself up on learning the death of the Duke de Guise: the shops closed, the people in crowds in the streets, arms in hand, seeking everywhere the Duke d'Aumale, to place him at the head of the League, knocking down the king's arms wherever met with, and imprisoning every one suspected of fidelity to him. A kind of vertigo or spirit of fury took possession of all the citizens without exception; they willingly allowed themselves to be dragged into open rebellion. The churches were hung with mourning, and the depositaries of the Word of God proclaimed aloud the martyrdom of the Balafré and his brother.

The leaders of the sedition sought, however, to color the public excesses with some specious pretexts. They caused a request to be presented to the faculty of theology at Paris, in which it was said "that the princes of the house of Lorraine had always deserved well of the Catholic church during their lives, and that, being protectors of the faith, the king had put them to death; that the monarch must be declared to have forfeited his crown, and his subjects be released from their fidelity; that the prince was a hypocrite, a favorer of heresy, a persecutor of the Church, having bathed his hands in the blood of a cardinal, without respect to his person or his sacred character." The Sorbonne, on the 7th of January, issued a decree, which allowed and even ordered all that this request stated. Lefebvre the dean, and several other doctors, refused to sign this abominable sentence; but the majority prevailed, and gave it all the authority that was desired. The principal leaguers, armed with this fatal document, tried to lay the foundation of an authority, which the same caprice which gave it to them might deprive them of an instant after. The heads of the sixteen quarters of Paris, all scoundrels, and for the most part the issue of low families, were revered like so many sovereigns. These monsters governed Paris; they were its oracles, and put in motion the arms of all the rebels. They also determined to have the parliament. Bussy le Clerc, governor of the Bastille, who had been a master-at-arms, took upon himself the task of ordering that august company to enregister the decree of Sorbonne. On the 16th of January he entered the assembly of French senators with fifty of his satellites, and, pistol in hand, presented to them a request, or rather an order, no longer to recognize the royal house. The refusal being unanimous, he selected the most conspicuous and led them away at once to the Bastille, where the barbarous manner in which he treated them procured him the soubriquet of "Grand Penitentiary of the Parliament."

Very shortly, the Duke de Mayenne, brother and heir to the power of the Duke de Guise, arrived in Paris with a reinforcement of troops. This prince, intrepid and intelligent, but indolent, was still employed in placing the capital in a state of defense, when the two kings of France and Navarre appeared at its gates with an army of 40,000 men. Henry III., took possession of the bridge of St. Cloud, and formed the blockade of the faubourg St. Honoré and the whole quarter of the Louvre as far as the river; the King of Navarre, on the other side, besieged the faubourg St. Marceau to that of St. Germain. The consternation and the fury of the Parisians were extreme when they found themselves surrounded in this manner by the royal troops. The priests recommenced their seditious declamations; to strike the vulgar, they caused little figures of wax to be made, representing the two monarchs, which they placed upon the altar during mass, and pricked them with knives. All priests carried arms, and mounted guard with the other citizens. But this aimless and blind fury could not have protected the capital from the just anger of the king, had it not been prevented by the most infamous of crimes. Jacques Clement, a priest and Dominican, devoted himself, as he said, to the task of killing the tyrant. He communicated his project to the doctors, the Jesuits, the leaders of the League, and the principals of the Sixteen; all encouraged him, all promised him the greatest dignities, if he survived this generous action; and if he became a martyr to it, a place in Heaven, above the apostles. On the 31st of July he went to St. Cloud, where the king's quarters were. He was arrested by the Sieur de Coublan, and conducted to the procureur-général De la Guesle. This magistrate introduced him the next day into the king's apartment. With a simple and respectful air he presented the king an intercepted letter to the President De Harley. The monarch having read it, and being separated from the Dominican by La Guesle, asked him if he had nothing else to say to him. "I have many important things to reveal to the king," replied Clement, "but I can only do it in a whisper to his own ear." "Speak out!" cried the procureur-général two or three times, as he began to mistrust the good father. "Speak aloud, and before me; there is no one here in whom the king has not confidence." Henry then told him to approach.

The villain obeyed, and instead of communicating secrets, plunged a knife, expressly forged for the purpose, into his bowels, and left it sticking in the wound. The astonished king immediately drew out the knife, and springing upon the assassin, stabbed him in the forehead. La Guesle put the finishing stroke with his sword. His body was thrown out at the window, torn in pieces, burned, and his ashes cast into the Seine.

In proportion as this parricide spread consternation in the army, so did it give cause of triumph to the Parisians. A relation of the martyrdom of Brother Jacques Clement was printed; he was canonized, and lauded at Rome from the very pulpit in which the funeral oration of Henry III. ought to have been pronounced. The object was by such means to incite fresh assassinations. The king died of his wound on the 2d of August, at two o'clock in the morning; and Henry of Bourbon, King of Navarre, whom he had proclaimed his successor as he was dying, was acknowledged by a part of the army, and by all who deserved the name of Frenchmen. The new monarch was obliged to interrupt the attacks upon Paris to disperse the different armies of the League; and it was not till after he had rendered himself master of the places which served as magazines to the capital, that he formed the blockade of it with less than 20,000 men. He commenced by attacking the faubourgs: his army, divided into ten bodies, attacked ten different quarters of Paris. In order to witness the operations, he placed himself in the abbey of Montmartre, and at midnight gave the signal. The artillery was immediately heard to roar on both sides. "There is nobody," says Sully, "who would not have supposed that that immense city was about to perish by fire, or by an infinite number of mines ignited in its entrails; there perhaps never was a spectacle more capable of inspiring horror. Dense masses of smoke, through which pierced at intervals sparks or long trains of flame, shrouded all the surface of that sort of world which, by the vicissitudes of light and darkness, appeared either plunged in black night or covered with a sea of fire. The roar of the artillery, the clash of arms, the cries of combatants, added every thing to this scene that can be imagined that is terrifying; and the natural horror of night redoubled it still more. This lasted two whole hours, and ended by the reduction of all the faubourgs, even of that of St. Antoine, though, from its extent, it was obliged to be attacked from a great distance."

The king's success did not relax the mad courage and the blind fury of the Parisians; the leaders set the same springs to work that had been employed the preceding year; sacrilegious sermons, the confirmation of the Sorbonne, and the excommunication of the king.

As soon as Henry IV. had closed all the issues from the city, provisions began to fail, and more than 200,000 persons of all conditions were reduced to the most awful extremity, but without losing any of that factious ardor which had seized all minds. To animate the people still further, a kind of regiment of ecclesiastics was formed, to the number of 1,300; they appeared on the bridge of Nôtre Dame in battle-array, and made a general review, which was called the procession of the League. The leaders carried in one hand a crucifix, and in the other a halbert, the rest having all sorts of arms.

The pope's legate, by his presence, approved of a proceeding at once so extraordinary and so laughable; but one of these new soldiers, who was no doubt ignorant that his arquebuss was loaded with ball, wishing to salute the legate in his carriage, fired into it, and killed his almoner. The legate, in consequence of this accident, made as speedy a retreat as possible; but the people exclaimed that it was a great blessing for the almoner to be killed in such a holy cause. Such was the frightful persuasion of this populace, whom impunity had rendered formidable. They believed themselves invincible under the orders of the Duke de Nemours, a skillful, courageous, and prudent general, whom the Duke de Mayenne, his brother, had left in Paris during his absence; they were backed by 3,000 or 4,000 good troops, and by several nobles of high courage. They every day skirmished against the royal army, or fought small battles; the Chevalier d'Aumale, of the blood of Lorraine, being always at the head of their sorties, and imparting his impetuous valor to his followers. Henry IV. satisfied himself with repulsing these attacks, convinced that famine would soon open the gates of the capital to him.

In fact, this terrible scourge began to make rapid progress; there was neither wheat, barley, nor oats left; more than 50,000 persons had already died of want; the sad remains of this numerous population, nobles, plebeians, rich or poor, languidly crawled through the streets to seek for and devour the grass and weeds that grew in them. Mules, horses, cats, dogs, all the domestic animals—even beasts that are reckoned unclean—served for food. The leather of shoes was sold for its weight in gold; it was boiled and devoured in secret, for fear some wretch, stronger and more hungry, should tear it from the mouth of the purchaser. Mothers were seen feeding upon the flesh of their children, and miserable beings flew like vultures upon a newly-dead body that had fallen in the streets. The Spanish embassador to the League advised that bread should be made of the ground bones of the dead, and his plan was eagerly adopted; but this shocking aliment cost the lives of most of those who partook of it. In this general desolation, the priests and monks enjoyed the comforts of abundance; on visiting their abodes, there was generally enough for the present discovered, and, in many instances, a good provision for the future. At length the leaders of the League, to appease the people, who now never ceased crying, "Bread or peace!" charged the Bishop of Paris and the Archbishop of Lyons with proposals to the king. "I am no dissembler," said the monarch, "I speak plainly and without deceit what I think. I should be wrong if I told you I did not wish for a general peace; I do wish for it, I ardently desire it, that I may have the power of enlarging and settling the limits of my kingdom. For a battle I would give a finger, for a general peace I would give two. I love my city of Paris; it is my eldest daughter; I am jealous of her. I am anxious to confer upon her more good, more kindness, more pity than she could ask of me; but I desire that she should owe them to me and to my clemency, and not to the Duke de Mayenne or the King of Spain. When you ask me to defer the capitulation and surrender of Paris till a universal peace, which can not take place till after many journeys, backward and forward, you ask for a thing highly prejudicial to my city of Paris, which can not wait so long. So many persons have already died of hunger, that if a further delay of ten or twelve days took place, vast numbers must die, which would be a great pity (une étrange pitie). I am the father of my people, and I am like the mother of old before Solomon, I would almost prefer having no Paris at all to having it ruined and dissipated by the death of so many Parisians. You, Monsieur le Cardinal, ought to have pity on them; they are your flock. I am not a remarkably good theologian; but I know enough of divinity to be able to tell you that God is not pleased that you should treat thus the poor people he has consigned to you. How can you hope to convert me to your religion, if you set so little store by the safety and lives of your flock? It is giving me but a poor proof of your holiness; I am but little edified by it."

"Such," says the historian, "were the words and sentiments of this generous prince; the evils which oppressed his people penetrated his compassionate and tender heart. He could not endure the idea," says Sully, "of seeing that city, of which Providence had destined him the empire, become one vast cemetery; he held out his hands to all he could secretly assist, and shut his eyes upon the supplies of provisions which his officers and soldiers frequently stole in, whether out of compassion for relations or friends, or for the sake of the heavy prices they made the citizens pay for them."

He could have carried Paris by the sword; and his soldiers, the Huguenots in particular, demanded that favor of him with loud cries; but he resisted all their entreaties. The Duke de Nemours having turned out a vast number of useless mouths, the council advised the king to refuse them a passage. Henry, deeply affected by their melancholy fate, gave orders to let them go where they liked.

"I am not astonished," said he, "that the chiefs of the League, or the Spaniards, should have so little compassion on these poor people, they are but their tyrants; but as for me, I am their father and their king, and I can not behold them without being moved to my inward heart." But he was deceived if he thought these kindnesses would make any impression upon the Parisians. They availed themselves of his benevolence without ceasing to regard him as the author of all the public calamities; and when, a short time after, the Prince of Parma and the Duke de Mayenne, at the head of an army, obliged him to pause in his enterprise, they insulted him who had only raised the siege because he was too sensible to the misfortunes of the besieged.

Paris persisted in its revolt to the month of March, 1594, when the Duke de Brissac, who had joined the League because Henry III. had told him that he was good for nothing, either by land or sea, negotiated with Henry IV. and opened the gates of Paris to him, for the reward of the baton of the Marshal of France. Henry IV. made his entrée, which only cost the lives of a small body of lansquenets, and of two or three citizens, who endeavored to induce the people to take up arms against a king who was willing to treat them as a father.

When Brissac had thrown open the gates, Henry's troops marched in in silence, keeping close and careful order, and took possession of the squares and public places, and great thoroughfares. After the prévôt des marchands and de Brissac had presented the keys to him, he advanced at the head of a large troop of the nobility, with lances lowered. His march was a triumph, and from that day, he considered himself among the Parisians, as in the midst of his children.

The ridiculous yet bloody war of the Fronde, though it maddened, and for a time half starved the Parisians, and although its two parties were headed by a Condé and a Turenne, does not furnish us with a regular siege.—Robson.

The French Revolution, A.D. 1789.—The most important epoch in the history of Paris is unquestionably the French Revolution of 1789; and we hope that in consideration of the interest of the subject, our readers will pardon us for devoting so much space to the descriptions of events, which caused many of the battles which are recorded in this volume, and which shook all Europe to its very center.

That a long continued series of abuses unredressed will at last become unendurable, is a truth which all history attests; and also, that before a nation can enjoy the blessings of freedom, its moral character must be high. The French people, before the Revolution broke out, had many grievances to complain of, such as the weight of taxes, the too general worthlessness of the clergy and nobility, and the remaining pressure of the feudal system. This aroused the people to action. They shook off all restraint. Infidelity strode hand in hand with blood. The whole land streamed with gore, and the leading actors in this awful scene of carnage appear possessed of the spirit of demons. There is no page of history full of greater excitement and instruction—none which gives a livelier picture of the evils of anarchy. The following extracts contain an account of some of the chief among this remarkable series of events:

It is fortunate for the memory of Louis XVI., that no authentic documents have been produced to prove that the court intended to assail the new legislative assembly of the French people. The democratic writers affirm, that a plan was actually concerted for the dissolution of the assembly, and the full resumption of despotic authority. They assert that the night of the 14th or 15th of July was fixed upon for the attack of the metropolis, which was already besieged by fifty thousand men, and one hundred pieces of cannon. They describe the arrangement which was planned for the assault; and some of them add, that not only the dissolution of the assembly, but a dreadful and sanguinary execution of its most distinguished members was to succeed. We are not disposed to credit this wild statement, though, perhaps, agreeably to the declaration in the royal session of the 23d of June, the authority of the States-General was to be lessened; and that some change was intended was evident from the dismission of M. Neckar, which took place on the 11th of July. He was at dinner when the letter of the king, ordering him to quit the kingdom in twenty-four hours, was brought him by the Count de la Luzerne. Without appearing in the least concerned, he had the presence of mind to tell the count, as he went out of the room, "We shall meet again at the council;" and continued to converse with the Archbishop of Bourdeaux and the rest of the company that were dining with him, as if nothing had happened. About five o'clock in the afternoon he complained of a pain in his head, and asked Madame Neckar, if she would accompany him in an airing. He was not more than a league from Versailles when he desired the coachman to drive on more quickly to St. Ouen, his country house. He passed the night there, and prepared for the journey; and this was the first opportunity he had of acquainting his daughter, the Baroness de Staël, with the event, though she was present when he received the order of the king to quit the country. He took the road to Brussels as the nearest frontier.

The new arrangements in the ministry were the Marshall Broglio, minister of war; the Baron de Breteuil, president of finance; M. de la Galezieri, comptroller-general; M. de la Porte, intendant of the war department; and M. Foulon, intendant of the navy.

It is impossible to describe the sensation which pervaded Paris on the receipt of this intelligence. The person who first reported it at the Hôtel de Ville was considered as a lunatic, and with difficulty escaped some harsh treatment. It was no sooner confirmed, than the shops and places of public amusement were all shut up. A body of the citizens ran to the warehouse of a statuary, and having procured the busts of M. Neckar and the Duke d'Orleans, dressed them in mourning, and carried them about the streets. In their progress they were stopped by a German regiment, the royal Allemand, when the busts were broken by the soldiers; one man lost his life, and others of the populace were wounded. The army now came forward in force, with the Prince de Lambesq, grand ecuyer of France, at their head, who was ordered to take post at the Tuilleries. Irritated, perhaps, at the spirit of resistance which he observed in the citizens, he imprudently wounded with his saber a man who was walking peaceably in the gardens. This unfortunate circumstance proved the signal of revolt; an instantaneous alarm was spread through the city, and the cry of "To arms" resounded in every quarter. The Germans were vigorously attacked by the populace, who were joined by the French guards, and, overpowered by numbers, were obliged to retreat. From that moment the guards took leave of their officers, they set fire to their several barracks, and formed themselves into companies with the citizens to patrol the streets.

The citizens of Paris at this moment conceived themselves in an alarming and critical situation. The reports of the intended attack upon the city were eagerly listened to; and it was thought that the mysterious and impolitic proceedings of the court gave countenance to every suspicion. On the other hand, troops of banditti, the pests of a populous city, such as are ever ready to take advantage of public commotion, were beginning to collect; and, either from these on the one hand, or the foreign soldiery on the other, a general pillage was feared. Covered by the darkness of the night, several bands of ruffians, doubtless apostles of freedom, paraded the streets, and even set fire to the city in different places: the horrid silence was interrupted only by confused shouts, and occasional discharges of musketry. In this disastrous night sleep only sealed the eyes of infants; they alone reposed in peace, while their anxious parents watched over their cradles.

STORMING THE BASTILE. Page 450.

Versailles was not more tranquil; but the court party rejoiced at the altered appearance of things. Their joy, however, was not of long duration; a false report of 100,000 armed citizens being on the road to Versailles, joined to their mistrust of the national troops, checked their happiness.

The morning of the 13th displayed at Paris a spectacle of confusion and dismay; a band of villains had already pillaged the charitable house of St. Lazare; at six o'clock the alarm bells sounded throughout the city, and the terror became universal. Many citizens assembled at the Hôtel de Ville, and no alternative appeared for the protection of their lives and property, but that of embodying themselves, and forming a regular militia for the defense of the capital. Sixty thousand citizens were soon enrolled, and marshaled under different commanders: the French guards spontaneously offered their services, and were distributed among the different companies. The standards of the city were displayed; trenches were thrown up, and barricadoes formed in different parts of the suburbs. Regulations were next established for the preservation of order, and a permanent council or committee, to sit night and day, was appointed. At about half past five in the afternoon this committee dispatched a deputation to acquaint the National Assembly with the occurrences which had taken place at Paris.

The Assembly had been engaged, from the day when they presented their address to the king, in framing a declaration of rights, and the plan of a constitution; and even in the midst of these alarms they continued their labors. In the disgrace of M. Neckar they apprehended their punishment. In their debates they endeavored to distinguish between the prerogatives and functions of the legislative and those of the executive powers; and on receiving the intelligence that Paris was in a state of uproar and confusion, a deputation was dispatched to the king, informing him once more of the danger which threatened the state from the presence of the troops that invested the metropolis; demanding their removal; and offering to proceed to Paris to assist, by their persuasion and authority, in the re-establishment of order and peace. The king adhered to his determination; he might well distrust them; he replied, "that he was the only judge of the necessity of removing the troops; that the presence of the deputies could be of no service in Paris; on the contrary, they were necessary at Versailles, to prosecute there those important labors which he should continue to recommend."

This reply was by no means agreeable to the Assembly. It was therefore no sooner communicated than the Marquis de la Fayette demanded an immediate declaration of the responsibility of ministers, and the assembly unanimously resolved:

"That M. Neckar and the rest of the late ministry carried with them the confidence and the regret of the Assembly; that they would not cease to insist on the removal of the troops; that no intermediate power can exist between the king and the representatives of the nation; that the ministers and agents of authority, civil and military, are responsible to the people for their conduct; that the present ministers and counselors of his majesty were personally responsible for the impending calamities, and all those which might be the consequences of their advice; that the Assembly having placed the public debts under the safeguard of the honor and loyalty of the French nation, no power has a right even to pronounce the infamous word bankruptcy; that they persisted in all their former decrees; and that these minutes should be presented to the king and the late ministry, and committed to the press."

The boldness of the Parisians was proportionably increased by the position of the National Assembly. By the accession of the French guards, they had obtained a supply of arms and ammunition, and a considerable train of artillery; the shops of the armorers were ransacked for weapons, and the soldier-citizens were even trained to some appearance of discipline. The night of the 13th passed without any event of consequence: the morning discovered that, taking advantage of the darkness, the troops encamped in the Champs Elysées had moved off. The people, however, were ignorant of the causes of this removal, and an immediate attack was expected. The national guard, for that was the name which the mixed band of soldiers and citizens now assumed, amounted to the number of 150,000 men; but the majority were still without arms. The Marquis de la Salle was named commander-in-chief; the green cockade, which they had at first adopted, was changed for the since famous national colors, red, blue and white; the new army was now more regularly officered; and various deputations were dispatched in quest of arms and implements of war. M. de Flesselles, the prévôt des marchands (or mayor), made many promises on this subject; which do not seem to have been verified.

In the course of their inquiries after arms, a party of more than 30,000, conducted by M. Ethis de Corny, repaired to the Hôtel des Invalides. M. Sombreuil, the governor, had received orders so early as on Sunday the 12th, to hold himself in readiness for an attack, and his men had remained during the whole of Monday under arms, and on the morning of Tuesday he permitted them to take a few hours' rest. At this moment M. de Corny arrived; and, on making known to the governor the object of his mission, he was answered, that the invalids had not any arms. M. Corny was reconducted by M. Sombreuil to the gate; but it was no sooner opened than the multitude rushed in, in an irresistible torrent, and in a few minutes ransacked every part of the Hotel. More than 30,000 muskets, and 20 pieces of cannon, were the fruit of this expedition. On the opposite side of the Seine a similar event occurred; there another party attacked the garde-meuble de la couronne, and from that ancient store an immense number of weapons of different kinds were procured.

Capture of the Bastille.—It has been generally believed that the taking of the bastille was a preconcerted matter; but this was really not the case. Some of the most important actions have been originated by that imperceptible chain of events which human blindness terms accident or chance. Like the Hôtel des Invalides, the bastille had, from the first moment of the alarms in Paris, been put in a state of defense. Fifteen pieces of cannon were mounted on the towers; and three field-pieces loaded with grape and case-shot, guarded the first gate. A large quantity of powder and military stores had been brought from the arsenal, and distributed to the different corps; the mortars had been exercised; the draw-bridge and gates strengthened and repaired; the house of the governor himself was fortified, and guarded by light pieces of artillery. The shortness of the time had not permitted him to be equally provident in laying in a sufficient store of provisions. The forces which the fortress included were chiefly foreigners. On the morning of the 14th, several deputations had waited on the Marquis de Launay, the governor, to demand arms and peace. They were courteously received by him, and he gave them the strongest assurances of his good intentions. Indeed, it is said that he was himself averse to hostile measures, had his resolution not been altered by the counsels of the Sieur Louis de Flue, commander of the Swiss guards, by the orders of the Baron de Bezenval, and by the promises of M. de Flesselles. The Swiss soldiers had even been engaged by oath to fire on the invalids who were in the fortress, if they refused to obey the governor; and the invalids themselves, it was vaguely reported, were intoxicated with a profusion of liquor which had been distributed among them.

At about eleven o'clock in the morning, M. de la Rosiere, a deputy of the district of St. Louis de la Culture waited on the governor, and was accompanied by a mixed multitude of all descriptions. He entered alone into the house of the governor, and the people remained in the outer court. "I come, sir," said the deputy, "in the name of the nation, to represent to you, that the cannons which are leveled against the city from the towers of the bastille have excited the most alarming apprehensions, and I must entreat that you will remove them." The governor replied, "that it was not in his power to remove the guns, as they had always been there, without an order from the king; that he would, however, dismount them, and turn them out of the embrasures." The deputy having with difficulty obtained leave from M. de Losme, major of the fortress, to enter into the court, summoned the officers and soldiers, in the name of honor and their country, to alter the directions of the guns, etc., and the whole of them, at the desire even of the governor, engaged themselves by oath to make no use of their arms, unless attacked. M. de la Rosiere, after having ascended one of the towers with M. de Launay, went out of the castle, promising to engage the citizens to send a part of the national guard to the duty of the bastille in conjunction with the troops.

The deputy had scarcely retired before a number of citizens approached the gate, and demanded arms and ammunition. As the majority of them were unarmed, and announced no hostile intention, M. de Launay made no difficulty of receiving them, and lowered the first drawbridge to admit them. The more determined of the party advanced to acquaint him with the object of their mission; but they had scarcely entered the first court, when the bridge was drawn up, and a general discharge of musketry destroyed the greater part of them.

The motives of the governor for this act have never been explained, and it can not be sufficiently regretted that the intemperate fury of the maddened populace did not allow him to be heard on his defense, though probably his enemies would have drowned his voice with insults. Its immediate effect was to raise the resentment of the people almost to frenzy. The instantaneous determination was to storm the fortress, and the execution was immediately prosecuted. An immense multitude, armed with muskets, sabers, etc., rushed at once into the outer courts. A soldier of the name of Tournay climbed over the corps-de-garde, and leaped alone into the interior court. After searching in vain for the keys of the draw-bridges in the corps-de-garde, he called out for a hatchet; he soon broke the locks and the bolts; and, being seconded by the efforts of the people on the other side, the two draw-bridges were immediately lowered. The mob lost no time in making good their station, where for more than an hour they sustained a fire from the garrison, and answered it with equal vigor.

During the contest, several deputations from the Hôtel de Ville appeared before the walls with flags of truce, as if to persuade the besieged to a peaceful surrender. But more probably, M. de Launay despaired of finding mercy at the hands of the rabble, and determined to maintain his post to the last. The guards, who now acted openly with the people, proved of essential service; and, by the advice of some of the veterans of this corps, three wagons loaded with straw, were set on fire under the walls, the smoke of which interrupted the view, and consequently intercepted the aim of the besieged; while the assailants, being at a greater distance, were able to direct their fire to the battlements with an unerring aim. In the mean time the arsenal was stormed, and a most dreadful havoc was prevented there by the prudence and courage of M. Humbert, who first mounted the towers of the bastille: a hairdresser was in the very act of setting fire to the magazine of powder, when M. Humbert, whose notice was attracted by the cries of a woman, knocked the ruffian down with the butt end of his musket; next, instantly seizing a barrel of saltpetre which had already caught fire, and turning it upside down, he extinguished it.

Nothing could equal the ardor of the besiegers: an immense crowd, as if unconscious of danger, filled the courts of the fortress in spite of the unremitted fire of the garrison, and even approached so near the towers, that M. de Launay himself frequently rolled large masses of stone from the platform on their heads. Within all was confusion and terror; the officers themselves served at the guns, and discharged their firelocks in the ranks. But when the governor saw the assailants take possession of the first bridge, and draw up their cannon against the second, his courage then was changed into despair, and even his understanding appeared to be deranged. He rashly sought to bury himself under the enormous mass which he had in vain attempted to defend. While a turnkey was engaged in distributing wine to the soldiers, he caught the match from one of the pieces of cannon, and ran to the magazine with an intention to set it on fire; but a subaltern of the name of Ferrand repulsed him with his bayonet. He then went down to the Tower de la Liberté, where he had deposited a quantity of powder; but here also he was opposed by the Sieur Beguard, another subaltern officer, who thus prevented an act of insanity which must have destroyed thousands of citizens, and, with the bastille, would have infallibly blown up all the adjacent buildings, and a considerable part of the suburb of St. Antoine. De Launay at length proposed seriously to the garrison to blow up the fortress, as it was impossible that they could hope for mercy from the mob. But he was answered by the soldiers, that they would rather perish than destroy such a number of their fellow-citizens. He then hung out a white flag, intimating his desire to capitulate; and a Swiss officer would have addressed the assailants through one of the loop-holes of the draw-bridge; but the exasperated populace would attend to no offers of capitulation. Through the same opening he next displayed a paper, which the distance prevented the besiegers from reading. A person brought a plank, which was rested on the parapet, and poised by a number of others. This individual advanced upon the plank; but just as he was ready to seize upon the paper, he received a musket-shot, and fell into the ditch. He was followed by a young man of the name of Maillard, son to an officer of the châtelet, who was fortunate enough to reach the paper, the contents of which were, "We have 20,000 pounds weight of gunpowder, and will blow up the garrison and all its environs, if you do not accept the capitulation." M. Elie, an officer of the queen's regiment, who was invested with a kind of spontaneous authority, was for agreeing to terms; but the mob rejected the very word capitulation, and immediately drew up to the spot three pieces of artillery.

The enemy now perceiving that the great bridge was going to be attacked, let down the small draw-bridge, which was to the left of the entrance into the fortress. Messrs. Elie, Hulin, Maillard, Reole, Humbert, Tournay, and some others, leaped instantly on the bridge, and, securing the bolts, proceeded to the door. In the mean time the French guards, with coolness and discipline, formed a column on the other side of the bridge, to prevent the citizens from rushing upon it in too great numbers. An invalid came to open the gate behind the draw-bridge, and asked the invaders what they wanted! "The surrender of the bastille," they cried; and he permitted them to enter. The conquerors immediately lowered the great bridge, and the multitude entered without resistance—the invalids were ranged to the right, and the Swiss on the left hand, with their arms piled against the wall. They took off their hats, clapped their hands, and cried out bravo! as the besiegers entered. The first moments of this meeting passed in peace and reconciliation; but some soldiers on the platforms, ignorant of the surrender, fired upon the mob, who instantly fell upon the invalids, two of whom, the unfortunate Beguard, who had prevented the governor from blowing up the bastille, and another equally innocent, were dragged to the place de Grève, and hanged.

The Sieurs Maillard, Cholat, Arné, and some others, dispute the honor of having first seized M. de Launay. He was not in a uniform, but in a plain gray frock; he had a cane in his hand, and it was reported would have killed himself with the sword that it contained, but the grenadier Arné wrested it out of his hand. He was escorted by Messrs. Hulin, Arné, Legris, Elie, and some others, who attempted to save his life, but in vain: they had scarcely arrived at the Hôtel de Ville before his defenders were overpowered, and even wounded by the enraged rabble, and he fell under a thousand wounds. M. de Losme Salbrai, his major, a gentleman distinguished for his virtues and his humanity, was also the victim of the popular fury. The Marquis de Pelleport, who had been five years in the bastille, and during that time had been treated by him with particular kindness, interposed to save him at the risk of his life, but was struck down by a hatchet, and M. de Losme was instantly put to death. The heads of the governor and the major were struck off, and carried on pikes through the streets of the city. The rage of the populace would not have ended here—the invalids of the fortress would all have been sacrificed, had not some of the French guards interposed, and insisted on their pardon.

The keys of the bastille were carried to M. Brissot de Warville, who had been a few years before an inhabitant of its cells; and a guard of 3,000 men was appointed over the fortress till the council at the Hôtel de Ville should decree its demolition. In the intoxication of success the prisoners were forgotten; and as the keys had been carried to Paris, the dungeons were forced open—seven prisoners only were found, three of whom had lost their reason, having been detained there as state prisoners from the reign of Louis XV. Thus, in a few hours was reduced that fortress which armies had considered as impregnable, and which had been in vain besieged by the force of the great Condé for upward of three weeks.

The fate of M. de Launay involved that of M. de Flesselles, the prévôt des marchands. He had long been an object of suspicion to the people. In the pocket of M. de Launay a letter from him was said to be discovered, which contained these words:—"I will amuse the Parisians with cockades and promises. Keep your station till the evening, you shall then have a reinforcement!" At the sight of this letter the unfortunate De Flesselles was struck dumb. A voice was heard in the hall—"Begone, M. de Flesselles, you are a traitor." "I see, said he, "gentlemen, that I am not agreeable to you—I shall retire." He hastened down the stairs; but as he crossed the Grève, accompanied by a number of persons to defend him, a young man, who had waited an opportunity, shot him with a pistol. His head was cut off, placed on a pike, and carried through the streets along with that of M. de Launay.

A tumultuous night succeeded this day; and the songs of joy and triumph which had celebrated the victory of the rabble, were converted into confused murmurs, expressive only of anxiety and alarm. A report was spread that the troops were about to enter the city at the Barrier d'Enfer; thither the citizens crowded under the conduct of the French guards, and preceded by a train of artillery—the body of troops, however, that appeared in that quarter were dispersed by a single volley. The alarm-bells were then sounded; barricades were formed at the barriers; deep holes were dug in different parts, to prevent the approach of the cavalry; the tops of the houses were manned; a general illumination was ordered; and the silence of the night was interrupted by discharges of artillery, and by the warning voice of the patrols—"Citizens, do not go to bed; take care of your lights; we must see clearly this night."

The first news of the taking of the bastille was regarded by the court as unfounded: it was, however, at length irresistibly confirmed. The first resolves of the ministry are said to have been for immediate action, and orders were issued to the commanders to push the projected movements with all possible vigor. In the dead of the night, Marshal Broglio is said to have arrived to inform them that it was impossible to obey the mandate he had received of investing the hall of the National Assembly with a train of artillery, as the soldiers would not comply with his orders. "Press then the siege of Paris," was the answer. The general replied, he could not depend on the army for the execution of that project.

The king was the only person in the palace who was kept totally ignorant of these transactions. The Duke de Liancourt, who was then master of the wardrobe, forced his way in the middle of the night into the king's apartment, informed him of every circumstance, and announced to the Count d'Artois that a price was set upon his head. The intelligence of the duke was supported by the authority of Monsieur, who accompanied him, and the king was immediately convinced of his error. Early the next morning the monarch appeared in the Assembly. His address was affectionate and conciliatory. He lamented the disturbances at Paris; disavowed all consciousness of any meditated attack on the persons of the deputies; and added, that he had issued orders for the immediate removal of the troops from the vicinity of the metropolis. An expressive silence first pervaded the Assembly, which presently was succeeded by a burst of applause and acclamation. The king rose to return to the palace, and the deputies accompanied him to the royal apartments.

Paris, which had been a scene of commotion, of terror, and of bloodshed, from the 12th of July, began on the 15th to assume some slight appearance of order and tranquillity. The livid and bloody heads were still carried about the streets as trophies of popular vengeance: but on the morning of that day a citizen persuaded the multitude to listen to the voice of humanity, and they were thrown into the Seine. The electors at the Hôtel de Ville were busied in the organization of the civil establishment, and in the regulation of the city militia. The odious name of prévôt was abolished; the more ancient and honorable appellation of mayor was substituted in its place; and to this office M. Bailly, who had been president of the tiers état, was called.

The Marquis de la Fayette was unanimously nominated vice-president. He was also intrusted with the commission of general and commander-in-chief of the national guard.

The troops, which had assembled on the Champ de Mars, had decamped during the night, leaving their tents and the greater part of their baggage behind them: but a spectacle still more interesting to the citizens soon presented itself: this was a deputation of eighty-four of the most distinguished members of the National Assembly, accompanied by an immense crowd, who covered the road from Versailles to the capital, and, with feelings too suddenly changed to be lasting, loaded them with blessings and semblance of affection. On their arrival at the Hôtel de Ville, the Marquis de Lafayette, Count Lally Tollendal, the Marquis Clermont Tonnerre, the Duc de Liancourt, and the Archbishop of Paris, addressed the people. From this place they adjourned to the Church of Nôtre Dame, where Te Deum was sung in celebration of the anticipated return of peace, accompanied with liberty. As they returned from the church, the acclamations of the populace were occasionally interrupted by the expression of two further demands—the wish of seeing their sovereign in Paris, and the recall of the patriotic ministry. The deputies returned in the evening to Versailles.

Public tranquillity, however, was far from being restored as ever. The ministry, an object of peculiar hatred, were not yet dismissed, nor had the troops yet evacuated the environs of Paris; two fresh regiments had arrived at St. Denis; and a convoy of flour, it was said, had been intercepted by the orders of a person well known. The night of the 15th, therefore, was spent in anxiety, and with the same warlike preparations as the preceding; and in the morning a fresh deputation was sent to the Assembly, entreating them to interest themselves in procuring the dismission of the ministry, and the recall of M. Neckar.

After a short debate, which chiefly respected the decorum of interfering with the appointments of the executive power, the Assembly were on the point of voting an address to the king, which had been proposed by Mirabeau, when they were informed that the ministers themselves had resigned. The same evening, a letter from his majesty to M. Neckar, inviting him to return, was read by the president. It was received by the loudest acclamations, and was seconded by an adulatory address from the Assembly themselves to that minister. The king having at the same time intimated his intention of visiting Paris the following day, the Assembly immediately decreed a deputation to convey the intelligence, and to disperse it throughout the metropolis.

The King's Visit.—It was not without consternation that the king's determination to visit Paris was received at the palace of Versailles. Those who really loved him were apprehensive for his safety. Rumors of projected assassinations were spread, and the least consequence that could ensue was supposed to be the detention of the sovereign in Paris. The king, however, with a degree of courage and patriotism which does honor to his character, remained immovable in his determination. On the morning of the 17th he left Versailles, in a plain dress, and with no other equipage than two carriages with eight horses each; in the first of which he rode himself—a part of the National Assembly in their robes, accompanied him on foot; and the militia of Versailles composed his only guard till the procession arrived at the Seve, where they were relieved by the Paris militia, with the Marquis de la Fayette at their head; and from this place the suite of the monarch amounted to about 20,000 men. The horse-guards led the procession; these were followed by the city cavalry; some battalions of the French guards and other soldiers, who had fought in defense of the nation, succeeded; then the different companies and corporations; and M. de la Fayette, with a large body of militia, brought up the rear. A quarter of an hour before the arrival of the king, a woman was shot by a musket-ball from the opposite side of the river. The king looked pale and melancholy, and an expression of anxiety was even apparent in the faces of the National Assembly. The progress was remarkably slow, and no shout was to be heard but Vive la nation! At the Barriere des Conferences, the king was met by Bailly, who acted as mayor, with the other magistrates. M. Bailly, on presenting the keys of the city, addressed his majesty in a short speech, the exordium of which was, "These, sir, are the keys which were presented to Henry IV. He came to reconquer his people; it is our happiness to have reconquered our king." At the Pont Neuf the passage was lined by a numerous train of artillery; but, in the true spirit of French theatrical effect, the mouths and touch-holes of the cannon were adorned with bouquets of flowers. On their arrival at the Hôtel de Ville, the king confirmed the election of M. Bailly and the Marquis de la Fayette; and on receiving the complimentary addresses of the mayor, the president of electors, Count Lally Tollendal, etc., he exclaimed with an air of pathetic emotion which scarcely allowed him utterance, "My people may always rely upon my affection." He received from the hands of the mayor the national cockade; and when he showed himself at the window with this revolutionary badge, the joy of the people could no longer be restrained; the shout of Vive le roi! which had scarcely been heard in the former part of the day, filled the whole atmosphere, and resounded from one extremity of the city to the other. The return of the king to Versailles had the air of a triumph. The citizens surrounded his carriage; his countenance, which in the morning bore the aspect of melancholy, was even cheerful and smiling.

Proceedings against the Royalists.—The royal visit to Paris was the signal for the dispersion of the ministry. Marshal Broglio retired to Luxembourg; Madam Polignac, in the habit of a waiting-woman, took the route to Brussels; the Count d'Artois, with his family, withdrew during the stillness of the night, and was followed by the Princes of Condé and Conti, the Duke de Luxembourg, and others of the nobility. But of all who were connected with the court, none was more obnoxious to the populace than M. Foulon. This unfortunate person had risen from a very low situation in life to the possession of immense riches. He had been commissary to the army in the war of 1755. It was alleged against him that he made a common boast of despotic principles; that his favorite maxim was, that "that country would be best governed, where the common people should be compelled to feed upon grass;" that he had boasted, "that if ever it should be his good fortune to be minister, he would make the people live upon hay." On the first news of the riots in Paris, he had withdrawn himself from the public eye, and had caused a report of his death to be industriously circulated, and his funeral had even been performed in a manner suitable to his immense riches. In the mean time, he had secretly retired to Very, an estate belonging to M. de Sartines, where he was in hopes of remaining concealed. His own ungrateful vassals were the first to pursue and detect him; and on the 22d of July he was brought to Paris with a bundle of hay at his back, in allusion to the language which he is said to have employed in expressing his contempt for the people. The committee at the Hôtel de Ville determined to send him to the prison of the abbey of St. Germain, where he might be detained till he underwent the form of a trial; but the immense crowd which was assembled in the Place de Grève resisted the determination. It was with difficulty M. Bailly could make himself heard, when he spoke to them of the injustice of condemning a citizen to death without hearing him in his own defense. The Marquis de la Fayette took still more popular ground by urging the detention of the criminal, in the hope of obtaining from him a discovery of his accomplices. To this demand the populace appeared to assent by their tokens of applause; but the unhappy Foulon, whether in testimony of his innocence, or by a mechanical movement, clapped his hands at the same time in approbation. A general exclamation was immediately raised: "They are conniving at his guilt; they intend to save him." He was immediately seized, and dragged under the fatal lamp-iron, which, during the Revolution, the populace had employed as the instrument of their vengeance. Every circumstance of horror attended his execution; the rope by which he was suspended broke twice; and he was detained for a quarter of an hour in a half-expiring state, before a new one could be procured. His head was cut off and placed upon a pike, with the mouth stuffed with hay, and was carried through the streets of Paris. This victim of popular fury was seventy-four years of age.

M. Berthier, who had married the daughter of M. Foulon, was implicated in the fate of his father-in-law, and was odious to many of the people from his office of intendant of police. He had been seized at Compeigne, and one of the electors, with 400 horse, had been dispatched to conduct him to Paris. He was accused of peculation and extortion, of being the principal agent in regulating the movements of the camp at St. Denis, and of the still more unpopular crime of speculating in grain, and contributing to the general scarcity. Unhappily for this unfortunate gentleman, he arrived in Paris the very evening in which the populace had imbrued their hands in the blood of his relation; his death was therefore inevitable. He suffered innocently, and sustained his unhappy fate with courage and dignity. During the greater part of the way he conversed tranquilly with M. Riviere, the elector who accompanied him. When he entered the city, however, the bloody head of his father-in-law was presented to him, and at this dreadful sight he is said to have turned pale, and to have lost his fortitude. When interrogated at the Hôtel de Ville as to his conduct, he answered calmly: "That he had obeyed the orders of his superiors, and that the inspection of his papers would instruct them as to the extent of his guilt." It was determined to send him immediately to the abbey; but it was impossible to penetrate the concourse of people that surrounded the hotel. It was in vain that M. Bailly opposed his eloquence to the fury of the multitude; in vain the commander-in-chief prostrated himself on his knees to entreat that the popular cause should no more be defiled with blood. Numerous as his escort was, they were soon dispersed, and he was dragged to the fatal lamp-iron, where a new cord was already prepared for him. His despair inspired him with new courage; and snatching a bayonet out of the hands of one of the guards, he attempted to defend himself, if not from death, at least from ignominy. He fell, pierced with innumerable wounds. A monster of inhumanity, a dragoon, plunged his hands into his reeking entrails, and, tearing out his heart, and fixing it on the point of his cutlass, carried it about as a trophy through the streets. The head was also cut off, and carried about with that of M. Foulon.

The mob in this instance were superior to the crime of theft. The bodies of the Marquis de Launay and of the major of the bastille lay exposed in the Place de Grève for a number of hours, and neither their watches nor any one of their valuables were even touched by the mob; and when M. Foulon was massacred, his pockets were full of money and bank-notes, which were taken carefully out by some of the multitude, and deposited before the committee on the table of the Hôtel de Ville. It has been apologized by the popular party, that, with respect to MM. Foulon and Berthier, the people were made the blind instruments of private enmity; who probably saw no other means of concealing the atrociousness of their own conduct from public inquiry. From the windows of the Hôtel de Ville, a number of persons of superior appearance were said to have been observed exciting the populace to outrage, and appeared to be the main-springs of all their motions. But this is improbable.

This day of horror and of blood might have filled every good citizen with disgust and apprehension; and many condemned in the strongest terms these gusts of inhumanity, these bloody proscriptions, these outrages against public justice. The Marquis de la Fayette in particular, was so much exasperated by this contempt of all authority, that he determined at once to resign his office of commander-in-chief; but M. Bailly had sufficient influence to prevail with him to resume it.

The example of the capital gave the signal for revolt in all the provinces; and it was no sooner promulgated that a conspiracy had been formed against the liberties of the nation, than all the citizens became soldiers, and all the soldiers citizens.

At Rennes, the capital of Brittany, the young men took up arms about the 20th of July, seized the arsenal and the principal posts, and raised at once the standard of liberty. The Count de Langeron, who commanded there, marched out against them at the head of the regiment d'Artois and Lorraine, and the dragoons d'Orleans; but the soldiers were no sooner drawn up in order of battle than they unanimously shouted Vive la nation! Eight hundred immediately joined the popular standard, and the rest returned to their barracks, after having taken a solemn oath not to stain their hands in the blood of their fellow-citizens. In the mean time the principal people being assembled at the Hôtel de Ville, they decreed the suspension of all levies and contributions on the part of the king or the feudal lords; deputations were sent to every town in Brittany; the whole province was presently in arms to support the cause, and all declared themselves ready to march, if necessary, to the relief of the National Assembly. The commanding officer, finding all his efforts in vain, retired from the province.

At St. Malo, the younger citizens determined to form two divisions, one of horse and the other of foot, and to proceed immediately to the National Assembly. As they were without artillery, their first step was to take possession of the city fort, and that of the Château Neuf, in order to obtain a supply of arms and ammunition. The commandant reinforced each of the fortresses, but in vain; the soldiers declared they would not act, and the citizens by some stratagem got possession of the keys.

The city of Bordeaux has been always distinguished by its democratic feelings. On the present occasion, the members of the parliament enrolled themselves voluntarily in the city militia, and mounted guard along with the other inhabitants; and the governor of the castle presented the keys to a deputation of citizens. A statue of M. Neckar was elevated on a pedestal hastily erected for the purpose, and was crowned with a garland of laurel.

Among the victims cast into the prison at Bordeaux, by the revolutionists, was the celebrated naturalist Latreille. The physician of the prison was one day struck by the attentive manner in which the captive naturalist was contemplating an insect on the wall of his prison, and entering into conversation with him, he was so interested on his behalf, that he never remitted his exertions till he had succeeded in procuring his release.

An incident which occurred at Versailles caused renewed animosity. The Count d'Estaing, who commanded the national guard of Versailles, requested an additional regiment to assist him in preserving tranquillity and order at the palace; and the regiment of Flanders dragoons was accordingly ordered for this service. On the 1st of October an entertainment (the first that was ever given in public at Versailles by that body) was given by the gardes-du-corps, or king's bodyguard, to the officers of the regiment of Flanders; and to augment the unpopularity of the circumstance, it was given in the royal saloon. Several of the officers of the national guard, with others of the military, were invited. At the second course, four toasts were given: "The king, and the queen, the dauphin, and the royal family." "The nation" was proposed, but was said to have been rejected by the gardes-du-corps.

The king was just returned from hunting; and the queen, having been informed of the gayety of the scene, persuaded his majesty to accompany her with the heir-apparent to the saloon, which was now filled with soldiers—the grenadiers of Flanders and the Swiss chasseurs having been admitted to the dessert. The queen appeared with the dauphin in her arms, affectionate as she was lovely, and carried the royal infant through the saloon, amid the acclamations and murmurs of the spectators. Fired with enthusiasm the soldiers drank the health of the king, the queen, and the dauphin, with their swords drawn; and the royal guests bowed respectfully, and retired.

The entertainment, which had hitherto been conducted with some degree of order, now became a scene of entire confusion. Nothing was omitted to inflame the passions of the military. The music played the favorite air, "O Richard, O my king, the world abandons thee;" the ladies of the court distributed white cockades, the royal ensign; and some of the national guard were said to have accepted them. In the height of this political banquet, it was affirmed, probably with little truth, that many expressions of marked disrespect toward the Assembly and the nation escaped from the officers of the gardes-du-corps, and others of the military. This however might easily have happened in such circumstances, without the least premeditation or evil design.

During these transactions the city of Paris was afflicted with all the evils of famine. Either no bread was to be obtained, or bread of so bad a quality that the populace, always mistrustful and suspicious, were not without their alarms of a criminal design upon the lives, or at least the health of the inhabitants. Such was the state of things when the news arrived of the banquet at Versailles. The circumstances which we have related were strangely magnified, and all the suspicions which were entertained respecting the design of dissolving the Assembly, and carrying off the sovereign, were added in exaggeration. At the same time the mutual resentment of the contending parties augmented; and the minority were exposed to every insult. White and black cockades were worn as signals of defiance. They were torn out of the hats of the wearers by the mob; but such was the enthusiasm of one of the royalists, that he is said to have picked up from the ground this relic of loyalty, and to have kissed it respectfully, and attempted to replace it in his hat. Some measures were taken by the three hundred directors of the municipality to prevent the spreading of the insurrection—in vain!

Early on the morning of the memorable 5th of October, a woman sallied out from the quarter of St. Eustacia, and entering the corps-du-garde, and seizing a drum, paraded the adjacent streets beating an alarm, and exciting the people by clamors respecting the scarcity of bread. She was soon joined by a numerous mob, chiefly of women, and repaired immediately to the Hôtel de Ville. A few of the committee of the commune, and M. Gouvion, at the head of the national guard, endeavored to prevent their entrance; but the soldiers, swayed either by gallantry, humanity, or disaffection, gave way, and permitted them to pass. Some of the women, who, by their air and manner appeared of a superior class, entered with good humor into a conversation with the committee, and pleaded eloquently the cause of their companions, who, under various circumstances of misery, came to ask for relief. But the greater number, both by their appearance and their conduct, showed that they were collected from the lowest ranks of indigence and depravity. With horrid imprecations they demanded bread and arms; they exclaimed with violence against the pusillanimity of the men, and threatened the lives of the whole committee, and particularly of M. Bailly and the Marquis de la Fayette. Others penetrated the magazine of arms; and a third troop ascended the belfry, where they attempted to strangle the Abbé Lefevre. In one of the halls two furies endeavored to set fire to the public papers, but were happily prevented by Stanislaus Maillard, who had rendered himself so famous at the taking of the bastille. Finding all endeavors to resist the fury of the mob in vain, he employed a new stratagem to preserve them. He applied to the commanding officer for his authority; and having obtained it, he proceeded down the stairs of the Hôtel de Ville, which were filled with women, and seizing a drum which lay at the door, he offered to put himself at the head of the insurgents, the universal clamor of whom was to proceed to Versailles. By a unanimous shout of applause Maillard was chosen captain of this turbulent troop; and by his authority the assembly was adjourned to the Champs Elysées. When arrived at this general rendezvous their number amounted to upward of 8,000; and their first measure was to surround their chief, and to insist upon his leading them to the arsenal to equip themselves completely with arms. He had still authority enough to make himself heard, and to convince them that the arms had been removed from the arsenal; and he had even sufficient address to engage them to lay aside the weapons with which they had provided themselves, by representing to them, that since their object was to supplicate the Assembly for justice and for bread, they would operate more forcibly on the compassion of that body, by appearing as distressed petitioners, than with arms in their hands. They departed for Versailles about noon, preceded by a company of armed men, and guarded in the rear by the volunteers of the bastille, whom Maillard had prepared for that purpose.

The fanaticism of the moment was communicated to the grenadiers. They not only declared, "that they could not turn their bayonets against the poor women who came to ask for bread," but intimated an inclination themselves to proceed to Versailles. Their spokesman declaimed loudly against the committee of subsistence, against the gardes-du-corps, and concluded, "that the people were miserable, and the source of the evil was at Versailles; that they must go and find out the king, and bring him to Paris." While the Marquis de la Fayette reasoned, insisted, threatened, the tumult increased from all quarters; an immense crowd, armed with sticks, pikes, guns, etc., rushed from the suburbs; and though the national guard appeared not in the most tractable disposition, the mayor and the municipality probably conceived it to be the only means of preventing mischief at Versailles, to permit their departure with their commander at their head. The Marquis, therefore, received an order to depart for Versailles, and it was most cheerfully obeyed by the national guard.

The representatives of the nation, the majority of whom, at least, were totally unconscious of what was passing in Paris, were assembled on the 5th, in expectation of receiving back the constitutional articles sanctioned by the king. M. Mounier was then president. The sitting opened with reading a letter from the king, in which he pleaded "the difficulty of judging partially of the constitution;" adding, however, that in the confidence that the new articles were calculated to establish the happiness and prosperity of the kingdom, he accepted them; but with one positive condition, that from the spirit of the whole system the executive power should have its entire effect in the hands of the monarch. He concluded with observing, that though these constitutional articles did not at all indiscriminately present him with the idea of perfection, yet he thought it proper to pay his respect to the wish of the Assembly, and to the alarming circumstances which so strongly pressed him to desire the re-establishment of peace, order, and confidence.

This letter by no means proved acceptable to the Assembly; the democratic members strongly denounced this provisional assent, which only seemed to be given in consequence of the alarming circumstances of the nation. In the course of the debate many allusions were made to the festival of the military at Versailles on the preceding week. The reported insults offered to the nation and the national cockade were dwelt upon, as well as the menaces of the soldiery. A motion was at length made, that the guilty persons on that occasion should be delivered up to the rigor of the law, and that the accusations which had been now insinuated should be formed into a criminal process. At these words the Count de Mirabeau rose. "I begin," said he, "by declaring that I consider the motion as supremely impolitic; nevertheless, if it is persisted in, I am ready to produce the details, and to sign them with my own hand. But this Assembly must first declare that the person of the king alone is sacred, and that all other individuals, whatever their station, are equally subjects, and responsible to the laws." The president and the Assembly prevailed over both parties. The motion was withdrawn, and it was decreed, that the president should wait on the king to request a simple acceptance of the constitutional articles. The Assembly was frequently alarmed, during the course of this discussion, by repeated intelligence that all Paris was advancing to Versailles. Maillard conducted his tumultuous troop with considerable address. When he came within sight of Versailles he arranged them in three ranks; and admonished them, that as they were entering a place where they were not expected, they must be careful, by the cheerfulness of their appearance and the regularity of their conduct, to excite no alarm in the inhabitants. When arrived at the gate of the National Assembly, Maillard undertook to speak for them. He entered attended by fifteen of the women, and persuaded the rest to wait for his return at the gate. His address had two objects: "to entreat that the Assembly would devise some method of relieving the dreadful scarcity of bread which prevailed at Paris, and which he said had been occasioned by the interception of convoys, and by the monopolists; and to solicit that the gardes-du-corps might be ordered to assume the national cockade." He had scarcely finished, when a national cockade was presented to him on the part of the gardes-du-corps, as a proof that they had already adopted it. Maillard showed it to the women, who immediately answered by loud acclammations of Vive le roi, et MM. les gardes-du-corps! A deputation was immediately appointed to wait on the king with this intelligence.

The king had gone that morning to take the diversion of shooting in the woods of Meudon; and in the midst of his sport intelligence was brought, "that a most formidable band of women were on their way from Paris, exclaiming for bread." "Alas!" answered the king, "if I had it I should not wait to be asked." On his return, as soon as he mounted his horse, a chevalier of St. Louis fell upon his knees and beseeched his majesty not to be afraid. "I never was afraid in my life," returned the king.

On his arrival at Versailles, he found the gardes-du-corps and the national guard under arms, and the palace surrounded by a mob. With the deputation from the Assembly five of the women were introduced to his majesty, who, on hearing of the distresses of the metropolis, was extremely moved, and the women sympathized in the feelings of the monarch. Louisa Chabry, a young woman who was employed in some of the branches of sculpture, and was only seventeen years of age, fainted. When she recovered she desired leave to kiss the king's hand, who embraced her, and dismissed her with an elegant compliment. The women without doors could scarcely believe the report of those who had been admitted. In the mean time the king signed an order for bringing corn from Senlis and de Lagni, and for removing every obstacle which impeded the supply of Paris. This order was reported to the women, and they retired with acclamations of gratitude and joy.

This band of Amazons was no sooner dispersed than it was succeeded by another, headed by M. Brunout, a soldier of the Parisian guard, whom they had compelled to assume the office of their leader. It is uncertain upon what provocation M. Savonieres, a lieutenant in the gardes-du-corps, and two other officers, imprudently singled out Brunout from his company, and chased him along the ranks with their drawn sabers. The unhappy man was upon the point of being cut to pieces with their sabers, when one of the national guard of Versailles fired upon M. Savonieres, and broke his arm, and by that means saved the life of Brunout: and this incident is said to have greatly increased that antipathy which the populace afterward manifested by atrocious acts of cruelty to the gardes-du-corps.

Whether there was indeed a concerted plan to carry off the king to Metz, or whether the court was really terrified by the accident which we have recounted, it is impossible to determine; but the king's carriages were ordered to the gate of the castle which communicates with the orangery. The national guard of Versailles however, who occupied the post, refused to permit them to pass; and the king himself was resolute in his determination to stay, declaring, "that he would rather perish, than that the blood of the people should be spilled in his quarrel."

The Assembly continued sitting; but the session was tumultuous, and interrupted by the shouts and harangues of the Parisian fish-women, who filled the galleries. A letter, however, from the king was read, deploring the scarcity of provisions, and recommending that effectual means might be taken to remedy that calamity; and in a little time after M. Mounier entered with the pure and simple assent of the king to the constitutional articles. The Assembly was then adjourned; but the applause which was bestowed on its proceedings was mingled with affecting murmurs and complaints, the multitude crying out that they were actually starving, and that the majority of them had eaten nothing for upward of twenty-four hours. The president therefore ordered that provisions should be sought for in every part of the town, and the hall of the Assembly was the scene of a miserable, scanty, and tumultuous banquet. Indeed, such was the dreadful famine, that the horse of one of the gardes-du-corps being killed in a tumult, he was immediately roasted, and greedily devoured by the mob. Previous to the adjournment of the assembly, Maillard and a number of women set off in carriages, provided by the king, for Paris, carrying with them the king's letter, and the resolves of the National Assembly, in the hopes of restoring peace to the metropolis.

Darkness and a deluge of rain added to the horrors of the night. The wretched multitudes who had traveled from Paris were exposed, almost famished, to the inclemences of the weather in the open streets: within the castle all was trepidation; nothing was to be heard from without but imprecations, and the voice of enraged multitudes demanding the lives of the queen and of the gardes-du-corps. Toward midnight, however, all appeared tolerably still and peaceable, when the beating of the drums, and the light of innumerable torches, announced the approach of the Parisian army. The Marquis de la Fayette, on his arrival, repaired to the royal closet, and informed the king of the whole proceedings of the day; a part of the national guards were distributed in posts agreeably to the orders of his majesty; the rest were entertained by the inhabitants of Versailles, or retired to lodge in the churches and public edifices, for the remainder of the night; and tranquillity appeared once more perfectly restored.

The troops of vagabonds who had accompanied Maillard, or who had followed the Parisian militia, were chiefly disposed of in the hall of the Assembly, and in the great corps-de-garde; and at about five in the morning the Marquis de la Fayette, after having visited all the posts, and found every thing perfectly quiet, retired to his chamber to write to the municipality of Paris, and perhaps in the hope of snatching a few hours' repose.

The day began to break at about half-past five; and at this period, crowds of women and other desperate persons, breathing vengeance and thirsting for blood advanced to the castle, which, in the fatal security that the arrival of the Parisian militia inspired, was left unguarded in several places. Some of the iron gates were shut, and some left open. An immense crowd found its way into the cour des ministres, and immediately proceeded to the royal gate, which was shut, and a number of the invaders attempted to scale it. Another troop of ruffians proceeded to the chapel court and another to that of the princes, and by both these avenues penetrated into the royal court. Some dispositions of defense were made by a M. Agues-seau; the gardes-du-corps were soon under arms, and one man was wounded by them in the arm, and another shot dead. The crowd immediately mounted the grand staircase where one of the gardes-du-corps, M. Miomandre, endeavored to dissuade them from their attempt, but he narrowly escaped with his life. M. Tardivet du Repaire hasted to the queen's apartment, in order to prevent the entrance of the banditti; but he was assailed by thousands, and felled to the ground. A villain with a pike attempted to pierce him to the heart, but he had the good fortune to wrest the weapon from his hand, with which he parried the attacks of his enemies, and at length effected his escape. M. Miomandre, in the mean time, made his way to the queen's apartment. He opened the door, and cried out to a lady whom he saw in the inner chamber—"Save the queen, madam her life is in danger; I am here alone against 2,000 tigers." He shut the door, and after a few minutes' resistance was desperately wounded with a pike, and left for dead, though he afterward recovered.

The queen had been awakened a quarter of an hour before, by the clamors of the women who assembled upon the terrace, but her waiting-woman had satisfied her by saying, "that they were only the women of Paris, who, she supposed, not being able to find a lodging, were walking about." But the tumult approaching, and becoming apparently more serious, she rose, dressed herself in haste, and ran to the king's apartment by a private passage. In her way she heard the noise of a pistol and a musket, which redoubled her terror. "My friends," said she to every person she met, "save me and my children." In the king's chamber she found the dauphin, who had been brought there by one of her women, but the king was gone. Awakened by the tumult, he had seen from the window the multitude pressing toward the great stair-case; and, alarmed for the queen, he hastened to her apartment, and entered at one door in the moment she had quitted it by the other. He returned without loss of time, and having, with the queen, brought the princess royal into the chamber, prepared to face the multitude.

In the mean time the noise and tumult increased, and appeared at the very door of the chamber. Nothing was to be heard but the most dreadful exclamations, with violent and repeated blows against the outer door, a pannel of which was broken. Nothing but instant death was expected by the royal company. Suddenly, however, the tumult seemed to cease—every thing was quite, and a moment after a gentle rap was heard at the door. It was opened, and in an instant the apartments were filled with the Parisian guard. The officer who conducted them ordered them to ground their arms. "We come," said he, "to save the king;" and turning to such of the gardes-du-corps as were in the apartment—"We will save you also, gentlemen; let us from this moment be united."

Unfortunately the national guard arrived too late to prevent all the mischief. Two of the gardes-du-corps were murdered by the mob before the troops could be rallied, and their heads, fixed on spikes, served as the standards of this detestable banditti. From the first moment of the alarm the Marquis de la Fayette had even exceeded his usual activity. He appeared in every quarter:—"Gentlemen," said he to the Parisian soldiers, "I have pledged my word and honor to the king that nothing belonging to him shall receive injury. If I break my word, I shall be no longer worthy to be your commander." Captain Gondran, the officer who had driven the ruffians from the king's apartment, was not less conspicuous for his activity. The Parisians forced their way in every part through the almost impenetrable mass—surrounded the gardes-du-corps, and placed them in safety under their own colors.

Plunder is however commonly one great object of a mob. The banditti had already begun to strip the palace, and to throw the furniture to each other out of the windows. M. Gondran pursued them from place to place, till the castle was at length completely cleared. Expelled from the palace, they repaired to the stables; but here a sudden stop was put to their depredations by M. Doazon, a farmer-general, and captain of the Paris militia. The horses were all recovered, and brought back in safety to their stalls. Disappointed at length in every view, they departed in a body to Paris; and left Versailles entirely free, and under the protection of the national guard. The most generous expressions of kindness and gratitude took place between the gardes-du-corps and the national guard. The former considered the others as their deliverers; while the latter evinced every inclination that they should in future form one united corps.

The royal family now ventured to show themselves at a balcony, and received the most lively acclamations of respect from the soldiers and the people. But whether it had been planned by the popular party, or whether it was the immediate impulse of the multitude—though the former is most probable, at the first a single voice, or a few voices, exclaimed, "The king to Paris!" and this was instantly followed by a universal acclamation enforcing the same demand. After some consultation with the Marquis de la Fayette, the king addressed them:—"You wish me to go to Paris—I will go, on the condition that I am to be accompanied by my wife and children." he was answered by reiterated acclamation of Vive le roi!

Before the departure of the king, the National Assembly was convened; and, on the motion of M. Mirabeau, passed a solemn decree, "that the Assembly was inseparable from the person of the king." A deputation of 100 members was also appointed to accompany the king to Paris. During the preparations for the journey the gardes-du-corps changed hats and swords with the grenadiers and national guards, and both they and the regiment of Flanders desired leave to mix indiscriminately in the ranks. It was two o'clock in the afternoon before the procession set out. During the progress all was gayety and joy among the soldiers and the spectators; and such was the respect in which many of the French nation still held the name and person of their king, that the multitude were superstitiously persuaded that the royal presence would actually put an end to the famine. On his arrival, the king was congratulated by the municipality, and declared his approbation of the loyalty which the city of Paris manifested. On this occasion he gave one proof, among several others which he had before given, that however he might be wrought upon by misrepresentation and evil counsels, his character was in general neither deficient in good sense nor firmness. As they ascended the stairs of the Hôtel de Ville, the Marquis de la Fayette requested the king that he would either assure the people himself, or permit some other person to assure them in his name, that he would fix his abode in Paris. "I feel no objection," replied the monarch, "to fix my abode in my good city of Paris: but I have not yet formed any determination on the subject; and I will make no promise which I do not positively mean to fulfill."

Trial of the King.—The republic, in its career of change and blood, had at length a most important matter to consider—How the dethroned king was to be disposed of! The proceedings which terminated in the trial and death of the unfortunate Louis for a time diverted the attention of the two great rival factions, the Mountain and Girondists, who were engaged in a struggle, which daily became more implacable. The moderate party wished to save the life of the dethroned sovereign, and this was a sufficient reason for their opponents being bent on his destruction. A committee was appointed to investigate his conduct, and a variety of charges having been brought forward, the Convention resolved to constitute itself at once prosecutor and judge. The report was brought up, exhibiting a loathsome tissue of confusion and falsehood. All acts that had been done by the ministers in every department, which could be twisted into such a shape as the times called criminal, were charged as deeds for which the sovereign was himself responsible; and the burden of the whole was to accuse the king, when he had scarcely a single regiment of guards, even at his nominal disposal, of nourishing the intention of massacring the Convention, defended by 30,000 national guards, besides the federates, and the militia of the suburbs. Of this report the Convention seemed almost ashamed, and would scarcely permit it to be printed. So soon as it appeared, two or three persons who were mentioned in it as accomplices of particulars charged against the king, contradicted the report upon their oath.

On the 11th of December, the ill-fated monarch was ordered to the bar of the Convention, and when the act of accusation had been read, Barriere, the president, summoned him to give separate answers to the several questions. These consisted of an enumeration of the whole crimes of the Revolution, from its commencement in 1789, all of which were imputed to him.

Valaze, who sat near the bar, presented and read some papers, asserted to contain plans of a counter-revolution, which the king disowned; also a number of other papers, which the king also disowned. His enemies admitted that Louis's answers were brief, firm, and judicious; his presence of mind being unshaken, in most cases dictated satisfactory replies to the accusations. The affair of Nancy, the journey to Varennes, the suppression of the revolt in the Champ de Mars, were justified by the decrees of the Assembly; and the catastrophe of the 10th of March, by the power of self-defense conferred on him by the laws. To every question, in fact, he replied with clearness and precision; denying some, showing that the matters referred to in others were the work of his ministers, and justifying all that had been done by the powers conferred on him by the constitution. In a loud voice he repelled the charge of shedding the blood of the people on the 10th of August, exclaiming, "No, sir, it was not I who did it." But he was careful in his answers not to implicate any members of the Constituent and Legislative Assemblies; and many who now sat as his judges, trembled lest he should compromise them with the dominant faction. The deep impression made on the Convention by the simple statements, and temperate but firm demeanor of the monarch, struck the Jacobins with such dismay, that the most violent of the party proposed that he should be hanged that very night. But the majority, composed of the Girondists, and the Neutrals, decided that he should be formally tried and defended by counsel. He then returned to the Temple, where the resolution of the municipality, that he was no longer to be permitted to see his family, was communicated to him; in other words, that a consolation which is never withheld from the most atrocious criminals, was denied him. Next day, however, the Convention, less inhuman than the commune, decreed that the unfortunate father might enjoy the society of his children; but the king, thinking them more necessary to the queen's comfort than his own, declined to take them from her, and after a struggle with feelings which even demons might have respected, he submitted to the separation with a resignation which nothing could shake.

In pursuance of the resolution of the majority of the municipality, the king chose as his counsel Trouchet and Target. The former accepted the office, but the latter declined the dangerous task. But Malesherbes, though eighty years of age, and oppressed with infirmities, in spite of personal risk, offered his services, which the king gratefully accepted. The old man had been twice nominated by the king, in the day of his prosperity, to be a member of his counsel, and he now magnanimously claimed a right to a similar office when it was attended with danger. De Lege, another lawyer of genius, was permitted to add his name to those of the king's counsel, from whom he was doomed to experience no effectual aid. Nor, indeed, did he expect it; and therefore he prepared to meet his approaching fate.

When the king returned, his faithful valet, Cleret, alone was suffered to approach him. Louis directed his counsel to abstain from all appeals to the passions, and restrict themselves to deductions from the evidence. The king was again conveyed to the Convention on the following morning. De Lege was permitted to read without interruption his defense, which was an able appeal to justice as a private citizen, and to his rights as a constitutional sovereign, while it was denied that he could have intended to direct his small force against the liberties of his country. When he had finished, Louis added a few words, expressive of his conviction that he now addressed the members for the last time, and solemnly avowed that he had the witness of conscience to his innocence. The king was removed: a long and fierce debate ensued, on Manuel's motion for three days' adjournment, that the king's defense might be printed, and sent to the departments. The Jacobins expelled Manuel, and insisted that judgment should be pronounced that day. Vergniaut ably pleaded that the king's fate should be decided by the people. He denounced the Jacobins as having caused the preceding bloodshed, and prophesied the horrors that would ensue from their rule. His voice was disregarded; and a final appeal was demanded, while the fierce emissaries of the Jacobins surrounded the hall, and terrified the members with threats of vengeance if they did not pronounce sentence of death; they swore, that if Louis was acquitted, they would go to the Temple, and murder the royal family, and all who favored them. Their earnestness was unquestionable; the votes were instanly taken; but amid the utterance of the fatal sentence, every eye was fixed upon the recreant Duke of Orleans, and when he pronounced the word "Death," even that assembly seemed shocked. A majority of fifty-three decreed the king's execution.

All the late histories of the French Revolution, and most of the memoirs of the time, contain a sufficiency of details on the horrible excesses of the 10th of August, 1792, which overthrew the French monarchy. The attack of the ferocious mob on the Tuilleries—the massacre of the Swiss guards, and of the male inmates of the palace, and the dangers of the royal family, have all been described with a minuteness and truth which make us shudder. But something still was wanting to complete the appalling picture. None of the memoirs of that period, with the exception of a short passage in Madam Campane, describe the state of the Tuilleries on the night after the massacre. The following sketch, written by an eye-witness, and communicated to the author of the Esquisses Historiques de la Revolution Française, in the 8th number of which it was published, will supply the deficiency:

I was one of the secretaries of the section of the Theater Français. About eleven o'clock at night the members of the board, feeling alarm respecting the state of Paris, ordered me to repair to the corps-de-garde of the section, and to request the commandant of the station to send out a patrol, with instructions to examine principally the quarter of the Tuilleries, to range myself in that patrol, and to return with a report of what I should observe. I went accordingly to the corps-de-garde. I procured the formation of a patrol of fifty men. I armed myself with a pike, and away we proceeded. Having arrived at the extremity of the Pont Neuf, we met another patrol as numerous as our own; we joined it, and then followed the quay as far as the arches called Guichet de Marigny, without meeting any thing remarkable. On our reaching the Place de Carrousel we were struck with a horrid spectacle. It was now near midnight. On our right we perceived on different points of the place, four or five mounds, each about twenty feet high, composed of dead bodies entirely naked. In the center of the square (place) was an immense blazing fire, standing round which we remarked three or four men, who appeared to be unmoved and insensible in the midst of the numerous and deplorable effects of carnage. At our right a long building (occupying the place where the railing now is), composed of a ground-floor and an upper story, which served as a barrack to the Swiss guard, was a prey to the flames. Over this scene of conflagration and dead bodies, there reigned a profound silence, which was only disturbed by the noise of our slow march, and the crackling of the planks and beams, which detaching themselves from the walls, fell into the building, and each fall caused torrents of flames to issue from the windows. The two patrols having united to proceed to the court of the Tuilleries, passed by the door of this burning lodge with a rapidity which the danger of the fire inspired.

Having arrived in the court, we were obliged to make a long halt, because some guards, recently placed in the palace, opposed the entrance of our double patrol. This halt gave us time to observe the frightful scenes which surrounded us. The light of the great fire, blazing in the midst of the court, together with that of the burning buildings, discovered to us an overwhelming picture. On one side were dead bodies collected into masses; on the other, dead bodies scattered over the pavement, mixed with human forms still animated, but asleep from intoxication. We could only distinguish the dead from the living by the clothes with which the latter were covered. In the fire we saw bodies half consumed, and the stench which proceeded from this combustion of human flesh, added to the horrer which the other parts of the spectacle excited. In turning our eyes toward the château, we saw through the vestibule in the garden, flitting lights similar to those igneous meteors which dance at night about marshy ground in the heats of the summer. While stationed in the court, our imagination busied itself in painful and fruitless efforts to discover the cause of this phenomenon. A superstitious mind, placed in this abode of the dead, and in the midst of the devouring flames, would have taken those flitting gleams for spirits endeavoring to unite themselves to the bodies from which they had been so lately separated. When we were allowed to pass into the vestibule, our impatient curiosity was gratified, and to vague conjectures succeeded a frightful reality. The wandering fires were lighted torches which we perceived in the darkness, without perceiving the persons who carried them. These persons, who were denied admission into the palace by the guard, were still making vain attempts to get into the vestibule. The double action of the parties produced the agitation of the lights. The torches of these men were intended to enable them to penetrate into obscure places for the purpose of pillage. In passing through the vestibule into the garden, we found that the space on both sides of the great staircase was filled with dead bodies, stripped entirely naked. We ascended to the rooms on the outer side of the chapel, and entered the chapel, where the most horrid sacrilege had been committed. The aisle was literally choked full with the dead and dying. We hastily descended, and returned at three in the morning to the section of the Theater Français, and after a few hours' rest awoke to see not only Paris, but the whole of France in a much more deplorable condition, for Robespierre had gained the ascendancy in power.

Reign of Terror.—From general details, the great outline of the calamitous state of France, at the period in question, may be collected; but more minute particulars are requisite to understand clearly the portion of suffering which fell to the lot of every family and often of every individual in it. "A sketch of the situation of one family with whom I was particularly acquainted at Marseilles," says a writer of the period, "shall be given as a specimen by which that of most others may fairly be judged.

"It consisted of the father, the mother, and four children, two sons and two daughters, all grown up. The father and the eldest son were in the law, the youngest son was what is called at Marseilles a Courtier de Commerce, that is, an agent for negotiating commercial transactions. The eldest son was the first who was involved in the revolutionary troubles; he had been a member of one of the sections, and was enrolled among the proscribed, at the time when most of those who had belonged to the sections fell under proscription. For several months did he remain concealed in his father's house by means of a place contrived for the purpose, in a room at the very top of it. In the day-time he generally sat in the room; but as the domiciliary visits were more frequently made by night than by day, his bed was, for greater security, made up in his place of asylum; hither he could, at any time, retreat in a moment, upon a signal agreed on being made below, and shut himself up within; and the door was so well contrived, that any one searching the room ever so accurately, unless previously acquainted with the secret, was not likely to discover it.

"As a suspicion was always entertained that he was in the house, frequent domiciliary visits were made to search for him, but he fortunately escaped them all. His eldest sister, between whom and himself a particular affection had always subsisted, and who entertained in consequence a double share of anxiety for his safety, was the person on whom he principally relied for giving him timely notice to conceal himself in time of alarm; and she has many times passed the whole night at the window, to watch whether any one approached the house, afraid to lie down, lest, exhausted by fatigue, sleep should overtake her, and her brother be surprised unawares.

"In this situation he continued for seven months, the family all that time not daring to attempt removing him, as they well knew that a constant watch was kept upon the house. But the vigilance of the revolutionists beginning at length to abate, wearied with the many fruitless searches they had made, an opportunity was taken to convey him by night on board a Genoese vessel, the owner of which had agreed to carry him to Leghorn. He was covered over with a heap of cords, sacks, and rubbish of different kinds, and as soon as the entrance of the port was open in the morning, the vessel was put in motion. But at this very moment, when it was hoped all danger was over, a party of the national guards appeared, and calling on the mariners to stop, came on board to visit her. They asked a thousand questions of the master, and even kicked some of the cords about, but fortunately without discovering what they concealed; at length departing, they left the vessel to pursue its course, and the fugitive was finally landed in safety at the place of his destination. To provide the means of satisfying the exorbitant demands of the Genoese captain, the two sisters made a sacrifice of many little objects of value which they possessed in personal ornaments.

"The youngest son, whose name was equally on the list of the proscribed, saved himself by escaping to Paris, where, lost among the crowd, he remained unknown and unregarded till the death of Robespierre. He then returned to Marseilles, and resumed his former occupation.

"Very soon after the eldest son's departure, the father was menaced with imprisonment, perhaps with death, as having two sons in emigration; on which the youngest daughter presented herself before the municipality, entreating that her father might be suffered to remain at liberty, and offering herself as a hostage that he would commit no act contrary to the interests of the republic. Her offer of becoming a prisoner was accepted, and she was conveyed to the convent of Ignorantins, which was set apart for confining the women who were arrested, and where 800 were then immured. But though she was detained, her father was not left at large; he was arrested a few days after, and sent with a number of proscribed to confinement in another convent. The prison of the father was at a different end of the town from that of the daughter, and both were equally removed from their own house. During eight months that elapsed from this period, to the conclusion of the reign of terror, the eldest daughter's daily occupation was to visit her father and sister in their respective prisons, which she was permitted to do, being always searched at her entrance, lest she should convey any thing which might assist their escape. Her anxiety for her sister's life was not very great, as few women were led to the scaffold; but she daily entered the prison of her father uncertain whether she might still find him, or whether he might not have been among the number who were daily immolated. While at home, her sole occupation was to endeavor to soothe and console her mother. How miserable, how painful, was such a state of existence! And yet, painful as it was, this family was ultimately among the number of the fortunate, since no member of it was cut off."

A.D. 1814.—When Napoleon opened the campaign on the 25th of January, he confided the command of the capital to his brother Joseph. His enemies were numerous and powerful. The English advanced on the south; 150,000 men, under Schwartzenberg, poured into France by way of Switzerland; a large army of Prussians, commanded by Blucher, arrived from Frankfort; and 100,000 Swedes and Germans penetrated into Belgium, under Bernadotte. Here was work cut out for even the genius of a Hannibal; and Bonaparte seemed to be duly roused by the perils which surrounded him. He redoubled his activity and energy, and never had his strategic calculations been more skilful. He was near destroying the two most formidable armies of his enemies by isolating them, and attacking them by turns. Wherever he did not command in person the allies triumphed; the English entered Bordeaux, which declared for the Bourbons; the Austrians occupied Lyons; and the united armies marched toward Paris.

Joseph received orders to defend Paris to the last extremity; the emperor depended upon him, and conceived the almost wildly brave project of cutting off the retreat of the allies, by marching rapidly behind them to St. Dizier. By this march he lost precious time; but by it, if he had been seconded, Napoleon might have saved his crown. The two grand armies of the allies had effected their junction, and drew near to the capital. To secure the success of the emperor's manœuvers, it ought to have been defended till his arrival; but timid counselors surrounded the regent, Maria Louisa, and persuaded her to retire to the Loire. In vain Talleyrand and Montalivet expressed a courageous opinion, and represented to the empress that the safety of France was in Paris: fear alone was listened to; Maria Louisa quitted the capital, and transported the regency to Blois. In the mean time Napoleon approached Paris by forced marches; but it was no longer time; Marshals Marmont and Mortier, on the 30th of March, fought a desperate battle under the walls of the city with forces very inferior to the allies'. Ignorant of the emperor's proximity, Joseph gave orders for a capitulation; he abandoned his post, and set out for Orleans. On the 31st of March, the allies entered Paris. Napoleon was hastening to the defense of his capital, when, on the 1st of April, he received this terrible news; he immediately fell back upon Fontainebleau, where his army took up a position. There he learned that the senate, guided by Talleyrand, declared Napoleon deposed from the throne, the hereditary right of his family abolished, and the French people and the army liberated from their oath of fidelity to him.

The victory of Paris cost the allies 9,000 men; the French lost 4,000 besides the prisoners and 109 cannon.

A.D. 1815.—When, after a series of the grossest blunders on the part of the Bourbons, Napoleon returned from Elba in 1815, and lost the battle of Waterloo, Davoust received the command of about 60,000 men for the defense of Paris. The city was difficult of access from the north and east, because the villages and heights were fortified, and well supplied with artillery. The Prussians, therefore crossed the Seine to attack Paris from Versailles, while the English remained in front of the fortified heights and villages. On this side the city is weakest, and might also be forced to surrender by intercepting supplies of provisions which came from Normandy. On the 30th of June the Prussians under Zeithen marched through Versailles, and after a short conflict succeeded in establishing themselves on the heights of Meudon, and in the village of Issy. A council of war held in Paris, almost unanimously determined that Paris was untenable; but in order to make a last attempt, Vandamme advanced on the morning of the 3d of July with 10,000 men, and attacked the Prussians in Issy; but after several hours' fighting they were repulsed with the loss of 1,000 men. A bridge was begun to be erected at Argenteuil to establish the communication between the British and Prussian armies, and an English corps moved to the left bank of the Seine by the bridge Neuilly. Upon this the surrender of Paris was resolved on. The capitulation was conducted at St. Cloud, the same day. It was stipulated that the French army should, on the following day, commence the evacuation of the capital, with their arms, artillery, caissons and whole personal property; that within eight days, they should be entirely established to the south of the Loire; Montmartre was to be surrendered, July 5th, and all the barriers on the 6th. July 7th the Prussian army entered the barrier of the military school, and part of the English that of St. Denis. On the 8th, Louis XVIII., who had followed in the rear of the English army from Ghent, made his public entrance, escorted by the National Guard. The star of Napoleon had paled before the fortunate sun of the Bourbons. The battle of Waterloo had destroyed an emperor and elevated a king; the one was doomed to lonely exile on a rock-bound island; the other ascended the throne of one of the most magnificent kingdoms of Europe.

Revolution of July, A.D. 1830. — The several causes which led to this revolution, and to the consequent dethronement of Charles X., having been so ably treated by celebrated French and English historians, and besides it being impossible in the limits of a work like the present to enter into these details, we will content ourselves with merely glancing at one or two of the immediate causes.

The Chamber of Deputies was convened by the king on the 2d of March, 1830; in the usual address to the throne, the ministers headed by the Prince Polignac, counseled his majesty to adopt vigorous measures, to coerce the liberty, or rather the licentiousness of the press, and, with other important changes, so to alter the constitution of the Chambers, that the liberal element might not be so predominant. They were defeated in this address by a majority of forty, and on the 19th the king prorogued the session to the 1st September, intending in the mean time to dissolve the present Chamber. This measure excited great consternation among the liberal members, and the journals in their interest proceeded to attack the king and his ministers with the coarsest vituperations it was possible to conceive of. This was followed by the arrest and conviction of several leading journalists, and as the people espoused their cause, this only served to fan the flame of the popular discontent. On the 16th of May the king, with the advice of his ministers, issued a decree dissolving the Chambers, and appointing the time for the elections to be held.

After the elections had commenced the ministers gave up all hope of a majority in the new Chamber. The report, industriously circulated, that the king had in contemplation a coup d'état, tended greatly to swell the majorities of the Liberal party.

On the 25th July the king, by the advice of Prince Polignac and his colleagues, signed the famous "ordinances," which may be said to have been the immediate cause of the revolution which followed. The first of these ordinances destroyed the liberty of the press by prohibiting the publication of any journal or small pamphlet, without a license from the government, which might at any time be recalled. The second dissolved the new Chamber of Deputies on the ground that the intentions of the ministers were unfairly represented to the people; and the third entirely changed the principle of the representation of the people, and established the Chamber upon a different basis. There were several others, all affecting, either directly or indirectly, the rights of the people. The populace of Paris were thunderstruck at such an assumption of "doubtful powers" by the man who had sworn to maintain inviolate the charter by which his brother had ascended the throne; and a large body of men, representing the literature, talent, and wealth of France, openly denounced the measures, which, they maintained, were a breach of the letter and spirit of the charter which Louis XVIII. had given to them. During the 26th there was no attempt at insurrection made; but there was an ominous appearance in the groups of men who assembled at the cafés and club-houses, discussing in an animated voice the events of the last two days, and it was clear to those who had passed through the stormy days of 1789 that an outbreak of the people was at hand. Nor were they disappointed in their calculations; for on the next day (the 27th) matters were brought to a crisis. The opposition journals appeared without any license from government, and having in their columns the protest of some of the leading men of Paris, against the coup d'état of the ministers. This open defiance of the king was immediately followed by an order to seize the journals and close the printing-offices, which was effected with much difficulty by the gens-d'armes and police.

Marshal Marmont had been appointed by the king, commander of the garrison of Paris, and he had entered on his duties on the morning of the 27th; but he found, to his astonishment, that he had only 11,500 men under his command, with twelve pieces of artillery, and six rounds of grape-shot to each gun. Of this small force only the guards, 4,600 strong, could be relied on in a conflict with the people. The king and his ministers reposed in fancied security at St. Cloud, and to Marmont was committed the more than herculean task of defending the city of Paris against an insurrection of the people, smarting under imaginary or real wrongs, and determined to redress their own grievances. The national guard, 40,000 strong, had been disbanded some time before, but they had been allowed to retain their arms, and they all, with very few exceptions, joined the ranks of the insurgents. Those who had no weapons broke open several armorers' shops in the city, and supplied themselves.

Marmont's plan for the defense of the city was similar to that adopted by Napoleon in 1795, in repelling the attack of the sections; he determined to concentrate his troops upon the defense of the Tuilleries, the Louvre, and the Plâce Carrousel, as an immense fortress in the center of the city. Three battalions of the guards were stationed in the Plâce Carrousel and in the Palais Royal; two in the Plâce Louis XV., with two guns, and one in the Rue Capucius, in front of the hôtel of the minister of foreign affairs; and three battalions of the line on the Boulevards from the Madeline to the Place of the Bastille. Finding that the insurgents were making rapid progress in the erection of barricades in some of the narrowest and most crowded districts, he sent out detachments to overturn them, and disperse the crowds. The first barricade, at the Rue St. Honoré, where it passed the Palais Royal, was carried by the troops, after one point-blank discharge, which killed one man and wounded several. The body of the dead man was carried off by his friends, who paraded it through the streets for the purpose of exciting their fellow-citizens to immediate action; the other barricades were carried with little difficulty, and the troops succeeded in restoring a degree of tranquillity to the city. The insurgents retired from the streets, but only to make vigorous preparations for renewing the conflict on the morrow; and the only measure of government was to proclaim Paris in a state of siege, a measure in itself calculated only to inflame the public mind, as it was not followed up by any reinforcements to Marmont's army, although there were 15,000 infantry and 3,400 cavalry of the guards stationed at a short distance from Paris.

Early on the next morning (the 28th) the people appeared in the Faubourg St. Antoine and St. Marceau, so well known in the worst days of the former revolution, armed with muskets, swords, bayonets, pickaxes, etc., gathering strength as they rolled onward through the Rue St. Denis, to the station occupied by the military. They were everywhere to be seen tearing up the pavement, overturning omnibusses, dragging furniture from the houses, and proceeding to erect barricades. Their operations continued almost unmolested, and with a degree of order and rapidity one would not expect to find in such an incongruous multitude. The arsenal was soon broken into and its contents distributed among the people; the powder manufactory des deux moulins, and the artillery dépôt of St. Thomas Aquinas shared the same fate. Emboldened by their successes they approached the Hôtel de Ville, which was carried without any resistance, as the garrison retired before any attack was made. Instantly the tri-color flag was displayed from its summit, and the tocsin sounded amid the deafening cheers and cries of the populace. The church of Nôtre Dame was next broken open, and the republican standard planted upon it, while at the same time the dismal clang of the tocsin recalled vividly to the minds of those who had witnessed it, the appalling commencement of the memorable 10th of August, 1792.

The government was soon awakened from their trance of fancied security. Four fifths of Paris was already in the hands of the insurgents, and it was high time that some measures should be adopted to stop their progress. Marmont accordingly divided his slender army into columns with orders to advance into the interior of the city, which was by this time wholly in the hands of the insurgents. The first column, commanded by General Talon, advanced along the quays preceded by two pieces of artillery, to clear that part of the city and re-take the Hôtel de Ville; he opened fire at the entrance of the Plâce de Grève, which was crowded with insurgents, and after a few discharges effectually cleared the square; he next attacked the Hôtel de Ville, which was almost immediately carried by the troops of the guard, but his success was of short duration, for the soldiers of the line refused to support their comrades, the officers breaking their swords and the men drawing their cartridges in the presence of the people. The scholars of the Polytechnic school now took the lead, and lent to the cause of insurrection not only the ardor and intrepidity of youth, but also their military skill. They formed in a body and soon re-filled the square, the troops taking refuge in the Hôtel de Ville from which they kept up a vigorous fire upon the people.

Meantime, the second column had advanced by the Boulevards toward the Place de la Bastille, where it was met by a torrent of people rolling to the eastward from the Faubourg

St. Antoine. These gave way after a few discharges, which killed a large number of people, but it was only to take refuge behind the barricades erected at no great distance, whence they poured a murderous fire upon the flank of the troops advancing in that direction. However, notwithstanding all the force arrayed against them, they succeeded in storming six of the barricades, but the ranks of the insurgents were momentarily increasing, and it was impossible to follow up their success, as almost all the houses on each side were occupied, and a steady fire was kept up which greatly thinned the ranks of the troops. They determined to retire, and taking advantage of a squadron of cuirassiers then passing through the Plâce de la Bastille, they succeeded in forcing their way across the center of Paris to the Plâce de la Grève, where they found General Talon making a desperate defense with his faithful guards, at the Hôtel de Ville. Cheers of "Vive la ligne," "Vivent les freres et enfants du peuple," greeted this corps on its arrival here, symptoms of wavering manifested themselves in their ranks, and to the great delight of the populace the 50th regiment refused to act, and took refuge in the court of the hôtel, where they delivered up their ammunition to General Talon, who was now left to prolong a hopeless defense.

The third column, composed almost entirely of Swiss, under the command of General Quinsonnus, was directed to march by the Rue St. Honoré to the Marché des Innocens, through the most densely populated parts of the city. He succeeded in storming all the barricades till he arrived at the Marché des Innocens, where the streets were so narrow and the houses so high, that a plunging fire could be kept on the soldiers, who were compelled to advance in single file; but, after losing a large number of men he succeeded in establishing himself in the square, from whence he could reply to the fire from the windows, which had caused him such heavy loss; and in a few minutes he had effectually silenced it. Determined to take advantage of his success, he sent a battalion with two pieces of artillery to clear the Rue St. Denis; it succeeded in doing so, though with a very heavy loss, the colonel himself being severely wounded. After remaining for several hours at the Porte St. Denis expecting assistance from the second column, who had taken refuge in the Hôtel de Ville, the colonel thought it expedient to retire, but as the Rue St. Denis was again in the hands of the insurgents, who had by this time erected a sufficient number of barricades to hold the street against the small force he could bring against them, the only way left open was by the Boulevards, where the felling of trees greatly impeded his progress. However, after great difficulty and considerable loss he succeeded in making his way back to the Plâce Vendôme.

The situation of Quinsonnus, left in the Marché des Innocens with his diminished force, was becoming every moment more critical. After four hours' incessant firing the ammunition of his troops gave out, there was no communication with the Tuilleries, as the streets leading in that direction were closed by barricades, and it was only by disguising one of the officers, that he succeeded in informing Marmont of his perilous position. The marshal had only one battalion at his disposal, and this he immediately dispatched to his assistance; with this reinforcement, Quinsonnus was able to cut his way back to the central position around the palace. Marmont issued orders for the concentration of all the troops on the Tuilleries; this movement was effected under cover of the darkness of the night.

While these signal successes were attending the arms of the populace, their leaders saw the necessity of organizing a provisional government, as the authority of the king was virtually at an end in Paris: with this view, a meeting was convened at the hôtel of M. Andry de Puyravan on the evening of the same day as that on which the above events transpired. The meeting was attended by almost all the liberal deputies, some of whom counseled moderation, and obedience to the king; who, they were persuaded, would recall the odious ordinances as soon as he found they were opposed by the people, and dismiss his ministry, who, by their acts had become obnoxious. But General Lafayette, whose age, and also whose experience in revolutionary matters entitled his voice to great weight, opposed any temporizing measures on the ground that it was too late, that arms had already been taken up, and that it should be decided by the fate of those arms.

These measures were adopted, though MM. Guizot, Villemair, and Thiers counseled more moderate ones. It now remained to appoint a provisional government, and General Lafayette, General Gérard, and the Duke de Choiseul, were appointed dictators by the street leaders, and proclamation issued bearing their names, but without their knowledge. As the office of dictator would be attended with considerable danger in case of the failure of the revolution, there was some doubt whether these gentlemen would accept it; it was therefore conferred upon General Delonny, who at once accepted it, and proceeded to install himself in the Hôtel de Ville which had been evacuated by the royal troops, from which he issued an edict concerning the preservation of the public monuments, taking care of the wounded, etc.

This rapid march of events created considerable consternation at the Palace of St. Cloud. The king immediately sent orders that the troops stationed in towns near Paris should repair at once to the support of Marmont, but Prince Polignac treated the whole matter very coolly, not believing there was any serious danger, although Marmont told him that the whole city was in the hands of the insurgents except the grounds around the Tuilleries where the royal guard was stationed.

Early on the morning of the 29th, 1,500 infantry, and 600 horse, arrived, but these did little more than compensate for the losses of the previous day. Marmont's total force to defend his position, which would evidently be assailed at day-break, was 5,000 effective men and eight guns. A number of the deputies met at the house of M. Lafitte, the banker, and agreed to make an effort to win Marmont over to their cause, which was in secret that of the Duke of Orleans. M. Arago was dispatched on this mission, but the marshal indignantly rejected his proposal, for, although he was convinced that longer defense was useless, yet he had been intrusted by his king with the defense of Paris, and he was determined to do his duty to the last.

When M. Arago returned to the deputies with Marmont's answer, their decision was at once taken: they determined to put themselves at the head of the movement, and hoist the tri-color flag, and thus close the door against all hope of accommodation, by declaring the king and his ministers public enemies. General Sebastiani alone protested against this, as it was a virtual dethronement of Charles X. Orders were immediately issued to prepare for an attack on Marmont's position at the Tuilleries. The military command of Paris was offered to Lafayette, and accepted. He more eagerly did so as he had learned that the greater number of the deputies had resolved to call the Duke of Orleans to the throne, while he himself wished for a republic.

In a short space of time, an immense armed multitude gathered in front of the Tuilleries, and occupied all the barracks adjoining, from which they kept up an unceasing fire upon the royal troops, but the soldiers of the line gave way, and opened their ranks so that the people rushed through the garden of the Tuilleries, broke open the doors and windows, and so carried the inner court of the Louvre; then, forcing their way through the interior, they penetrated into the gallery of the museum, from the windows of which they opened a plunging fire upon the Swiss soldiers in the Place Carrousel. These, finding themselves attacked at once in front and flank, were seized with a sudden panic, and they fled in wild disorder through the gardens of the palace. Marmont did all in his power to arrest the disorders of the retreating soldiers, and he succeeded in drawing them off with some degree of regularity. He was the last man who left the gardens. This success of the insurgents decided the fate of the king. The only other posts in possession of the royal troops—the Invalides and the barracks of Babylone—were evacuated; and the troops, after a severe conflict, succeeded in joining Marmont at the Champs Elysées. This universal triumph was darkened by a melancholy event, which cast a heroic and a tragic air over the last days of the monarchy. A hundred Swiss soldiers who had been stationed in a house at the junction of the Rue Richelieu and the Rue St. Honoré, had been forgotten: they were attacked by the multitude, and made a most gallant defense, but they were all cut to pieces, and perished to the last man, like their predecessors on the 10th August, 1789, in the defense of their king. Several Swiss, found in different parts of the city, were massacred, but with these exceptions they made a good use of their victory. However, men paraded through the apartments of the Tuilleries, and evinced their hatred of royalty by firing at the pictures, and destroying the furniture. The royal cellar, too, was emptied of its contents. The municipal authorities acted most praiseworthily in the vigorous efforts they used to preserve the public monuments from spoliation, and they were, with one or two exceptions, successful. The royal guard continued their retreat to the Bois de Boulogne, where all hostilities ceased, and Marmont galloped on to St. Cloud to lay the state of affairs before the king, directing his troops to continue their retreat thither. When he had related to the king the circumstances of the fall of the Louvre, and the final evacuation of Paris, Charles immediately called his cabinet together; some counselled bold measures; but he resolved to submit without any more bloodshed, and accordingly issued a decree revoking the ordinances, and dismissing his ministers. He appointed M. Montemarte president of the council, and General Gérard minister at war. The other members were equally liberal. It was with the greatest reluctance that the king prevailed upon M. Montemarte to accept this perilous office, but he at length accepted, and proceeded to the Hôtel de Ville to negotiate with the provisional government; but Lafayette's words were again uttered to him: "It is too late—the throne of Charles X. has melted away in blood." The popular party now published a proclamation—the sentence of death against the French monarchy—which was received with vehement demonstrations of delight by the people.

At this crisis the Duke of Orleans arrived in Paris, and the king determined to make one more effort to preserve the throne of his ancestors for his grandson. The Orleans family had received many acts of kindness from the king; among others, he had restored to them their estates which had been confiscated to the crown; and for this and others favors the duke had professed himself unboundedly grateful to Charles X.

The king offered him the lieutenancy-general of the kingdom, in order to guard the crown during his minority for the Duke de Bordeaux, in whose favor the king and the Duke d'Angoulême offered to renounce it. The duke refused the offer, and this failure of the attempt to enlist the Duke of Orleans among the supporters of the royal cause, and the increasing pressure of the revolutionary forces, induced Marmont to enter into a sort of capitulation for the royal troops, in virtue of which hostilities were immediately to cease between them; and a proclamation to that effect was issued by him. The Duke d'Angoulême was aroused to the highest pitch of indignation. He openly accused Marmont of treachery, and in attempting to snatch from him his sword, wounded himself in the hand. Marmont was immediately put under arrest; but the king soon after ordered him to be set free, and restored his sword to him. The near approach of the revolutionary forces which were close to St. Cloud, induced the king to withdraw himself to Trianon, where he assembled a council of his former ministers, as M. de Montemarte had not yet returned from Paris, and had not been heard from for 24 hours. But while the council was still in session, the Duke d'Angoulême arrived with the disheartening intelligence that the regiments of the first line, posted at the bridge, had refused to fire upon the insurgents, who had consequently crossed the bridge, and were making preparations to advance against Trianon. On receipt of this intelligence, it was resolved to fall back at all points on Rambouillet, where the court arrived with the royal guard, still 12,000 strong, at midnight, in the deepest state of depression.

Charles arrived at Rambouillet fully determined to abdicate for himself in favor of his grandson; he saw that the people would no longer submit to his control. The Duke d'Angoulême was strongly opposed to the abdication of the king, preferring rather the chances of a conflict to constrain the people to submission. But on the following morning (August 1st), the king assembled his family around him, and announced his intention of abdicating in favor of his grandson, the Duke de Bordeaux, as his son, the Duke d'Angoulême, showed his sentiments, and renounced his right of succession to the throne. He dispatched a letter containing this resolution to the Duke of Orleans, and requiring him in the character of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, conferred on him by the revolutionary authorities, and confirmed by the king by royal appointment, to proclaim Henry V. to the throne. But the Duke of Orleans did not feel himself obliged to obey, and issued in its place an order that the revolutionary forces should prepare to the utmost to resist the king's wishes, and to march out of Paris on Rambouillet. At the same time Marshal Maison, Schonen, and Odillon Barrott, were sent forward to the king as deputies to impress upon him the necessity of an immediate and unqualified resignation for himself and his descendants, and every preparation was made to compel his embarkation for England.

The revolutionary army took up their line of march from Paris on the 3d of August. The advanced guard consisted of veterans and the national guard; the remainder consisted of militia, who, although poorly armed, were inflamed with an ardor which rendered them almost equal to regulars. The whole was under the command of General Pajol. When the three commissioners who preceded the army were admitted to the king, he asked them, "What do you wish with me?" The commissioners impressed upon him the necessity of his immediate resignation, with all his descendants, and added, that in case he should refuse, there was a sufficient force on its way from Paris to compel him to do so. Being assured of this, the king replied, "Enough! I consent to any thing to spare the life of my guards." With that he gave orders for the departure of the court for Cherbourg, to embark for England. On the 16th of August, 1830, Charles X., with those that attended him, embarked in the Great Britain packet-boat, and in melancholy silence the vessel plowed through the sea, steering for Scotland.

Thus fell the dynasty of the Bourbons—and fell, to all appearance, never again to be restored. The Duke of Orleans became Louis Philippe, King of the French, amid the transports of a people, who, eighteen years later, ignominiously expelled him from France.

The revolution of 1848, which gave Louis Napoleon, first the Presidency of the French Republic, and next the imperial throne of the French empire, is of so recent a date, that most of our readers are familiar with its details. Therefore, as we have already devoted more space to the narration of events which have transpired in Paris, which, after all, is the heart, life, and soul of France, than we can afford, we will content ourselves with simply referring to it.

PAOLI, A.D. 1777.—In September, 1777, the American troops under General Wayne, were surprised near Paoli, in Pennsylvania, by a greatly superior British force under General Gray, and defeated. On this occasion a number of the Americans were butchered in cold blood, after they had laid down their arms.

PARMA, A.D. 1734.—An indecisive battle was fought near Parma, in Italy, on the 29th of June, 1734, between the confederate armies of England, France, and Spain, and the army of the Emperor of Austria. Both parties claimed the victory.

PATAY, A.D. 1429.—Patay is a town of France, fourteen miles north-west of Orleans, and is celebrated for the victory gained there in 1429, by the French under Joan of Arc, over the English under Talbot. The battle was fought on the 10th of July, and resulted in the signal defeat of the English. The redoubted hero Sir John Fastolfe fled in the commencement of the action, and Talbot was made prisoner. The English lost in this battle 1,200 men. In consequence of this victory, Charles of France entered Rheims in triumph, and on the 17th of July in the same year was crowned; Joan of Arc, taking part in the ceremony, in full armor, and holding the sword of state. As soon as the ceremony was over, the Maid of Orleans threw herself upon her knees before the king, and embracing his feet, declared her mission accomplished, and with tears entreated that she might return to her former station. But Charles did not wish to lose the services of such a useful servant, and at his earnest request she consented to remain in the army. See Orleans and Compeigne.

PAVIA, A.D. 476.—Pavia "the city of a Hundred Towers," stands on the left bank of the Ticino, in Austrian Italy. It is surrounded by walls, and contains numerous public edifices; but its magnificence and fame belong to former ages; now, nothing remains but decay and paralysis.

Orestes having undertaken to dethrone Nepos, the Emperor of the West, raised an army, merely showed himself, and the weak monarch abandoned the diadem. The fortunate rebel encircled the head of his son Romulus Augustulus with it. The Roman empire of the West was in its last period of decay. Odoacer, at the head of an army of Goths, Heruli, Scyrri, and Thuringians, came to give it the last blow, and to reign over its vast wreck. Terror and confusion preceded him. All fled, all dispersed at his approach. The plains were deserted, the cities opened their gates to him. Orestes, too weak to withstand him, shut himself up in Pavia. Odoacer pursued him thither, carried the city by storm, made a frightful carnage, and set fire to the churches and houses. Orestes was taken and decapitated on the 28th of August, 476, the very day on which, one year before, he dragged Nepos from his throne. Augustulus, abandoned by every body, stripped himself of his dangerous dignity, and delivered up the purple to his conqueror, who, out of compassion for his age, left him his life, with a pension of six thousand golden pence, that is, about £3,300 sterling. Thus disappeared the empire of the West, after having subsisted 506 years from the battle of Actium, and 1,229 from the foundation of Rome. Scarcely was its fall perceived, scarcely a look was fixed upon its last moments; it might be compared to an old man who dies of caducity.

SECOND SIEGE, A.D. 572.—Albion, King of Lombards, entered Italy for the purpose of founding a state. Pavia alone ventured to oppose him. The new conqueror laid siege to it; and that city, after a vigorous resistance of three years, reduced to the last extremity, was forced to surrender at discretion. The conqueror, exasperated by the obstinacy of the defense, had resolved to put all the inhabitants to the sword, but their submission disarmed his vengeance. He entered Pavia, not as a conqueror, but as a pacific king; forbade murder, violation, or pillage, and made that important place the capital of his new empire.

THIRD SIEGE, A.D. 774.—Two centuries of profound peace had rendered Pavia one of the most flourishing cities of the universe, when it beheld the standards of Didier, King of the Lombards, floating at its gates. This grasping prince, jealous of the power of Pope Adrian, sacked every place belonging to the pontiff. The holy father fulminated horrible excommunications; but these arms were too weak to stop the usurper, and the pope had recourse to Charlemagne. That monarch crossed the Alps, combated the enemies of the court of Rome, and made such a carnage of them, that the field of battle took the name of the Plain of the Dead. Didier sought refuge in Pavia. He had provided that capital with every thing necessary for a long resistance. Charlemagne blockaded it, and left the command of his troops to his Uncle Bernard; he then took the road to Rome, where he was received as the liberator of the Holy See. After having made a sojourn there, he returned to his army before Pavia, and pressed the siege so vigorously, that it opened its gates after a heroic defense of six months, Didier, his wife and children, were made prisoners, and banished to Liége.

Thus finished the kingdom of the Lombards, which had subsisted 206 years. Charlemagne added to the titles of Emperor of the Franks and Patrician of the Romans, that of King of the Lombards.

Fourth Siege, A.D. 1525.—Francis I. of France, after a brilliant campaign, in which he drove back the imperialists from Provence to the Milanese, very unwisely employed his army in sieges, instead of pursuing his enemies with vigor to the other side of the Carnic Alps. Accumulating errors, he weakened an army of 40,000 men by dividing it; detaching from it a body of 10,000 soldiers upon an expedition into the kingdom of Naples. He thus left his enemy time to recover, and to remain master, by means of the armies he was able to raise in Germany and Naples.

After having taken Milan, he commenced the siege of Pavia. That city, well fortified, had for governor Antonio de Leva, a great captain, commanding a numerous and warlike garrison. The French monarch attacked the place with vigor, but he evinced indecision in his points of attack. The siege was protracted; Pavia was reduced to extremity; the garrison mutinied more than once for want of pay; the governor was even in dread of seeing the city delivered up to the French by his unruly troops; but his genius, equally firm and fertile in resources, contrived to keep them to their duty. Lannoi, viceroy of Naples for Charles V., was informed of the distresses of Pavia. The taking of that place might complete the disbanding of the imperial troops for want of money and subsistence; he felt that this was the moment to venture to attack his enemy, and to attempt an action, hazardous without doubt, but which might re-establish the affairs of Charles V. in Italy. He set out then, accompanied by the Marquis de Pescara and the constable de Bourbon. At his approach, the French monarch called a council; prudence would have commanded him to avoid an engagement, to raise the siege, and to refresh and enlarge his army: "Sire," said La Trémouille to him, "the true honor in war is to succeed. A defeat can never be justified by a battle; you risk your army, your person, and your kingdom, and you risk nothing by raising the siege." The monarch was deaf to the councils of wisdom; his romantic spirit fancied that his honor would be compromised. The Admiral Bonnevet promised so to dispose his troops that he should conquer his enemies, that the imperialists should not dare to attack him, and that Pavia should fall into his hands. The king followed this fatal and pernicious advice. The troops were nearly equal in numbers on both sides, each reckoning about 30,000 men. The imperialists first fell upon the rear guard of the French, placed at the castle and in the park of Mirabel. They expected to carry it if the king did not come to its assistance; and, if he did come, they should make him lose the advantage of the position in which he was fortified. What Lannoi anticipated, happened. Scarcely did the French monarch perceive the danger of his brother-in-law the Duke of Alençon, who commanded the rear guard, than, impatient to signalize himself, he rushed forward at the head of his cavalry, and fell upon the imperialists. His artillery, placed with much skill by Gaillon de Genouillac, and served with great spirit, fired at first with such success, that every volley carried away a file. The Spanish infantry, being unable to resist this terrible fire, precipitately broke their ranks, to seek shelter, in great disorder, in a hollow way. Such a brilliant commencement dazzled Francis; he forgot that he owed all his success to his artillery, believed himself already the conqueror, and came out from his lines. This inconsiderate movement placed the prince between his own artillery and the fugitives, and rendered his cannon useless. The face of the battle was changed in a moment; the viceroy advanced with the gend'armerie and a body of arquebusiers; the king was pressed on all sides. The French gend'armerie did not, in this battle, sustain its ancient reputation; it was beaten and almost destroyed by 2,000 Biscayans, of astonishing agility, who, separating by platoons of ten, twenty, or thirty men, attacked it with inconceivable celerity and address. They were seen, all at once, making a discharge, disappearing at the moment they should be in turn attacked, and re-appearing unexpectedly, again to disappear. It is said that Antonio de Leva had, for some time, trained these arquebusiers to fight thus in platoons, between the squadrons of the Spanish cavalry, and that he had borrowed the maneuver from the Greeks. A stratagem of Pescara's contributed still further to the success of the day. This general having approached the enemy's camp a little before the commencement of the battle, returned to his own to announce that the King of France had just published in his army a prohibition, under a capital punishment, to grant quarter to any Spaniard. This information, although false, produced so strong an impression upon his troops, that almost all the imperialists swore to spare the life of no Frenchman, and to die sooner than surrender. This oath rendered the Spaniards equally invincible in fight, and ferocious after victory. The French monarch sustained the powerful charges of the enemy like a hero. Francis of Lorraine, and Richard de la Pole, the last heir of the house of Suffolk, endeavored, with some companies of Lansquenets, to disengage him; but they were killed, and the soldiers instantly turned their backs. Bonnevet perished fighting, and was regretted by nobody. Louis de la Trémouille shared the same fate; nearly 9,000 warriors, all gentlemen, were left lifeless on the field of battle. The mêlee was terrible around the king. Left almost alone in the midst of a host of enemies, he inspired terror in all who ventured to approach him. He had already immolated five of his assailants, when his horse was killed, the monarch fell, and a rush was made to seize him. Springing up, he recovered himself, and killed two more Spaniards. At this moment, Molac de Kercado, first gentleman of the chamber, perceived the peril of his master, and dispersed or killed all who stood in the way of his zeal. He placed himself before his exhausted sovereign, protected him with his sword, and checked the savage impetuosity of the Spanish soldiery; but Kercado fell while defending the king, who refused to surrender to any body but the viceroy of Naples: "Monsieur de Lannoi," said he, "there is the sword of a king who deserves consideration, since before parting with it, he has employed it in shedding the blood of several of your people, and who is not made prisoner by cowardice, but by a reverse of fortune." Lannoi fell on his knees, received the arms of the king with respect, and kissed his hand, while presenting him with another sword, saying, "I beg your majesty to accept of mine, which has spared the blood of many of your subjects. It is not becoming in an officer of the emperor to behold a king disarmed, although a prisoner." Francis was conducted, after the action, across the field of battle, to the place he was to be confined in. The imperialists made him observe that all the Swiss guards had fallen in their ranks, and that they lay dead close to one another. "If all my troops had done their duty," said he, much affected by this spectacle, "as well as these brave fellows, I should not be your prisoner, but you would be mine." Francis announced this defeat to his mother in the energetic words: "Madame, all is lost but honor."

While the king's wounds were being dressed, a Spanish soldier, approaching him respectfully, said: "Knowing we should have a battle, sire, I cast a golden bullet, which I destined for your majesty, and six silver ones for the principal officers of your army. The six have been used, but yours is left, because I could not find the opportunity I watched for. I implore of you, sire, to accept of it, and to keep it to form part of your ransom." The king took it, thanked the Spaniard, and praised his intelligence and generosity. The emperor issued a decree by which he forbade any rejoicings on account of the victory; but this moderation was only apparent. Francis was taken to Madrid. Charles assembled a council to consider how the captive king ought to be treated. "As your brother and your friend," replied the bishop of Osma, "he must be restored to liberty without any other condition than that of becoming your ally." Charles did not follow this wise counsel; he behaved toward the king like a Corsair with a rich prisoner. Francis recovered his liberty thirteen months after, by an onerous treaty, in which he gave up his claims to the Milanese, Genoa, and Asti. He was also to have ceded his rights to the Duchy of Burgundy, but when Lannoi came to demand that province in the name of the emperor, Francis, as his only reply, required him to be present at an audience of the deputies of Burgundy, who told the king that he had not the power to dismember a province of the French monarchy. Francis I. preserving a continual desire to avenge himself for the disgrace before Pavia, entered into all the leagues that were formed against Charles V. The emperor derived but little advantage from this event, the most decisive and glorious of his reign. A modern writer has discovered the reason of this. Money constitutes the sinews of war, and the emperor could not pay his troops. He assembled the cortes of Castile at Madrid, and all orders refused him assistance; the clergy, because they had no power to dispose of the goods consecrated to religion; the nobility would have derogated from their privilege, if they had paid a tribute; and the third estate, because, not having yet had in their power to pay a gratuitous gift which had been demanded of them of four hundred thousand ducats, it was impossible for them to furnish fresh sums. The emperor, although very much dissatisfied, pretended to find these reasons good, although they defeated all his designs. Napoleon, with that jealousy which he always professed to have for the honor of France, when master of Spain, caused the unfortunate king, Charles IV, to restore the sword and armor of Francis I., which were preserved at Madrid as a monument of this victory.

Pavia experienced something approaching to sieges in 1655, 1733, and 1745, but they furnish no details worth relating. In 1796, likewise it was captured without any trouble by Bonaparte, who on this occasion said: "If the blood of a single Frenchman had been shed, I would have caused a column to be erected over the ruins of the city, upon which should have been inscribed, HERE STOOD THE CITY OF PAVIA!"

PENSACOLA, A.D. 1814.—This place is the capital of Escambia co., Florida, and is situated on the west shore of Pensacola Bay, about twelve miles from the Gulf of Mexico. In 1814 Pensacola was a Spanish city, and as the governor of the place held communication with the British, Jackson, the American general, resolved to take possession of the town. The governor refusing to give up the town, the Americans, on the 20th of November, advanced against it. At the entrance to the town two cannon were planted, which opened on the Americans as they advanced. These were speedily taken, and the Americans in a few minutes were masters of the place. The British in the town fled. Having thus chastised the Spanish governor, Jackson took up his march for New Orleans, against which a strong British force was approaching. See Fort Boyer.

PERMASIN, A.D. 1793.—On the 14th of September 1793, the French army, under General Moreau, commenced an attack upon the Prussian corps stationed at Permasin, on the Rhine, in Germany. The republican forces advanced with the utmost intrepidity to the attack; but when they reached the Prussian redoubt such a terrific fire of grape was hurled upon them that their advance was arrested. At the same time they were attacked in flank by the Duke of Brunswick, who with heavy and continuous discharges of artillery threw their ranks into disorder, and finally compelled them to retire with the loss of nearly four thousand men killed and wounded, and made prisoners; twenty-two pieces of cannon also fell into the hand of the allies.

PERSEPOLIS, B.C. 330.—Ever insatiable of glory, Alexander had laid siege to Persepolis, the capital of the Persian empire. At his approach the inhabitants deserted the city, and fled away into the deserts, and the conqueror entered without the least obstacle. The Macedonian soldiery, greedy of booty, pillaged the city, and destroyed the few inhabitants they met with. But Alexander stopped the carnage, and gave orders that the virtue of the women should be respected. Almost all of the treasures and magazines of the Persians were collected in Persepolis, which had been their capital from the time of Cyrus. The amount of wealth is so enormous, that a modern historian is afraid to repeat what the ancients have stated; it appears to be a subject for the imagination rather than of calculation or comparison. So rich a booty gave rise to the idea of celebrating this event by a festival. Tables were spread in the streets; the soldiers gave themselves up to rejoicings and the enjoyment of good cheer, while their prince presided at a grand banquet given to his officers and friends. Thaïs, an Athenian courtezan, the mistress of Ptolemy, who was afterward king of Egypt, had gained the privilege of being admitted to the royal table by her wit and gayety, and was accustomed to address the conqueror of Asia with the utmost freedom. When wine had sufficiently warmed the guests, Thaïs exclaimed, "Noble lord! thanks to your invincible courage, Greece is avenged; you are master of Persia, and we are quaffing the wines of Darius in the palace of the Persian kings. The pleasures I enjoy in this superb abode make amends for the fatigues I have endured while you subdued Asia. There is only one thing wanting to complete my felicity. Great prince, why will you not permit the women who have had the honor to follow your warriors, to make one glorious blaze of the dwelling of Xerxes, the barbarian who burned and destroyed my country? I should consider myself a thousand times too fortunate if I could myself set fire to it in your presence, and to let it be known to all ages, that a woman in the train of the great Alexander had more nobly avenged Greece than Miltiades or Themistocles had done!" The guests applauded this boastful appeal. The king rose from table with his head crowned with flowers, and seizing a blazing torch, rushed to the execution of the suggested sacrifice. The Macedonians, following the example of their king and Thaïs, spread themselves in all directions with their flaming brands, and soon produced an awful conflagration. But scarcely had the first flame cast its glare around, than Alexander became aware of his folly, and gave earnest orders for the extinguishing of the fire; but it was too late—the palace was consumed.

PETERWARDEN, A.D. 1716.—In the year 1716 a battle was fought between the Austrian army under Prince Eugene, and the Turks, near Peterwarden, on the Danube, in Sclavonia, in which the latter were defeated, and thus lost their last foothold in central Europe.

PEQUOT HILL, A.D. 1637.—This hill is eight miles north-west from New London, Conn., was the scene of a terrible conflict between the early English settlers in Connecticut and the Pequots, a tribe of Indians who scorned every overture of peace from the white men. On the contrary, they murdered and insulted the colonists at every opportunity. Aroused to action by the continued outrages of the Pequots, the settlers set sail from the Bay State to the number of 79 men, under Captain John Mason; and on the 21st of May, 1637, entered a harbor near Wickford, in the Narraganset bay. On Pequot Hill (now called), 700 Pequots with their wives and children occupied a strong position. The little village on the hill was defended by a slight pallisade work, which the Indians, in their ignorance of the strength of the white man, considered a sufficient protection. As Captain Mason advanced through the country on his march of forty miles through the forest toward the Mystic river, his force was swelled by friendly Indians, until he counted 500 men under his command. On the evening of the 4th of June, Mason arrived in the vicinity of the enemy. The Pequots, all unconscious of his approach, were engaged in dancing, and the whole night was spent in revelry. The morning came, and the English with their allies, moved rapidly up the acclivity. Overcome by the fatigues of the night, the Indians were wrapped in sleep. The English broke through the feeble defenses of the Indian camp; the savages, aroused by the fierce barking of a dog, sprang to their arms and resisted valiantly. Like a huge cataract they poured down upon the assailants, and seemed on the point of overwhelming them by their very weight, when Mason shouted "We must burn them!" A dozen firebrands were thrown to windward upon the mat roofings of the Indian lodges. The fire spread from point to point, till the whole camp was in a blaze. The English surrounding the hill stood with pieces ready, watching like hunters for the first appearance of their prey. No sooner did the unfortunate Indians climb the pallisades, than they were pierced by the balls of the unerring marksmen; and when they attempted a sally, they fell beneath the broadswords of the enemy. The carnage was fearful. Six hundred Indians, men, women, and children, perished, most of them in the flames. The work of destruction was finished in an hour. Three hundred Pequots advanced at early dawn from their other fort, on the Pequot (Thames) and rushed upon the English. They were received by a well directed fire of musketry, which drove them back in disorder, and a fierce charge scattered them far and wide. The victory was won; and the conquerors marched in triumph to the English fort at Saybrook.

PERPIGNAN A.D. 1474.—Perpignan, in France, was taken in 1474, by the army of Louis XI., and in 1642 by Louis XIII. In 1793 a battle was fought near Perpignan between the French and the Spaniards, in which the latter were defeated. Philip the Bold died in this town in the year 1285.

PERTH.—Perth, in Scotland, was captured and its records carried off by Edward I. of England, in 1228; in 1644 it was taken by the troops of Montrose; and it capitulated to Oliver Cromwell in 1651. James I. of England was murdered in Perth in 1437.

PHARSALIA, B.C. 48.—The modern city of Satalge, in Thessaly, occupies the site of the famous ancient town of Pharsalia. On some eminences toward the east of the town, was fought a battle between the Romans, under Quintus Flaminus, and Macedonians, under Philip; but the celebrated battle of Pharsalia, in which Cæsar defeated Pompey, was fought on the plain immediately adjoining the city.

Pompey's army greatly exceeded that of Cæsar in point of numbers, especially in horse, archers, and slingers; and he trusted that by this part of his army he should prevail on the wings, and carry his attack to the flank, and even to the rear of the enemy. Having the Enipeus, a small river with steep banks, on his right, which sufficiently covered that flank, he drew all the cavalry, amounting to 7,000, with the archers and slingers, to his left, expecting that the event of the battle would be determined on this wing. He himself, therefore, took post, to second the operations of the cavalry, at the head of the two famous legions which he had called off from Cæsar at the beginning of the war. Scipio was posted in the center with the legions from Syria, having the great body of the infantry divided on his right and left. The right of the whole was covered by a Cilician legion, and the remains of the Spanish army which had joined Pompey under Afranius. The whole amounted to 100 cohorts, or about 45,000 foot, drawn up in a line of ten men deep.

Cæsar observing this disposition, formed his army in three divisions; the left was commanded by Antony, the right by Sylla, and the center by Cn. Domitius. The tenth legion was posted on the right, and the ninth on the left of the whole. He had eighty cohorts in the field; but these so incomplete as not to exceed above 21,000 men. He saw the disparity of his horse and irregulars on the right, having no more than 1,000 horse to oppose 7,000 of the enemy. In order to reinforce and sustain them, he draughted a cohort from each of the legions in the night to form a reserve, which he placed in the rear of his cavalry with orders to sustain them, or to repel the enemy's horse, when they should attempt, as he expected, to turn his flank. This body formed a fourth division of his army, not placed in the same line with the other divisions; but facing obliquely to the right, in order to receive the cavalry that was expected to turn the flank and fall obliquely on the rear. He himself passed along the front of the right wing, and earnestly entreated them not to engage till they got the signal from himself. He reminded them of his continual attention to the welfare of the army, desiring them to recollect with what earnestness he had endeavored to bring about a treaty, in order to save both armies to the republic, and how far he had always been from any desire to shed the blood of his soldiers wantonly, Loud shouts testified the desire of his hearers to be led to battle. Pompey had directed the cavalry and archers assembled on his left to begin the attack; and instructed them to fall upon the flank and rear of Cæsar's infantry as soon as they had driven his cavalry from the field.

A solemn pause ensued. The two armies gazed at each other in sorrowful silence. Clothed in the same guise, armed with the same weapons, they did not appear like two hostile armies drawn up in battle array; but like two great divisions of one army. The trumpets sounded, and the notes on each side were alike; it seemed as if brother were about to contend against brother. At the sound of the trumpets, Cæsar's troops rushed forward; they had only space enough between them if both sides advanced to acquire that velocity with which they were usually shocked; but Pompey had ordered his men to stand firm in the expectation that the enemy's soldiers if they were made to run a double space in coming to the shock, would be disordered or out of breath. But Cæsar's veterans, suspecting the intention of this unusual method of receiving an enemy, made a full stop; and having drawn breath, came forward again with the usual rapidity. They were received with perfect order; but not with that resistance and equal force which motion alone could give. The action became general near about the same time along the whole front. Pompey's horse, as was expected, in the first charge, put Cæsar's cavalry to flight; and together with the archers and slingers were hastening to turn the flank of the enemy. But as soon as they opened their view to the rear, being surprised at the sight of a body of infantry, which was drawn up to receive them, and being, probably, from their confidence of victory negligent of order, in their attempts to recover it they were thrown into the utmost confusion, and although there was not any enemy in condition to pursue them, fled to the heights. The archers being thus deserted by the horse, were put to the sword. And Pompey's left, on which he expected the enemy could not resist him, being flanked by the cohorts who had defeated the cavalry, began to give way. Cæsar, in order to increase the impression he had made, brought forward fresh troops to the front of his own line; and while his reserve turned upon the flank, made a general charge, which the enemy no longer endeavored to withstand.

Pompey, on seeing the flight of his cavalry, an event he so little expected, either thought himself betrayed, or despairing the event of the day, put spurs to his horse and returned into camp. As he entered the prætorian gate, he called to the guards to stand to their arms, and to provide for the worst. "I go the rounds," he said, "and visit the posts." It is likely that surprise and mortification had unsettled his mind. He retired to his tent in the greatest dejection, and yet he awaited the issue. His army, meanwhile, being routed, fled in great confusion through the lanes of their own encampment. It was noon, and the victors as well as vanquished, were greatly fatigued; but Cæsar seldom left any refuge to a flying enemy, not even behind their intrenchments. He ordered Pompey's lines to be stormed; met with some little resistance from the guards that were placed on the parapet, but soon prevailed. The rout and the carnage continued through the streets and alleys of the camp, to the rear gate passages through which the vanquished crowded to recover the fields, and from which, without any attempt to rally, they continued their flight to the neighboring hills.

When Pompey's army went forth to battle, their tents were left standing, as in full confidence of victory, and the plate, furniture, and equipage of the officers were still displayed, as if intended for show.

Notwithstanding this circumstance, Cæsar had authority enough to restrain his troops from plunder, and continued the pursuit. Seeing crowds of the vanquished had occupied a hill in the rear of their camp, he made haste to surround them and cut off their further retreat. But they themselves, having observed that the place was destitute of water, abandoned it before they could be surrounded, and took the road to Larissa. Cæsar, having ordered part of the army to keep possession of the enemy's camp, another part to return to their own, he himself, with four legions, endeavored to intercept the fugitives on their way to Larissa. He had the advantage of the ground; so that after a hasty march of six miles, he got before them; and, having thrown himself in their way obliged them to halt. They took possession of a height over a stream of water, from which they hoped to be supplied. Night was fast approaching, and the pursuers were spent with fatigue; but Cæsar yet prevailed on his men to prevent the access of the enemy to the brook. When overwhelmed with fatigue and distress, these remains of the vanquished army, offered to capitulate; and while the treaty was in dependence, many among them, senators and persons of rank, withdrew in the night and made their escape; the rest surrendered at discretion. Persons of distinction who had been formerly prisoners, and who had been set at liberty, were now put to death. Some were spared at the intercession of their friends, to whom Cæsar permitted that each should save one of the prisoners. The private men took oaths of fidelity to the victor, and were enlisted in his army. Cæsar, having ordered such of his men as had been on service all night, to be released from the camp, he himself marched the same day with a fresh body of Larissa.

In the famous battle of Pharsalia, Cæsar, by his own account, lost no more than 200 men, among whom were thirty centurions, officers of distinguished merit. Of Pompey's army, 15,000 were slain, and 24,000 made prisoners. One hundred and eighty stands of colors, and nineteen Roman eagles, and legionary standards, fell into the hands of the victors. Among the slain were many senators, and many of the equestrian order, the flower of the Roman nobility, who were the most likely to bear up the sinking fortunes of the commonwealth. Pompey, after his defeat, fled into Egypt, where he was shortly afterward murdered by the order of Ptolemy, the younger. His body was thrown naked on the strand, and exposed to the view of all those whose curiosity led them that way, till it was burned by his faithful freedman Philip. The battle of Pharsalia was fought on the 12th of May, 48 B.C.

PHILIPPI, 42 B.C.—Philippi is a ruined town of European Turkey, in Macedonia, ten miles south-east of Drama. The memorable battles between the troops of Octavius and Marc Antony, and those of Brutus and Cassius, took place in the month of October, B.C. 42, in a plain west of the town.

The army of Brutus and Cassius first took post at Philippi, on the declivity of the mountains, two miles from the town, on two separate eminences, about a mile asunder. Brutus commanded the right wing, Cassius the left. On their right was Philippi, covered by the mountains, on the left an impassable marsh, which reached about nine miles from their camp to the sea. Octavius and Antony took two separate stations in the plain, opposite those of the enemy. Octavius opposite to Brutus, and Antony to Cassius. The number of legions on both sides was equal; but those of Octavius and Antony were not complete. In cavalry they were unequal; that of Brutus and Cassius amounting to 20,000, while that of Octavius and Antony was no more than 13,000. Antony and Octavius, in order to force their antagonists to a battle, or to cut off their communication with their fleet which was in harbor at Neapolis, near where the marsh which covered the left of Cassius's camp terminated in the sea, formed a design to pierce the morass, and to seize upon the heights beyond it on the left of the camp of Cassius. In the work which they carried on for this purpose, they were covered by the reeds, which grew to a great height in the marsh; and in ten days, without being observed, by means of timbers, hurdles, and earth, which they sunk as they advanced, accomplished a passage, and sent in the night a party of their army to occupy the opposite heights, to make lodgments and to intercept the communication of their antagonists with Neapolis from which they received their daily supplies.

As soon as Brutus and Cassius perceived this advantage gained by the enemy, they took measures to recover it, and to re-open their own access to the sea. For this purpose, they, in their turn, traversed the marsh in a line which crossed the passage already made by the enemy, and pierced Octavius and Antony's highway with a deep and impassable ditch. Having in this manner cut off the enemy's parties that had passed the morass from any succors or supplies from their own main body, they were about to force them, when Octavius and Antony endeavored to recover their passage; and to divert the attention of the enemy from what they were doing in the marsh, drew forth their armies on the plain. While Octavius was still confined by sickness, his lieutenant, or next in command, took his place in this movement, and advanced toward the intrenchment of Brutus. The light troops began to skirmish on the ascent of the hills, and notwithstanding it was the resolution of both leaders in the republican army, not to hazard a battle, except in defense of their own intrenchments, the legions of Brutus, observing from their parapets what was passing between the advanced parties in front, were so animated or incensed as not to be restrained. They accordingly quitted their lines, attacked the wing which Octavius was supposed to command, drove them back to their ground, and continuing the pursuit, even forced them into their camp. Octavius himself, having been carried from his bed to a litter, narrowly escaped falling into the enemy's hands.

On the other wing, likewise, Antony had advanced toward the camp of Cassius; but as he was observed, at the same time, beginning to work in the morass, this movement of his army was considered no more than a feint to favor the other design. Cassius, to divert him from his operation in the marsh, drew forth his army likewise; and having greatly the advantage of the ground, did not suppose that the enemy in such circumstances would venture upon a general action. In this, however, he was disappointed. Antony, seeing Cassius expose his front, discontinued his work in the morass, mounted the height in his presence, forced him to retire, and even took and pillaged his camp, thus showing, in his turn, what are the effects of an impetuous attack upon an enemy who are disposed to think themselves secure. These separate actions, or the preparations which were made for them, had filled up the greatest part of the day. It was already dusk, and the field, for the most part, was covered with clouds of dust, so that no one could see to a distance. Those who commanded on the right in both armies, having put those who were opposed to them to flight, thought that the event was decisive in their own favor. But Brutus and Antony being informed of what had passed on the other wings of their respective armies, neither attempted to keep the advantage he had gained. Disqualified by fatigue or surprise from renewing the contest, they passed each other on the plain, and hastened back to their former stations.

Cassius, after the rout of his division, with a few who adhered to him, had halted on an eminence, and sent Titinius to the right, with orders to learn the particulars of the day on that side. This officer, while yet in sight, was met by a party of horse emerging from the clouds of dust on the plain. This party had been sent by Brutus to learn the situation of his friends; but Cassius supposing them to be enemies, and believing that Titinius, whom he saw surrounded by them, was taken, he insolently, with that precipitant despair which on other occasions had proved so fatal to the cause of the republic, presented his breast to a slave to whom he had allotted, in case of any urgent extremity, the office of putting an end to his life. Titinius, upon his return, imputing this fatal calamity to his own neglect in not trying sooner to undeceive his general by proper signals, killed himself, and fell upon the body of his friend. Brutus, soon after, arrived at the same place, and seeing the dead body of Cassius, shed tears of vexation and sorrow over the effects of an action so rash and precipitant, and which deprived the republic and himself, in this extremity, of so necessary and so able a support.

After the death of Cassius, the surviving republican general seemed resolved not to hazard a battle. Antony and Octavius, for many days successively, drew out their army, but could not entice the enemy from their strong position. Brutus, to hasten the effects of the season, which was beginning to give the enemy great annoyance, turned the course of a river from the hills, and laid under water part of the plain on which they were encamped. The troops of Octavius and Antony began to suffer greatly for want of provisions, and a calamity befell them at sea which increased their distresses, and diminished their hopes of relief. On the same day on which the late battle was fought at Philippi, Domitius Calvinus had sailed from Brundusium, having on board of transports two legions, of which the Martia was one, with 2,000 men of the Prætorian bands, and a body of horse, convoyed by some galleys or ships of war. Being met at sea by the fleet of Brutus, consisting of 130 sail, under Marcus and Ahenobarbus, a few of the headmost and best sailing ships escaped; but the remainder being surrounded, had no resource but in the valor of the troops, who endeavored to defend themselves with their swords, grappling and lashing their transports to the ships of the enemy; but in this attempt, being galled with missiles from the armed galleys, particularly with burning darts, by which some of the transports were set on fire, the others to avoid the flames, were obliged to keep at a distance; and the greater part of them, suffering extremely, without being able to annoy the enemy, were sunk or destroyed. Calvinus, himself, having been five or six days at sea, escaped to Brundusium.

These tidings had their effect in both armies. In that of Brutus they inspired an unseasonable ardor, and a disposition to commit the cause of the party to the hazard of a battle; in that of Antony and Octavius, they impressed the necessity of a speedy decision. These leaders, to amuse their own troops, and to provoke the enemy, had seized, in the night, a post on the declivity below the ground which was lately occupied by Cassius. They were suffered to make a lodgment upon it by Brutus, who had not any apprehension that he could be annoyed from a situation that was so much lower than his own. From this new position they endeavored, by frequent alarms, and by exposing their own parties on the plain, to engage Brutus in a general action. Meanwhile the republican general, having secured his own communication with Neapolis, by a proper disposition of posts from his present encampment to the sea, and trusting that his enemies must, upon the approach of winter, be obliged to evacuate Macedonia, or to separate their army for the convenience of finding subsistence, persisted in his resolution to protract the war. His troops, however, could not be reconciled to this dilatory plan; they began to complain that a victorious army should be cooped up behind intrenchments to be insulted like women; and Brutus, in about 20 days after the former action, overcome by mere importunities, drew forth his army on the declivity before his camp; the enemy at the same time, according to their custom, were forming on the plain; and both sides foresaw the approach of a general engagement.

Historians prefix their accounts of the last action at Philippi, with a detail of forms and solemnities, which, on other occasions, they have either omitted to mention, or which were not equally observed. As soon as the parole, or word for the day, was given out to the different divisions of the respective armies, a single trumpet sounded the signal of battle, and was followed by a numerous band, which played an air, while the legions were dressing their ranks, and while the men were trying and handling their arms.

Brutus, being on horseback, passed along the lines of his own army, and exhorted his men not to quit the advantage of the ground on which they stood by advancing too far to meet the enemy. "You have promised me a victory," he said; "you have forced me to snatch it now, rather than to wait for a more secure possession of it hereafter. It is your business to fulfil your own expectations and mine."

On the other side, Antony and Octavius were happy in having their fortunes, hitherto desperate, brought to the chance of a battle. They put their army in mind, that this was what all of them wished. "You are poor and distressed," they said, "but in the enemy's camp you will find an end to your sufferings, and the beginning of riches and plenty."

In these preparations, the day being far spent, and noon about three hours already past, the trumpets on both sides having sounded a general charge, made a sudden pause, and sounded again, while both armies being in motion, struck upon their bucklers, advanced with a mighty shout, and, under a shower of missiles, and weapons of every sort, closed with their swords. They continued long with all the fury that kindles in the use of short weapons, to struggle on the same spot. The places of those that fell in the first rank were continually supplied from the ranks behind them; and the place of action began to be encumbered with the heaps of the slain. No stratagem is said to have been practiced, or any accident to have happened to determine the fate of the day on either side; but after a severe contest, the army of Brutus began to give way, at first, slowly, and almost insensibly; but being pressed with growing violence, they were thrown into some confusion, and gave up the day without hope of recovery. In the disorder that followed, numbers, who had fled to the camp, finding the entrance obstructed by the crowds that struggled for admission, despaired of safety there, and passed on to the heights in its rear. Octavius advanced to the enemy's camp to secure, or to keep in awe those that had taken refuge within it. Antony pursued those who were dispersed on the heights, and, at the approach of night, made the necessary dispositions to prevent those who were within the intrenchment, or who were in the field, from rallying or assembling again; and employed detached bodies of horse all night to scour all the avenues in search of prisoners. Brutus himself being cut off from the camp, and closely followed, Lucilius, one of his company, to give him time to escape, affecting to personate his general, and falling behind, was taken, and conducted to Antony, who recognizing him, said to his captors, "You intended to bring me an enemy, but you have brought me a friend." Brutus, meanwhile, endeavored to reach the camp; but reflecting upon the improbability of rallying his dispersed troops in sufficient numbers to defend his lines against a victorious enemy, gave way to despair, and with Strato and several others, put an end to his own life. Brutus, at the time of his death, was about forty years of age. Of all the Romans, Brutus, next to Cato, is supposed to have been actuated by the purest motives of public virtue. On learning of the death of his formidable antagonist, Octavius ordered his head to be conveyed to Italy, and exposed on Cæsar's tomb. The part of the vanquished army which fled to the heights, being about 14,000 men, hearing of the death of the last of their leaders, surrendered themselves, and were equally divided between Antony and Octavius. Those who remained in the camp, or at any of the outposts of the army, likewise laid down their arms. Of the persons of rank who partook in the wreck of their party at Philippi, some escaped by sea, and joined Sextus Pompeius in Sicily, now the sole refuge of those who adhered to the commonwealth; others killed themselves, or in the late battle refused quarter, and fought till they were slain. Among the immediate consequences of the event at Philippi, was the death of Porcia the wife of Brutus, and the daughter of Cato, who destroyed herself by swallowing burning coals. The defeat of Brutus decided the fate of the Roman republic; by their decisive victory, Octavius and Antony had removed the last pillars of the commonwealth; and the cause of the republicans fell with the death of Brutus.—Ferguson.

PINKEY, A.D. 1547.—The battle of Pinkey took place in the vicinity of Musselburg, formerly Eskmouth, in Scotland, and derived its name from a nobleman's seat near the spot on which it was fought. This battle was fought on the 10th of September, 1547, between the English under the Duke of Somerset, and the Scots under the Earl of Arran. Early in September, Somerset, with 20,000 men, crossed the Tweed and directed his march upon Edinburg; while the English fleet of twenty-four galleys, and an equal number of store-ships, under Lord Clinton, crept along the shore without losing sight of the army. To meet this invasion the Earl of Arran had dispatched the fire-cross from clan to clan, and had ordered every Scotchman to join his standard at Musselburg. The Scots flocked to the place of rendezvous in such numbers that the multitude became too numerous for any useful purpose, and having selected 30,000 men, Arran dismissed the rest to their homes. The two armies arrived within sight of each other on the 9th of September, and a bloody renconter took place between the Scottish and English cavalry at Falside in which each party lost about 1,000 men. The next morning Arran passed the Eske, a movement which led to the battle of Pinkey. The Scottish army was divided into three bodies, each of which, marching in close order, presented a dense forest of pikes. Arran commanded the main body, the Earl of Angus the vanguard, and Huntly the rear. Their cavalry was stationed on their left wing, strengthened by some Irish archers whom Argyle had brought over for their service. The Duke of Somerset was much pleased when he saw this movement of the enemy. He was confident that in a pitched battle the English were superior. He ranged his van on the left, farthest from the sea; and ordered them to remain on the high grounds on which he placed them till the enemy should approach; he placed his main battle and his rear toward the right, and beyond the van he posted Lord Grey at the head of the English men-at-arms, and ordered him to assail the Scottish van in flank, but not until they should be engaged in close fight with the van of the English. While the Scots were advancing on the plain, they were galled with the artillery from the English ships; the eldest son of Lord Graham was killed; the Irish archers were thrown into disorder, and even the other troops began to stagger, when Lord Grey, hoping to take advantage of the confusion, ordered his troops to charge the vanguard of the enemy in flank. He paid severely for his temerity. On advancing he found a slough and ditch in his way, and behind were ranged the enemy, on a fallow ground broken with ridges which lay across their front, and disordered the movements of the English horse. The Scots, with their long spears, received the feeble charge of the English horsemen, who were in a moment pierced, overthrown, and disordered. The bravest of them fell, their commander was wounded with a pike in the mouth, and the colors were nearly captured. Lord Edward Seymour had his horse killed under him. Somerset, meanwhile, assisted by Sir Ralph Sadler, and Sir Ralph Vane, employed himself with diligence and success in rallying the cavalry. Warwick displayed great presence of mind in maintaining the ranks of the foot, on which the horse had recoiled; he ordered Sir Peter Mentas, captain of the foot arquebussers, and Sir Peter Gawbaa, captain of some Italian and Spanish arquebussers, to advance, and assail the Scottish infantry. They marched to the slough, and discharged their pieces full in the face of the enemy; the ships galled the Scots from the flank; the artillery planted on a height infested them from the front; the English archers poured in a shower of arrows upon them, and the vanguard descending from the hill, advanced leisurely and in good order toward them. The Scots dismayed by all these circumstances, wavered, broke, and retreated. The retreat was soon changed into flight which was begun by the Irish archers. The panic of the van communicated itself to the main body, and passing thence to the rear, rendered the whole field a scene of terror, confusion, flight, and consternation. The English army perceived from the heights the condition of the Scots, and began the pursuit with loud shouts and acclamations, which added still more to the dismay of the vanquished. The cavalry in particular, eager to avenge the affront they had received in the beginning of the day, did the most bloody execution on the flying enemy, and from the field of battle to Edinburg, for the space of five miles, the whole ground was strewn with dead bodies. The priests, above all, and the monks, received no quarter; and the English made sport of slaughtering men, who, from their extreme zeal and animosity, had engaged in an enterprise so ill-befitting their profession. Few victories have been more decisive, or gained with smaller loss to the victors. There fell not 200 of the English; and according to the most moderate computation, over 10,000 of the Scots perished on the field of battle or in the flight.

PIRNA, A.D. 1756.—The battle of Pirna, in Saxony, was fought in the year 1756, between the army of Frederic II. (the Great) and the Saxons. The battle was hotly contested; but resulted finally in the defeat of the Saxons who were put to rout with great slaughter.

PLACENCIA, B.C. 219.—The modern city of Placenza, in north Italy, occupies the site of the ancient city of Placencia. In the vicinity of this town, in the year 219 B.C., an obstinate battle was fought between the army of Hannibal, and the Romans. The Romans were defeated.

PLAINS OF ABRAHAM. See Quebec.

PLATÆA, B.C. 479.—This city of ancient Greece, in Bœotia, is now wholly in ruins. It is situated at the northern foot of Mount Cithæron, about seven miles south-west from Thebes.

Mardonius, the Persian general, whom Xerxes had commanded to remain in Greece with 300,000 men, was on his return with his troops from Attica to Bœotia. Upon his arrival in Bœotia he encamped by the river Asopus. The Grecians followed him thither under command of Pausanias, king of Sparta, and of Aristides, general of the Athenians. The Persian army consisted of 300,000 men. That of the Grecians did not amount to 70,000; of which there were but 5,000 Spartans; but as these were accompanied by 35,000 helots, viz: seven for each Spartan, they made up together 40,000; the latter of these were light-armed troops. The Athenian forces consisted of but 8,000, and the troops of the allies made up the remainder. The right wing of the army was commanded by the Spartans, and the left by the Athenians. Mardonius, in order to try the Grecians, sent out his cavalry, in which he was strongest, to skirmish with them. They charged upon the Megarians who were encamped in the open country, and who, unable to stand against the superior numbers of the enemy, dispatched a messenger to Pausanias for assistance. Pausanias hearing their request, and seeing the camp of the Megarians darkened with the showers of darts and arrows, was at a loss what to do, for he knew that his heavy-armed Spartans were not fit to act against cavalry. But Aristides immediately made an offer of his Athenians to go to the assistance of the Megarians; and gave immediate orders to Olympiodorus, one of the most active of his officers, to advance with his select band of three hundred men, intermixed with archers. In a moment they ran to the attack of the Persians. Their approach was seen by Masistius, the general of the Persian horse, a man distinguished for his strength and noble mien. Putting spurs to his horse he dashed against them, followed by his troops. Like a thunder-bolt they dashed into the midst of the Athenians, who withstood the shock with great firmness, and a sharp conflict ensued, for both parties considered this skirmish as a specimen of the success of the whole battle. At last the horse of the Persian general was wounded, and threw his rider who, encumbered by the weight of his armor, could not rise. The Athenians almost fought with each other in their eagerness as to which should be the first who should slay him. But to slay him was a difficult task, for not only his body and his head, but his legs and arms were covered with plates of gold, brass, and iron. But the vizor of his helmet leaving part of his face exposed, one of the Athenians thrust a spear into his eye, and thus dispatched him. The Persians then left the body, and fled. The news of the death of Masistius filled the Persian camp with grief. They cut off their hair, and the manes of their horses and mules, and filled the air with their cries and groans. For ten days after this skirmish both sides forbore the combat, because the soothsayers equally assured both armies of victory if they stood upon the defensive, and threatened the aggressor with total defeat. But at length Mardonius, seeing but a few days' provisions left for his troops, and that the Grecian army daily increased in numbers by the arrival of reinforcements, became uneasy, and resolved to pass the river the next morning by break of day, and if possible to take the Greeks by surprise. But at midnight a man on horseback rode into the Grecian camp. He was hailed by a sentinel. "Call Aristides, the Athenian, hither," said he, and soon Aristides stood before him. "I am Alexander of Macedon," said the horseman, "and for the sake of the friendship I bear you, I have exposed myself to the greatest danger, that I may prevent you from being surprised by your enemy's. Mardonius will give you battle tomorrow; not that he is induced by any well-grounded hope or prospect of success, but his men are famishing. Although his soothsayers endeavor to divert him from doing so, yet necessity compels him either to hazard a battle, or to sit still and see his whole army starve to death before his eyes." Alexander then took a solemn promise of Aristides not to communicate the intelligence to any other person, except Pausanias, the commander-in-chief. Aristides immediately went to the tent of Pausanias, and laid the whole matter before him. Pausanias forthwith gave orders to the officers to prepare for battle. He changed his order of bettle by placing the Athenians on the right wing instead of the left which they before occupied. This he did in order to oppose the Athenians to the Persians who formed the left wing of the Persian army. But Mardonius upon learning this movement, made a little change in his army; the Athenians again moved from the right to the left; the Persians made a like movement, so that they still faced the Lacedæmonians, and in this manner the whole day passed without any action at all.

In the evening the Grecians held a council of war, in which they determined to decamp, and take possession of a place more commodious for water, because the springs of their present camp were disturbed and spoiled by the enemy's horse. After nightfall the Grecian army was put in motion; but the soldiers marched very unwillingly, and could not, without great difficulty, be kept together. At length they halted near the city of Platæa. As soon as Mardonius heard that the Grecians had decamped, he drew his army into order of battle, and pursued them with the hideous shouts and howls of his barbarian forces. They thought they were not going to fight an enemy, but to strip and plunder a mass of flying fugitives. While in hot pursuit, the Persians encountered the Lacedæmonians, who were alone and separated from the main body of the Grecian army. They were about 50,000 strong. The encounter was exceedingly fierce; on both sides the men fought with the courage of lions, and the barbarians perceived that they were contending with men who had resolved to conquer or die on the field. The Athenians hastened to their assistance, but the Greeks who were on the side of the Persians, to the number of 50,000 men, went out to meet them, and prevented them from joining the Lacedæmonians. Aristides, with his brave men, bore up firmly against them, and withstood the attack. His 8,000 men of courage were more formidable than the 20,000 Grecian renegades who opposed him. The battle was thus divided into two parts, and the Lacedæmonians first broke through the Persian ranks. Now the barbarians fled before the vengeful swords of the Spartans. In vain did Mardonius ride through their ranks urging them back upon the enemy. He himself rode into the thickest of the fight, and with his own sword brought many a Spartan to the ground. But a stone from the hand of a Spartan named Arimnestus struck him on the head, and crushing through his helmet broke his skull, and he fell upon his horse a corpse.

SIEGE OF PLATÆA.

Page 482

The barbarians, flying to their camp, were pursued thither by the Spartans. Shortly afterward the Athenians routed the Thebans, killing 300 persons of the first distinction on the spot. But now they learned that the Persians had shut themselves up in their camp, which was strongly fortified. They suffered the flying Thebans to escape, and hastened to assist their allies in besieging the camp. They stormed and took the camp, and then the work of slaughter commenced. Out of 300,000 Persians only 40,000 escaped, and these men escaped only through the discretion of Artabazus, a Persian general, who foresaw by Mardonius's imprudent conduct that he would be defeated, and, after having distinguished himself in the engagement, made a timely retreat with the 40,000 men he commanded, and safely conveyed them into Asia. Of the Grecian army only 1,360 were slain, and of these only 52 were Athenians. The Lacedæmonians lost 91. This battle was fought on the 4th of Bœdromion, which day answers to the 19th of our September, and by it Greece was totally delivered forever from the continual alarms to which she was exposed on account of Persian invasions. From that time none of the princes of Persia dared to appear with a hostile force beyond the Hellespont.

B. C. 431.—The Peloponnesian War.—

The first act of hostilities by which the Peloponnesian war was begun, was committed by the Thebans, who besieged Platæa, then in alliance with Athens. The Thebans gained their entrance into the city through treachery; but the citizens fell upon them in the night, and killed them all, with the exception of about 200, who were taken prisoners; but shortly afterward they were all put to death. The Athenians, as soon as they heard of the action at Platæa, sent men and provisions thither, and cleared the city of all persons who were incapable of bearing arms.

B. C. 428. — This siege of Platæa is one of the most famous of antiquity, on account of the vigorous efforts of both parties, but especially for the glorious resistance made by the besieged, and their bold and industrious stratagem, by which several of them made their escape from the city, and from the fury of the enemy. The Lacedæmonians besieged this place in the beginning of the third campaign. As soon as they had encamped around the city, in order to lay waste the surrounding country, the Platæans sent deputies to Archidamus, the commander of the Lacedæmonians, to represent that he could not attack them with the slightest shadow of justice, because, that, after the battle of Platæe, Pausanias, the Grecian general, offering up a sacrifice, in their city, to Jupiter the Deliverer, in presence of all the allies, had given them their freedom, to reward their valor and zeal; and, therefore, they ought not to be disturbed in the enjoyment of their liberties, since it had been granted them by a Lacedæmonian. Archidamus answered that their demands would be very reasonable, had they not joined with the Athenians, the professed enemies to the liberties of Greece; but that, if they would disengage themselves from their present alliance, or at least remain neuter, they then should be left to the full enjoyment of their privileges. The deputies replied that they could not possibly come to any agreement without the cognizance of the Athenians, to whose city they had sent their wives and children. The Lacedæmonians permitted them to send thither. The Athenians, however, promised solemnly to send aid to the utmost of their power to the Platæans, and the latter resolved to suffer the last extremities, rather than surrender. Accordingly their deputies mounted the walls of the city, and informed the Lacedæmonians that they could not comply with their desires.

This was no sooner heard than Archidamus called the gods to bear witness, that he did not first infringe the alliance, and was not the cause of the calamities which might befall the Platæans, for having refused the just and reasonable conditions offered them. He then aroused his army to action.

He first of all surrounded the city with a circumvallation of trees, which were laid lengthways, very close together, with their boughs interwoven, and turned toward the city, to prevent any person going out of it. He afterward set up a platform to set the batteries on, in hopes that, as so many hands were employed, they should soon take the city. He therefore caused trees to be felled on Mount Cithæron, and interwove them with fascines, in order to support the terrace on all sides: he then threw into it wood, earth, and stones, in short every thing that could help to fill it up. The whole army worked day and night, incessantly, during seventy days; one half of the soldiers reposing themselves, while the other half were at work. The besieged, observing that the work began to rise, threw up a wooden wall upon the walls of the city opposite to the platform, in order that they might always out-top the besiegers. They filled the hollow of the wooden wall with the bricks they took from the rubbish of the neighboring houses, which they had pulled down for that purpose. The wooden case was designed to keep the wall from falling as it was carrying up. It was covered on the outside with hides, both raw and dry, to defend the workmen from missive weapons, and to prevent the wood from being fired by the enemy. This work, within, was raised to a great height, and the platform, without, was raised with equal expedition. But the besieged made a hole in the opposite wall, in order to carry off the earth that sustained the platform; but they were perceived by the besiegers who put baskets of reeds, filled with mortar, in the place of the earth which had been removed, because they could not be so easily carried off. The besieged, therefore, finding their first stratagem defeated, made a mine underground as far as the platform, in order to work under cover, and to remove from it the earth and other materials of which it was composed, and which they passed from hand to hand as far as the city. These operations long escaped the discovery of the besiegers. At length, however, they found that their work did not go on forward; and that the more earth they laid on, the lower it sunk. But the besieged were apprehensive that, as they were so few in number, they should not be able long to hold out against such numerous besiegers, and had recourse to another project. They desisted from carrying up the great pile which was to counterwork the platform, and beginning at each end of their wall where it was low, they ran another wall in the form of a crescent along the inside of the city, that if the great wall should be taken this might afterward hold out. The enemy would then be under the necessity of throwing up a a second platform against it, and that thus the further they advanced their difficulties would be doubled, and the siege be carried on with increase of danger.

In the mean time, the besiegers having completed their platform, set up their battering machines, and played away against the wall. One of these engines was worked so dexteriously from the platform against the great pile within, that it shook it from top to bottom, and threw the Platæans into great consternation, although it did not discourage them. They employed every art that their imagination could suggest against the enemy's batteries. They prevented the effects of the battering-rams by ropes, the lower ends of which were formed into nooses with which they caught the heads of the machines and thus turned aside their strokes. They also employed another artifice: the two ends of a great beam were made fast by long iron chains to two large pieces of timber, supported at due distance from the wall in the nature of a balance; so that whenever the enemy plied their machine, the besieged lifted up this beam, and let it fall on the head of the battering-ram, which quite deadened its force, and consequently made it of no effect. Upon this the besiegers determined to try whether it was not possible to set the town on fire, and burn it down, as it was not large, by help of a brisk gale of wind. Procuring for this purpose a quantity of faggots, they tossed them from the platform into the void space between the wall and the inner fortification. As many hands were employed in this business, they soon filled it up, and then proceeded to toss more of them into the other parts of the city lying beyond, as far as they could, by the advantage which the eminence gave them. Upon these they threw fiery balls made of sulphur and pitch, which ignited the faggots, and soon kindled such a flame as before this time no one had ever seen kindled by the hand of man. This invention was very nearly carrying the city, which had baffled all the others, for the Platæans could not make head at once against the fire and the enemy in several parts of the town, and, had the weather favored the besiegers, as they had hoped it would, it would certainly have been taken; but as history informs us, a heavy rain suddenly fell, attended with claps of thunder, and extinguished the flames. The last effort of the besiegers having been defeated as successfully as all the rest, they now turned the siege into a blockade, and surrounded the city with a brick wall strengthened on each side by a deep ditch. The whole army was engaged successively in this work, and when it was finished, they left a guard over half of it; the Bœotians offering to guard the rest, and the Lacedæmonians returned to Sparta in the latter part of October. There were now in Platæa only 400 inhabitants, and eighty Athenians with 110 women to dress their food, all the rest having been sent to Athens before the siege.

During the winter the Platæans, finding themselves much distressed by the failure of their provisions, giving up all hope of succor from the Athenians, and quite destitute of all other means of preservation, formed a project now in concert with those Athenians who were shut up with them in blockade; "first of all to march out of the town in company, and to compass their escape, if possible, over the works of the enemy. But half of them, struck with the greatness of the danger, and the boldness of the enterprise, refused to share in the attempt. But the others, to the number of 220, resolutely adhered to attempt an escape through the enemy."

The works of the besiegers was composed of two circular walls; one toward Platæa, and the other outward, to prevent any attack from Athens. The walls were at the distance of sixteen feet one from the other; and this intermediate space of sixteen feet was built into distinct lodgments for the guards. These lodgments, however, standing thick together, gave to the whole work the appearance of one thick center wall, with battlements on both sides. At every ten battlements were lofty turrets of the same breadth with the whole work, reaching from the face of the inward wall to that of the outward; so that there was no passage by the sides of a turret, but the communication lay open through the middle of them all. By night when the weather was rainy, the guards quitted the battlements, and sheltering themselves in the turrets, as near at hand, and covered over head, they there continued their watch. Such was the work by which the Platæans were entirely surrounded. On each side of this work was a deep ditch, the earth of which had been employed in making the bricks of the wall. The besieged first ascertained the height of the wall, by counting the rows of bricks which composed it. This they did at different times, and employed several men for the purpose, in order that they might not mistake the calculation. This was the easier, because as the wall stood at a small distance, every part of it was distinctly visible. They then made ladders of a proper length. When every thing was ready, the enterprising body, taking advantage of a dark night, tempestuous with wind and rain, marched out of the city. Thæanetus and Eumolpidas, the authors of the project, were now the conductors. After crossing the first ditch, they approached quite up to the wall of the enemy, unperceived by the guards. The darkness of the night prevented their being seen, and the noise they made was drowned in the loudness of the storm. They advanced also at a considerable distance from one another, to prevent any discovery from the mutual clashing of their arms. They were further armed in the most compact manner, and wore a covering only on the left foot, to keep them from sliding so easily into the mire. The bearers of the ladders marched first, and applied them to the walls, at a space between the turrets, where they knew no guards were posted, because it rained. That instant, twelve men, armed only with a breastplate, and a dagger, mounted the ladders, and marched directly to the turrets, six on each side. They were followed by soldiers armed only with javelins, that they might mount the easier. Behind them followed their companions bearing the bucklers of those before them, ready to deliver them into their hands, should they be obliged to charge. When most of them had reached the top of the wall, they were discovered by the falling of a tile, which one of their comrades in seizing upon the parapet to keep himself steady, had dislodged and thrown down. The alarm was immediately given from the towers, and the whole camp hastened to the wall; but the darkness was so intense, that the besiegers could not discover the cause of the outcry. At this crisis, the Platæans who were left behind in the city, sallied forth and assaulted the besiegers' works, in a quarter opposite to that where their friends were attempting to pass. The besiegers were thus thrown into a state of the utmost perplexity and confusion; each was afraid to quit his post to run to the place of alarm, for he did not know how soon it would be attacked. But a body of 300 men who were kept as a reserve for any unforeseen accident that might occur, hastened to the spot whence the noise proceeded. Torches were immediately elevated on the side of the wall toward Thebes, to show the Thebans that the besiegers needed assistance. But the Platæans who were in the city, also lighted torches, and elevated them in various quarters at the same time, and thus rendered the besiegers' signal useless.

In the mean time, those Platæans who had first mounted the walls, possessed themselves of the two towers which flanked the intervals where the ladders were planted, and having killed the guards, they posted themselves there to defend the passage, and keep off the besiegers. They defended their position with so much energy, that none of the enemy were able to reach them. Two ladders were then placed against the two towers, and a large number of the Platæans mounted them to discharge their arrows upon those of the enemy who were advancing to the wall, as well as those who were hastening from the neighboring towers. Their companions now had time to set up several ladders, and to throw down the parapet, that those Platæans who had not yet gained the summit of the wall might come up with greater ease. As fast as they came up, they went down on the other side, and drew up near the ditch on the outside to shoot at those of the enemy who appeared. After they had passed over, the men who were in the towers descended, and hastily followed their comrades to the ditch. At that instant the guard of 300, with torches appeared, to intercept their passage. But as the Platæans could see their enemies by the light of their torches, better than they themselves could be seen, they took sure aim, and finally succeeded in forcing their way through the ditch, though not without great difficulty and toil. For the water in the ditch was frozen, and the ice was not of sufficient thickness to bear their weight. Having succeeded in gaining the opposite side of the ditch, they took their way toward Thebes, the better to conceal their retreat, because it was not likely that they would flee toward the city of the enemy. In fact the besiegers were deceived, for the fugitives soon saw them hastily pursuing them with torches on the road which led to Athens. The Platæans continued on the road toward Thebes for about half a mile, and then flew to the mountains. After which they turned their steps toward Athens, where 212 out of 220 who had quitted Platææ, arrived in safety. The rest had returned to the besieged city, through fear, except one, an archer who was taken by the enemy while crossing the ditch. The besiegers after having pursued the fugitives to no purpose, returned to their camp. In the mean time, the Platæans who remained in the city, having been informed by those who returned, that their companions had been slain, sent a herald to demand the dead bodies for burial; but on being informed of the true state of the affair the herald withdrew.

During the following summer the Platæans who remained in the blockaded city, becoming in absolute want of provisions, and unable to make the least defense, surrendered upon condition that they should not be punished till they had been tried by the due forms of justice. Five commissioners were sent from Sparta for this purpose, and these, without charging the Platæans with any crime, merely asked them whether they had done the Lacedæmonians and the allies any service during the war. The Platæans were both embarrassed and surprised at this question. They well knew that it had been suggested by their inveterate enemies the Thebans, who had vowed their destruction. They therefore reminded the Lacedæmonians of the services they had done for Greece in general, both at the battle of Artemisium, and that of Platæa. They declared that they had only joined the Athenians to protect themselves from the hostilities of the Thebans, against whom they had implored the assistance of the Lacedæmonians to no purpose. They intreated the Lacedæmonians to remember their former bravery and former services, and they concluded by saying, "We may venture to say that our interest is inseparable from your glory; you can not deliver up your ancient friends and benefactors to the unjust hatred of the Thebans, without overwhelming yourselves with eternal infamy."

To these just remonstrances, however, the Lacedæmonians paid no attention. They adhered entirely to their first question, "Have you done us any service during the war?" and making them pass, one after another as they severally answered, "No," they were immediately butchered. Not one escaped. About 200 Platæans were thus killed, and twenty-five Athenians who were with them met with the same fate. In the following year Platæa was entirely destroyed by the Thebans, into whose hands the Lacedæmonians had committed this ill-fated city.

PLATTSBURG, A.D. 1814.—Plattsburg, the capital of Clinton co., N. Y., is situated on both sides of the Saranac river, at its entrance into Cumberland Bay, on Lake Champlain, about one hundred and sixty miles north-east from Albany.

In the third year of the second war between the United States and England, Sir George Prevost, governor-general and commander-in-chief of the British forces in Canada, made preparations in Lower Canada to invade the territories of the United States on Lake Champlain. A body of fourteen thousand men was collected on the frontier of Lower Canada, with a formidable train of artillery, and commanded, under Prevost, by several generals and officers who had acquired durable renown in the Peninsular campaigns. "If any thing could have added to the well-founded expectations entertained by this noble force," writes a British historian, "it was the circumstance of its being in great part composed of the veterans who had served with Wellington in Spain and France." With this magnificent army Prevost invaded the country, and advanced toward Plattsburg, which was occupied by three thousand American troops under General Macomb. The British force crossed the Canada line at Champlain, twenty-four miles north of Plattsburg. Prevost left a detachment of one thousand men at Chazy, fourteen miles, and another detachment of the same strength at Cumberland Head, six miles from Plattsburg, and with twelve thousand troops arrived before Plattsburg on the 6th of September, 1814. During the spring and summer both the English and the Americans had constructed a fleet on Lake Champlain, and these were now ready for active operations. The American fleet consisted of four vessels and ten galleys, and was commanded by Commodore McDonough; the British fleet was commanded by Captain Downie, and consisted of four large vessels and thirteen galleys. The American fleet mounted 86 guns and carried 850 men; that of the British mounted 96 guns and carried about 1,000 men. The American fleet, which, early in the season, lay in Otter Bay, was got into the lake, and sailed for the Bay of Plattsburg, to assist Macomb in the defense of the town. On the 20th of September McDonough anchored his fleet just within the mouth of the bay, nearly opposite where the Saranac empties into it. A large shoal and an island lay between him and the main land, effectually blocking the approach of an enemy on that side. Prevost, meanwhile, was busily engaged in erecting his batteries before Plattsburg, and by the 10th of September they were all completed; but still the English general did not deem it expedient to make the attack till the fleet should arrive. At length, on the morning of the 11th, the British fleet hove in sight. The American vessels were immediately cleared for action, and the British squadron, under easy sail, advanced one after another round Cumberland Head, and hauling up to the wind, waited the approach of the galleys. It was a bright Sabbath morning; but the inhabitants of Plattsburg and vicinity deserted their churches, and thought only of the fearful drama which was so soon to be enacted. What a gorgeous spectacle was presented to the eyes of the beholders on that day. Lying calmly at anchor in the bay were the four American ships, the Eagle, the Saratoga, the Ticonderoga, and the Preble, with their attendant galleys; while the four English ships, the Chubb, the Linnet, the Confiance, and the Finch, were lying with flapping sails, between Cumberland Head and the American fleet awaiting the arrival of their galleys.* Prevost's army, with banners flying and music sounding, was drawn up in battle array before Plattsburg, where three thousand Americans were awaiting with beating hearts the signal for battle.

As the British fleet approached, McDonough displayed his flag. On it was inscribed, "Impressed seamen call on every man to do his duty." The American seamen hailed the motto with loud cheers. McDonough's vessels were anchored in a line running north and south; his galleys formed a second line in the rear; the English ships advanced from the south-east, with bows on. The Eagle, which lay nearest the shore, opened her broadsides on the enemy; the Saratoga, however, reserved her fire. The British ship Confiance boldly advanced. When she came within range McDonough himself sighted a long twenty-four pounder, and fired into her. The ball swept the deck from stem to stern, killing many of her men, and dashing her wheel into fragments. Upon this every American vessel opened its fire. The Confiance, which was greatly superior to any single vessel in the American flotilla, did not return a shot, but held steadily on in spite of the tempest of balls which went crashing through her rigging and spars, which fell in showers under the well-directed shots of the American fleet. Having arrived within two cable-lengths of the Saratoga, she let go her anchors, and brought her broadsides to bear on the enemy. Instantly she appeared a sheet of flame; all her guns were discharged at once into the Saratoga. The effect of this broadside was terrible; nearly half of the crew of the Saratoga were struck down, and, for a moment, the seamen were completely stunned. The Americans, however, soon recovered from the effects of the blow, and springing to their guns, poured broadside after broadside into the Confiance with fatal effect. The battle now raged fearfully. The decks of the Saratoga and Confiance were strewn with the dead and dying. Captain Downie was killed, and Commodore McDonough slightly wounded. At length when reduced to a perfect wreck, the Confiance surrendered; and with her defeat the battle, which had lasted two hours and a half, was terminated. The other vessels struck their flags; but the galleys took to their sweeps and escaped. The Americans lost in this fight 110 killed and wounded. Of these all but 20 fell on board the Saratoga and Eagle. The English loss was never fully ascertained. It is supposed, however, to have been nearly double.

While this desperate conflict was raging on the lake, the British batteries on the shore were pouring their discharges fast and furious into the town. At length, finding the cannonade produced no effect, the British general resolved to carry the place by assault. The British advanced in three columns; but they were received by the Americans with such a furious fire of musketry and artillery, that they were obliged to fall back to their intrenchments, leaving the ground behind them strewn with dead and wounded, and when they saw the flags of the British fleet strike successively to the Americans, they were so much disheartened that they diminished their fire, and at nightfall it ceased entirely. Sir George Prevost now ordered a retreat, and that army of 12,000 men, "in great part composed of the veterans who had served with Wellington in Spain and France," ignominiously fled before Macomb's gallant little army of 3,000. Macomb would have pursued, but a furious storm of wind and rain arose, and the British were allowed to retire unmolested. Prevost lost 250 in killed and wounded. So hasty was his flight that he abandoned his wounded, commending them to the humanity of the victors, and continued his retreat toward the St. Lawrence.

* American—1, Eagle, mounted 7 guns; 2, Saratoga (flag ship), mounted 26 guns; 3, Ticonderoga, mounted 17 guns; 4, Preble, mounted 7 guns. English—1, Chubb, mounted 11 guns; 2, Linnet, mounted 16 guns; 3, Confiance (flag ship), mounted 37 guns; 4, Finch, mounted 11 guns.

POICTIERS, A.D. 1356.—Poictiers is situated on the Clain, in France, 58 miles southwest of Tours. It is inclosed by ancient walls. For three centuries Poictiers was attached to the English crown. The famous battle of Poictiers was fought on the 19th of September, 1356, between the English under Edward, Prince of Wales, called the Black Prince, and the French under king John, of France.

The Black Prince, with an army of 12,000 men, of whom about 4,000 were Englishmen, had penetrated into the very heart of France. The King of France, provoked at the insult offered him by this incursion, collected an army of above 60,000 men, and advanced by hasty marches to intercept his enemy. The French army came within sight of the English at Maupertuis, five miles from Poictiers, on the 17th of September, and the Prince of Wales saw that he must hazard a battle. He accordingly prepared for battle with all the courage of a young hero, and with all the prudence of the oldest and most experienced commander.

But the utmost prudence and courage would have proved insufficient to save him in this extremity had the King of France known how to make use of his present advantages. His great superiority in numbers enabled him to surround his enemy; and by intercepting all provisions, which were already become scarce in the English camp, to reduce this small army, without a blow, to the necessity of surrending at discretion. But such was the impatient valor of the French nobility, and so much had their thoughts been bent on overtaking the English as their sole object, that this idea never struck any of the commanders; and they immediately took measures for the assault, as for a certain victory. While the French army was drawn up in battle array, they were stopped by the appearance of the Cardinal of Perigord; who, having learned the approach of the two armies to each other, had hastened, by interposing his good offices, to prevent any further effusion of Christian blood. By John's permission, he carried proposals to the Prince of Wales; and found him so sensible of the bad posture of his affairs, that an accommodation seemed not impracticable. Edward told him, that he would agree to any terms consistent with his own honor, and that of England; and he offered to purchase a retreat, by ceding all the conquests which he had made during this and the former campaign, and by stipulating not to serve against France during the course of seven years. But John, imagining that he had now got into his hands a sufficient pledge for the restitution of Calais, then in the possession of the English, required that Edward should surrender himself prisoner with a hundred of his attendants; and offered on these terms a safe retreat to the English army. The prince rejected the proposal with disdain; and declared that, whatever fortune might attend him, England should never be obliged to pay the price of his ransom. This resolute answer cut off all hopes of accommodation; but as the day was already spent in negotiating, the battle was delayed till the next morning.

The Cardinal of Perigord bore a great attachment to the French interest; but the most determined enemy could not, by any expedient, have done a greater prejudice to John's affairs, than he did by this delay. The Prince of Wales had leisure, during the night, to strengthen, by new intrenchments, the post which he had before so judiciously chosen; and he contrived an ambush of 300 men-at-arms, and as many archers, whom he put under the command of the Captal de Buche, and ordered to make a circuit, that they might fall on the flank or rear of the French army during the engagement. The van of his army was commanded by the Earl of Warwick, the rear by the Earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, the main body by the prince in person. The Lords Chandos, Audeley, and many other brave and experienced commanders, were at the head of the different corps of his army.

John also arranged his forces in three divisions; the first commanded by the Duke of Orleans, the king's brother; the second by the dauphin, attended by his two younger brothers; the third by the king himself, who had by his side Philip, his fourth son and favorite, then about fourteen years of age. There was no reaching the English army, but through a narrow lane, covered on each side by hedges; and in order to open this passage, the Marshals Andreken and Clermont, were ordered to advance with a separate detachment of men-at-arms. While they marched along the lane, a body of English archers, who lined the hedges, plied them on each side with arrows; and being very near them, yet placed in perfect safety, they coolly took their aim against the enemy, and slaughtered them with impunity. The French detachment, much discouraged by the unequal combat, and diminished in their number, arrived at the end of the lane, where they met on the open ground the Prince of Wales, himself, at the head of a chosen body, ready for their reception. They were discomfited and overthrown; Clermont was slain, and Andreken unhorsed and made prisoner; and the remainder of the detachment, who were still in the lane, and exposed to the shot of the enemy, without being able to make resistance, recoiled upon their own army, and put every thing into disorder. In this critical moment, the Captal de Buche, unexpectedly appeared, and attacked in flank the dauphin's line, which fell into some confusion. Landas, Bodenai, and St. Yevant, to whom the care of that young prince and his brothers had been committed, too anxious for their charge, or for their own safety, carried them off the field, and set the example of flight, which was followed by that whole division. The Duke of Orleans seized with a like panic, and imagining all was lost, thought no longer of fighting, but carried off his division by a retreat, which sooned turned into a flight. Lord Chandos called out to the prince, that the day was won; and encouraged him to attack the division under King John, which, though more numerous than the whole English army, were somewhat dismayed at the precipitant retreat of their companions.

"Sir," said Sir John Chandos to the prince, "the field is won—let us mount, and charge the French king. I know him for an intrepid knight who will never flee from an enemy. It may be a bloody attempt, but please God and St. George, he shall be our prisoner." The advice was approved, and the army advanced to the moor which had become the theater of battle.

The Duke of Athens, Constable of France, was the first to throw himself in their way; his shout of "Mountjoy and St. Denis!" was answered by the national cry of "St. George for Guienne!" and in a few minutes the duke, with the greater part of his followers, were slain. The German cavalry next charged the English; but were easily dispersed with the loss of the three earls, their commanders. Lastly, John himself, animated by despair, led up his division on foot, and fought for honor, when it was evidently too late to fight for victory. John maintained the unequal contest with the most heroic valor. But at length, after receiving two wounds in the face, he was beaten to the ground, and was surrounded by a host of adversaries, each of whom was anxious to secure so noble a prize. A young knight, bursting through the crowd, bent his knee, and requested him to surrender or he would lose his life. He asked for his cousin, the Prince of Wales. "He is not here," replied the knight, "but surrender to me and I will conduct you to him." "But who are you?" inquired the king. "Denis de Morbecque," he replied, "a knight of Artois, but compelled to serve the King of England because I have been banished from France." John surrendered to him, and his son Philip was made prisoner at the same time. Thus ended the battle of Poictiers. Edward's treatment of the conquered king stands forth in golden relief on the page of history. John, in captivity, received the honors of a king; and all the English and Gascon knights imitated the generous example of their prince. Edward conducted his prisoner to Bordeaux, whence he concluded a two years' truce to France, and conducted his prisoner into England. On the 5th of May, 1357, a great assemblage of people of all ranks and stations gathered at Southwark to welcome the conqueror. John was clad in royal attire, and mounted on a white steed, distinguished by the richness of its caparisons. The conqueror rode by his side in a meaner attire, and on the back of a black pony. In this situation, more glorious than all the parade of a Roman triumph, he passed through the streets of London, and presented the King of France to his father, Edward III., King of England. Edward received the royal prisoner with the same courtesy as if he had been a neighboring potentate that had voluntarily come to pay him a friendly visit. By a treaty ratified between Edward and John in 1359, the latter was set at liberty, and he returned to France the same year.

PORTO NOVO, A.D. 1782.—In the year 1782, a battle was fought near Porto Novo, in India, between the troops of Hyder Ali and the British force under Sir Eyre Coote, in which the former were defeated.

PORTSMOUTH, A.D. 1377.—About the year 1377 a battle was fought near Portsmouth, in England, between the English and French. The French, in 1377, landed at Portsmouth, in an attempt to invade England. They were vigorously attacked by the British, who, after an obstinate conflict, succeeded in driving back the invaders with great loss; but not before the French had succeeded in burning a large part of the town.

PRAGA.—Praga is situated directly opposite Warsaw, in Poland, on the Vistula, which is here crossed by a bridge. In the year 1656, a battle took place here between the army of Gustavus of Sweden and the Poles, in which the latter were defeated; and a bloody battle also took place near this town, in the latter part of the month of February, 1831, between the forces of the Emperor of Russia, under Diebitch, and the Polish insurgents, under General Radziwil. The battle commenced on the morning of the 24th of February, and continued with the utmost obstinacy and various success for two days. The Poles were at length defeated with a loss of about 4,000 men, and retired into Warsaw. The Russian loss was nearly 5,000 men, killed and wounded. See Warsaw.

PRAGUE, A.D. 1741.—In the year 1741, Prague, one of the most ancient and interesting cities of Europe, was taken by the French; under its walls in 1744 a battle was fought between the Austrians and the Prussians, under Frederic the Great, who won a complete victory, but was soon afterward obliged to evacuate the city. Since then it has belonged to Austria.

PRESTONPANS, A.D. 1745.—Near this village, in Scotland, was fought on the 21st of September, 1745, a battle between the royal army of England, under Sir John Cope, consisting of about 2,100 regular troops, and the Highlanders, under Charles the Pretender. The battle was short; nearly at the first fire the royalists were struck with a panic, and throwing away their arms, fled in wild terror. The Highlanders pursued eagerly, slaughtering the fugitives almost without resistance.

PRINCETON, A.D. 1777.—Princeton is a pleasantly situated town in Mercer county, New Jersey, forty miles north-east of Philadelphia. Here, on the 3d of January, 1777, was fought a battle between the American army under General Washington, and the British army commanded by Colonel Mawhood.

The situation of the American army, after the action of Assunpink, or Trenton bridge, was extremely critical. If Washington maintained his position on the south side of the Assunpink, it was certain that he would be attacked by a superior force, with the probable result of the destruction of his little army. Fires having been lighted immediately after dark, a council of war was convened. Washington, by the advice of General St. Clair, Colonel Reed, and others, "formed the bold and judicious design of abandoning the Delaware and marching silently in the night, by a circuitous route, along the left flank of the British army, into their rear at Princeton, where he knew they could not be very strong. After beating them there, he proposed to make a rapid move to Brunswick, where their baggage and principal magazines lay under a weak guard."

The more effectually to mask the movement (says General Wilkinson, in his memoirs), Washington ordered the guards to be doubled, a strong fatigue party to be set at work on the intrenchment across the road near the mill, within distinct hearing of the enemy, the baggage to be sent to Burlington, the troops to be silently filed off by detachments, and the neighboring fences to be used as fuel by the guards to keep up blazing fires until toward day, when they had orders to retire. The night, though cloudless, was dark, and, though calm, exceedingly cold, and the movement was so cautiously conducted as to elude the vigilance of the enemy. Taking the lower road by Sandtown, across the Quaker bridge, the Americans reached Stony creek, which having crossed, they came to a small wood south of the Friends' meeting-house in the vicinity of Princeton, a little before sunrise. Here the main column wheeled to the right, and turning the south-east corner of the wood, marched diretly for Princeton. General Mercer, having under him Captains Stone, Fleming, Neal and others, with about 350 men, were detached to take possession of the bridge on the old Trenton road, for the double purpose of intercepting fugitives from Princeton, and to cover the rear of the army against Lord Cornwallis, from Trenton.

The morning was bright, serene, and extremely cold, with a hoar-frost, which bespangled every object. A brigade of the enemy under Lieutenant-Colonel Mawhood, consisting of the 17th, 40th, and 55th regiments, with three troops of dragoons, had quartered at Princeton the preceding night. The 17th regiment on their march to join Lord Cornwallis at Trenton, had passed the bridge over Stony creek before they discovered the Americans. Colonel Mawhood immediately repassed the bridge, when he first discovered General Mercer's detachment marching up the creek at a distance of about 500 yards from the bridge. Both parties then endeavored to get possession of the high ground on their right. The Americans reached the house and orchard of William Clark, but perceiving the British line advancing on the opposite side of the height, and a worm fence between them, they pushed through the orchard, and anticipated the enemy about forty paces. The first fire was delivered by General Mercer, which the enemy returned with a volley, and instantly charged. The Americans being armed only with rifles, were forced, after the third fire, to abandon the fence, and fled in disorder.

On hearing the firing, General Washington directed the Pennsylvania militia to support General Mercer, and in person led them on with two pieces of artillery, under Captain William Moulder, who formed in battery on the right of Thomas Clark's house. The enemy had pursued the detachment of General Mercer as far as the brow of the declivity, when they discovered for the first time the American army. They thereupon halted, and brought up their artillery. Encouraged by the irresolution of the militia, they attempted to carry Captain Moulder's battery; but being galled by his grape-shot, and perceiving Hitchcock's and another continental regiment advancing from the rear of the American column, they, after a few long shot with the militia, retreated over the fields up the north side of Stony brook. This action, from the first discharge of firearms to the retreat of the enemy, did not last more than fifteen or twenty minutes. They left their artillery on the ground, which the Americans, for want of horses, could not carry off. The 55th and 40th regiments of the enemy made some show of resistance at the deep ravine, a short distance south of the village of Princeton, and at the college, into which they precipitated themselves on the approach of the Americans. It was, however, soon abandoned, and many of them made prisoners. In this engagement upward of 100 of the enemy were killed, among whom was Captain Leslie, whose loss they much regreted, and nearly 300 taken prisoners. The numerical loss of the Americans was inconsiderable, not exceeding thirty, fourteen only being buried in the field; but it was of great magnitude in worth and talents—Colonels Haslet and Potter, Major Morris, Captains Shippen, Fleming, and Neal, were officers of much promise.

In the death of General Mercer, the Americans lost a chief who, for talents, education, integrity, and patriotism, was qualified to fill the highest trusts of the country. "The manner in which he was wounded," says General Wilkinson, "is an evidence of the excess to which the common soldiery are liable, in the heat of action, particularly when irritated by the loss of favorite officers. Being obstructed, when advancing, by a post and rail fence, in front of the orchard it may be presumed, the general dismounted voluntarily; for he was on foot when the troops gave way. In exerting himself to rally them, he was thrown into the rear; and, perceiving he could not escape, he turned about, somewhere near William Clark's barn, and surrendered, but was instantly knocked down and bayoneted thirteen times; when feigning to be dead, one of his murderers exclaimed, 'D—n him! he's dead—let us leave him.' After the retreat of the enemy, he was conveyed to the house of Thomas Clark, to whom he gave this account, and languished till the 12th, when he expired."

The following, relative to the conflict at Princeton, was derived from persons living in Princeton; one of whom was an eye-witness of some of the scenes described. Mr. Joseph Clark states that General Mercer was knocked down about fifty yards from his barn; and, after the battle, was assisted by his two aids, into the house of Thomas Clark—a new house then just erected, which is still standing, now owned and occupied by Mr. John Clark, about one and a quarter miles from the college, and about one fourth of a mile from the house of Mr. Thomas Clark. The late Miss Sarah Clark, of the society of Friends, with a colored woman for an assistant, took care of General Mercer, while he lived; and after his death his body was taken to Philadelphia, where, after laying in state, it was interred with military honors. The killed were buried about 200 yards north of Mr. Joseph Clark's barn, in a kind of driftway. Their bodies, frozen stiff, with their clothing mostly stripped off by the American soldiers, were piled into a wagon and thus carried to the grave.

The British being routed, the greater part retreated back to Princeton, about a mile and a quarter distant, where they had for some time previously occupied the college, and the large brick Presbyterian church, as barracks. Washington pushed on to Princeton, placed a few cannon a short distance from those buildings, and commenced firing upon them. The first ball is said to have entered the prayer-hall, a room used as a chapel in the college, and to have passed through the head of the portrait of George II., suspended on the wall. After a few discharges, Captain James Moore, one of the militia, a daring officer (late of Princeton), aided by a few men, burst open a door of the building, and demanded their surrender; which they instantly complied with. In the building were a number of invalid soldiers; but Washington, having no time to spare, left those unable to travel, on their parole of honor, and hurried off with the rest toward Brunswick. On reaching Kingston, about three miles distant, a consultation of general officers was hastily held on horseback; when a wish was generally expressed, to move on to New Brunswick, fall on the British troops, and secure the large supplies there laid up for their winter's consumption. But the American troops had, besides the action in the morning, been fighting at Trenton the day previous, and marching all night over rough and frozen roads: not half of them had been able to obtain breakfast or dinner; many were destitute of either shoes or stockings, and the whole were worn down with fatigue. Under these circumstances, Washington was reluctantly compelled to file off to the left, toward Rocky Hill. By going down the valley of the Millstone, he would avoid the army under Cornwallis, then in hot pursuit, from Trenton. Although the prize at Brunswick was rich and tempting, yet the danger of being held at bay there till the overwhelming force of Cornwallis, rapidly approaching in his rear, should overtake his worn-out troops, prevented him from making the attempt. Cornwallis arrived at Kingston shortly after the Americans had left; but, supposing they were still on the road to Brunswick, he pushed on through Kingston, and over little Rocky Hill, on the main road to Brunswick, which, from rocks and frozen ground, was almost impassable. Here his baggage-wagons broke down; but such was his anxiety to reach Brunswick, he pressed on, leaving them in charge of a guard of 200 or 300 men, to bring them on the next morning. A small company of fifteen or twenty militia, from the neighborhood, having learned the situation of this baggage, soon after dark assembled and arranged themselves among the trees, in a semicircular form, around where the soldiers lay guarding their wagons. On a concerted signal, they set up a tremendous shout, and commenced firing. The British were taken completely by surprise; and having found, by experience of the last ten days, that when they supposed their enemies were the farthest off, they were nearest at hand, and their fears magnifying the number of their assailants, they hastily drove off what few wagons were in a traveling condition, and left the rest a prize to the militia-men, who took them the next morning to the American camp. Here they were opened, and found to contain what proved the most acceptable of all articles to the American troops—namely, woolen clothing.

About the close of the action at Princeton, Washington detached a small party to destroy the bridge over Stony brook, at Worth's mills, on the road from Princeton to Trenton. This party had scarcely half completed their work, before the British troops from Trenton made their appearance on a hill a short distance west of the dwelling of Mr. Worth, and commenced firing on them. The Americans, however, pushed on their work with renewed vigor, until the cannon-balls began to strike around them, by which time they had thrown off the loose planks into the stream, and then hastily retreated. The baggage and artillery of the British troops were detained at the bridge nearly an hour before it could be made passable. The troops, however, were ordered to dash through the stream (then swollen and filled with running ice, and about breast high), and press forward as rapidly as possible toward New Brunswick. The officer who commanded the detachment ordered to destroy the bridge, is said to have been Major, (afterward Col.) John Kelly, of Pennsylvania, who died about the year 1835. After the British appeared in sight, it was necessary that some part of the bridge should be cut away, which was an extremely hazardous service under the fire of the enemy. Major Kelly, disdaining to order another to do what some might say he would not do himself, bravely took the axe and commenced cutting off the logs on which the planks of the bridge were laid. Several balls struck into the last log he was chopping, and on which he stood, when it broke down sooner than he expected, and he fell with it into the swollen stream. His men not believing it possible for him to escape, immediately fled. Major Kelly, by great exertion, got out of the water and followed them; but being unarmed and encumbered with frozen clothing, he was taken prisoner by a British soldier.

On the near approach of the British troops to Princeton, their advance division was suddenly brought to a stand by the discharge of a large 32-pounder. This piece, now in the central part of the college grounds, formerly belonged to the British; which Washington was unable to take with him when he left Princeton, on account of its carriage being broken. It was left on a temporary breast-work in the vicinity of the present residence of Dr. Samuel Miller, near the west end of the town; and was loaded by two or three persons, and pointed toward the British army. As their advance guard was coming up the rising ground, within 300 or 400 yards, it was discharged, which brought them instantly to a halt. The enemy, supposing that Washington had determined to make a stand under cover of the town, sent out their reconnoitering parties of horsemen, and in the mean time cautiously approached the breast-work with their main body, determined to carry it by storm. By these movements they were delayed nearly an hour; and when arrived at the breast-work and the town, were astonished to find them destitute of defenders.

PUENTE NACIONAL, A.D. 1847.—On the 11th of August, 1847, an engagement took place at Puente Nacional, a village of Mexico, between a body of American troops and a party of Mexicans; the latter were defeated. The Americans lost 11 men killed and 40 wounded.

PULTOWA, A.D. 1709.—Pultowa, or Poltava, as it is also written, is situated on the river Vorskla, in Russia. It is built on an eminence, and is inclosed by planted walks on the site of its former ramparts.

The history of Charles XII's conquests and reverses possesses all the interest of a romance. He was born at Stockholm on the 27th of June, 1682. He checked the designs of Denmark, defeated the Russians in a great battle, on the 30th November, 1700, at Narva, after which he gained possession of Poland. His next great enterprise was the invasion of Russia, but the tide of fortune turned against him, and he was defeated by Peter the Great in the decisive battle of Pultowa, on the 9th of July, 1709. Voltaire, in the following extract, has given us a most vivid account of the battle and his retreat.

It was on the 9th of July, 1709, that the decisive battle of Pultowa was fought between the two most famous monarchs that were then in the world. Charles XII., illustrious for nine years of victories; Peter Alexiowitz for nine years of pains taken to form troops equal to those of Sweden; the one glorious for having civilized his own; the other fighting for glory alone; Alexiowitz scorning to fly danger, and never making war but from interested views; the Swedish monarch, liberal from an innate greatness of soul; the Muscovite never granting favors, but in order to serve some particular people; the former a prince of uncommon sobriety and continence, naturally magnanimous and never cruel but once; the latter not having yet worn off the roughness of his education, nor the barbarity of his country, as much the object of terror to his subjects as of admiration to strangers, and too prone to excesses, which even shortened his days. Charles had the title of "Invincible," of which a single moment might deprive him; the neighboring nations had already given Peter Alexiowitz the name of "Great," which, as he did not owe to his victories, he could not forfeit by a defeat.

In order to form a distinct idea of this battle, and the place where it was fought, we must figure to ourselves Pultowa on the north, the camp of the King of Sweden on the south, stretching a little to the east, his baggage about a mile behind him, and the river of Pultowa on the north of the town, running from east to west.

The czar had passed the river about a mile from Pultowa, toward the west, and was beginning to form his camp.

At break of day the Swedes appeared before the trenches with four iron cannons for their whole artillery; the rest were left in the camp, with about 3,000 men, and 4,000 remained with the baggage; so that the Swedish army, which advanced against the enemy, consisted of about 21,000 men, of which about 16,000 only were regular troops.

The Generals Renschild, Roos, Levenhaupt, Slipenbak, Hoorne, Sparree, Hamilton, the Prince of Wirtemberg, the king's relation, and some others who had most of them seen the battle of Narva, put the subaltern officers in mind of the day when 8,000 Swedes defeated an army of 80,000 Muscovites in their intrenchments. The officers exhorted the soldiers by the same motive, and as they advanced they all encouraged one another.

Charles, carried in a litter at the head of his infantry, conducted the march. A large body of horse advanced by his order to attack that of the enemy; and the battle began with this engagement, at half-past four in the morning. The enemy's horse was posted toward the west on the right side of the Russian camp. Prince Menzikoff and Count Gollowin having received them at certain distances between the redoubt lined with cannon, General Slipenbak, at the head of the Swedes, rushed upon them. All those who have served in the Swedish troops are sensible that it is almost impossible to withstand the fury of their first attack. The Muscovite squadrons broke and routed. The czar ran up to rally them in person; his hat was pierced with a musket-ball; Menzikoff had three horses killed under him, and the Swedes cried out victory.

Charles did not doubt but the battle was gained. About midnight he sent General Creutz, with 5,000 horse or dragoons, to take the enemy in flank, while he attacked them in front; but as his ill-fortune would have it, Creutz mistook his way, and did not make his appearance. The czar, who thought he was ruined, had time to rally his cavalry, and in his turn fell upon that of the king, which, not being supported by the detachment of Creutz, was likewise broken. Slipenbak was taken prisoner in this engagement. At the same time 72 pieces of cannon played from the camp upon the cavalry; and the Russian foot, opening their lines, advanced to attack Charles's infantry.

After this the czar detached Menzikoff to go and take post between Pultowa and the Swedes. Prince Menzikoff executed his master's orders with dexterity and expedition. He not only cut off the communication between the Swedish army and the camp before Pultowa, but having met with a corps de reserve, he surrounded them and cut them to pieces. If Menzikoff performed this exploit of his own accord, Russia is indebted to him for its preservation; if it was by the orders of the czar, he was an adversary worthy of Charles XII. Meanwhile the Russian infantry came out of their lines, and advanced into the plain in order of battle. On the other hand, the Swedish cavalry rallied within a quarter of a league from the enemy; and the king, assisted by Field-marshal Renschild, made the necessary dispositions for a general engagement.

He ranged the few troops that were left him in two lines, the infantry occupying the center, and the cavalry forming the two wings. The czar disposed his army in the same manner. He had the advantage of numbers, and of 72 pieces of cannon, while the Swedes had no more than four to oppose to him, and began to be in want of powder.

The Emperor of Muscovy was in the center of his army, having then only the title of major-general, and seemed to obey General Sheremetoff. But he rode from rank to rank in the character of emperor, mounted on a Turkish horse, which had been given him in a present by the Grand Seignior, animating the captains and soldiers, and promising rewards to them all.

At nine o'clock in the morning the battle was renewed. One of the first discharges of the Russian cannon carried off the two horses of Charles's litter. He caused two others to be immediately put to it. A second discharge broke the litter in pieces, and overturned the king. Of 24 Drabants who mutually relieved each other in carrying him, 21 were killed. The Swedes, struck with consternation, began to stagger; and the cannon of the enemy continuing to mow them down, the first line fell back upon the second, and the second began to fly. In this last action it was only a single line of 10,000 Russian infantry that routed the Swedish army; so much were matters now changed!

All the Swedish writers allege, that they would have gained the battle, if they had not committed some great blunders; but all the officers affirm, that it was a great blunder to give battle at all, and a still greater to shut themselves up in a desert country, against the advice of the most prudent generals, in opposition to a warlike enemy, three times stronger than Charles, both in number of men, and in many resources from which the Swedes were entirely cut off. The remembrance of Narva was the chief cause of Charles's misfortune at Pultowa.

The Prince of Wirtemberg, General Renschild, and several principal officers, were already made prisoners; the camp before Pultowa was stormed, and all was thrown into a confusion which it was impossible to rectify. Count Piper, with some officers of the chancery, had left the camp, and neither knew what to do, or what was become of the king; but ran about from one corner of the field to another. A major, called Bere, offered to conduct them to the baggage; but the clouds of dust and smoke which covered the plain, and the dissipation of mind so natural amid such a desolation, brought them straight to the counterscarp of the town, where they were all made prisoners by the garrison.

The king scorned to fly, and was unable to defend himself. General Poniatowsky happened to be near him at that instant;—he was a colonel of Stanislaus's guards, a man of extraordinary merit, and had been induced, from his extraordinary attachment to the person of Charles, to follow him into the Ukraine without any post in the army. He was a man, who, in all the occurrences of life, and amid those dangers, when others would at most have displayed their courage, always took his measures with dispatch, prudence, and success. He made a sign to two Drabants, who took the king under the arm, and placed him on his horse, notwithstanding the exquisite pain of his wounds.

Poniatowsky, though he had no command in the army, became on this occasion a general through necessity, and drew up 500 horse near the king's person; some of them Drabants, others officers, and a few private troopers. This body being assembled, and animated by the misfortunes of their prince, forced their way through more than ten Russian regiments, and conducted Charles through the midst of the enemy for the space of a league, to the baggage of the Swedish army.

Charles, being closely pursued in his flight, had his horse killed under him; and Colonel Gieta, though wounded and spent with the loss of blood, gave him his. Thus, in the course of the flight, they twice put this conqueror on horseback, though he had not been able to mount a horse during the engagement.

This surprising retreat was of great consequence in such distressful circumstances; but he was obliged to fly to a still greater distance. They found out Piper's coach among the baggage; for the king had never used one since he left Stockholm: they put him into his vehicle, and fled toward the Boristhenes with great precipitation. The king, who, from the time of his being set on horseback, till his arrival at the baggage, had not spoke a single word, at length inquired, what was become of Count Piper? They told him he was taken prisoner, with all the officers of the chancery. "And General Renschild and the Duke of Wirtemberg?" added the king. "Yes," said Poniatowsky. "Prisoners to the Russians," resumed Charles, shrugging up his shoulders. "Come, then, let us rather go to the Turks." They could not perceive, however, the least mark of dejection in his countenance; and had any one seen him at that time without knowing his situation, he never would have suspected that he was wounded and conquered.

While he was getting off, the Russians seized his artillery in the camp before Pultowa, his baggage, and his military chest, in which they found six millions in specie, the spoils of Poland and Saxony; 9,000 men, partly Swedes and partly Cossacks, were killed in the battle, and about 6,000 taken prisoners. There still remained about 16,000 men, including the Swedes, Poles, and Cossacks, who fled toward the Boristhenes, under the conduct of General Levenhaupt. He marched one way with his fugitive troops, and the king took another with some of his horse. The coach in which he rode broke down by the way, and they again set him on horseback; and, to complete his misfortune, he wandered all night in the wood; where, his courage being no longer able to support his exhausted spirits, the pain of his wound became more intolerable through fatigue, and his horse falling under him through excessive weariness, he lay some hours at the foot of a tree, in danger of being surprised every moment by the conquerors, who were searching for him on all sides.

At last, on the 9th or 10th of July, at night, he found himself on the banks of the Boristhenes. Levenhaupt had just arrived with the shattered remains of his army. It was with an equal mixture of joy and sorrow that the Swedes again beheld their king, whom they thought to be dead. The enemy was approaching. The Swedes had neither a bridge to pass the river, nor time to make one, nor powder to defend themselves, nor provisions to support an army, which had eat nothing for two days. But the remains of this army were Swedes, and the conquered king was Charles XII. Most of the officers imagined that they were to halt there for the Russians, without flinching; and that they would either conquer or die on the banks of the Boristhenes. Charles would undoubtedly have taken this resolution, had he not been exhausted with weakness. His wound was now come to a suppuration, attended with a fever; and it has been remarked, that men of the greatest intrepidity, when seized with the fever that is common in a suppuration, lose that impulse to valor which, like all other virtues, requires the direction of a clear head. Charles was no longer himself. This, at least, is what I have been well assured of, and what indeed is extremely probable. They carried him along like a sick person in a state of insensibility. Happily there was left a sorry calash, which by chance they had brought along with them; this they put on board a little boat; and the king and General Mazeppa embarked in another. The latter had saved several coffers of money; but the current being rapid, and a violent wind beginning to blow, the Cossack threw more than three fourths of his treasures into the river to lighten the boat. Mullem, the king's chancellor, and Count Poniatowsky, a man more necessary to the king than ever, on account of his admirable dexterity in finding expedients for all difficulties, crossed over in some barks with some officers. 300 troopers of the king's guards, and a great number of Poles and Cossacks, trusting to the goodness of their horses, ventured to pass the river by swimming. Their troop, keeping close together, resisted the current, and broke the waves; but all those who attempted to pass separately a little below were carried down by the stream, and sunk in the river. Of all the foot who attempted to pass, there was not a single man that reached the other side.

While the shattered remains of the army were in this extremity, Prince Menzikoff came up with 10,000 horsemen, having each a foot-soldier behind him. The carcases of the Swedes who had died by the way of their wounds, fatigue, and hunger, shewed Prince Menzikoff but too plainly the road which the fugitive army had taken. The Prince sent a trumpet to the Swedish general to offer him a capitulation. Four general officers were presently dispatched by Levenhaupt to receive the commands of the conqueror. Before that day, 16,000 soldiers of King Charles would have attacked the whole forces of the Russian empire, and would have perished to a man rather than surrender; but, after the loss of a battle, and the flight of two days, deprived of the presence of their prince, who was himself constrained to fly, the strength of every soldier being exhausted, and their courage no longer supported by the least prospect of relief, the love of life overcame their natural intrepidity. Colonel Troutfetre alone, observing the Muscovites approach, began to advance with one Swedish battalion to attack them, hoping by this means to induce the rest of the troops to follow his example. But Levenhaupt was obliged to oppose this unavailing ardor. The capitulation was settled, and the whole army were made prisoners of war. Some soldiers, reduced to despair at the thoughts of falling into the hands of the Muscovites, threw themselves into the Boristhenes. Two officers of the regiment commanded by the brave Troutfetre killed themselves, and the rest were made slaves. They all filed off in presence of Prince Menzikoff, laying their arms at his feet, as 30,000 Muscovites had done nine years before at those of the King of Sweden, at Narva. But whereas the king sent back all the Russians, whom he did not fear, the czar retained the Swedes that were taken in Pultowa.

These unhappy creatures were afterward dispersed through the czar's dominions, particularly in Siberia, a vast province in great Tartary, which extends eastward to the frontiers of the Chinese empire. In this barbarous country, where even the use of bread was unknown, the Swedes, who were become ingenious through necessity, exercised the trades and employments of which they had the least notion. All the distinctions which fortune makes among men were then banished. The officer, who could not follow any trade, was obliged to cleave and carry wood for the soldier, now turned tailor, clothier, joiner, mason, or goldsmith, and who got a subsistence by his labors. Some of the officers became painters, and others architects; some of them taught the languages and mathematics. They even established some public schools, which in time became so useful and famous that the citizens of Moscow sent their children thither for education.

Count Piper, the King of Sweden's first minister, was for a long time confined in prison at Petersburg. The czar was persuaded, as well as the rest of Europe, that this minister had sold his master the Duke of Marlborough, and drawn on Muscovy the arms of Sweden, which might have given peace to Europe; for which reason he rendered his confinement the more severe. Piper died in Muscovy a few years after, little assisted by his own family, which lived in opulence at Stockholm, and vainly lamented by his sovereign, who would never condescend to offer a ransom for his minister, which he feared the czar would not accept of; for no cartel of exchange had ever been settled between them.

The Emperor of Muscovy, elated with a joy which he was at no pains to conceal, received upon the field of battle the prisoners, whom they brought to him in crowds; and asked every moment, "Where, then, is my brother Charles?"

He did the Swedish generals the honor of inviting them to dine with him. Among other questions which he put to them, he asked General Renschild what might be the number of his master's troops before the battle! Renschild answered, that the king always kept the muster-roll himself, and would never show it to any one; but that, for his own part, he imagined the whole might be about 30,000, of which 18,000 were Swedes, and the rest Cossacks. The czar seemed to be surprised, and asked how they durst venture to penetrate into so distant a country, and lay siege to Pultowa with such a handful of men. "We were not always consulted," replied the Swedish general, "but, like faithful servants, we obeyed our master's orders, without ever presuming to contradict them." The czar, upon receiving this answer, turned about to some of his courtiers, who were formerly suspected of having engaged in a conspiracy against him: "Ah!" says he, "see how a king should be served;" and then taking a glass of wine, "To the health," says he, "of my masters in the art of war." Renschild asked him who were the persons whom he honored with so high a title? "You, gentlemen, the Swedish generals," replied the czar. "Your majesty, then," resumed the count, "is very ungrateful, to treat your masters with so much severity." After dinner the czar caused their swords to be restored to all the general officers, and behaved to them like a prince who had a mind to give his subjects a lesson of generosity and politeness, with which he was well acquainted. But this same prince, who treated the Swedish generals with so much humanity, caused all the Cossacks that fell into his hands to be broke upon the wheel.

Thus the Swedish army, which left Saxony in such a triumphant manner, was no more. One half of them had perished with hunger, and the other half were either massacred or made slaves. Charles XII. had lost in one day the fruit of nine years' labor, and of almost a hundred battles. He made his escape in a wretched calash, attended by Major-General Hord, who was dangerously wounded. The rest of his little troop followed, some on foot, some on horseback, and others in wagons, through a desert, where neither huts, tents, men, beasts, nor roads were to be seen. Every thing was wanting, even water itself. It was now the beginning of July; the country lay in the forty-seventh degree of latitude; the dry sand of the desert rendered the heat of the sun the more insupportable; the horses fell by the way, and the men were ready to die with thirst. A brook of muddy water which they found toward evening was all they met with; they filled some bottles with this water, which saved the lives of the king's little troop. After a march of five days, he at last found himself on the banks of the river Aypanis, now called Bogh by the barbarians, who have spoiled not only the general face, but even the very names of those countries, which once flourished so nobly in the possession of the Greek colonies. This river joins the Boristhenes some miles lower, and falls along with it into the Black Sea.

On the other side of the Bogh, toward the south, stands the little town of Oczakow, a frontier of the Turkish empire. The inhabitants, seeing a body of soldiers approach, to whose dress and language they were entire strangers, refused to carry them over the river, without an order from Mehemet Pasha, governor of Oczakow. The king sent an express to the governor, demanding a passage; but the Turk, not knowing what to do, in a country where one false step frequently costs a man his life, durst not venture to take any thing upon himself, without having first obtained permission of the seraskier of the province, who resided at Bender, in Besarabia. While they were waiting for this permission, the Russians, who had made the king's army prisoners, had crossed the Boristhenes, and were approaching to take him also. At last the pasha of Oczakow sent word to the king, that he would furnish him with one small boat to transport himself and two or three attendants. In this extremity the Swedes took by force what they could not obtain by gentle means; some of them went over to the further side in a small skiff, seized on some boats, and brought them to the hither side of the river; and happy was it for them that they did so; for the masters of the Turkish bark, fearing they should lose such a favorable opportunity of getting a good freight, came in crowds to offer their services. At that very instant arrived the favorable answer of the seraskier of Bender, and the king had the mortification to see 500 of his men seized by the enemy, whose insulting bravadoes he even heard. The Pasha of Oczakow, by means of an interpreter, asked his pardon for the delays which had occasioned the loss of 500 men, and humbly entreated him not to complain of it to the grand seignior. Charles promised him that he would not; but at the same time gave him a severe reprimand, as if he had been speaking to one of his own subjects.

The commander of Bender, who was likewise seraskier, a title which answers to that of general, and pasha of the province, which signifies governor and intendant, forthwith sent an aga to compliment the king, and to offer him a magnificent tent, with provisions, baggage, wagons, and all the conveniences, officers, and attendants, necessary to conduct him to Bender in a splendid manner; for it is the custom of the Turks, not only to defray the charges of embassadors to the place of their residence, but likewise to supply, with great liberality, the necessities of those princes who take refuge with them, during the time of their stay.— Voltaire.

PULTUSK, A.D. 1703.—Pultusk is built on an island in the river Narew, in Poland, sixty miles nearly north-east of Plock.

In the year 1703, Charles XII., King of Sweden, marched against the Saxon army with an army of 10,000 men. The Saxons were commanded by General Stenau, and were 10,000 strong. Stenau avoided the Swedish army, and retired toward Prussia to the north-west of Warsaw. The river Bug separated the two armies. On the 1st of May, 1703, Charles overtook the Saxons at Pultusk. So great was the terror of his army that one half of the Saxon troops fled at his approach, without waiting for the battle. General Stenau with two regiments, kept his ground for a moment, but was soon hurried along in the general flight of his army, which was dispersed before it was vanquished. The Swedes took about 1,000 prisoners, and killed over 600 of the enemy, having more difficulty in pursuing than in defeating them.

A.D. 1806.—In 1806, on the 26th of December, a battle was fought near Pultusk, between the French and the Russians.

An open and cultivated plain lies to the south and east of the town of Pultusk, a succession of thickets surround this plain on every side, with the exception of that of the town; and on the inside of them the ground rises to a semicircular ridge, and then slopes down to the town on one side, while the forest is on the other; so that, until this barrier is surmounted, to get even a glimpse of the buildings is impossible. Here the Russian army was drawn up in two lines—their left resting on the town of Pultusk, their right on the wood of Moszyn, which skirted the plain; the artillery was placed in advance, while in front of the whole army was placed an immense number of Cossacks, so that the enemy could not even discover the force or composition of those they were to attack. The left was commanded by Sacken, the right by Count Osterman Tolstoy; a copsewood in front of the right, was occupied by Barclay de Tolly, with twelve battalions, and ten squadrons; while Benningsen was stationed in the center. Lannes, the commander of the French forces, consisting of about 35,000 men, resolved to force the enemy in this position, and accordingly on the morning of the 26th of December, advanced to the attack. The woods occupied by the Russian light troops were forced by the French voltigeurs, not without an obstinate resistance, however; Lannes, encouragad by this success, surmounted the ridge, and advanced into the open plain, when instantly the Cossacks dispersed to the right and left, and displayed to view the Russian army in two lines, in admirable order, with 220 guns placed along its front. Lannes was astonished, but not panic-stricken by this sight; he still pressed forward, and as his divisions successively cleared the thickets, and reached the top of the ridge, they deployed into line. This was done with admirable discipline, being performed under the fire of the Russian cannon, to which they had as yet none to oppose. It was attended with dreadful loss, and by the time the line was formed sufficient for a general charge, the ground was covered with dead bodies. They charged with very little success; the soil being soft, was cut up by the passage of so many horses and carriages, and in many places the mud was up to the knees of the French soldiers, the snow at intervals, obscured the heavens, the gunners could not discover the enemy's range; while the Russian batteries in light and darkness sent their fatal storm of grape and round-shot through their ranks. In spite, however, of all these obstacles, the French advanced with great intrepidity to the attack, and after a little time the arrival of their batteries rendered the fire more equal. The first line commanded by Suchet, slowly gained ground on the right, where the division of Barclay was stationed, but Benningsen seeing his danger, soon reinforced him with fresh troops; a battalion of the French infantry was routed and cut to pieces by the cavalry of the enemy, and the disorder was such, that Lannes was obliged to advance in person to restore the confused troops. By this movement, the Russians were arrested in that direction, their victorious columns being also charged in flank, were compelled to give ground, and resume their old position in front of Pultusk. Suchet had, meanwhile, commenced an attack on the post in the woods occupied by Barclay de Tolly. After a severe contest, the Russians were forced back; but being reinforced from the town, they again recovered their former position, and drove the French in disorder out of the wood. Lannes at the head of the 34th regiment, immediately flew to their rescue, and in some degree restored the combat, but Barclay kept his post, and threatened the extreme left of the enemy. The Russian reserve was now brought up, and after a terrible struggle, which lasted until long after nightfall, the combatants were separated by a frightful storm. Neither party were victorious, but the Russians remained masters of the battle-field till midnight, and then crossed the Narew by the bridge of Pultusk, and retreated in the most orderly manner; the republican army also retreated to such a distance, that the next day the Cossacks could discover no traces of them within eight miles of the scene of action. The losses on both sides were great; the French loss amounting to 6,000 men, the Russian to nearly 6,000, and the twelve guns which were lost in the morning were never regained.

PUNÁ, A.D. 1531.—Puná, an island which lies in the mouth of the river Guayaquil, in Peru, is about 24 miles in length, and at the widest part 16 in breadth.

The thirst for gold alone, seemed to impel the Spanish navigators of the sixteenth century to extend their discoveries on the western continent. Dazzled by the successes of Cortez in Mexico, many adventurers set forth on exploring expeditions in the New World, and among these was Francisco Pizarro the discoverer and afterward the conqueror of Peru. Having received from the crown of Spain the right of discovery and conquest in the province of Peru, or New Castile as the country was then called, Pizarro, with 180 men, set sail in three vessels from the bay of Panama, on his voyage of conquest to Peru. He had provided himself with 27 horses; and his men were armed with muskets, swords and long pikes or lances. Without molestation the little army, sometimes by land and sometimes by water, proceeded on their way, until they landed on the island of Puná, in the mouth of the river now called the Guayaquil, a short distance from the Tumbez, which Pizarro considered as the gate of the Peruvian empire. During his march Pizarro had been reinforced until they numbered about 200 men. The Spaniards were hospitably received by the inhabitants of Puná; and Pizarro determined to make the island his quarters until the reinforcements he expected should arrive. The inhabitants of Tumbez, which city Pizarro had visited during a former expedition; upon hearing of the arrival of the Spaniards, came over to the island in considerable numbers to visit their old friends. But the inhabitants of Puná and the citizens of Tumez, were on terms of enmity with each other. The islanders had long opposed the arms of the Peruvian incas, and, though finally conquered, yet they were still at feud and often at open war with the people of Tumbez. Under these circumstances no one can wonder that they received the visit of their detested rivals with much dissatisfaction. Pizarro's suspicions were aroused against the islanders, not only by their conduct, but by his interpreters, who assured him that they were plotting his destruction as well as that of their new visitors. Being informed that a number of the chieftains were assembled together to take measures for the carrying out of their design, he surrounded the place of meeting with a number of his soldiers, and caused the insurgents to be arrested. Satisfied of their guilt, Pizarro placed the prisoners in the hands of the citizens of Tumbez, who butchered them on the spot. The news of this outrage spread through the island like wild-fire. The natives with one accord rushed to arms, and with yells of defiance and rage, fell on the Spanish camp with barbaric fury. They numbered several thousand warriors, and to all appearances the army of the Spaniards was doomed to certain destruction. But with muskets presented, and lances firmly set, the little army awaited the coming of the enemy. In one body the Indians rushed toward the Spaniards, darkening the air with missiles and shouting forth their terrible battle-cry. But the Spaniards met their charge with rapid and well-directed thrusts of the lance, and brisk discharges of musketry, which checked them in their career. Then like a bolt from the bow, the Spanish horse sprung forward into the midst of the enemy, trampling them under foot, and throwing them into the utmost disorder. Stunned by the deafening reports of the musketry, and appalled by the terrible havoc committed by the Spanish cavalry, the Indians for a moment remained inactive. Then, with cries of terror and dismay, they scattered in every direction, and sought shelter in the labyrinths of the forests. In this engagement the Spaniards lost only four men killed, but many were seriously wounded.—Prescott.

PYRAMIDS, A.D. 1798.—The battle of the Pyramids occurred on the 21st of July, 1798. The French army was commanded by Napoleon, and that of the Mamelukes by Mourad Bey. The latter had collected all his forces, numbering some 6,000 Mamelukes, and double that number of Fellahs, Arabs, and Copts, and had encamped in the village of Embabeh, on the left bank of the Nile. The place was fortified by rude field-works, and forty pieces of cannon, but in consequence of the guns not being mounted, they could fire in only one direction. A large sandy plain lay between their camp and the Pyramids, and on this was stationed above 8,000 of the finest horsemen in the world, with their right resting on the village, and their left stretching toward the Pyramids. A few thousand Arabs, whose business it was to rob the vanquished of either party, filled up the space, quite to the foot of these great monuments.

Napoleon, by means of his telescope, soon ascertained that the enemy's cannon were stationary, and could only fire in one direction, and accordingly moved his army to the right, in order to be out of the direction of their guns entirely. The columns began their march; Dessaix commanded the one in front, next Regnier and Dugua, and those in the rear were headed by Vial and Bon. The French general seemed inspired with more than usual ardor; the army shared his enthusiasm, as they marched on toward the huge and indestructable masses of stone which formed the Pyramids. Napoleon, with his usual sagacity, had taken extraordinary precautions to insure success against the formidable army of the desert. The divisions were drawn up in hollow squares, six deep, the generals and baggage in the center, and the artillery at the angles. When they were in mass, the two sides advanced in column; those in front and rear moved forward in their ranks, but as soon as they were charged, the whole were to halt, and face outward on every side. When they were to charge, themselves, the three front ranks were to break off and form the attacking column, those in the rear remaining behind still in square, but only three deep, to constitute the reserve. The French general was confident of the result of these operations, if the infantry were steady; his only fear was that his soldiers, accustomed to charge, would give way to their impetuosity too soon, and not have the necessary firmness which this kind of warfare required. Mourad Bey no sooner perceived the lateral movement of the French army, than with great promptness he resolved to attack their columns while in the act of completing it. An extraordinary movement was observed in the Mameluke line, and 7,000 men detached themselves from the remainder of the army, and bore down upon the French columns. When this immense body of horse came rushing at full gallop upon the squares of infantry, it was a terrible sight, and one to fill the bravest heart with terror. The horsemen, admirably mounted, and dressed with great magnificence, filled the air with their shouts. The glittering of spears and cimeters dazzled the sight, while the earth seemed shaken by the thunder of the horses' feet. The French soldiers seemed struck with awe, but stood firm, and waited, with their pieces ready, the order to fire. The division under Dessaix was delayed, by being entangled in a wood of palm-trees, and was not completely formed, when the swiftest of the enemy came upon them; consequently, they were partly broken, and thirty or forty of the bravest of the assailants penetrated, and died in the midst of the square at the feet of the officers; but before the mass arrived, the movement was completed, and a rapid fire of musketry and grape drove them from the front, around the sides of the column. With the greatest intrepidity they forced their way through the space between Dessaix's and Regnier's divisions, and riding round both squares, strove to find an entrance; but an incessant fire from every front cut them down as fast as they rushed in at the opening. This unexpected resistance made them furious; they dashed their horses against the ramparts of bayonets, and threw their pistols at the heads of the grenadiers, while many whose horses had been killed crept along on the ground, and with their cimeters, cut off the legs of those occupying the front ranks.

In vain thousands followed, and rode round the flaming walls of steel; the fire was incessant, and multitudes perished; at last the survivors, in despair, fled toward the camp which they had lately left. Here they were charged in flank by Napoleon, at the head of Dagua's division, while Vial and Bon, on the extreme left, stormed the intrenchment. The utmost confusion now prevailed in the camp, the horsemen, driven back in disorder, trampled under foot the infantry, who, panic-struck at the rout of the Mamelukes, on whom their hopes depended, abandoned their ranks, and fled to their boats to escape to the other side of the Nile. The desperation of the Mamelukes was such, that seeing no means of escape, they fell upon the approaching columns, at the right, with their wings extended in order of attack, but with inconceivable rapidity they formed in a square, repulsed them with great slaughter, and drove them back in the direction of the Pyramids. The intrenched camp fell into the hands of the victors, with all its artillery, stores, and baggage. Many thousands of the Mamelukes were drowned or killed, and of those who had appeared in such splendor in the morning, not more than 2,500 escaped with Mourad Bey into Upper Egypt. The French hardly lost 200 men in the action, and several days were employed after the battle in stripping the killed of their magnificent apparel, or fishing up the rich spoils from the banks of the Nile.

PYRENEES.—The Pyrenees, renowned in ancient and modern history, is a chain of mountains which separates France from Spain, and which, in its largest extent, stretches from Cape Creux in Spain on the Mediterranean, near the frontier of France, westward to the coast of Galicia, a distance of nearly 650 miles. It is more usual, however, to confine the term to that portion of the chain which separates Spain from France.

The Pyrenees, which seem to have been known to the Greeks, under the name of Πυρήνη, are connected with many important historical events. Hannibal crossed them on his way to Italy, at the beginning of the second Punic war.* Julius Cæsar also traversed them with his army when marching into Spain against Pompey. Charlemagne carried his victorious arms over these mountains, and added Spain to the empire of the Franks.† Edward the Black Prince led his army over one of the western passes, while fighting in defense of Peter the Cruel, against Henry of Trastamare; and these mountains have obtained a more recent celebrity from having been the scene of several obstinate struggles between the French and English at the close of the Peninsular War.

After the battle of Vittoria (fought June 21st, 1813), Napoleon sent Soult to supersede Jourdan, with instructions to drive the allies across the Ebro. The allies mustered in all 72,000 combatants of the Anglo-Portuguese army, of whom 7,000 were cavalry, besides 25,000 Spaniards. The entire French army consisted of about 70,000 men. Both armies occupied a line about forty miles in length from the sea on the left to the pass of Roncesvalles, on the extreme right. The British were posted on the high grounds, and occupied passes in the mountains difficult of access, yet the columns had the disadvantage of being separated from each other by inaccessible ridges, and could only communicate with, or receive support from each other, by a round-about march of some days in the rear. The French were grouped in the plain, from which access was easy from any one part of the line to the other, and could at pleasure throw the weight of their force against the weakest part of the allied line, and overwhelm it by a vehement irruption with superior forces, before succor could by possibility be obtained.

Having concentrated his troops, and selected his point of attack, Soult, at daybreak on the 25th of July, with 35,000 combatants ascended the French side of the pass of Roncesvalles, while D'Erlon, with the center, 20,000 strong, threatened the British center by Puerta de Mayor, at the head of the valley of Basten; and Villatte with the remainder of the army remained in observation on the Bidassoa. Soult's object in this measure was to accumulate forces on Wellington's right, more rapidly than the English general could collect forces to oppose him; to relieve Pampeluna which was occupied by 6,000 French troops, who had been thrown into that fortress by the army during its retreat from Vittoria, and which was blockaded by the British army under O'Donnell; and then turning to his own right, descend upon St. Sebastian, which was also blockaded by the British. While he was performing this part of his plan, his center and right were to force the allied positions in their front. To facilitate these operations, great efforts had been made in the preceding days to smooth the ascent to the pass of Roncesvalles, and 300 bullocks were in readiness to assist in dragging the guns up the long and toilsome ascent. Sixty pieces of artillery accompanied the center and left, and the troops each carried provisions for four days' consumption. At daybreak on the 25th, Clausen with three divisions suddenly commenced an attack upon the British and Spaniards who occupied an elevated position 5,000 feet above the level of the sea, and on the summit of a craggy ridge of rock at Altobiscar, commanding the higher parts of the pass of Roncesvalles. The steep ascent soon rung with louder notes than the bugles of Charlemagne, for the British troops, undismayed by the multitude of assailants, made a vigorous resistance: the musketry pealed sharp and long among the rocks, and the advancing columns, fell fast beneath the deadly fire which issued from above the clouds. But the French, electrified by the presence of Soult, and burning to efface the recollection of their recent defeat, advanced with the utmost intrepidity, and toiled far up the steep, and finally forced the allies to abandon the strong position of the Altobiscar, and retreat toward the general rendezvous of the troops in that quarter, in the valley of Zubiri.

* See Saguntum. † See Roncesvalles.

While the pass of Roncesvalles was thus forced on the allied right, the Puerta de Maya in the center had also been the scene of a sanguinary conflict. D'Erlon had, early in the morning, put himself in motion on the same day, to attack that pass at the head of the valley of Bastan, and thus pour down another road on the British blockading force at Pampeluna. Hill was there with the second division, and the ground at the summit of the pass was exceedingly strong, consisting of an elevated valley three miles broad, flanked by lofty rocks and ridges on either side, and presenting scenery of the grandest description. The better to conceal his real intentions, Count d'Erlon, early on the morning of the 25th, made some demonstrations against the small passes of Espegne and Lareta, which lie to the right of that of Mayor, and were guarded by the Portuguese; and under cover of these movements, he brought forward his main body, long concealed from view by the great wood leading direct from Urdax up the pass, and they were near the summit before they were perceived.

The alarm-guns were instantly fired; the pickets were driven in with heavy loss, and the light companies slowly retired, firing quickly as they fell back, with the utmost steadiness. Breathless with running up the Spanish side, from the bivouacs a little below the summit, the British regiments now came up. A fierce fight ensued. The French rushing up the rocky acclivity, were met by the enemy with the utmost gallantry. The cries of the combatants; the sharp ringing volleys of musketry, and the screams of the wounded, resounded through that rock-inclosed avenue with tenfold effect. The French pushed the enemy back to the last ridge of the pass, and the English were about to abandon the crest of the mountain altogether; but Barnes with a fresh brigade came up from Echallar, and thus reinforced, the English drove the French back to the first summit of the range. But like a returning wave the French troops again rushed upon the enemy, and driving them back finally remained in possession of the important pass. Thus far the most brilliant success had attended Soult's operations; he had won the two principal passes leading to Pampeluna, and final success seemed inevitable.

On the morning of the 26th, Soult's march was retarded by a thick fog which hung on the higher parts of the mountains; he at length, however, got into motion, and descended the valley in pursuit of the British, who were retreating to Zubiri. The next day the British continued their retreat toward Pampeluna, and took up a position at Sauroren, about four miles in front of that division. The garrison of Pampeluna meanwhile taking advantage of the alarm created in the rear of the allies by the retreat of the army, made a sortie; O'Donnell, who commanded the blockading force, immediately spiked his guns, and destroyed his magazines, to prevent their falling into the enemy's hands; and he would have raised the blockade entirely had not Don Carlos d'Espana come up at the moment with his corps, and restored some sort of order in the besieging force.

Wellington was on his way from St. Sebastian when he received intelligence of Soult's irruption, and he immediately ordered Graham to raise the siege of St. Sebastian, embark the stores and guns, and hasten with all his disposable force to the support of Giron, in a defensive position previously selected for battle on the southern side of the Bidassoa. These orders were punctually executed; and, meanwhile, Wellington set out on horseback with the utmost speed to join Picton's and Cole's divisions in their position in front of Pampeluna. As he entered the village of Sauroren, he saw Clausen's division moving along the crest of the mountain opposite, which made an alteration of his dispositions advisable. He immediately dispatched Lord Fitzroy Somerset (afterward Lord Raglan), with the necessary orders to his generals, and spurred his horse up the ascent to join the British troops. When he arrived at their position, he and Soult were so near that their features, with the aid of a telescope, were visible to each other. The French general resolved to attack the British position the next day; and although a sharp fire of musketry along the front of the line, commenced at six o'clock in the evening, no important operation took place on either side until the following morning.

Early on the morning of the 28th, the allied army having received considerable reinforcements during the night, were under arms. The position which they occupied was very strong. Their troops were drawn up in two lines; the first on the summit of the ridge of Oricain, stretched in the form of a convex semicircle, from the village of that name on the left, to Zaboldica on the right, and was about two miles in length, covered on the right flank by the river Guy, and on the left by the torrent Lanz. On this ridge the guns of which commanded the roads down the valleys on either side, stood a British division under Cole; while another division was drawn up across the Lanz in the valley on the left, and entirely blocked up the approach to Pampeluna in that direction. The Spaniards under Murillo held in strength the crest of the ridge on the extreme left, above the Estreiba, the valley where the river Lanz flows. The second line was posted on a still more rugged ridge, which runs entirely across the valley, and is cleft asunder by two narrow openings, through the left of which the Lanz makes its way between overhanging rocks, while through the one on the right the Guy descends; and these two streams, uniting in the rear of the ridge, form the Arga river, which, a mile further on, washes the ramparts of Pampeluna. On this strong ground, the front of which is uncommonly bold and abrupt toward the north, Picton's division was placed; his right in front of Huarte—which village lies immediately behind the opening through which the Guy flows—his left, communicating with the Spaniards under O'Donnell, who had been hurried up from the lines before Pampeluna, stretched on the heights across the gap formed by the Lanz, and in front of the village of Villaba.

The rocks on which the first line stood, consisted of huge piles, standing one above the other, like the ruins of gigantic castles, half gone to ruin; and none but the troops inured to the perils of the Peninsular warfare, would have thought of assailing them. But Soult's men were equal to the task. Having minutely surveyed the ground, he resolved upon an attack. Both armies were nearly equal, each being about 30,000 strong. Of the allies 10,000, however, were Spaniards; but the great strength of the position compensated for the inferiority in the quality of these troops. About mid-day on the 28th of July (the anniversary of the battle of Talavera) the French tirailleurs with the most admirable gallantry began to swarm up the steep; while Clausen's division, in the valley of Lanz, burning with ardor, poured down the sides of the stream in one impetuous mass, even before the signal for attack was given. But just as it had turned Cole's left, and was preparing to double upon his rear, a Portuguese brigade appeared on the heights on its right flank, while the broad lines of the English uniforms emerging from behind the same ridge, stood in battle array in its front! Time there was none either for deliberation or retreat. The British in front opened a heavy fire on the head of the column; the Portuguese on the right poured in their shot on the one flank, while two British brigades, descending from their rocky fastness on the left, smote the other with redoubled fury. Thus fiercely assailed at once in front and both flanks by an enemy heretofore invisible, the French columns recoiled, still bravely combating, and strewed their numerous slain along their line of retreat.

While this bloody action was going on upon the British left, in the valley of Lanz, a conflict of unequaled severity was raging along the top of the ridge in the center and right. With surpassing valor Clausen's other divisions rushed up the steep face of the mountain, and, undismayed by a plunging fire, which in many cases swept off half their battalions, worked their toilsome way up to the top. In some instances their extraordinary gallantry met with deserved but temporary success. The Portuguese caçadores shrunk from the terrible encounter on the summit, and the French established themselves for a few minutes on their part, on the left of the ridge; but Ross's brigade, instantly advancing, charged them with a loud shout, and hurled them down the steep. Again they returned, however, reinforced, to the charge. Another Portuguese regiment on Ross's right having given way, the French penetrated in that opening, and that brigade was compelled to give ground. Instantly the assailants stood on his position on the summit; the line began to deploy to a considerable breadth on either side, and the crest of the mountain, enveloped in cloud and flame, seemed already won. In this extremity Wellington ordered up Byng's brigade, which advanced in double-quick time; two regiments were brought down from the higher ground in the center; and thus strengthened the British with indescribable fury charged the crowded masses of the enemy on the summit, and the whole were rolled in wild confusion over the rocks. Meanwhile Reille's division, on the left of Clausen's division, had environed the right of the position above the Guy stream, where Murillo's Spaniards were placed, and mounting fiercely the hill-side, dislodged them from their ground. A Portuguese battalion gallantly advancing, took its place in their room on the left of the British regiment, which waited in stern silence until the French set their feet on the broad summit; but when their glittering arms appeared over the brow of the mountain, the charging cry was heard, the crowded mass was broken to pieces, and a tempest of bullets followed its flight. Four times this assault was renewed, and the French officers were seen to pull up their tired men by the belts, so fierce and resolute were they to win. But their efforts were fruitless. The allies, posted in a favorable position, hurled back the French with ease; and at length, with thinned ranks and weary limbs, the assailants were obliged to retire. The French general now saw that the position of his enemy was too strong to be forced. He therefore relinquished his design of relieving Pampeluna, and resolved to throw the weight of his forces towards St. Sebastian and raise the siege of that fortress. During the night after that battle, Wellington was reinforced by the arrival of General Hill's three divisions; and having now over fifty thousand men, determined to assume the offensive. An indecisive battle was fought the next day, and both armies spent the night of the 29th on the field of battle; but Soult, finding himself pressed by superior numbers, the next day retreated with all possible expedition, up the valleys of Lanz and Guy, and closely pursued by the enemy, with whom he fought as he retreated, finally, on the 1st of August reached the French side of the Pyrenees. The French lost in this vain attempt, 20,000 men. The allies lost 7,096 men, of whom 4,756 were British soldiers.

The two armies, after Soult's retreat to the French side of the mountains, occupied nearly the same position that they had held before the irruption took place. The first object which occupied the attention of the British general, after the defeat of Soult's irruption, was the renewal of the siege of St. Sebastian, which had been so rudely interrupted.

QUAKER HILL, A.D. 1778.—On the 29th of August, 1778, an engagement took place between the American patriot army under General Sullivan, and the British under General Pigot, near Quaker Hill, about twelve miles from Newport, Rhode Island. The American army consisted of about 5,000 men; and that of the English was of about the same strength; but only about 1,200 on either side were engaged. The action commenced at nine o'clock in the morning, and continued until three in the afternoon, when the British were forced to retire. The Americans lost thirty killed, 132 wounded, and forty-four missing. The British lost in killed and wounded 210, and twelve missing.

QUATRE BRAS, A.D. 1815.—The little village of Quatre Bras ("four arms,") in Belgium, ten miles from the village of Waterloo, was the theater of an action between the French and English on the 16th of June, 1815, two days before the battle of Waterloo. See Waterloo.

QUEBEC, A. D. 1759.—On the north bank of the river St. Lawrence, 340 miles from its mouth, stands the city of Quebec, the capital of the two Canadas, and one of the most beautiful and populous places in the British North American provinces. The city consists of an Upper and Lower Town, the former within fortified walls, upon the top and declivities of a high peninsula; the latter occupying a narrow beach at the margin of the water. Upon the heights is a level plateau, called the plains of Abraham. The river St. Charles enters the St. Lawrence a little north of the city.

In July, in the year 1759, Quebec was strongly garrisoned by French regulars, and Montcalm, with the main body of the French army, occupied a fortified camp along the north bank of the St. Lawrence, between the St. Charles and Montmorenci rivers. William Pitt, the great statesman of England, had conceived the magnificent scheme of putting an end to French dominion in America by conquering all Canada. General Amherst was appointed commander-in-chief in place of Abercombie, and early in the spring of 1759, he found himself at the head of 20,000 provincial troops. A large land and sea force was also sent from England to cooperate with the Americans; and Amherst at once made preparations to carry the war forward to a successful termination. A strong naval and land force under General Wolfe was to ascend the St. Lawrence and attack Quebec; a second force under Amherst was to expel the French from Lake Champlain, and fall upon Montreal, after which he was to join Wolfe at Quebec, and a third expedition under General Prideaux was to attack fort Niagara, and then to proceed with all possible speed down lake Ontario to Montreal. In the month of June Wolfe, with 8,000 troops under convoy of twenty-two line of battle ships, and as many frigates and other armed vessels, under Admiral Saunders, left Louisburg, on the St. Lawrence, and arrived on the 26th at the Isle of Orleans, a few miles below Quebec. Wolfe disembarked on the island on the 27th of June. The two armies were within sound of each others' arms; and the scene presented must have been indeed magnificent. The island of Orleans, with its emerald surface dotted with the tents of Wolfe's encampment; the placid waters of the St. Lawrence reflecting the sails of the British fleet; the army of Montcalm stretching between two rivers, with its center at Beauport, and the city of Quebec reposing in tranquillity at the extreme verge of the horizon, all formed a picture worthy of an artist's pencil. Montcalm's army consisted in all of about 5,000 men, a small force indeed when compared with the army and fleet of Wolfe. On the 30th of July, a British detachment of about 2,000 men, took possession of Point Levi, opposite Quebec. The river at this point is about a mile in width; and the English, by the discharge of red-hot balls and shells, almost destroyed the Lower Town. But the citadel which stands in the Upper Town, crossing Cape Diamond, was beyond their reach, and every approach from the river was so strongly protected that an assault was impracticable.

Wolfe was eager for battle, and seeing that the eastern bank of the Montmorenci was more elevated than the ground occupied by Montcalm, resolved to remove his army thither, and on the 9th of July he crossed the river with the troops of generals Townshend and Murray from Orleans Island and encamped on the east shore of the Montmorenci, directly opposite the left flank of the French army. The river Montmorenci is a very rapid stream; precipitating itself through rocky gorges in impassable eddies and rapids. A ford was formed three miles in the interior; but the opposite shore was high, woody, and strongly fortified. The vigilant Montcalm had not left a spot for miles along the line of the river unprotected. Wolfe now proceeded to reconnoiter the shore above the town. With six ships he sailed along the strongly protected bank, from the Montmorenci to the St. Charles; passed the high cliff of Cape Diamond, and coasted along the bluff precipice which extends beyond the citadel, and saw everywhere a place strongly protected by nature and art; inaccessible heights, crowned with cannon; and intrenchments and floating batteries guarded every approach. He attempted however to land at St. Michael's Cove three miles above the city; but the enemy prevented him from so doing by planting a mortar and some cannon to play on the ships. On the 28th of July, the French sent down an immense raft of five stages, to destroy the British fleet; but they proved ineffective. Meanwhile Wolfe returned to his camp on the Montmorenci. Weary with inactivity he resolved on an engagement. Three hundred yards above its mouth, the Montmorenci plunges over a rocky precipice, and then flows calmly and smoothly toward the St. Lawrence. Near the junction of the two rivers, the Montmorenci at certain hours, is very shallow, and may be crossed on foot. Wolfe decided that Murray and Townshend, with about 4,000 men, should ford the Montmorenci at this place, at the proper hour, while Monckton's troops should cross the St. Lawrence from Point Levi in boats.

Battle of Montmorenci.—The signal was given, and the British troops were put in motion. The boats rapidly advanced toward the Canadian shore; but some of them grounded on a ledge of rocks which extends into the river. The French poured forth incessant discharges of shot and shell upon the enemy; and in the midst of this iron tempest, Wolfe, with a number of naval officers, calmly selected a landing-place. The seamen meanwhile were busily engaged in getting off the grounded boats. At length 13 companies of grenadiers effected a landing, and without waiting for the arrival of Murray and Townshend, who were fording the river, rushed furiously toward the French intrenchments; but they were received by such a terrific discharge of musketry and artillery, that they were thrown back in the utmost disorder, and could not again be rallied. Wolfe saw the impossibility of success, and ordered a retreat, and the British returned to their camps on the east shore of the Montmorenci, and at Point Levi, having lost in this fruitless attack, nearly 500 men, while the enemy was uninjured. Eight weeks elapsed and the British troops had yet obtained no decided advantage. Wolfe burning with impatience, and filled with anxiety and care, sickened beneath his load of trouble, and at the beginning of September lay prostrate in his tent. Yet his mind was active, and he called a council of war at his bedside, and on the suggestion of Townshend it was decided to scale the heights of Abraham, above the town, and assail the place on its weakest side. Wolfe acquiesced in his proposal, and prepared to carry it into effect. Attended by the admiral, Wolfe, feeble as he was, examined in person the citadel once more; and the camp on the Montmorenci was removed to Point Levi, as a preparatory movement. Having secured the posts on Orleans Island, and opposite Quebec, on the 5th and 6th of September Wolfe marched with the army from Point Levi, and embarked them in transports. On the 7th, 8th and 9th, Admiral Holmes, with the ships ascended the river to amuse De Bougainville, who had been sent up the St. Lawrence with about 1,500 men to watch the movements of the enemy, and succeeded in allaying the suspicions of that officer. In fact Montcalm, and the whole French army with the citizens of Quebec, believed that the worst dangers of the siege were over. Meanwhile Wolfe made dilligent preparations to attack the place. He applied himself closely to the examination of the north shore above Quebec.

"Nature has given me good eyes as well as a warmth of temper to follow first impressions," wrote Wolfe on the 1st of December, 1758, and on this occasion he used his eyes to a good purpose. He himself discovered the cove which now is called by his name, and he saw the ravine which breaks the steepness of the rocky shore, and which although narrow, nevertheless wound up to the summit, and was, as he discovered by counting the tents, protected only by about 100 men. This ravine is now called Wolfe's Ravine. He resolved to land at this point; push up with his men through the ravine, in the face of the troops who guarded it, and take the enemy by surprise. On the evening of the 12th of September, having made all his preparations, Wolfe with his troops ascended the river in several vessels of the fleet to a point some distance above the ravine. At midnight the troops embarked in flat boats, and with muffled oars stole down the river, to the mouth of the ravine, which is about a mile and a half above the city. The ships silently dropped down with the tide, and reached the cove in time to cover the landing of the troops. Wolfe and his men leaped to the shore; the light infantry landed a short distance below him, and the whole force clambered up to the top of the cliff, some through the ravine, and some up the very face of the precipice, clinging, as they went, to the roots and boughs of the trees that covered the declivity. By daybreak Wolfe's entire force had gained the summit of the rock, and stood on the Plains of Abraham in battle array. The news of this bold movement on the part of the enemy filled Montcalm with astonishment. He at first believed it to be but a small party come to burn the houses and retire; but he soon received reliable information and resolved to give battle at once. He immediately marched from his encampment with his whole army and crossing the St. Charles river, confronted the British army at about ten o'clock in the morning of the same day.

The Battle of the Plains of Abraham.—The ground between the two armies was crossed by ravines and rail fences. The British troops were all regulars, and filled with enthusiasm: and proud of their morning's achievement panted with the desire to engage the enemy. Montcalm's army consisted chiefly of militia; only about 2,000 were regular troops. The French had two pieces of cannon; the English two. The battle commenced with a sharp cannonade from both parties, which lasted about an hour. Montcalm now resolved to gain the left flank of the enemy and crowd him down the high bank of the river. Accordingly he called De Bougainville to his aid, and sent messenger after messenger, for De Vandreuil, who with 1,500 men remained at the camp, with orders to join him before he was driven from the ground. Wolfe saw through Montcalm's intention, and covered his left flank with the regiment of Amherst under Townshend, and a detachment of the royal Americans. Montcalm waited anxiously for De Vandreuil; he came not, and the French general led his army impetuously to the attack. The English reserved their fire until the enemy was within forty yards of their line; then with regularity and precision they delivered volley after volley of musketry, which checked the progress of the Canadians and threw them into disorder. Montcalm flew from rank to rank, urging his men on to the fight. Although grievously wounded he maintained his place in their front, encouraging them both by words and example. The gallant though unpracticed Canadians, bewildered by the carnage which was committed on their ranks, wavered; they saw the brave De Lennezergues, the second in command, fall dead from his horse, and terror was rapidly spreading through their ranks. Wolfe placing himself at the head of the 28th and Louisburg grenadiers, led them forward to a bayonet charge. Like a hurricane they dashed upon the affrighted Canadians scattering them in all directions; but before they fled, the Canadians had delivered their fire with terrible effect: the British officers Barre, and Carlton, were severely wounded, and Wolfe himself received a musket-ball in his wrist. The British pressed forward, and Wolfe was again wounded; and at the very moment of victory he received a third ball in the breast, and fell, mortally wounded. "Support me," he exclaimed to an officer near him; "let not my brave fellows see me drop." They carried him to the rear. "They run, they run!" cried an officer who was holding his loved commander in his arms. "Who run?" inquired Wolfe. "The French are giving way in every quarter," replied the officer. "What!" said Wolfe, and his eye lighted for an instant, "do they run already?" Then after murmuring a few words of directions as to the pursuit, he fell back in the arms of his friend and with the exclamation, "I die content," expired. General Monckton was shot through the lungs, and the command devolved upon Townshend. This general recalled the army from the pursuit and declined to engage with De Bougainville, who now appeared in view with fresh troops. Montcalm was struck twice during the action; first at the beginning of the battle, and next and mortally while attempting to rally a body of fugitives in a copse near St. John's gate. On being informed by the surgeon that he could not live, he cried, "I am glad of it; how long shall I survive?"

"Ten or twelve hours, at the furthest," was the reply. "So much the better; I shall not live to see the surrender of Quebec." Townshend now prepared to besiege the city; and De Vandreuil, on whom now the command of the army fell, wrote to De Ramsay at Quebec, not to wait for an assault, but surrender, as soon as his provisions were exhausted. The citizens fearing a famine, and dreading the horrors of an assault, urged a surrender; and on the 18th of September, five days after the battle, Quebec, with its fortifications, people, stores, and shipping, was surrendered to the English. The English lost in the battle of the Plains of Abraham, 600 in killed and wounded; the French lost 500 killed, and 1,000 made prisoners including the wounded. The French although disheartened by the loss of Quebec, were not conquered; they still held Montreal, and had a large land and naval force above Quebec.

Siege of 1760.—Early in the year 1760, Vandreuil, the French Governor-General of Canada, sent De Levi, Montcalm's successor, with about 10,000 men, to besiege Quebec. Quebec was garrisoned by about 7,000 British troops, under the command of General Murray. De Levi, with a fleet of six vessels, besides his land army, went down the St. Lawrence, and arrived within a few miles of Quebec, on the 28th of April. Murray went out to meet him, and on the same day the two armies came in collision at Sillery wood, three miles above Quebec. The British troops rushed precipitately on the vanguard of the French, who received them with so much ardor that they fell back. In danger of being surrounded by the enemy, Murray was compelled to retreat to the city, abandoning "his very fine train of artillery," and losing 1,000 men. The French lost about 300 men. De Levi laid siege to Quebec, and the English garrison, reduced by death during the winter, sickness, and the disastrous battle, was reduced to about 2,000 effective men. The condition of the garrison was becoming perilous, when it was rescued by the foresight of Pitt, who, at his bidding, was on its way to Quebec. On the 18th of May the fleet approached in the St. Lawrence, and De Levi at once raised the siege, and fled to Montreal. In June Pitt thus wrote to his wife, the sister of Lord Temple and George Grenville: "Join, my love, with me in most humble and grateful thanks to the Almighty. The siege of Quebec was raised on the 17th of May, with every happy circumstance. The enemy left their camp standing, and abandoned forty pieces of cannon. Swanton arrived there in the Vanguard on the 15th, and destroyed all the French shipping, six or seven in number. Happy, happy day! My joy and hurry are inexpressible."

The fall of Montreal, which occurred in 1760, completed the conquest of Canada, and Quebec remained in the firm possession of the British.

Siege of 1775.—The American patriots had cordially invited the Canadians to join them in their efforts for liberty; but their proffers of friendship were repulsed, and the Americans could not but consider the Canadians as positive supporters of the cause of the king. The Americans, therefore, in 1775, resolved to take possession of Canada, and prevent its being used by the British as a place of rendezvous and supply. To carry this resolution into effect, a body of New York and New England troops, under Schuyler and Montgomery, were ordered to proceed to Montreal and Quebec, by the way of Lake Champlain; and Colonel Benedict Arnold, with about 1,000 men, was to march through the wilderness by the Kennebec and Chaudiere rivers, and join Montgomery before the walls of Quebec. Arnold left Cambridge early in September, 1775, and after enduring incredible hardships in his long and weary march through the deep forests, arrived at Point Levi, opposite Quebec, on the 9th of November. Arnold was well acquainted with the localities in and around Quebec, having visited the place several times in earlier life, and many of the inhabitants were his personal friends. The people of Quebec were filled with astonishment and fear at the sudden appearance of the American army in the vicinity of their city; the drums beat to arms, and the whole town was in a state of tumult. Arnold found means to apprise his friends in the city of his instructions, and was upon the point of crossing the river, when a violent tempest of wind and snow arose, and he was compelled to await till it abated. Meanwhile, the garrison of the city was reinforced by troops from Sorel, and a frigate (the Lizzard), with a sloop, was placed in the river to intercept the Americans, should they attempt a passage. The wind at length abated; and on the night of the 13th of November, the Americans, leaving 150 at Point Levi, embarked in thirty or forty birch canoes, and crossed the river, and rendezvoused at Wolfe's Cove. Arnold immediately led his men up the rugged path, which Wolfe had trodden sixteen years before, and at daybreak stood on the plains of Abraham. His whole force consisted of only 750 men; and after having vainly endeavored to draw out the garrison by hostile displays on the heights, he sent a flag to McLean, the commander of the garrison, and summoned him to surrender. McLean, however, not only refused to admit the message, but ordered his men to fire upon the bearers. Arnold, at the same time, was informed that Carlton and his troops, who had escaped the discomfiture of Montreal, was coming down the river, and finding that nearly all his cartridges were spoiled, and hearing also that the garrison meditated a sortie, felt constrained to retire. He retreated to Point-aux-Trembles, twenty miles above Quebec, to await the arrival of Montgomery.

On the 1st of December, Montgomery arrived with his troops at Point-aux-Trembles, and the united forces amounted to about 900 men. The next day they started for Quebec, and arrived in sight of the city on the 5th. Meanwhile Carlton had arrived at Quebec, and the garrison thus augmented was considerably stronger in point of numbers than the American army. The English, however, considered the Americans much stronger. On the morning of the 6th, Montgomery sent a letter to Carlton, by a flag, demanding an immediate surrender. The governor ordered his troops to fire upon the bearer. Montgomery then resorted to the agency of an inhabitant to bear a second letter to Carlton; in which after magnifying his own strength, the weakness of the garrison, and the impossibility of defense, he demanded an immediate surrender, threatening an assault, and all the calamities which an irritated and victorious soldiery are apt to inflict upon places taken by storm. Carlton imagined the American army much larger than it really was, yet he was not easily frightened. Like Arnold, Montgomery had friends in the town, but, overawed by the presence of the British troops, they dared not do anything in favor of the besiegers. The Americans finding that all attempts to persuade Carlton to surrender were fruitless, resolved to annoy the people into submission, by continual and harassing attacks on the city, and accordingingly endeavored to throw shells over the walls. These attempts proved unavailing, and Montgomery then erected a six gun battery upon some heaps of ice and snow within 700 paces of the walls, and opened a fire from it; but his pieces were too light to be of service, and for three weeks the Americans remained before the walls without gaining any advantage. At length a council of war was called, and a general assault on the town at several points was decided upon. Accordingly at two o'clock on the morning of the 31st of December the troops were ordered to parade in three divisions. The New York militia and a portion of Easton's militia, were under the immediate command of Montgomery; the Cambridge detachments, Captain Morgan's riflemen, and Colonel Lamb's artillery corps, with one piece, were commanded by Arnold; and the third division, which consisted of the troops of Livingston and Brown, paraded under their respective commanders. Montgomery resolved to assail the town at four points. The troops of Livingston and Brown were to distract the attention of the enemy by feigned attacks on the Upper Town, from the Plains of Abraham, the one against the St. Louis and St. John's gates, and the other against the Diamond Bastion, while his own division and that of Arnold, should assail the Lower Town on opposite sides. Montgomery was well aware that if he should carry the Lower Town, the conquest of the other part of the place, would still be difficult; but he hoped that the inhabitants, on finding the enemy in possession of so much of their property, would force Carlton to surrender. The month of December, 1775, departed in a howling storm of wind and snow, and in the midst of this blinding tempest the American army advanced toward the city. The first division under Montgomery descended from the Plains of Abraham, to Wolfe's Cove, and advanced upon the bank of the river. The lofty heights and the grim guns of Cape Diamond frowned over their heads; and the whirling tempest beat fiercely upon their breasts, and piled huge snow-drifts in their path. The second division under Arnold advanced around the north side of the place on the river St. Charles. Montgomery and Arnold were to meet at Mountain-street, and the united forces were to assail Prescott gate. The columns of Brown and Livingston, impeded by the snow and other obstacles, were prevented from executing their feints. Montgomery and his men arrived at a point, under Cape Diamond, called Pres-de-Ville. Here the huge cliff on which stands the bastion, advances abruptly toward the river; and the narrow path between the rocky wall and the water was defended by a battery, in charge of a captain of Canadian militia, with thirty-eight men. The guns were manned by nine British seamen, under Captain Barnsfare. The Americans cautiously approached the battery; the enemy remained inactive. Montgomery halted to reconnoiter. The silence of the British caused him to believe that his approach was unobserved; but Barnsfare had seen through the gloom of the storm, the advance of the enemy, and was prepared to receive them. Montgomery sprang forward with the thrilling exhortation, "Men of New York, you will not fear to follow where your general leads. March on!" The Americans followed their gallant commander, rushing over heaps of ice and snow, and through the blinding storm which beat fast and furious in their faces.

Captain Barnsfare reserved his fire until the Americans had arrived within about forty yards of his battery, then he gave the signal, the match was applied, and a terrific tempest of grape-shot swept through the American column, committing fearful havoc. Montgomery and both his aides, Captains Macpherson and Cheeseman, were killed on the spot, and a number of privates were also slain. The rest, appalled at the death of their general, shrunk back, and fled in wild disorder back to Wolfe's Cove. Colonel Campbell here assumed the command, but made no further attempts to join the troops of Arnold. Meanwhile, Arnold at the head of his men was slowly working his way along the St. Charles, through immense drifts of snow, toward the city. He finally reached the narrow street called Sault au Matelot, when his progress was checked by a battery of two guns, which the besieged had erected under a high projecting rock. The battery was well manned. The Americans halted for a moment and then Arnold led his men forward at a rapid pace. The besieged appearing upon the walls, poured incessant volleys of musketry on the assailants, and a musket-ball struck Arnold in the knee, injuring him so seriously that he was completely disabled, and was carried back to the hospital. Morgan now assumed the command, and for more than an hour the Americans stood against the tempest of bullets and grape-shot which was hurled upon them from the battery and the walls. At length by a bold charge they carried the first battery, and rushed on the second, which commanded the streets of St. Peter and Sault au Matelot. The day began to break, and as the Americans approached the barrier they encountered a detachment of the enemy who had sallied out from the battery under Captain Anderson. The English officer summoned Morgan to lay down his arms. Morgan replied by leveling a musket and shooting the officer dead. The English retired within the barrier and a fierce conflict which lasted nearly three hours ensued. The Americans, assailed in front, flank, and rear by musketry from the battery, walls, and houses, suffered fearfully. At length the besiegers took shelter from the fire of the enemy in the neighboring houses, and a brisk fire was maintained through the windows by the Canadians and English who occupied other houses in the vicinity. The Americans at length drove back the enemy and carried the second barrier, and were preparing to rush into the town, when Carlton detached a large body of troops from the garrison, and sent them through Palace gate to attack the besiegers in the rear. Captain Dearborn with some American troops was posted near Palace gate. Suddenly the gates were flung open, and the British poured forth in overwhelming numbers on the Americans. Dearborn being entirely surrounded, was forced to surrender. Morgan with his riflemen was pressing forward into the town when he heard the news of Dearborn's surrender and Montgomery's defeat and death, and finding his retreat cut off on every side, he yielded and surrendered himself and troops as prisoners of war. The remainder of Morgan's division effected their escape and retreated to their camp. The Americans on this occasion lost in killed and wounded one hundred and sixty men. The British loss was only about twenty killed and wounded. Arnold, after the death of Montgomery, took the command of the army, and feeling unsafe under the walls of the city, retreated about three miles above the place, and took up a fortified position. He here assumed the attitude of a blockade, scouring the country, and cutting off supplies for the city in the hopes of bringing the enemy to terms. Carlton, on his part, feeling secure within the walls, and trusting in the hope of success, remained peaceably within the city, waiting for a more favorable season, and reinforcements from England. The belligerents remained in this relative position until the 1st of April 1776, when Arnold was joined by General Wooster and his troops from Montreal. Wooster, being senior in rank, took command, and the whole army now amounted to near three thousand men. Eight hundred of these, however, were sick with the small-pox. Wooster made immediate preparations to renew the siege. A battery was erected on the Plains of Abraham, and a cannonade was opened on the place. But all the efforts of the besiegers were fruitless, and Carlton having received reinforcements under Burgoyne, the Americans hastily raised the siege and retreated toward the Sorel, leaving the stores and sick behind them. Burgoyne followed them, and they were finally driven out of Canada.

QUEENSTOWN, A.D. 1812.—Queenstown is situated on the north bank of the Niagara river, in Lower Canada, directly opposite Lewiston, about seven miles below the Niagara Falls.

On the 13th of October, 1812, a battle occurred on Queenstown heights, between the American army under General Stephen Van Rensselaer, and the British under the command of General Sir Isaac Brock. The American army consisted of about 1,200 men; the British army numbered more than 2,500 men, besides hordes of Chippewa Indians. Early on the morning of the 13th, Colonel Solomon Van Rensselaer, with 300 militia, and Colonel Chrysler, with 300 regular troops, made preparations to cross the river from Lewiston. The British troops occupied a strong position on Queenstown heights, and while the Americans were crossing the river, they were assailed by a terrific and incessant fire from the British batteries. As there was not a sufficient number of boats to convey all the troops over at once, the Americans were obliged to cross in detachments. Colonel Van Rensselaer at length, with about 100 men, effected a landing. These troops were led up the bank, where they halted to await the arrival of the others who were landing every moment, a few boat-loads at a time. It was now daybreak, and the British turned their fire upon this detachment, which, so much exposed, suffered greatly. In a few moments every commissioned officer was either killed or wounded. Colonel Van Rensselaer, being himself wounded in four places. He resolved, however to storm the heights, and ordered Captains Ogilvie and Wool to advance with the little band. The Americans rushed impetuously up the hill, and carried the heights and the enemy's works. The British retired into a strong stone house, whence they made an unsuccessful attempt to regain the ground they had lost. General Brock in person, attempted to rally his troops, and while endeavoring to lead on the grenadiers of the 49th, fell mortally wounded. On the fall of their leader, the British fled in dismay. At this time, Colonel Winfield Scott with one piece of artillery, and about 600 men, of whom 350 were regular troops, crossed over. The British also received a reinforcement of troops from Fort George, and 500 Chippewa Indians. Thus reinforced, the British far outnumbered the Americans, and the militia remaining at Lewiston cowardly refused to cross over to the assistance of their friends. Like the billows of a tempestuous ocean, the British columns rushed upon the American army, which stood in their midst like a wave-beaten rock, firm and unyielding. For eleven hours that little band contended against their foes, but at length they were compelled to surrender. The Americans lost on this occasion, about ninety killed, and 900 wounded, missing, and prisoners. The British did not suffer so much; but they met with an irreparable loss in the death of their gallant commander, General Brock. The behavior of some of the American militia during this day was disgraceful. Several hundred who had crossed over were found concealed along the shores, and were dragged out of their hiding-places by the heels by the British soldiers after the surrender.

RAAB, A.D. 1809.—Raab is a town in Hungary, and is situated on the river Raab, at its confluence with an arm of the Danube. The battle of Raab was fought on the 14th of June, 1809, between the French and the Austrians. The Austrian army consisted of about 40,000 men, and was commanded by the Archduke John. This army was posted upon the high grounds in front of the village of Raab. Their right rested on the village of Szabadhegi, and the heights bearing the same name, their left was covered by a morass; their center ran through the farm of Kismeyger: numerous light horse were dispersed along the front of the line, while a thousand picked troops occupied a square stone house, still further in advance of the center, which was loopholed, and strengthened by a few works, besides a deep rivulet, which formed a sort of natural fosse to the post. In this position, the Archduke John resolved to await the attack of the French, who, under Eugene Beauharnois were now approaching from the west. Prince Eugene resolved to attack the enemy on the 14th of June, the anniversary of the battle of Marengo. At ten o'clock in the morning of that day, the French army advanced to the struggle. Their left was commanded by Baraguay D'Hilliers; their center by Gremier, and their right was composed of the light infantry of Montbrun, and the heavy dragoons under Grouchy. Practhod, with several divisions, was in reserve behind the left and center. Eugene formed his troops in colums of divisions of echelon, the right in advance; but before the action had become serious, that order was abandoned by the rapid advance of the center and left, and the battle became general in parallel lines. The French army consisted of about 30,000 men. The troops of Serras first came into action. They attacked fiercely the square building in front of the Austrian position. The Austrians were speedily driven within their stronghold, but not before inflicting considerable loss on the assailants. Meanwhile, Durutte with a chosen division of infantry had advanced toward the village of Kismeyger, in the rear of the square house. But he was met by the fire of a battery of twelve pieces, under cover of which the Austrians made an onset, which for a moment checked the advance of the French.

Meanwhile, the Austrians in the square building maintained a furious fire through the loopholes upon the French, who were unable to dislodge them.

Baraguay d'Hilliers with his Italian division on the left, attacked the village of Szabadhey, but were checked by the murderous fire which issued from that village.

Eugene saw that the decisive moment had arrived, and hastened to the spot. He instantly addressed a few words to the discomfited Italians, exhorting them to remember their victories and their glory; and brought forward the reserves under General Pacthod, to their support. The Italians returned to the charge, the center and right of the enemy were forced, and the village of Szabadhegi carried. Upon this the Archduke John brought up his reserve, consisting of the flower of the army. The French reserves and the Italians, overpowered by numbers, were driven from the village; again and again the French renewed the fight, and for a third time they were obliged to fall back. But at length the French returned to the charge for a final effort, and drove back the enemy, and threw their whole center and right wing into irretrievable confusion. In the mean time a furious combat was going on on the Austrian left, between the troops of Montbrun and Grouchy, and the whole weight of the Hungarian cavalry. This formidable body of horse, 7,000 strong, in the first instance overwhelmed Montbrun, with his division, who had advanced to the support of Colbert's brigade which was endeavoring to turn the square from a house in front which still prolonged its defense; but Grouchy came up with his terrible cuirassiers, and charged the Hungarians with such vigor that they were driven back so far as to leave the defenders of the house entirely to their own resources.

"Though thus left in the middle, as it were, of the French army, Hammel and the heroic defenders of the farm-house abated nothing of their resolution. Irritated at this prolonged opposition, Serras combined a new attack; he himself with his whole division, assailed it on one side, while Roussel, with a fresh brigade, recommenced the attack in front. Nothing could resist this last attack; surrounded on all sides, the walls of the building were carried by escalade, the doors cut down with redoubled strokes of the hatchet, and an infuriated soldiery rushed into the building. A frightful scene ensued. In the tumult the building took fire; the flames spread with extraordinary rapidity, and, amid the death-struggle between the French and Austrians, the roof fell in with a tremendous crash, and all within, friends and foes, perished. This decisive success established Eugene in a solid manner in the village of Kismeyger and center of the enemy, who now fought only to secure his retreat. It was conducted in disorder, and the archduke sought refuge under the cannon of Kosnour, abandoning the intrenched camp of Raab, which was immediately evacuated by some battalions of Hungarian troops by whom it was occupied. In this battle the Austrians lost about 6,000 men. The French lost about 2,000. Raab was shortly afterward besieged in due form, by the French under Lauriston, with heavy cannon drawn from the arsenal of Vienna, and on the 24th of June, taken, with its garrison of 2,000 men, and 18 guns.

RABASTENS.—This city of France suffered greatly during the religious wars which have ravaged that country at various periods. But it was reserved for Mouluc to complete the sufferings of the people of this unfortunate town. In revenge for a wound which he had received in the face, which obliged him ever afterward to wear a mask, he caused a general massacre of its inhabitants, regardless of age or sex; cast about 60 Protestant deputies headlong from a tower, and laid the town in ashes.

RAGAN, B.C. 625.—A great battle was fought between the Medes and Assyrians in the plain of Ragan, in Persia, about the year 625 B.C. Phraortes, the King of the Medes, was defeated; his chariots were overthrown, his cavalry put to flight, and his whole army thrown into disorder. Nebuchadnezzar taking advantage of the defeat and confusion of the Medes, entered their country; took their cities, and pushed on his conquests even to Ecbatana, which he took by storm, and gave over to be pillaged by his soldiers. The unfortunate Phraortes who had escaped into the mountains of Ragan, where he at last fell into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, who cruelly caused him to be shot to death with darts. The mountains of Ragan are supposed to have been those now called Mazunderan near Teheran, the modern capital of Persia.

RAISIN, RIVER. See Frenchtown.

RAJDEER, A.D. 1818.—Rajdeer, in Hindoostan, was besieged in 1818, by the British. The place is strongly situated on a steep mountain, and is accessible only by one narrow path cut through the rocks and well protected by gates, yet, though plentifully supplied with provisions and water, the garrison evacuated the place at the first sound of the besiegers' cannon, and the British troops entered the place without losing a single man.

RAMALES, A.D. 1837.—Ramales in Spain was, in 1837, a scene of an obstinate and protracted struggle between the Carlists under General Maroto, and the troops of General Espartero. Maroto held the town, and the neighboring fort of Guardamino, and received the assaults of the enemy with the utmost coolness. The Carlists fought with dogged courage; but at length were obliged by the superior force and arms of the assailants, to evacuate the place. But before leaving the town they set fire to the buildings and Ramales was reduced to a heap of ruins, in which condition it still remains.

RAMILLIES, A.D. 1706.—The village of Ramillies in Belgium, is famous in history from being the scene of the battle fought on the 23d of May, 1706, between the English, and the allies, under the Duke of Marlborough, on the one side, and the French under Marshal Villenoi, on the other. The French army consisted of about 80,000 men, being superior in numbers to that of the allies. The latter, however, owing as it is alleged, to the bad dispositions and incapacity of Villenoi, gained an easy as well as a complete victory. The French lost about 8,000 men, killed and wounded, and nearly 7,000 prisoners, including 600 officers, with all their artillery and baggage. The allies lost about 3,000 men. The Duke of Marlborough, whose gallantry was as conspicuous as his great talents as a general, had a horse shot under him in the action; and the head of Colonel Brierfield, who was assisting the duke to remount, was carried off by a canon-ball! This victory accelerated the fall of Louvain, Brussels, and other important places, and the British parliament rewarded the victor by settling the honors which had been conferred on himself upon the male and female issues of his daughters.

RAMSOUR'S MILLS, A.D. 1780.—Early in June, 1780, General Rutherford was stationed, with about 500 American militia, in the vicinity of Charlotte, North Carolina. Intelligence having reached him that the Tories were assembling beyond the Catawba in Tryon county, he called upon the militia of the adjoining country, to collect for the dispersion of those men. The Tories' place of rendezvous was at Ramsour's Mills, in the present county of Lincoln, on the south fork of the Catawba. Having received intelligence that the British under Lord Rawdon had returned toward Camden, Rutherford marched toward Ramsour's Mills. The force of the Tories amounted to about 1,300 men, and was commanded by Colonel John Moore, and Major Welch. On the 18th of June, Rutherford, having concentrated the militia of the neighboring towns, advanced to the Catawba; and on the 19th, crossed that river at Tuckesege Ford. He sent a messenger to Colonel Locke, of Rowan, ordering him to join his forces at a point on the Catawba sixteen miles from Ramsour's. Locke, with 400 militia, was encamped on the 19th of June, on Mountain Creek, higher up on the Catawba, about sixteen miles from Ramsour's. On the arrival of Rutherford's messenger, he called a council of his officers, and it was decided that it was not prudent to form a junction with that general's forces; but that a decided blow should be struck at once. It was resolved therefore, to attack the Tories without delay. Colonel Johnson was sent to apprise Rutherford of the state of affairs. He arrived at Rutherford's camp late in the same night. On the evening of the 19th Colonel Locke and his troops commenced their march, and arrived within a mile of the enemy's camp early the following morning. The Tories occupied a lofty eminence, about 300 paces from Ramsour's Mills, and half a mile from the present village of Lincolnton. The slope of the hill was almost entirely devoid of trees; and the position of the Tories was most advantageous, for, occupying an elevated ground which commanded the surrounding country, they could fire without impediment upon an approaching foe in any direction. Three mounted companies of the patriots, under Captains Falls, McDowell, and Brandon, led on to the attack, followed closely by the footmen who were under the immediate command of Colonel Locke. The patriots rushed up the hill with the utmost impetuosity. The Tories were taken by surprise. Their pickets fired, and immediately retreated to the camp. The Tories soon recovered from their confusion, and poured such a terrible fire upon the assailants that they were compelled to retire. Rallied by their officers at the foot of the hill, the patriots again advanced to the attack, and the action became general. It was a fierce and cruel fight. Children of the same soil were opposed in deadly conflict to each other. There was no martial pomp on either side; the soldiers of both parties were clothed in citizen's guise. They fought in stern silence with that animosity for which civil war alone is distinguished. Brother against brother, neighbor against neighbor, regardless of the calls of mercy, and thinking only of mutual destruction.

The patriots under Captain Hardin gained the right flank of the Tories, while the action in the center was at its height, and fell fiercely on the enemy in that quarter. The troops were so close that they beat each other with the butts of their guns. After a desperate resistance the Tories were driven from their position and the patriots took possession of the heights. The Tories rallied at the foot of the hill; and fearing an immediate attack, Locke dispatched messengers to urge Rutherford forward. They met him within six miles of Ramsour's, advancing with all possible speed. A body of horse under Major Davie, started forward at full gallop, followed by Colonel Davidson's foot. Arriving within six miles of the scene of action they received intelligence that the Tories had retreated. Rutherford marched to the height and there encamped. The fight had been brief but bloody. Seventy men were stretched dead upon the plain. Side by side lay the Tories and Whigs, clothed in the same raiment, and it was difficult to distinguish one from the other. It is thought that an equal number was slain on both sides. Fifty Tories were made prisoners. The next day the battle field presented a sad spectacle. Hundreds of the relatives of the slain were congregated on the plain, filling the air with pitiable lamentations as they recognized the bodies of fathers, husbands, sons and brothers. May God preserve our country from such another day!

RANSBECK, A.D. 1143.—The battle of Ransbeck, (a village of Belgium), was fought in 1143, between the soldiers of the lords of Deist Beribeck, Wesermael, and Wemmel, and the troops of those of Gimberghen and Mechlin. The prize for which they fought was the territory of Godfrey III. The battle was bloody and obstinate but at length resulted in the defeat of the lords of Gimberghen and Mechlin.

RAPHIA, B.C. 217.—In the year 217 B.C. Ptolemy, King of Egypt, caused his army of 70,000 foot, 5,000 horse, and 73 elephants to advance toward Pelusium. Placing himself at the head of these forces, he marched through the deserts which divide Egypt from Palestine, and encamped at Raphia, between Rhinacorura and Gaza, at which latter city the armies met. The army of Antiochus, King of Syria, was somewhat more numerous than the other. His forces consisted of 72,000 foot, 6,000 horse, and 102 elephants. He at first encamped within ten furlongs, and soon after, within five of the enemy. The two armies thus remained almost within sight of each other for a considerable length of time, and continual skirmishes took place between individuals who wished to distinguish themselves, and the parties who went to fetch water, or to forage. At length the two kings determined to decide their quarrel, and drew up their armies in battle array. They both rode along the lines of their troops to cheer and animate them to the utmost. Ptolemy's wife and sister Arsinoë, not only exhorted the soldiers before the battle to behave manfully, but she remained with her husband throughout the whole engagement. The right wing of the Syrians charged down upon the enemy's left like a hurricane, carrying every thing before them. The Egyptians turned and fled, and the Syrians, flushed with victory, warmly pursued the fugitives; but in the mean time the right wing of the Egyptian army had successfully charged upon the left wing of the enemy, and Ptolemy, perceiving that their center was uncovered, dashed upon it, and before Antiochus could come to its relief, it was broken, and his men were flying in disorder over the plain. In vain did he endeavor to rally his men; the overwhelming numbers of the Egyptians; the fearful slaughter which had already been committed upon their ranks, appalled them, and Antiochus was obliged to provide for his own retreat. He returned to Raphia with a loss of 10,000 men killed, and 4,000 taken prisoners. Shortly afterward, finding that it would now be impossible for him to maintain himself in that country against Ptolemy, he returned to Antioch with the balance of his army. The battle of Raphia was fought at the same time with that in which Hannibal defeated Flaminus the consul, on the banks of the lake Thrasymenus in Etruria.

RATISBON, A.D. 1809.—In the year 1809. Ratisbon, on the Danube, in Bavaria, was taken from the French by the Austrians, who having been defeated by Napoleon at the battle of Echmuhl, sought shelter within its walls, closely pressed by their victorious enemies. Alison thus describes the capture of Ratisbon by the French emperor:

"No sooner did Napoleon discover that the Archduke Charles had withdrawn the bulk of his forces during the night, than he moved forward the whole cavalry to attack the rear guard, drawn up in front of Ratisbon. Notwithstanding all their efforts, the Austrian generals could not prevent great confusion occurring as the host of the carriages withdrew into the town; and nearly a thousand brave horsemen there sacrificed themselves for the safety of the army. The screen of cavalry which was drawn up around the bridge of boats happily concealed its existence from the enemy till the troops were all over; but the pontoons themselves were burned or fell into the hands of the victors. At length the rear guard was all withdrawn within the walls of Ratisbon, the gates closed, and the ramparts lined with infantry.

"Napoleon arrived on the spot at noon on the 23d of April, the day after the battle of Echmuhl, and in his anxiety to press the assault, approached so near the walls that a musket-ball struck him on the right foot, and occasioned a considerable contusion. The pain obliged him to dismount from his horse; the report spread that the emperor was wounded, and instantly the soldiers broke from their ranks, and leaving their muskets, their guns, their horses, crowded round their beloved chief. Regardless of the cannon-balls which fell in the dense group, 15,000 men of all arms hastened to the spot, every one forgetting his own danger in the intense anxiety concerning their general's welfare. After a few moments, the wound was found so inconsiderable that the emperor again mounted his horse; a rapturous cheer from the warlike multitude announced the joyful event to the army, and soon the rolling of the drums, and the clang of trumpets recalled the soldiers in all directions to their arms.

"This perilous incident retarded only for a few minutes the progress of the attack. Lannes, who directed the operations, perceiving a large house, which rested against the ramparts, pointed several guns against the walls, which speedily reduced them to ruins, and formed a sort of breach, by which access might be obtained to the summit. A heavy fire, however, was kept up from the rampart, which rendered the crossing of the glacis highly dangerous, and for a long time no soldiers could be found who would incur the hazard. Impatient of delay, Marshal Lannes seized a scaling-ladder, and himself ran forward over the perilous space, swept in every part by the enemy's balls. Animated by this example, the troops rushed on, cleared the glacis, leaped into the ditch, and crowding up the breach formed by the ruined house, forced their way into the house. Labedoyere, reserved for a melancholy fate in future times,* was the first man who was seen on the summit. The troops now followed rapidly into the town; the gates attacked in flank were seized and opened, and the streets filled with a ferocious multitude of assailants. Still the Hungarian grenadiers maintained their resistance. Slowly retiring toward the bridge, they kept up an incessant discharge upon their pursuers; the houses took fire in the conflict; the ammunition-wagons were only rescued from the flames by the united efforts of friends and foes, and after losing half their number in the desperate strife they reached the barricades of the bridge, where the cannonade of artillery from the opposite side was so violent as to render all further pursuit impossible. The French head-quarters were established for the night in the convent of Prull, under the walls; in the course of it the bridge was evacuated, and next day the Austrian rear guard was discovered beyond Stadt-am-Hoff, covering the retreat of the army to the woody heights of the Bohmervald."

The advantages gained by these brilliant operations to Napoleon were very great. Twelve days had only elapsed since he left Paris, and already he had combatted the Austrians on four successive days, and had taken a multitude of prisoners, over a hundred pieces of cannon, six hundred ammunition-wagons, two pontoon trains, and an incalculable quantity of baggage. Over 30,000 Austrians had fallen or had been made prisoners, and the spirit of the vanquished so thoroughly broken as to render them incapable of engaging in active operations. The French had lost between 15,000 and 20,000 men; but what was such a loss when compared to the brilliant path he had opened before him. The road to Vienna lay open to the conqueror. "If ever," says Alison, "the words of Cæsar, 'Veni, vidi, vici,' were applicable to a modern conqueror, they might have been used by Napoleon on this occasion."

* Ney and Labedoyere were tried for treason, declared guilty, and put to death by the allied powers after the fall of Napoleon.—Ed.

RAVENNA, A. D. 488. — Theodoric besieged Odoacer in Ravenna, a city of central Italy; but, too weak to carry the city by force, he resolved to reduce it by famine. Ravenna, being well supplied with provisions, and its port being accessible to light barks, the siege was protracted to two years and a half. Odoacer made frequent sorties by night, and never returned without having signalized his courage. Theodoric, master of all the neighboring country, at length succeeded in closing the port. Famine then began to be sensibly felt; a bushel of wheat was worth six pieces of gold (more than three pounds sterling); and the inhabitants were reduced to the extremity of eating every thing that could be converted into aliment. Odoacer, obliged to treat with his rival, contented himself with sharing with Theodoric the title of king. On the 5th of March, 491, the King of the Goths entered Ravenna. Such was, in Italy, the foundation of the kingdom of the Ostrogoths, which only subsisted 60 years. Odoacer was treated for some time with all the respect due to his dignity, but that prince, worthy of a better fate, was massacred soon after, with his son Silœnes, by Theodoric himself, in the midst of a banquet.

Second Siege, A.D. 550.—Belisarius, after having deprived Vitiges of the greater part of the places which that prince possessed in Italy, besieged him in Ravenna, which he soon reduced to a state of famine. It was here Belisarius was so near losing his life by an arrow, which was intercepted by a devoted follower, who sacrificed himself to save his master. The city was on the point of surrendering, when two senators arrived from Constantinople, charged with a message from Justinian to his victorious general, directing him to make peace with the King of the Goths. Belisarius was indignant at being thus deprived of the honor of conquering Italy. Under different pretexts he amused the senators, and pressed the siege more closely. Belisarius is one of the fine characters of history upon whom the young imagination loves to dwell. He was of the stamp of Plutarch's heroes; he was brave, magnanimous, good; and after being eminently successful, was as eminently unfortunate, not from any falling off in himself, but from his master's weakness and ingratitude. Such being our feeling for Belisarius, we experience regret in being told that, in his eagerness to take Ravenna, he condescended to practices we think unworthy of such a man: he poisoned the waters; circulated, by means of miscreants, reports in Ravenna disadvantageous to Vitiges; and contrived to have the city granaries set on fire by an incendiary. These may come within the line of the proverb, "All is fair in war;" but there is nothing heroic in them; they would have become Justinian better than his really great general. The Goths, believing themselves betrayed by their prince, offered not only to give up the city, but even proposed to Belisarius to become their king. Although this extraordinary man might have accepted the crown without dishonor, he only affected to listen to it that he might the more speedily terminate the war. Embassadors came from Vitiges with offers of surrendering on any terms he would please to impose. Belisarius entered Ravenna, secured the person of Vitiges, and sent him and his treasures to the emperor.—Robson.

RED BANK, A.D. 1777.—The village of Red Bank is situated on the east bank of the Delaware, in Gloucester co., N. J., about five miles below Philadelphia.

Soon after open war commenced between the colonies and England, the Americans turned their attention to the mouth of the Delaware river. To prevent a British fleet from capturing Philadelphia, extensive fortifications were erected at various eligible points along the river shores. On a low reedy island, where the beach was only a few feet above tide, stood Fort Mifflin, a strong fortress built of earth, stones, and huge logs.

On the Jersey shore, just opposite, was Fort Mercer, a similarly constructed fortification, armed with heavy cannon. Further down the river were other works, while under the lee of small islands, floating batteries commanded the river in every direction. Nor was this all; for in the main channel the Americans sunk huge chevaux-de-frize, or frames of timber filled with stones and logs. Upon these defenses, principally, the patriots relied for the protection of the city of Philadelphia.

Soon after the battle of Brandywine, Sir William Howe, with a large fleet of frigates and store-ships, appeared in the mouth of the Delaware river, and opened fire upon the first line of batteries. Being able to bring many heavy guns to bear upon the American works, Howe soon silenced them, and taking advantage of a strong wind, sailed in one night nearly to the sunken obstruction near Billing's Island. Under cover of a heavy fire from the ships, the British labored to break a passage through the cheveaux-de-frize. By great exertions, a channel eight feet deep, and just wide enough for a little frigate, was delved out, and six vessels sailed through. Meantime, the British army, which had defeated Washington at Brandywine, rapidly neared Philadelphia, and, in fact, received stores from the six ships that broke through the sunken obstructions. With a determination to destroy Forts Mercer and Mifflin, Howe sent Donop, with 1,200 picked men, to make an attack by land, while the fleet assaulted a large flotilla of American batteries, galleys, gunboats, and schooners, which caused the British much annoyance. The fleet was also to bombard Fort Mifflin.

Fort Mercer, commonly called Red Bank, was garrisoned by a regiment of Rhode Island troops under Colonel Greene, and Fort Mifflin by two regiments of Marylanders under Colonel Smith. Colonel Donop, with his brigade, left the British camp on the morning of October 21, and the first night rested at Haddonsfield, New Jersey, for several hours. Getting under arms about midnight, they marched briskly across the country, and at four o'clock on the morning of the 22d, came within cannon-shot of the fort. They were discovered by the sentry about daylight, slowly forming in the edge of a belt of forest. The garrison was instantly under arms, and preparations made to fight until the last. Although Colonel Greene had only 400 men, he declared that Fort Mercer should never be surrendered. With only 14 pieces of cannon, the brave officer, heartily supported by his gallant men, hastily made ready for battle.

Soon a stir was observed in the British ranks, and an officer, riding up to the intrenchments, protected by a white flag, made a proclamation: "The King of England orders his rebellious subjects to lay down their arms, and they are warned that if they stand battle, no quarters whatever will be given!" To this insulting message, Colonel Greene replied: "We ask no quarters, neither will we give any!" The officer retired, and very soon a party of artillerists commenced the erection of a battery within easy cannon-shot of the fort. The works of Fort Mercer consisted of a strong citadel, loopholed, and supplied with strong embrasures for cannon. The citadel was surrounded by ramparts, flanked with batteries; there was also a ditch and abatis. Besides these defenses, a strong masked battery occupied an angle of the ramparts, its guns completely raking the abatis and approaches.

The battery being finished, a rapid fire was commenced on the American works. The patriots replied for a time, but gradually slackened, and the men withdrew in small parties to the citadel, leaving a company to manage the masked battery. Colonel Donop, believing the enemy's guns dismounted and the men dismayed, ordered an assault from his whole force, in two columns of 600 men each. The column which first advanced cleared the outworks with loud shouts of derision, under the impression that the Americans had abandoned the whole fortress; but their dreadful mistake was soon evident. As the Hessian soldiers climbed upon the rampart in great numbers, a vivid fire from cannon and musketry opened upon them from the citadel. It is said that nearly 100 men fell at the first volley. A storm of grape and chain-shot swept the glacis, while from every loop-hole they poured a stream of musket-balls.

As the enemy staggered back astonished and dismayed, the masked battery suddenly opened, and at point-blank range cut down the disorganized enemy, and the glacis was covered with dead and dying. The column of Colonel Donop assaulted the south side of the works just at this instant, charging at the head of his men. Donop led them over the abatis, across the ditch, and even upon the fort. Here Donop fell badly wounded, and his soldiers, unable to endure the terrible carnage made at every volley from the citadel, turned and fled. As they wheeled, Colonel Mingetode, the second in command, received a mortal wound. The Hessians, panic-struck, fled at once, nor did they for a moment halt until several miles from the scene of defeat. Under the ramparts of Fort Mercer they left over four hundred dead and wounded men, while the fort only numbered eight men killed and twenty-eight wounded.

As a party of Americans, under the orders of a French engineer, were removing the wounded, a faint voice from among the heap of slain and mangled men called out, "whoever you are, draw me hence!" It was the voice of Colonel Donop. He was taken to a neighboring house and kindly cared for, but his wounds defied human skill. In three days he died. A few hours before his death he said: "It is finishing a noble career early (he was thirty-seven), but I die a victim of my ambition and the avarice of my sovereign!" The attack on Fort Mifflin by the fleet began at the moment of Donop's assault. For several hours a severe cannonade was kept up by six British frigates, upon the American fleet and fortifications. It was returned by the Americans in such a skillful and rapid manner, that very soon two of the frigates were set on fire by hot shot, and two others badly crippled. Finally the English commander abandoned the attack, and retired beyond cannon-shot.

A handsome monument commemorating the battle of Red Bank, was erected in 1829, near the site of Fort Mercer. About the 10th of November, the British made a grand attack upon Fort Mifflin, which, after a long resistance, was destroyed and evacuated by the American forces. Its destruction cost the English a very heavy loss of men and material.—Richard Everett.

RED SEA, B.C. 1491.—The first encampment of the children of Israel during their departure from out the land of Egypt was on the edge of a wilderness, on the verge of the Red Sea. Pharaoh was pursuing them with a force which he deemed adequate to compel their return or effect their destruction. They might easily have secured their escape in the fastnesses of the wilderness; but Moses, who acted solely under divine instruction, led them into a defile between the mountains so that they were inclosed on all sides. The people murmured at this piece of bad management, as it appeared to them, and tauntingly asked him if he had brought them hither because there were no graves in Egypt. But God had instructed Moses to draw them into this awkward position that Pharaoh might be incited to pursue them. The proud Pharaoh led his mighty hosts toward the feeble band of fugitives and threatened to annihilate them; but Moses stretched forth his hand over the sea, and immediately the waters separated, and a dry and commodious passage was afforded. The children of Israel passed over in safety, protected on either side by walls of water. The Egyptian forces eagerly pursued them; but ere they had reached the middle of the sea Moses again stretched forth his rod, and the waters closed, and Pharaoh with all his forces, chariots, and horses were buried beneath the foaming waters.

RENCHEN, A.D. 1796.—On the 28th of June, 1796, a battle was fought near Renchen, in Baden, between the French under Moreau, and the Austrians. The former were victorious, and Moreau and his army entered Swabia.

RENNES, A.D. 1357.—Rennes, a beautiful and ancient town of France, was besieged in the year 1357, by the English under the Duke of Lancaster; but the French made such a spirited resistance that the English were compelled to raise the siege.

RESACA DE LA PALMA, A.D. 1846.—This noted battle-field is on the route from Point Isabel to Matamoras, about four miles north of the latter place, in Mexico.

After the battle of Palo Alto, General Taylor pushed forward his army with all speed to relieve the American camp opposite Matamoras, which he had left in charge of Major Brown, and which was closely besieged by the Mexicans. The American army consisted of about 2,000 men, and the road to Major Brown's camp was obstructed by a Mexican army consisting of nearly 6,000 men. General Taylor at length, on the 9th of May, encountered the enemy within four miles of the fortified American camp, posted in and near a ravine called Resaca de la Palma. The position of the Mexicans was strong, and with their overwhelming numbers they expected to crush the enemy with ease; but the undaunted valor of the Americans overcame all obstacles. Captain McCall with the advance pushed forward, gallantly, and received the first fire of the Americans without wavering. Lieutenant Ridgely, who now commanded the lamented Ringgold's battery, was ordered to the front with his pieces, and Captain Walker, with the Texan volunteers, was sent to point out the enemy's position. Ridgely moved forward in the very face of the Mexican battery, and opened his guns upon the enemy. The Mexicans replied briskly, and for some time a fierce cannonade was maintained on both sides at the distance of about one hundred paces. The Mexican cavalry and infantry made frequent and fierce charges upon Ridgely's flanks, but were repulsed invariably with great slaughter.

Meanwhile, the battle on the left and right of the road was rapidly increasing in warmth. The Americans steadily advanced on their two wings; but their efforts were retarded by the effectual resistance made by the Mexicans to the attempts of Lieutenant Ridgely in the center. Ridgely worked his pieces incessantly; but the Mexican gunners replied with a coolness and precision which prevented him from making any sensible impression on their position. Taylor saw that unless the Mexican battery in the center was silenced, all further efforts were useless; and ordered Colonel May, with his dragoons to charge the battery. "Sir," said Taylor, "your command has done nothing yet—you must take that battery." "Men," said the gallant colonel, "we must take that battery. Follow!" and like a whirlwind, that stalwart body of horse, headed by their brave leader, whose long hair streaming back from his head in the wind, served as their banner, dashed though the ravine, in the midst of a tempest of shot hurled upon them from the opposing battery, and with wild hurrahs urged their horses over the enemy's guns. So wild was their career, that the impetus carried them some distance in the rear of the battery; and when May halted he could rally but six of his men. With these, however, he dashed upon the Mexican gunners, who had regained their pieces, and drove them off. General La Vega, who stood by the side of a cannon, which he was about to discharge, finding himself abandoned by his men, surrendered himself a prisoner to Colonel May. The dragoons cut their way back through the Mexican lines. The following graphic description of May's gallant charge is related by a participant:

"At Resaca de la Palma, our troops stood anxiously waiting for the signal to be given, and never had I looked upon men upon whose countenances were more clearly expressed a fixed determination to win. The lips of some were pale with excitement, and their eyes wore that fixed expression which betokens mischief; others with shut teeth, would quietly laugh, and catch a tighter grip of the rein, or seat themselves with care and firmness in the saddle, while quiet words of confidence and encouragement were passed from each to his neighbor. All at once, May rode to the front of his troop—every rein and saber was tightly grasped. Raising himself, and pointing at the battery, he shouted, 'Men follow!' There was now a clattering of hoofs, and a rattling of saber-sheaths; the fire of the enemy's guns was partly drawn by Lieutenant Ridgely, and the next moment we were sweeping like the wind upon the ravine. I was in a squad of about nine men, who were separated by a shower of grape from the battery, and we were in advance, May leading. He turned his horse opposite the breastwork, in front of the guns, and with another shout 'to follow,' leaped over them. Several of the horses did follow, but mine, being new, and not well trained, refused; two others bolted, and their riders started down the ravine to turn the breastwork, where the rest of the troops had entered. I made another attempt to clear the guns, with my horse, turning him around feeling all the time secure at thinking the guns discharged. I put his breast toward them, and gave him spur, but he again balked: so, turning his head down the ravine, I too started to ride round the breastwork.

"As I came down, a lancer dashed at me with lance in rest. With my saber I parried his thrust, only receiving a slight flesh-wound from its point in the arm, which felt at the time like the prick of a pin. The lancer turned and fled; at that moment a ball passed through my horse on the left side and shattered my right leg. The shot killed the horse instantly, and he fell upon my left leg, fastening me by his weight to the earth. There I lay, right in the midst of the action, where carnage was riding riot, and every moment the shot, from our own and the Mexican guns, tearing up the earth around me. I tried to raise my horse, so as to extricate my leg, but I had already grown so weak with my wound that I was unable, and, from the mere attempt, I fell back exhausted. To add to my horror, a horse which was careering about, riderless, within a few yards of me, received a wound, and he commenced struggling and rearing with pain. Two or three times he came near falling on me, but at length, with a scream of agony and a bound, he fell dead—his body touching my own fallen steed. What I had been in momentary dread of, now occurred—my wounded limb, which was lying across the horse received another ball in the ankle.

"I now felt disposed to give up; and, exhausted through pain and excitement, a film gathered over my eyes, which I thought was the precursor of dissolution. From this hopeless state I was aroused by a wounded Mexican, calling out to me, 'Bueno Americana,' and turning my eyes toward the spot, I saw that he was holding a certificate and calling to me. The tide of action now rolled away from me, and hope again sprang up. The Mexican uniforms began to disappear from the chapparal, and squadrons of our troops passed in sight, apparently in pursuit. While I was thus nursing the prospect of escape, I beheld, not far from me, a villainous-looking ranchero, armed with an American serjeant's short-sword, dispatching a wounded American soldier, whose body he robbed; the next he came to was a Mexican, whom he served the same way, and thus I looked on while he murderously slew four. I drew an undischarged pistol from my holsters, and, laying myself along my horse's neck, watched him, expecting to be the next victim; but something frightened him from his vulture-like business, and he fled in another direction.

"I need not say that had he visited me I should have taken one more shot at the enemy, and would have died content had I succeeded in making such an assassin bite the dust. Two hours after, I had the pleasure of shaking some of my comrades by the hand, who were picking up the wounded. They lifted my Mexican friend, too, and I am pleased to say he, as well as myself, lives to fight over again the sanguinary fray of Resaca de la Palma."

As soon as May had captured the battery in the center, Ridgely pushed forward his pieces to the edge of the ravine. The Mexican infantry poured a volley of musketry upon him; and their cavalry made a furious charge; but one discharge of cannister hurled them back. The battle now became warm and bloody. The Mexicans with the coolness of veterans rallied in the ravine; the Americans rushed upon them, and a general conflict ensued. Our space will not permit us to enter into a detailed account of all the movements of the various troops; suffice it to say the Mexicans, after making a most obstinate resistance, finally gave way. Their retreat became a perfect rout; the Mexicans fled in terror toward Matamoras. The Americans pursued; and the sight of the fugitives and the sound of cannon gradually approaching the American camp, assured its gallant defenders that succor had arrived. In this battle the Americans lost 121 men, in killed and wounded. The Mexicans lost about 500 men, killed and wounded, and 100 prisoners, and eight pieces of artillery, with a great quantity of ammunition, three standards, and a large number of pack mules fell into the hands of the victors. The joy of the Americans was damped by the death of Major Brown, who with his small force had heroically withstood a cannonade and bombardment of 160 hours. He died on the 9th of May, from the effects of a wound inflicted by the bursting of a shell. The post opposite Matamoras, was now called Fort Brown, in honor of the gallant commander, who had fallen in its defense.

RHEIMS, A.D. 1359.—Rheims is an ancient city of France, situated on the Vesle, twenty-five miles north-west of Châlons. In 1359, the troops of Edward III. of England, invested the city of Rheims; but they were so obstinately resisted by the besieged that they were obliged to raise the siege, and abandon the attempt. In 1814 the Russians gained possession of the city of Rheims, but soon after they were attacked by the army of Napoleon, and driven from the city with immense slaughter.

RHODES, B.C. 352.—The beautiful island of Rhodes, in the Mediteranean, with all its delightful mythological associations, its roses and its splendid scenery, has not escaped the horrors of war; it has been besiged several times, and in all instances in connection with great names and great events.

The city of Rhodes it situated at the north-east extremity of the island.

Mausolus, King of Caria, subdued Rhodes. After his death, the Rhodians revolted, and besieged Artemisia, his widow, in Halicarnassus. The king and queen are rendered immortal in the European word mausoleum, derived from the splendid monument so called, one of the seven wonders of the world, which she built to his memory. She gave prizes to poets for panegyrics written to commemorate his virtues; but still further did her grief carry her—she resolved to give him a yet more extraordinary tomb. Having collected his ashes left by the burning of his body, and caused the bones to be beaten in a mortar, she mingled some of the powder every day in her drink, till she had consumed it all, meaning by this to make her own body the sepulcher of her husband. Notwithstanding her active, energetic spirit, her grief proved too strong for her, and she died lamenting him, two years after his decease.

This princess ordered the inhabitants of Halicarnassus to meet the Rhodians with open arms, as if they meant to deliver up their city to them. The deceived Rhodians landed their men, and left their ships empty, for the purpose of entering the place. In the mean time Artemisia ordered out her own galleys, which seized the fleet of the enemy, and, having thus deprived them of the means of retreat, she surrounded the Rhodians and made a general slaughter of them. This intrepid queen then sailed toward Rhodes. The citizens, perceiving their vessels coming home crowned with flowers, admitted the Carian fleet into the port, amid cries and exclamations of joy. Their surprise may be supposed when they recognized their unwelcome visitors. Artemisia insisted upon having the authors of the revolt put to death, and returned home in triumph. We can not leave this remarkable princess without mentioning the extraordinary part she played in the immortal battle of Salamis. She, from her country, was of course against the Greeks, and, with her vessels, formed part of the fleet of Xerxes. She strongly advised Xerxes to avoid a naval engagement; the Greeks, she said, were more accustomed to the sea than the Persians were, and would have a great advantage upon that element. Although her advice was not listened to, she did her duty so nobly in the fight, that Xerxes exclaimed—"That if the men appeared like women before the Greeks, the women fought like heroes." In order to escape the Greeks, who pursued her warmly, she hoisted a Greek flag, and to complete the deception, attacked a Persian vessel commanded by Clamasithymus, King of Calydna, her personal enemy, and sunk it. After this, the Greeks, believing her to be of their party, offered her no more molestation.

Second Siege, B.C. 303.—Upon the death of Alexander of Macedon, his dominions were divided among his generals. Of these, Antigonus, by force of arms, attained great power throughout the country, and Seleucus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander, four Macedonian princes, jealous of the rapidly increasing strength of Antigonus, formed a conspiracy against him, and united their armies for the purpose of crushing him. Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, invariably accompanied his father in his expeditions, and when Antigonus had arrived at an age which incapacitated him for active service, he made use of his son, who from the experience he had already acquired, transacted the most important affairs with great ability. The war between Antigonus and the Rhodians, was occasioned by their alliance with Ptolemy, and the king, determined to punish them for their temerity in refusing to aid him in his war against that prince, sent Demetrius with a fleet and army, to reduce them to his obedience. The Rhodians, who foresaw the impending storm, had sent to all the princes their allies, and to Ptolemy in particular, to implore their assistance. They represented to Ptolemy that their attachment to his interest had drawn upon them the danger to which they were then exposed. The preparations on both sides were immense. Demetrius arrived before Rhodes with a numerous fleet. It consisted of 200 ships of war of various dimensions, and more than 170 transports, which carried about 40,000 men, without including the cavalry. He had likewise near 1,000 small vessels loaded with provisions, and other necessary accommodation for an army. Demetrius upon his arrival landed in order to take a view of the most commodious situation for assaulting the place.

He also sent out parties to lay the country waste on all sides, and at the same time caused another body of his troops to cut down the trees, and demolish the houses in the parts adjacent to Rhodes, and then employed them as materials to fortify his camp with a triple pallisade. The Rhodians on their part prepared for a vigorous defense. They dismissed from the city all such persons as were useless. The number of those who remained, and were capable of bearing arms, amounted to about 6,000 citizens and 1,000 strangers. Among the latter were many of the most illustrious captains of the countries in alliance with the Rhodians. Liberty and the rights of denizens, were promised to such slaves as should distinguish themselves by their bravery, and the public engaged to pay the masters the full price for each of them. It was likewise publicly announced that the citizens would bestow an honorable interment on those who should lose their lives in any engagements, and would provide for the subsistence of their parents, wives, and children, and that when the sons should be of an age capable of bearing arms, they should be presented with a complete suit of armor, on the public theater, at the great solemnity of the Bacchanalia. This decree kindled an incredible ardor among all classes. The rich came in crowds with money to defray the expenses of the siege; the workmen redoubled their industry in making heavy and light machines for casting arrows, darts, beams, and stones, called catapults and balistas, and other weapons. The laborers repaired the breaches in the walls; while others supplied them with stone. In short the whole city was full of bustle and activity; every man from the highest to the lowest, strove with emulation to distinguish himself on this occasion.

It had been mutually agreed upon, between Demetrius and the Rhodians, that 100 drachmas (about $125) should be paid as a ransom for every prisoner, and one half that sum for every slave, who should be taken prisoner by either party during the continuance of hostilities. This siege affords the only example to be found in antiquity, of the establishment of a cartel for the exchange of prisoners.

The besieged first sent out their galleys against a small fleet of sutlers and merchants who were bringing a supply of provisions to the enemy. The Rhodians sunk a great number of their vessels, burned several, and carried into the city such of the prisoners as were in a condition to pay their ransom. They gained a considerable sum of money by this expedition. Demetrius began to attack from the sea, in order to make himself master of the port and the towers which defended the entrance. He caused two tortoises, or sheds of wood constructed so as to shelter the soldiers, to be erected on two flat-bottomed vessels, joined together, in order to cover the men from the enormous masses of stones and beams, as well as the flights of darts and arrows which the besieged discharged from the towers and walls. He also caused two towers to be erected of greater height than those which defended the entrance into the port, and in these he placed machines for battering the latter with stones, heavy beams, and darts. Each of these towers were then placed upon two ships strongly bound together. He also caused a kind of floating barricado to be erected in front of the tortoises and towers on a long beam of timber, four feet thick, through which stakes, armed at the ends with large irons, were driven. These stakes were disposed horizontally, with their spikes projecting forward, in order to prevent the Rhodian vessels from shattering the work with their beaks. Then selecting one of his largest galleys he erected on one of its sides a rampart of planks, which he pierced with loopholes. In this galley he placed his best archers and slingers, and furnished them with a multitude of bows, cross-bows, slings, and catapults, with other engines for shooting in order to gall the workmen of the city employed in raising and repairing the walls of the port. The Rhodians, seeing the besiegers turning all their efforts against the harbor, were no less industrious in defending it. They raised two machines upon an adjoining eminence, and planted three more on large ships at the mouth of the little harbor. Both the eminence and the ships were provided with troops of archers and slingers, who had an abundant supply of arrows, darts, and stones of all kinds. The ships in the great harbor, were also manned and armed. When Demetrius advanced with his ships and all his armament, to begin the attack on the ports, a violent tempest arose, and he was obliged to suspend his operations for that day; but about night the wind went down, and the sea became calm. Demetrius again advanced, and made himself master of a neighboring eminence, about 500 paces from the wall of the ports, and posted there 400 men, who fortified themselves with pallisades. The next morning Demetrius caused his batteries to advance with the sound of trumpets, and the shouts of his whole army, and fiercely attacked the Rhodians who guarded the mole which covered the port. A great many of the Rhodians were slain, but the besiegers were at length repulsed, after a loss nearly equal on both sides, and were obliged to retire from the port with their ships and machines, to be out of reach of the enemy's arrows. The besieged, who had learned to their cost what advantage might be taken of the darkness of the night, caused several fire-ships to sail out of the port during the night, in order to burn the tortoises and wooden towers which the enemy had erected; but as unfortunately they were not able to force the floating barricado, which protected the machines, they were obliged to return into the port.

The Rhodians lost some of their fire-ships in this expedition; but the mariners saved themselves by swimming. The next day the prince made a general attack against the port and the walls of the city, amid the sound of trumpets, and the shouts of his whole army. The Rhodians sustained the attack with incredible vigor, and for eight days they continually repulsed every assault made by the enemy. Deeds of surprising valor were performed on both sides. The besiegers discharged great stones from the eminence they had seized, against the walls and towers of the port, that the latter trembled with the shocks, and several breaches were made in the walls. They advanced with great fury against those who defended the mole, which guarded the entrance to the port; but the Rhodians, feeling the importance of that post, discharged such a quantity of stones and arrows upon the enemy that they were obliged to retire in confusion, after losing a great number of their men. The ardor of the besiegers was not diminished by this repulse. They began to escalade by sea and land at the same time, and employed the besieged so effectually that they scarce knew to what quarter to run for the defense of the place. Many of the Macedonian officers gained the walls, where, covered by wounds, and overwhelmed with enemies, they were taken prisoners. Both parties fought with a desperation and valor unparalleled; but at length Demetrius saw fit to retreat in order to repair his engines, which were almost entirely destroyed by so many attacks, as well as the vessels that carried them. In the interval of his absence, the Rhodians buried their dead, and worked industriously in repairing the breaches of the walls. Seven days after his departure, Demetrius returned to renew the siege, with the determination of taking the post at all hazards. Upon his arrival he caused a great quantity of lighted torches, flaming straw, and arrows to be discharged into the harbor in order to set fire to the vessels, while his engines battered the mole without intermission. The besieged with difficulty extinguished the flames, after which they caused three of their largest ships to sail out of the port, under the command of Exacestes, one of their bravest officers, with orders to attack the enemy, and destroy and sink, if possible, the vessels on which the towers and tortoises were placed. These orders were executed with extraordinary expedition and address. They shattered the floating barricade, and driving the beaks of their galleys violently into the sides of the enemy's barks, on which the machines were erected, they sunk two of them, but the third was towed along by the galleys, and joined the main fleet. The Rhodians, animated to the highest degree by their success, blindly attacked the whole fleet of the enemy. But overwhelmed by the superiority of numbers, Exacestes, with the officers who commanded under him and their ship, fell into the hands of the enemy. The other two Rhodian galleys regained the port, after sustaining many dangers, and most of the men also arrived there by swimming. In spite of this last repulse, Demetrius determined to make another attack. He caused a machine to be built of thrice the size of those he had lately lost. But, at the very instant the machine was ready to be worked against the port, a violent storm arose, and sunk it to the bottom of the sea, with the vessels on which it had been raised. In the mean time, the Rhodians had, after several repulses, regained the eminence, which the enemy had carried at the first onset, and the 200 troops that Demetrius had stationed there were taken prisoners. The Rhodians shortly afterward received a reinforcement of 1,000 men —500 from Crassus, a city of Crete, and 500 whom Ptolemy sent from Egypt.

Demetrius now determined to attack the city by land. He was mortified and galled by his many repulses, and now resolved to employ such means as would insure him success. He therefore prepared materials of every kind, and formed an engine of greater size and power than any instrument of war that had ever been invented before. This machine was called helepolis. It stood on a square base, seventy-five feet wide on each side. The machine itself was an assemblage of large square beams, riveted together with iron, and the whole mass rested upon eight wheels of great solidity and strength. The felloes of these wheels were three feet thick, and strengthened with large iron plates. In order to vary and facilitate the movements of the machine, casters had been placed under it, by which the machine was made movable in any direction. From each corner of the square arose a large column of wood. These columns inclined toward each other. The machine was composed of nine stories, whose dimensions gradually lessened in the ascent. The first story was supported by forty-three cross-beams, and the last by no more than nine. Three sides of the machine were rendered fire-proof by a coating of iron plates. Each story was furnished in front with loop-holes, corresponding in shape and dimensions, with the nature of arrows and beams that were to be shot from the machine. Over each window was a kind of curtain of leather, stuffed with wool, which could be let down at pleasure to break the force of such weapons as the enemy might direct against the machine. Each story had two large staircases, one for the ascent, and one for the descent of the men. This enormous machine was propelled over the ground by 3,400 of the most powerful and vigorous men of the entire Macedonian army. But it was constructed in all its parts with so much art that its movement was comparatively easy. Demetrius also caused a great number of other machines, large and small, for discharging arrows, stones, and pieces of timber, and for battering the walls of the city, to be made. He likewise leveled the ground over which the machines were to move, to the distance of one hundred fathoms. Thirty thousand men were employed in these works, which consequently were completed with astonishing expedition. The Rhodians, in the mean time, were not indolent. They raised a counter-wall on the track of ground where Demetrius intended to batter the walls of the city with the helepolis, and made other preparations to repel his assaults. While the Macedonians were busily engaged in making their machines, the Rhodians sent out a fleet of nine of their best ships of war, which scoured the sea, and returned with very rich booty, and a great number of prisoners, having captured many of the enemy's ships. Shortly afterward, Demetrius ordered a general assault against the walls of the city. The helepolis was moved to a situation where the city might be battered with the greatest effect. Each story of this formidable machine was furnished with catapultas and cross-bows, proportioned in their size to the dimensions of the room. The helepolis was supported on two of its sides by four small machines called tortoises, to protect those who should either enter the helepolis, or issue out of it to execute various orders. On the two other sides was a battering-ram of prodigious size, consisting of a piece of timber, one hundred and sixty-eight feet long, armed with iron terminating in a point, and as strong as the beak of a galley. These engines were mounted on wheels, and were driven forward to batter the walls during the attack, with incredible force, by nearly 1,000 men.

Every thing being ready, Demetrius gave the signal for the assault. The trumpets sounded, and the place was at once attacked both by sea and land. The battering-rams were applied with tremendous power; the walls shaking and trembling before their frequent blows. In the heat of the attack, embassadors arrived from the Cnidians, and earnestly solicited Demetrius to suspend the assault, giving him hopes, at the same time, that they should prevail upon the Rhodians to submit to an honorable capitulation. A suspension of arms was accordingly granted; but the Rhodians refusing to capitulate on the conditions offered them, the attack was resumed with so much fury, that a large tower, built with square stones, and the wall that flanked it, were battered down. The Rhodians fought like tigers in the breach, and repulsed their enemies with great slaughter. In this conjuncture, the besieged received 800,000 bushels of grain from several of their allies, notwithstanding all the efforts made by the enemy's fleet to intercept the vessels which brought this supply. This unexpected arrival of provisions was received by the citizens with joy, for their stock was almost exhausted. Inspired with new hopes and courage, they resolved not to surrender till the last extremity. The Rhodians now attempted to fire the enemy's machines, and with this view, ordered a numerous troop of soldiers to march out of the city with torches, and kindling wood of all kinds. The troops advanced to the batteries, and set them on fire. At the same time myriads of arrows were shot from the wall to support the detachment against those who should endeavor to extinguish the flames. The besiegers lost great numbers of men on this occasion, being in the obscurity of night unable to avoid the volleys of arrows discharged upon them. The endeavors of the Rhodians, however, to burn the machines, proved fruitless, for as fast as they set fire to them, the enemy quenched the flames with water. But Demetrius, apprehensive that his machines might be consumed, caused them to be speedily removed. Curious to know the number of machines, employed by the enemy, Demetrius caused all the arrows which had been shot from the place in the attack that night, to be gathered up. These were counted, and upon a proper computation, he found that the Rhodians must have used more than 800 large machines, for discharging heavy masses, and about 1,500 for arrows. The prince was struck with consternation at this number, as he had not imagined that the city had made such formidable preparations.

The besieged opened a large and deep ditch behind the breach, to obstruct the passage of the enemy into the city. They then raised a substantial wall, in the form of a crescent, along the ditch; which would cost the besiegers a new attack. At the same time they sent a squadron of their best sailing vessels to sea. These ships took a great number of vessels laden with provisions and ammunition, for Demetrius, and brought them into the port. Shortly afterward a numerous fleet of small vessels freighted with corn and other necessaries, sent by Ptolemy with 1,500 men, arrived. Demetrius, whose imagination was fruitful of expedients for success in his projects, detached 1,500 of his best soldiers, under the command of Alcimus and Mancius, with orders to enter the breach at midnight, and force the intrenchments behind it. They were then to possess themselves of the posts adjacent to the theater, where they would be in a condition to maintain their ground, if they could but once make themselves masters of it. In order to facilitate the execution of so important and dangerous an expedition, and amuse the enemy with false attacks, he, at the same time, caused all the trumpets to sound a charge, and the city to be attacked on all sides, by land and sea, that the besiegers finding sufficient employment, in all parts, the 1,500 men might have an opportunity of forcing the intrenchments which covered the breach, and afterward of seizing all the advantageous posts about the theater. This feint had all the success the prince expected. With a general shout, and amid the sound of trumpets, and the clang of arms, his forces rushed against the walls of the city on all sides. The detachment commanded by Alcimus entered the breach; vigorously attacking and repulsing those who defended the ditch, and the crescent-shaped wall, and finally after killing a great number of their enemies, they seized upon the posts adjacent to the theater, where they maintained their position. The officers of the city quickly advanced at the head of a chosen body of their troops against the enemy, which had advanced as far as the theater; but in the obscurity of the night they were unable to dislodge them from their advantageous posts. At the dawn of day the besiegers without the walls of the city, gave a general shout, to animate the courage of those who maintained their position within.

This terrible cry inspired the populace, women and children, with horror and fear. But the besieged, roused to fury by the tears and complaints of the women and children, rushed with such vigor upon the Macedonians, near the theater, that they, after having seen Alcimus and Mancius slain on the spot, were obliged to abandon their post. The Rhodians pursued them eagerly, and a fierce and bloody struggle ensued; the Macedonians defended themselves with the desperation of despair; but at length, overwhelmed with numbers, they surrendered themselves prisoners, after the greater part of them had been cut to pieces. The ardor of Demetrius was rather augmented than abated by this check, and he was making the necessary preparations for a new assault, when he received letters from his father Antigonus, directing him, by all means, to conclude a peace with the Rhodians. The Rhodians on their part were very desirous of an accommodation, provided it could be effected on honorable conditions. They therefore listened with pleasure to the proposals of peace made to them, and a treaty was concluded upon the following terms:—That the republic of Rhodes, and all its citizens, should retain the enjoyment of their rights, privileges, and liberty, without being subjected to any power whatsoever. The alliance they had formerly made with Antigonus should be renewed and maintained, with the obligations to take up arms for him in any war in which he should be engaged, provided it was not against Ptolemy. The city was also to deliver 100 hostages, to be chosen by Demetrius, for the effectual performance of the articles stipulated between them. When these hostages were given, the army decamped from before Rhodes, after having besieged it a year. Demetrius, now reconciled with the Rhodians, and desirous before his departure to give them a proof of his friendship, presented them with all the machines of war he had employed in the seige. These the Rhodians afterward sold for 300 talents (about $330,000), which they employed, with an additional sum of their own, in making the famous Colossus, which was reputed one of the seven wonders of the world.

Third Siege, A.D. 1521.—Rhodes, like the rest of Greece, submitted to the empire of the Romans, and, when that had been annihilated by the barbarians, it passed under the yoke of the all-conquering Mahometans. In 1308, Foulques de Villard, grand master of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, formed the project of conquering this island, in order to make it the head-quarters of his Order. Seconded by several of the sovereigns of Europe, he landed on the isle, beat the Saracens and the Greeks in several encounters, and after four years of fatigue and danger, made himself master of Rhodes. The knights placed the isle in a formidable state of defense, and under their auspices, it became happy and flourishing. These precautions were quite necessary, for Greeks, Saracens, and Turks were continually attempting to gain footing in this beautiful place. Mahomet the Second, the great conqueror of Constantinople, wished to besiege it; but his generals were beaten, and he himself died, while proceeding on this expedition. The glory of taking Rhodes was reserved for Soliman the Second, whose troops approached the isle in 1521. Villiers de l'Isle-Adam, grand master of the Knights of St. John, reigned there at that time: he was an intrepid, courageous, skillful captain, of great experience, and fertile in resources. He had, at most, 6,000 warriors to oppose to 200,000 men. But, like their leader, these warriors were filled with the most heroic valor, and preferred death to slavery. Rhodes was invested, and the trenches were opened out of the reach of the cannon. When the Turks ventured nearer, and erected a battery, their works were speedily destroyed by the artillery of the place. The frequent sorties of the knights filled up their works. The discouragement became so general among the Turks, that Soliman was obliged to show himself to his troops, and animate their operations by his presence.

What had been written to him of the ill-behavior of his soldiers, and what he learned of their cowardice on his arrival, determined him to make them appear before him disarmed, and to surround them by the troops he had brought with him. "If I had," said he, in a haughty, contemptuous tone, and casting terrible glances on all around him, "if I had to address soldiers, I would have permitted you to appear before me with your arms; but as I am reduced to the necessity of speaking to wretched slaves, more weak and more timid than women, it is not just that men so base should dishoner the marks of valor. I should like to know if, when you landed in the isle, you flattered yourselves that these crusaders would be still more cowardly than yourselves, and that they would servilely hold out their hands for the irons with which it would please you to load them? To undeceive you, please to learn that in the persons of these knights, we have to fight with the most intrepid among the Christians, and most thirsting for Mussulman blood. It is their courage that has excited ours; in attacking them I have thought I had met with an enterprise and perils worthy of my valor. Is it to you, then, base and effeminate troops, that I am to look for a conquest; you who fly from an enemy before you have seen him, and who would already have deserted, if the sea which surrounds you had not presented an insurmountable obstacle? Before experiencing such a disgrace, I will inflict such severe justice upon all cowards, that their punishment shall restrain within their duty such as might be tempted to imitate them." Scarcely had Soliman ceased to speak, than the soldiers drew their swords, as if to massacre those of their comrades who had excited the indignation of the Sultan.

These unfortunate wretches, who saw death suspended over their heads, implored with loud cries the mercy of their sultan. Their commander, as agreed upon with him, supported their prayers. "Well," said Soliman to Peri, the general, "I suspend, to your prayers, the punishment of the guilty; it remains for them to find pardon on the bastions and bulwarks of the enemy." This mixture of severity and clemency affected all hearts; the greatest perils appeared to be beneath the valor of the soldiers who had been the most discouraged. Officers and soldiers, to efface the least traces of their murmurs, hastened to signalize themselves under the eye of their master; and that armed multitude, till that time to be little dreaded, became at length most formidable. The soldiers and pioneers pushed on the trenches without relaxation; they worked day and night; the grand master, finding them supported by large detachments, did not think it prudent to continue the sorties, in which he lost more by the death of one knight, than Soliman did by that of fifty janizaries. Thus the infidels, having nothing to fear but from the fire of the place, behaved with so much spirit that they carried their works up to the counterscarp; and, to render their lines more solid, they covered them without with posts and planks, bound well together. The batteries were then increased, and continued incessantly playing against the city, but without success, for their balls scarcely grazed the parapets of the walls. They were warned of this by a Jew, who served them as a spy in Rhodes. They immediately changed their batteries, which from that time fired more effectively. Seeing that the place might be said to be covered and buried under its fortifications, the Turks resolved to build two cavaliers of a greater height than its works, which should command the city and its boulevards. Soldiers and pioneers, by order of the general, brought, during several days, earth and stones, which they placed between the gates of Spain and Auvergne, opposite to the bastion of Italy. These two points lay open to the cannon of the place; thousands of men perished here; but such loses were deemed nothing. At length two seeming hills appeared to rise up, higher by twelve feet than the walls, and which completely commanded them. The German post was the first attacked. The Turks pointed their cannon toward the walls, and it was thought impossible they could stand against these destructive machines. The grand master went to the spot, and ordered the wall to be supported within by earth, beams, posts, and fascines; and, as the artillery placed over the gate of his palace, on an elevated spot, bore directly upon the infidels, the Christian cannoneers poured their shot upon them, and knocked to pieces their bastions and their parapets. New ones were obliged to be constructed; the cannon of the city battered them down immediately, while the Turkish artillery, on the contrary, badly served and pointed, fired over the walls, without doing any injury. Disheartened by the little effect produced by their batteries, the sultan's officers transported them against the tower of St. Nicholas. They played upon it with twelve guns; but they had the mortification to see their cannon dismounted and their batteries ruined by those of the tower. To guard against this effect of the skill of the Christian cannoneers, they resolved to fire only by night, and during the day they buried their cannon under the gabions in the sand; on the approach of darkness, they were placed upon the platform. More than 500 balls were fired against the point of the wall looking toward the west, and brought it down into the ditch. The Turks congratulated themselves upon the success of this nocturnal battery, and felt certain of carrying the fort at the first assault; they were astonished, however, to see behind the ruins a new wall, terraced with its parapets, and bristling with artillery which prevented all approach to it. Soliman caused all the principal bastions of the place to be attacked, and the Ottoman cannon, which battered them day and night during a whole month, did them considerable damage. The numbers of knights and citizens in Rhodes began to diminish fast. They were in want of powder; the grand master caused some to be made, and hopes were entertained that this feeble succor would enable them to hold out for a long time against the Mahometan emperor. Up to this time, the war had only been carried on by artillery; and although that of the Turks, in the multitude of fiery mouths and abundance of powder, was very superior, they were not yet masters of an inch of ground in the bastions or advanced works of the place, The retirades and intrenchments dug by the knights, supplied the places of the battered-down walls. These new works could only be taken by assault; and to mount to it, it was necessary to attempt the descent of the ditch, or to fill it up. Soliman having an immense number of pioneers in his army, formed several detachments of them, with orders to throw earth and stones into the ditch. But the knights, by means of casemates, removed, by night, all the rubbish the Turks had brought during the day. Other Turkish pioneers were employed in digging mines in five different places, each one of which led to the bastion opposite to it. Some of these were detected by the vigilance of the famous De Martinengere, to whom is due the invaluable invention of discovering, by means of stretched skins, where mining is being carried on. The Turks had worked with so much address, that the different branches of these mines went from one to another, and all, to produce the greater effect, ended at the same place. Two of these mines sprang, one after the other, under the English bastion. Their explosion was so violent, that they threw down more than six toises of the wall, the ruins of which filled up the ditch. The breach was so large and so easy, that several battalions flew to the assault, with loud cries, saber in hand. They at once gained the top of the bastion, and planted seven flags, and would have rendered themselves masters of it, if they had not met with a traverse behind it, which stopped them. The knights, recovered from the astonishment caused by the fearful noise of the exploded mine, rushed to the bastion, and charged the Turks with muskets, grenades, and stones.

The grand master, at the moment of the explosion of this volcano, was in a neighboring church, imploring, at the foot of the altar, the aid of God. He judged, by the horrible noise he heard, that the explosion of the mine would be followed by an assault. He arose at the very moment the priests, to commence the office, were chanting this preliminary prayer—Deus, in adjutorium meum intende! (Lord, come to my help!) "I accept the augury," cried the pious general; and turning toward some knights who accompanied him, "Come, my brothers," said he, "let us change the sacrifice of our praises into that of our lives, and let us die, if it be necessary, in defense of our holy faith." As he spoke, pike in hand, he advanced with a menacing air. He mounted the bastion, met the Turks, and struck down and killed all who came in his way or resisted him. He tore down the enemy's ensigns, and regained the bastions in a moment. Mustapha, Soliman's general, rallied the fugitives and led them back toward the enemy, by dint of blows as well as menaces. He marched forward himself with the greatest audacity. The combat was renewed, and the mêlée became bloody. Steel and fire were equally employed on both parts; they slaughtered each other hand to hand, or at a distance, by musket-shots or sword-cuts. They even proceeded to struggle body to body, and the stronger or more adroit killed his enemy with dagger-thrusts. The Turks, at once exposed to arquebusses, stones, grenades, and fire-pots, at length abandoned the breach and turned their backs. In vain their chief, by menaces and promises, endeavor to reanimate their valor. They do not listen to him. All fly, all disperse, and Mustapha himself turns unwillingly from the foe, after having lost more than 3,000 men. It was with such inveteracy that the superiority was contested up to the 24th of September, when Soliman issued the order for a general assault.

At daybreak the Mahometans, divided into four bodies, or rather four armies, advanced on four sides boldly toward the breach, in spite of the thunders which poured from the place, in spite of a deluge of balls, arrows, darts, and stones. Nothing could stop them. The knights crowded to the point of conflict; they repulsed the assailants; they precipitated them from the walls; they overthrew the ladders. The infidels returned to the charge with more impetuosity than ever, but all their efforts were useless: the knights were invincible. The priests, monks, old men, and even the children, all insist upon taking their share of the peril, and at length repulse the enemy. The women do not yield in exertions to the pioneers, or in courage to the soldiers. Many lost their lives in defending their husbands. A Greek woman, exceedingly handsome, the mistress of an officer who commanded in a bastion, and who was just killed, frantic at the death of her lover, and resolved not to outlive him, after having tenderly embraced two young children she had had by him, and imprinted the sign of the cross upon their brow—"It is better, my children," said she, with the tears streaming from her eyes, "it is better for you to die by my hands than by those of our pitiless enemies, or that you should be reserved for infamous pleasures, more cruel than death." Frantic with grief and rage, she seized a knife, slaughtered them, and threw their bodies into the fire; then clothing herself in the garments of her lover, stained with his blood, with his saber in her hand, she rushed to the breach, killed the first Turk who opposed her, wounded several others, and died fighting with the bravery of a hero. The ill success of so many assaults rendered Soliman furious. He ordered Mustapha to be shot with arrows, and several other captains would have undergone the same fate if they had not persuaded him that he might still succeed in his undertaking. Incessant combats and attacks were carried on up to the middle of winter. At length the Ottomans triumphed; Rhodes, almost entirely destroyed, had no means of resistance left. Most of the knights had been killed in defending the fortifications. The grand master, Villiers de l'Isle-Adam, seeing with the deepest grief that all his resources were exhausted, felt that it would be madness to resist longer. He resolved to surrender; but his persuasion that he who makes the first proposals loses an advantage, made him positively determine to wait till the Turks should propose capitulation. His project succeeded. Deceived by the continued brave defense, the Turks were ignorant of the real state of the place, and offered the besiegers more honorable conditions than they might have expected. This famous isle which had been for nearly three centuries the bulwark of Christianity, was wrested from the few surviving defenders, the wreck of a society of heroes. As soon as the capitulation was signed, Soliman entered the city for the purpose of expressing to L'Isle-Adam his admiration of his noble defense. After a long conversation the conqueror retired, saying, "Although I came here alone, do not imagine I was without an escort; I had the parole of the grand master and the faith of his knights, a security stronger than a whole army." Soliman did not abuse his victory. He treated the grand master generously; he visited him, pitied him, and consoled him as that last of a race of heroes deserved.

RIMINI, B.C. 49. — Cæsar, forgetting his virtues in order to sacrifice every thing to his ambition, prepared to march against his country. But this was not done without a mental struggle. When he arrived on the banks of the Rubicon, he was a prey to a thousand conflicting thoughts; he stopped all at once, and turning to his friends, said: "We have it still in our power to retract; but if we cross this rivulet, the enterprise must be carried out by force of arms." According to Suetonius, there appeared at that moment a man of extraordinary height, playing upon a rustic flute, and the soldiers flocked round him to listen to him. This wonderful man, seizing a trumpet, applied it to his mouth, and sounding a charge, crossed the river. This was most likely a ruse of Cæsar's to encourage his troops; be that as it may, he immediately cried out—"Forward! let us go whither the voice of the gods and the injustice of our enemies call us;—the die is cast!" And he crossed the Rubicon. The short siege and the capture of Rimini were the consequences of this determination, followed by the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey, which annihilated the liberties of Rome.

SECOND SIEGE, A.D. 538.—Vitiges, King of the Ostrogoths, appeared before Rimini, and laid siege to it. He brought toward the walls an enormous tower, at the top of which was a large drawbridge, to be let down when within reach of the parapets. The inhabitants were in a terrible fright; but the commander rendered the tower useless by having the ditch widened during the night; and by a spirited and unexpected attack upon the enemy's camp, he raised as much dread among them as the machine had created in Rimini. Some of the bravest of the Goths fell in this sortie, and their leader turned the siege into a blockade. The arrival of Belisarius compelled him to abandon the enterprise altogether.—Robson.

RIMNIK, A.D. 1789.—In 1789 a battle took place at Rimnik in Wallachia, between the allied armies of Russia and Austria, under General Suwarrow, and the Turks, in which the latter were defeated.

RIO SECO, A.D. 1808. — The battle of Rio Seco, in Spain, was fought on the 14th of July, 1808, between the French army under Marshal Bessières, and the Spanish army under Generals Blake and Cuesta. The French army consisted of 12,000 men; the Spanish army was 30,000 strong. Yet, in spite of their great inferiority of numbers, the French troops, after a brief but bloody battle, defeated the Spaniards, and put them to rout, with great slaughter. The Spaniards on this occasion lost 6,000 men in killed and wounded. The French lost about 1,800. The town of Rio Seco was taken in the pursuit, and sacked and plundered with merciless severity by the victors.

RIO TABASCO—BATTLE OF, A.D. 1519.—On the 10th of February 1519, Hernando Cortez set sail from the Havana in Cuba, with a fleet of eleven vessels, for the beautiful and wealthy country in the west, which the Spanish navigator Grivalja had discovered the year before. This country was Mexico, and the glowing accounts and rich products which Grivalja brought with him to Cuba from the newly-discovered country excited the cupidity of the Spaniards in the highest degree. In every town and settlement, Mexico, its wealth, resources and beauty was the theme of discourse in all circles.

The fleet of Cortez had been fitted out jointly by himself and Velasquez, the Spanish governor of Cuba, who resided at St. Jago. A few days before the ships were fully equiped for the voyage, however, Velasquez becoming jealous of the rapidly-increasing popularity of Cortez, resolved to deprive him of the command of the expedition. But Cortez soon heard of the intended movement on the part of the governor, and determined to put to sea before it could be put into operation. Great was the astonishment of the worthy governor when one morning he was aroused from his bed by the news that the fleet which he thought was so ill prepared for the voyage, had left its moorings and was busily getting under way. But neither his astonishment nor his rage could avail. He arrived at the quay only in time to receive a parting salutation from the commander of the fleet.

From St. Jago Cortez proceeded to Macaca where he laid in such stores as he could obtain from the royal farms; and thence sailed to Trinidad, a town on the southern coast of Cuba. Having landed here he erected a standard in front of his quarters, and issued a proclamation offering liberal sums to volunteers. Among many others who joined him at this place were about one hundred of Grivalja's men who had just returned from their voyage, and were anxious to return to the country which, from their own experience, they knew to be rich in gold and silver. Many cavaliers of family and distinction also joined the expedition; among them Pedro de Alvarado and his brother Christoval de Olid, Alonso de Avila, Juan Valesques de Leon, a relative of the governor, Alonso Hernandes de Puertocarrero, and Gonzalo de Sandoval, may be mentioned as those who took the most important part in the conquest. From Trinidad Cortez proceeded to Havana where he again erected his standard and invited the citizens to volunteer. Here he caused all his large guns, arquebusses, and cross-bows to be examined and put in order, and had the jackets of his soldiers thickly quilted with cotton, as a defense against the Indian arrows from which the troops in the former expedition had greviously suffered. He distributed his men into eleven companies, placing each under the command of an experienced officer.

His standard was of gold-embroidered velvet, black, and bearing in the center a red cross surrounded by blue and white flames. It bore, in Latin, the following inscription: "Friends, let us follow the cross, and under this sign, if we have faith we shall conquer."

Having fully completed his preparations he set sail, directing his course toward Cape St. Antonio. After arriving at the cape he mustered his forces and found that they consisted of eight hundred and sixty-three men, of whom one hundred and ten were mariners, five hundred and thirty-three were soldiers, and two hundred, Cuban Indians. His artillery force consisted of ten heavy guns, and four falconets, and he was provided with a sufficient amount of ammunition. His cavalry was only sixteen strong.

On the 18th of February 1519, the fleet weighed anchor, and sailed for the coast of Yucatan. Upon his arrival in Yucatan, Cortez fell in with a number of Spaniards who had been taken prisoners by the Indians during Grivalja's visit. Among them was Jerome de Aguilar, who had learned the Indian language during his imprisonment, and therefore was of great use to the Spanish commander in the capacity of interpreter.

The Spanish fleet continued on its course along the coast of Yucatan, and soon arrived at the mouth of the river Tabasco. Along the shores of that river Grivalja had driven a lucrative traffic with the Indians, and Cortez determined to ascend the river and visit the town on its banks before he visited the Aztec territories. The water being too shallow to allow the passage of his ships, Cortez and his soldiers, leaving a number of men to guard them while they lay at anchor, embarked in small boats and proceeded up the river. The banks were lined with mangrove trees, behind whose closely interlocked shoots and branches the forms of the natives were seen gesticulating wildly and threateningly. They did not make any active demonstration, however, until the Spaniards had arrived at an open place, where they congregated in great numbers. Cortez, deeming it important to land that evening, withdrew to an island in the vicinity, with the determination to effect a landing on the following morning.

At daybreak the Spaniards made preparations to land on the main shore. The Indians had received large reinforcements during the night, and stood upon the opposite banks, a dense mass of armed men, apparently prepared to fight to the last to repel the intruders. The Spanish commander detached Alonso de Avila with a hundred men to land at a point lower down the stream, near a thick grove of palms. From this point a road led to Tabasco. De Avila was instructed to march immediately on Tabasco, and assail the place in flank while Cortez himself was to assail it in front.

Cortez now embarked with the balance of his army, and crossed the river in the face of the enemy. As he approached the hostile shore he proclaimed through his interpreter to the Indians that all he desired was a free passage for himself and his men, and that should blood be spilt the sin would be their own. The natives replied with a shower of arrows, accompanied by shouts of derision and defiance.

Embarking in their canoes, the Indians advanced to meet the enemy. The Spaniards brought their boats close alongside of the canoes, and grappling them, closed in a fierce struggle. The water was but waist-deep, and the combatants leaping from their boats fought in the water with desperate valor. But in spite of the overwhelming numbers of the enemy, the Spaniards forced them back, and effected a landing on the opposite shore. The retreating natives were here supported by their countrymen who showered down arrows, darts, and pieces of burning wood upon the heads of the Spaniards. The conflict between the invaders and the natives upon the banks was hot and bloody. The natives, eager to push the enemy down the slippery banks, fought with the utmost ferocity, the Spaniards equally eager to ascend the bank, strove with the enemy with the greatest resolution, and for a season victory seemed to hang in a balance. At length with one tremendous effort, the Spaniards drove back the natives and gained the land, and having formed, opened a sharp fire from their small-arms and cross-bows. At the first rattle of the fire-arms, the natives astounded by the unexpected and apparently supernatural sound, and bewildered by the repeated flashes of fire from the weapons of their enemy, retreated hastily, and sought refuge behind a breast-work of timber thrown across the road. The Spaniards stormed these works at the first assault, and chased the retreating natives to the town. Here the Tabascans established themselves behind their pallisades. At this moment Avila arrived, and the natives finding themselves threatened on two sides, precipitately retreated and abandoned the place to the invaders. But having taken the precaution to remove their families and effects, in season, nothing fell into the hands of the victors, save some provisions and a very little gold.

Cortez, upon finding himself master of the town, took formal possession of it in the name of the crown of Castile.—Prescott.

RIVAS, A.D. 1855.—The town of Rivas in Nicaragua, is situated on the east shore of Lake Nicaragua, about seven miles west from Virgin Bay.

The first battle of Rivas was fought on the 29th of June, 1855, between the forces of General William Walker, and the Nicaraguans under General Boscha. Walker's army consisted of 158 men, of whom 58 were natives of the United States. The Nicaraguan army consisted of 480 men. Before entering into an account of the battles of Rivas we will review briefly the immediate cause of the revolution in Nicaragua, of which they formed a portion. In the year 1855 the Constituent Assembly of Nicaragua met, and formed a new national Constitution, and, without making known its contents to the people, passed a decree, that it should go into effect on a certain day. Meanwhile, the day for an election of a President arrived, and Chamorro their President, again offered himself as a candidate for the office. The liberal or democratic party presented as their candidate against Chamorro, Castellon a republican democrat of the purest order. A two-third vote was essential to an election; and as neither party could obtain a sufficiency of votes to elect their candidate, Chamorro claimed the seat by default of election. Shortly after this he caused Castellon and a number of his political friends to be cast into prison—and this outrage was followed by another of still greater magnitude. The Supreme Court was suppressed; and this last act of lawless despotism deeply affected the pulse of the whole country, and ripened the democratic feeling into resistance. Castellon and his friends, were banished. They sought refuge in Honduras, and while there they conceived the noble and heroic design of liberating their native land from the thraldom of her aristocratic tyrants. They were aided in the prosecution of their design by Cabañas, President of Honduras, who furnished them as far as he was able, with money and arms. Having called together the political refugees in Honduras, Castellon bravely led them back to Nicaragua, and proclaimed revolution for the sake of democratic liberty.

Success attended them at every step, and they advanced against Leon, Castellon's native city, with every evidence of triumph; their numbers increased hourly, and the heart of every patriot in the land beat light with the hope of freedom. The patriot army was commanded by Muñoz and Jerez, Castellon's companions in exile. Castellon was named Provisional Director of the republic, which office he held until the day of his death, September 6th, 1855. Chamoros was defeated in two hotly contested battles, in which some 2,000 men participated, and was finally driven to the city of Grenada, where he fortified himself so strongly that the patriots failed to dislodge him after a siege of nine months. For six months after Castellon had entered the country, the patriots were in possession of all Nicaragua, except the city of Grenada; but the want of success at this place gradually disheartened the people. The cause of the revolutionists commenced declining, and the priesthood, a powerful auxiliary in Central American warfare, using their influence in favor of Chamorro, his party became strengthened; and by a series of powerful sallies, he not only defeated the besiegers, and obliged them to raise the siege, but obtained possession successively of Masalla, Managua and Rivas; and finally regained the entire State, with the exception of the towns of Leon, Chinandega, and Realejo, with the northern sea-coast, and the Bay of Fonseca. Chamorro, at this crisis, died; but his chiefs took up the quarrel, and the war raged furiously, but indecisively, until the arrival of General Walker, whose indomitable character soon wrought a change in the aspect of affairs. Castellon had called this officer, of whose courage and experience he was well informed, to the assistance of the liberals, offering him, in case of success, a grant of 52,000 acres of land. Walker had accepted the proposal, and set sail from San Francisco with a number of men well armed with rifles, revolvers, and knives. Walker and his troops arrived in Nicaragua on the 11th of June, 1855, and after some delay, they were formally enlisted in the army of Nicaragua, as did also all Americans residing in the country. General Walker received orders to proceed to Rivas and occupy the place. The first battle of Rivas took place immediately on his arrival in the vicinity of that place.

For several hours the firing on both sides was incessant; the Americans plied their rifles with deadly effect: not a shot was thrown away. But early in the action, the natives, who formed a portion of Walker's force, and were under the command of Colonel Mendez, became panic-stricken, and fled into the woods. The Americans now were left to contend with a force nearly eight times their own number. They fought with the utmost coolness, firing rapidly and accurately. Walker, however, finding his little band exposed to such great odds, ordered them to storm a large building which was occupied by a great number of the enemy. The Chamorrostas made but a slight resistance, and the Americans took possession of the house. There they were less exposed, and they could pick off at their leisure such of the enemy as were brave enough to approach within range. The natives retired and held a council of war, in which it was decided that the only method of dislodging the Americans, was to burn the building. Great rewards were offered to any one who should succeed in firing the house; and several of the natives made the attempt, but the unerring rifles of the Americans laid them in the dust; and it was not until after numbers had been slain, and the night had set in, that, favored by the darkness, they succeeded in setting fire to the building. The Americans finding it impossible to hold the building longer, burst out of the house, and charging through the enemy with the utmost fury, fought their way out of the town. They retreated slowly and in good order, checking every advance of the pursuers with deadly volleys, until they had effected their escape. The army retreated three miles toward Virgin Bay, and encamped for the night. The enemy did not pursue them beyond the limits of the town. In this battle Walker lost 22 men killed and wounded. The natives lost 180 men killed and wounded. "The effect of this battle," says the historian of the Central American War, "though immediately disastrous to the American cause, was to inspire the Nicaraguans with a dread and respect of General Walker's prowess, and a proper idea of the indomitable bravery of our riflemen. From that time forth it became generally known that in battle, to appear within 300 yards of our marksmen was to die; and officers were the certain mark of the American sharp-shooters."*

The battle of Rivas was followed by that of Virgin Bay, in which the democratic party, with the aid of the rifles of the Americans, was victorious. Grenada shortly afterward fell into the hands of Walker and his confederates, and with its surrender fell all the hopes of the legitimists. On the 23d of October, 1855, a treaty of peace was formed between the belligerent parties, and a new government was organized. Thus, four months after General Walker's entrance into the country, peace was restored, and the two parties seemed united by the strongest desire to maintain it.

Second Battle of Rivas.—Although General Walker had succeeded in restoring peace to Nicaragua, the efforts of the new government to establish friendly commerce with the other Central American States met with no success. By Costa Rica, especially, were their offers received by the most unequivocal indications of hostility. On the 10th of February, 1856, Colonel Louis Schelessinger was sent by the Nicaraguan government as a commissioner to the republic of Costa Rica. The mission was eminently peaceable, being simply to inquire the causes why Costa Rica had failed or refused to hold intercourse with the existing government of Nicaragua, and, if possible, to bring about a more favorable condition of affairs between the two States. This commission was received with contempt and insults by Costa Rica, and Colonel Schlessinger and suite were driven ignominiously from the country. General Walker, with his usual promptitude, resolved to resent this outrage; and shortly afterward war was declared between Costa Rica and Nicaragua. This was followed by an order from General Walker to Colonel Schelessenger, directing that officer to prepare to march into Costa Rica.

Meanwhile, the government of Costa Rica was making active preparations for the approaching contest. The president on the 27th of March, 1856, issued a decree calling out 9,000 of the militia, and on the 29th another proclamation was issued which denied the authority of the so-called provisional government of Nicaragua. A loan of $100,000 was asked for, and the whole sum was immediately subscribed. The Costa Rican army were marched to Punta Arenas, whence they embarked for Liberia, accompanied by President Mora in person. Colonel Schlessinger with about 200 hundred men, on the 13th of March, marched from Virgin Bay for Guancaste. On the morning of the 19th he reached the hacienda of Santa Rosa, about twelve miles from Guanacaste. Here, at at about three o'clock in the afternoon of the 20th, he was suddenly attacked by the Costa Ricans. Colonel Schlessinger proved himself incapable of the trust reposed in him by his government. The Costa Ricans had scarcely made their appearance ere this redoubtable hero fled in the utmost terror, followed by a great portion of his army. Two companies of Americans alone maintained their ground; but, deserted by their commander and opposed by an overwhelming force, they were obliged to retire. The company under Lieutenant Higgins, were the only Nicaraguan troops that fired a volley during the action. They had entered the battle with forty-four men, and left the field with twenty-two, and were the last to leave the ground. The Nicaraguans lost, in the battle and flight, forty-three men killed and missing, among whom nineteen were captured by the Costa Ricans and summarily executed.

* Wm. V. Wells.

Elated with their easy victory, the Costa Ricans resolved to invade Nicaragua, and drive the Americans from Central America. The entire Costa Rican army consisted of about 3,000 men, and was commanded by Baron Bulow, a German officer of considerable distinctien. The invading army marched to San-Juan-del-Sud, and thence continued their advance through the country, devastating towns and butchering all Americans that came in their path. The defeat of Schlessinger seems to have paralyzed for a time the courage of the Nicaraguans, for with a single exception the advance of the invaders was not opposed. On the 10th of March, Lieutenant Green, with fifteen Americans, encountered about 200 Costa Ricans, eighteen miles above the mouth of the Serapiqui. A skirmish ensued in which the Americans were victorious, putting the enemy to flight with a loss of twenty-seven men killed. The Americans lost only one man killed and two wounded. On the 7th of March the main body of the Costa Rican army arrived at Rivas, and took undisputed possession of the place. No sooner had General Walker, who was at Grenada, received intelligence of the occupation of Rivas by the Costa Ricans, than he made preparations to expel them; and so speedily were his measures effected, that in one day after the receipt of the news, the Nicaraguan army was on its march for Rivas. The army consisted of about 500 men, of whom 100 were natives, and was commanded by General Walker in person. This little band embarked in a lake steamer at daylight on the 8th of April, and, arriving at San Carlos, it was resolved to attack the invaders immediately. The troops were disembarked to the southward of Rivas, and on the 10th, encamped within nine miles of the city. Walker here learned that the enemy's force amounted to no less than 2,700 men. The march was resumed early on the following morning; the army advancing by the road leading from Virgin Bay, instead of the usual route from Granada. The troops without halting, were assigned their respective positions, and instructed as to appropriate points of attack. The battalion under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Sanders, was ordered to enter by the street leading along the west side of the plaza, and the east side was to be charged by the force under command of Colonel Fry.

With a whoop and a yell, a rush was made for the plaza, and as the troops were discovered by the enemy ascending the eminence which concealed the approach to the city, they were saluted with a volley of musketry, which gave evidence of a firm and obstinate resistance. On both sides of the plaza a brisk and incessant fire was maintained by the Costa Ricans, but the fearless and undaunted forces of the democracy charged them with such vigor, that in a few minutes the assailants were in the entire possession of the plaza. The Costa Ricans, shunning an open fight, precipitately betook themselves to the barricades and fortified houses, and from these places of protection and concealment, kept up an unremitting fire. Their cannon was also brought into play, and galled the assailants with constant discharges. General Walker saw that until the cannon was silenced his advance would be effectually checked. The determination was instantly formed and carried into execution by Lieutenant-Colonel Sanders of taking the piece from the enemy. The order to charge was given, and the gallant Sanders, followed by his brave men, rushed into the face of the impending danger, and with the loss of four men succeeded in capturing the cannon. It was immediately brought and stationed at the south-east corner of the plaza, and placed under the control of Captain McArdle, an experienced and intrepid artillerist. The ammunition belonging to it was also seized, and a few minutes only elapsed before the weapon that was destined for the destruction of the democratic forces, was pouring a fatal fire upon the discomfited Costa Ricans.

Chagrined and enraged at the loss of their gun, they made several bold attempts to regain the piece; but its thundering voice, rapidly followed by the deadly discharges of the Mississippi rifles, drove them back to their hiding-places. In the mean time, fifteen or twenty American riflemen had stationed themselves on the roof of a building whence they could plainly discover a large body of the enemy in the back streets. A continuous fire was maintained by these men, and at least a hundred Costa Ricans fell before their unerring aim.

The battle now became too hot for the Costa Ricans, and 300 of them in a body retreated rapidly in the direction of San Juan del Sud. At about 12 o'clock, however, the Costa Ricans in the town were reinforced by a body of 250 men from Virgin Bay. Captain Waters of the rangers, who held possession of the tower surmounting the unfinished cathedral on the north side of the plaza, immediately communicated to General Walker information of their approach, and a body of men was sent to protect that portion of the town. Meanwhile, Captain Waters and his rangers, from their advantageous position, opened upon them with their rifles, and did most signal execution. The intention of the enemy of completely surrounding the city, and hemming the democratic forces in the plaza, was thwarted; but not without a long and fierce fire from all four of the corners of the plaza.

The north-west corner was held by Colonel Don Bruno Natzmer, and Major O'Neil, with their commands, and over 100 dead bodies of the enemy gave signal proof of the gallantry and skill of these officers and their troops. The south-west corner was in charge of Captains Rudler and Mason with their companies, and that, with the exception of the position held by Lieutenant-Colonel Sanders, was the end from which the greatest danger was to be apprehended. These brave officers and their trusty men maintained their ground with a firmness and courage deserving of the highest commendation. From these corners of the plaza, a constant fire was maintained from 8 o'clock in the morning till noon. Four hours of unremitting service in the field, following a tedious march of more than two days, had necessarily the effect of burdening the energies of the soldiers with irresistible fatigue. The Costa Ricans, also, seemed to become weary of the fight, and little firing for an hour was done on either side, except by sharp-shooters, adventuring chances at a long distance. This temporary cessation of hostilities by the Costa Ricans, was, however, a ruse, for the purpose of secretly possessing themselves of the building on the north-east corner of the plaza, whence, unharmed, they could pour a destructive fire upon the American troops stationed in every direction upon the plaza. This stratagem was discovered by Lieutenant Gray, and volunteers were solicited from among the troops to make a desperate charge and rout the enemy from their close approximation to the position they coveted.

Ten true and fearless men, armed with rifles and Colt's revolvers, were all that were required, and instantly, the requisite number, fully equiped for the perilous expedition, were ready to engage the foe. This number was composed of officers, among whom were Captains Hueston and Salter, of General Walker's staff; Colonel Kewen; Major Rogers; Major Webber; Captains Breckenridge, and Mahon; and Lieutenants Winters, Stith, and Gray. A few privates also volunteered, increasing the number to thirteen. Crossing the street under the fire of the enemy, they pressed through the corner building, which was the object coveted by the Costa Ricans, to the far end of the corridor, which was partially barricaded by an adobe wall or breastwork. From that position they cautiously surveyed the approaching enemy, and hastily determining the plan of operation, the order to charge was given, and with a shout and a bound, they rushed in the direction of the picket fence, behind which the Costa Ricans were cautiously making progress. The shout was immediately answered by a volley of thirty muskets; but as the attack was so sudden, the disconcerted foe were unable to aim with precision, and the only damage effected, was a single wound inflicted upon the head of Captain Breckenridge. The Americans gained the fence without loss, and thence opened a brisk fire upon the retreating enemy. The Costa Ricans fled for protection behind a neighboring building, whence, with more security, they could prevent pursuit. It was necessary, however, that they should be driven entirely from that vicinity, and in order to gain a position to effect that object, the Americans were obliged to cross a street swept by the enemy's fire.

It was a hazardous experiment, as the opposing force numbered more than 100 men; but nothing daunted, the gallant thirteen essayed the perilous adventure; and, although the bullets whistled in fearful proximity to them, not a man was killed or wounded. The position they sought, was gained, and then in earnest the crack of the rifle became the death-knell of the foe. The Costa Ricans, with great obstinacy, sought to maintain their ground, and returned the fire with zeal and eagerness. In this conflict, Captain Hueston fell mortally wounded. The remaining twelve, maddened to fury by the death of their comrade, fired so fast and furious, that in a few minutes thirty of the enemy were slain, and unable to sustain the fearful storm, the Costa Ricans were compelled again to relinquish their position, and seek greater security elsewhere.

BATTLE OF RIVAS.

They retreated precipitately; and were hotly pursued by the assailants. Fortifying themselves behind a broken adobe wall, they again turned upon their pursuers, and opened a determined fire. In this assault, Lieutenant Gray was slightly wounded. To drive the Costa Ricans from the wall, and obtain possession of it was the object and determination of the pursuers. The enemy perceiving this, again sought safety in flight. With the loss of eight or ten more of their number, they succeeded in reaching the building from behind, where they again sought to repulse the advance of the Americans. In the further prosecution of the pursuit, Lieutenant Gray and a private were slain. The Costa Ricans, closely pursued, finally made good their retreat, and little execution was afterwards effected. The fight on the plaza had almost entirely ceased. During the remainder of the day, and until late at night, there was no firing, except from a few of the enemy, who throughout the conflict maintained their concealment, and with Minié rifles menaced every visible inimical object. The possessors of these weapons were evidently Englishmen and Germans who had long experience in the use of that deadly weapon.

The battle of Rivas—the second one fought in that city by General Walker—was warmly contested; and General Walker, unwilling to make targets of his men for an enemy whom he could not draw into open conflict, withdrew his troops, and returned to Grenada, to prepare for a final attack upon the invaders, and drive them out of the country. The Americans lost in this battle 30 men killed and 30 wounded. The Costa Ricans lost 600 men killed outright and a large number, wounded and missing. The second battle of Rivas was fought on the 11th of April, 1856, and eighteen days afterward, the Costa Rican army, having lost by killed, wounded, and by the cholera, nearly one half of its number evacuated Rivas, and retreated into Costa Rica.

The invasion and the retreat of the Costa Ricans at Rivas was soon followed by the abdication and flight of President Rivas, who deserted the cause of General Walker, and by this action aggravated the disorder of the country, and menaced it with violent civil and political eruptions. The treachery of the chief officer of the government was imitated by a majority of the ministers of state. Salazar, the master-spirit of the treasonable factions, was captured by General Walker, and after a trial was found guilty of treason, and executed.

The execution of Salazar aroused the ire of the Nicaraguan leaders, who sought the sympathy and aid of the neighboring States of Central America, with the design of expelling the Americans from the country. The disaffected Nicaraguans succeeded in effecting an offensive and defensive league with Guatemala and San Salvador, and a contribution of force was levied from each of those States, to unite in waging a war of extermination against the Americans in Nicaragua.

The negotiation of the Rivas faction resulted in the forced levy of 1,000 troops from Guatemala, and 400 from San Salvador, to which was added 600 from Leon, the head-quarters of the disaffected, and a few hundred legitimists, or Chamoristas, from the different towns and haciendas of Nicaragua. The whole number of the allied force amounted to about 2,500 men, all of whom were concentrated in Leon, to meet the exigency of an attack upon that place by General Walker. It was evidently the intention of the allies to intrench themselves within the city of Leon. But maladies of the most alarming character broke out among the troops, and they were compelled to evacuate Leon, and proceed to the more inland and healthy atmosphere of Nicaragua. There they were again attacked by fevers, and again they were obliged to abandon their position. They marched toward Massaya, an Indian village about twelve miles from Grenada, which presented many advantages over any of their former quarters.

When the allies abandoned Managua, the town of Massaya was occupied by an American garrison of 300 men, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel McIntosh. General Walker, who was at Grenada, having received intelligence of the movements of the enemy, ordered McIntosh to make no opposition to the entrance of the allies into Massaya, but to relinquish it, and fall back immediately upon Grenada. This order was promptly obeyed, and the allies, on the 2d of October, were safely intrenched within the fortifications of Massaya. They did not attempt an immediate attack on Grenada, but contented themselves by endeavoring to cut off all supplies of provisions intended for the Americans in Grenada. Walker finally resolved to be no longer annoyed by the allies, and determined to prosecute a war which he would have avoided, if it could have been done with honor, and which was forced upon him. The command of General Hornsby, which was garrisoned at San Jorge, near Rivas, was ordered to Grenada, and preparations were instantly in progress for opening the campaign. The battles of Massaya, fought on the 12th, and of Grenada on the 13th of October, 1856, in both of which Walker was victorious, followed. The allies were scattered in all directions, and the cause of Walker's party seemed triumphant.

This seems to be the state of affairs in Nicaragua, as this work goes to press. From the recency of the events, and the difficulty of obtaining impartial information regarding the conduct and intention of General Walker, and his men in Nicaragua, we can vouch for the authenticity of the above account no further than to state that it is compiled from the most reliable sources of information within our reach.

RIVOLI, A.D. 1797.—On the 14th of January, 1797, was fought between the French and Austrians the battle of Rivoli, in Italy. The French were victorious, and on this occasion Massena received the title of Duke of Rivoli. The whole Austrian force under Alvinzi had concentrated near Rivoli for the purpose of entirely routing the French if they attempted to cross the Adige. Napoleon, through some treachery of the Austrians, ascertained their intentions and resolved to attack them; therefore, with the whole center of his army he went to the support of Joubert, who was then struggling with a much superior force. At two o'clock in the morning he arrived on the plain of Rivoli. The weather was clear and beautiful. The light of an unclouded moon gave the fir-clad mountains the appearance of silver, while the northern horizon was illuminated by the fires of the Austrian encampment, and from the neighboring heights he could discover the lights of nearly forty thousand men. The Austrians had divided their forces into five columns, the principal one under Quasdanovich, composed of all the artillery, horse, and a large body of grenadiers, took the road on the right, and were to ascend the plateau by the winding path which led to its summit. Three other divisions of foot received orders to climb the mountain in front, and when the action on the high road took place they were to descend upon the republicans; while a fifth, under Lusignan, were to wind around the base of the plain, gain the road in the rear, and thus cut of their retreat to Verona. This was a great plan, and would have succeeded admirably had the French been commanded by any one except Napoleon.

In opposition to this great force of the Austrians Napoleon had only thirty thousand men; but his position was more favorable, being an upland, elevated among the mountains, which would occasion much fatigue to his enemies to reach it; and he had sixty pieces of cannon and a large body of horse in an excellent condition. He at once perceived that it was of the greatest importance to maintain his position on the plain, as by so doing he could prevent the enemy from uniting, and overthrow them separately. By the light of the moon he arranged his whole force with great precision on the summit. On the 14th of January, at nine o'clock, the action commenced by the Austrians attacking the French left. After resisting manfully, the regiments were broken and fled in confusion, upon which Napoleon rode in haste to the village of Rivoli, where Massena, who had marched all night, was resting from his fatigue, led his division to the front, and by a bold charge restored the combat in that quarter. This check had compelled Joubert, who was on the right, to give way. The divisions in front pressed down upon the plain, while at the same moment the head of the column of grenadiers appeared at the top of the windings of the high road, having with the utmost difficulty forced the perilous ascent, and their horse and artillery began to debouch upon the level surface at its summit. The division under Lusignan had wound, unperceived, round the flanks of the French, and at this time appeared directly in their rear, and the Austrian soldiers, deeming the destruction of the republicans certain, gave loud cheers on all sides and clapped their hands as they took their ground in succession. The French army, attacked in front, flank, and rear at the same time, their retreat being also cut off, saw no way of escape from the bayonets of their enemies but in the precipices of the Alps. The presence of mind of Napoleon did not forsake him at this perilous moment. In order to gain time he sent a flag of truce to Alvinzi, proposing a suspension of arms for half an hour, as he had some propositions to make in consequence of dispatches from Paris. The Austrian general immediately fell into the snare; the suspension was agreed to, and the march of the imperialists was stopped at the very moment when victory was surely theirs. Junot repaired to the Austrian head-quarters, when, after a conference of an hour he returned without having come to any terms, of course. But Napoleon had gained time to face the danger, all he wished at this critical period, and was now on the defensive. Joubert, with the light infantry, was sent to the extreme right to oppose Quasdanovich, while Leclerc and Lasalle, with the horse and flying artillery, hurried to the menaced point, and another regiment of foot was sent against Lusignan. Napoleon, far from being disconcerted, spoke to the soldiers in a confident tone, and assured them of success. The head of Quasdanovich's division, which had so bravely accomplished the ascent, received in front by a terrible fire of grape-shot, charged on one flank by Lasalle's horse, and exposed on the other to the musketry of Joubert, broke, and hurried backward down the steep. The fugitives, rushing headlong into the column that was ascending, threw it into the most dire confusion, cavalry, infantry, and cannon struggled together under a terrible fire from the batteries of the French, while at the same time some ammunition-wagons blew up, and all was a scene of frightful disorder. As soon as the plateau was safe from this flank attack Napoleon fell upon the troops which had descended from the heights, and that heroic band, being destitute of artillery, and also deprived of the aid which they expected from the troops in flank, soon gave way and fled to the mountains where most of them were made prisoners. The division under Lusignan had been successful, and reached the heights in rear of the army in time to witness the destruction of the three divisions in the mountains. Then they gave up all hope. The French troops were speedily directed against this column, now separated from all support, and depressed by the ruin which it beheld in other parts of the army. For some time they maintained their position, but the fire of fifteen pieces of heavy artillery, to which they had nothing to oppose, at length compelled them to retreat, and they had not proceeded far when they encountered the division under Massena, which had been held in reserve and was now approaching. The consternation produced was so great that the whole column laid down their arms, while Quasdanovich, left entirely to his own resources, retired up the valley of the Adige, and the remainder of the center divisions sought refuge behind the rocky stream of Jasso.

ROCHELLE, LA, A.D. 1372.—The English having made themselves masters of La Rochelle, the inhabitants of that important city did not endure the yoke without impatience. They were only restrained by their fear of the military who garrisoned the castle, which dominated over both the port and the city. Jean Candocier, Mayor of La Rochelle, proposed gaining possession of it by a stratagem. "We shall easily do so, and to our honor," said he, "for Philip Monsel (the English commander) is not over cunning." Candocier invited Monsel to dine with him, and took the opportunity of showing him an order which desired him, in his quality of mayor, to review the garrison and the armed burgesses. This order was a fiction. The English commander, like most warriors of the time, could neither read nor write. Candocier showed the order openly, and read it with a confidence that might have imposed upon any one. On the day appointed for the review, Monsel marched all his garrison out of the castle, with the exception of about twelve men. Scarcely had he passed the fortifications, than a body of armed citizens, placed in ambuscade behind an old wall, got between him and the citadel, while a body of 200 men met him, in good order, in front. The English, finding themselves surrounded, yielded at discretion. The inhabitants then summoned the few left in the citadel to place it immediately in their power. Their number was so small that they complied without hesitation. Charles V. rewarded the Rochellois with great privileges.

SECOND SIEGE, A.D. 1573.—During the various religious wars in France, the reformers had no more formidable rampart or place of refuge than La Rochelle. Readers not well acquainted with French history, and accustomed to look upon France as one kingdom ruled by a despotic king, can form no idea of the real state of that country quite up to the middle of the reign of Louis XIV. In all the provinces of France there were strongly-fortified cities, mostly attached to the governments of these provinces. It was the object of princes of the blood and of the high nobles to obtain a government; after that, upon receiving offense at court, or taking umbrage at even an imaginary insult, they would retire to their fortified city, and set even royalty at defiance. La Rochelle, Sedan, and some other cities, were the great rallying-points of the Huguenots, and, in them, the power of the monarchs was merely nominal. In 1573, they were besieged in La Rochelle by the Duke of Anjou, afterward the infamous Henry III., the most inveterate enemy they ever had to encounter. The massacre of St. Bartholomew has fixed an indelible stain upon the reign of Charles IX.; but more of its horrors were due to this, his successor, than to him. Henry of Anjou was more after Catherine de Medici's own heart than her second son Charles. This prince could boast of having in his army the flower of the French nobility. In the course of eight months they gave nine general assaults, and formed more than twenty useless attacks. An English fleet endeavored to throw succors into the city, but it was repulsed, and forced to renounce the enterprise. The Rochellois, notwithstanding, continued to signalize their valor by the most intrepid resistance. The Duke of Anjou, returning from visiting a mine, passed by a place within gun-shot of the city. A soldier, recognizing him, took a deliberate aim at him, and would have ridded the world of a monster, but for the intervention of his squire, Hubert Devins, who, seeing the danger of the prince, rushed forward, and received the ball instead of him. He was cured of his wound, and lived a long time to enjoy the glory of such an action. Upon the duke being chosen King of Poland, a general assault was given; but it succeeded no better than its predecessors. The prince, who had already lost more than 24,000 men, then resolved to terminate the siege by making peace. The conduct of the royalists during the siege was the height of extravagance, injustice, and ferocity: "They sported there with the lives of men," says Matthieu the historian; "and I have heard those say who were near the Duke of Anjou, that to pass away the time, when they were at a loss what to do, they sent soldiers to the breach." It is not to be wondered at that an enterprise so conducted should have had a bad end, and that the Rochellois, pretending to submit, to save the honor of the court, should have really remained masters of their city. Near the counterscarp, there was a mill, called Lebrande, of which Captain Normand had obtained the proprietorship, upon condition that he should have it guarded. He thought at first of fortifying it; but finding he could not put it in a state of defense, he satisfied himself with keeping a few soldiers in it in the daytime, who retired at night, with the exception of one sentinel. Strozzi, one of the Catholic generals, who fancied he could derive some advantage from this mill, fixed upon a moonlight night to attack it with a detachment and two culverins. A soldier from the Isle of Rhé, named Barbot, sole defender of this bad post, stood his ground, fired, with incredible celerity, many arquebus-shots at the assailants, and, by varying the inflexions of his voice, made them believe that he had a considerable number of comrades. Captain Normand kept encouraging him from the top of a cavalier, speaking as if there were an entire company in the mill, and telling them to hold out bravely, and they should soon have assistance. Barbot's artillery being exhausted, he came forward and demanded quarter for himself and his comrades; and, the defense having been so respectable, it was granted. He immediately laid down his arms, and revealed the whole garrison in his own person. Strozzi, enraged at what he ought to have thought heroic, wanted to have him hung for his act of gallantry; but Biron, who was more moderate, satisfied himself with condemning him to the galleys. These men prided themselves upon fighting in a religious cause, and in civilized times; the pagans of old Greece or Rome would not have punished such a man at all. The soldier was fortunate enough to escape by flight a punishment he did not deserve.*

THIRD SIEGE, A.D. 1627.—We come now to the most important siege of La Rochelle, a siege which is likewise the great event of the life of so remarkable a man as the Cardinal de Richelieu.

Cardinal de Richelieu, who governed France and its king, being very desirous to signalize his ministry by the conquest of La Rochelle, ordered the siege of it to be prepared. In the year 1627, an army 23,000 men, with Louis XIII. at their head, presented itself before this last asylum of the Protestants. The warlike cardinal conducted all the operations in the name of the king. The city was vast, well fortified, well situated, provided with numerous artillery, full of munitions of all kinds, and defended by inhabitants animated by religious zeal. They elected as mayor, governor, and general of their city, Jean Guiton, a man of great firmness and valor. He was scarcely clothed with these important but perilous dignities, than he assembled the inhabitants, and drawing a poniard, said: "I will be your mayor, since you insist upon my being so, but only upon condition that I may be permitted to plunge this poniard into the heart of the first man who shall speak of surrendering. I consent that it shall be employed in the same manner upon me, if I should propose to capitulate; and I require that this poniard shall remain for that purpose upon the table of the chamber in which we assemble." Richelieu in the mean time continued his works for the blockade of the place. A circumvallation of three leagues was formed, protected by thirteen forts, flanked with redoubts, and bristling with artillery. But the great object was to close the ports, in order to exclude succor. Piles were sunk to embarrass the entrance; a chain of immense force was stretched across the mouth; but all these means proved useless.

At length the cardinal resolved to make a dyke. Everybody, as is usual in such cases, exclaimed against the project as absurd. Louis Métézau and Jean Tiriot alone ventured to undertake the execution of it, and they were kindly set down by their cotemporaries as madmen. It was necessary to form a canal of 740 toises in width, in a place where the current of the sea was very strong. Long posts were sunk in the sea, at twelve feet distance from each other, from the point of Coreille to Fort Louis: other posts, quite as strong, connected them crosswise. Immense dry stones were thrown into the intervals, to which the slime and mud acted as cement. This dyke was so elevated, that in the highest tides the soldiers were dry upon it; its thickness was proof against cannon. It was, toward the bottom, about twelve toises wide, and only about four at the top, so that it resembled a glacis. At each extremity a fort was built; an opening was left in the middle to allow passage for the tides; but, in order to prevent the enemy's vessels from entering by this opening, forty vessels, filled with hewn stones, were sunk, and a vast number of huge piles were driven. This great and wonderful work, which required the incessant labor of six months, was defended by several batteries erected on firm ground, and by 200 vessels of all sizes, well armed, which lined the shore. The advantage of this dyke was soon perceived: La Rochelle, which till then had received all its munitions and provisions by sea, became destitute in a very short time. The English made two attempts to deliver or revictual the place, but were obliged to renounce their undertaking. After a year's blockade, the Rochellois, for some time reduced to subsist upon grass, herbs, and shell-fish, began to be carried off in great numbers by famine. Twelve thousand men had already perished; whole houses were filled with dead bodies. One day the mayor met a person, attenuated by famine. "He has but one breath of life left," said some one to him. "Are you surprised at this?" replied he; "you and I must soon come to that, if we are not relieved." "But," added another, "hunger carries off so many daily, that we shall soon have no inhabitants left." "Well," rejoined the brave old man, "never mind, so long as there is one left to keep the gates shut." They really had "but one breath of life left," when on the 28th of October, 1628, they were compelled to capitulate. The royal troops took possession on the 30th, and on the 1st of November the king made his public entrance. The fortifications were demolished, the ditches filled up, the inhabitants disarmed and made taxable; echevinage and the corporation of the city were abolished forever. For nearly two hundred years, La Rochelle had scarcely acknowledged any sovereigns but its magistrates. This conquest cost Louis 40,000,000 of francs, but not so many lives as might have been expected.—Robson.

* This anecdote is evidently the foundation of an amusing scene in Dumas's "Three Musketeers," and proves the truth of the proverb, "that truth is even more strange than fiction."

ROME.—In our account of the early sieges of Rome, notwithstanding our conviction that many of the events related of them are apocryphal, we shall adhere to the version which was the delight of our boyhood.

First Siege, b.c. 747.—From the way in which what is called Rome, as a nation was got together, it was naturally in a constant state of warfare. The spirit in which it was founded pervaded and ruled over it to its fall: it was at all times a nation of the sword; and when that sword was blunted by having conquered the known world, its conquests all crumbled away: when Rome ceased to be an aggressor, she instantly ceased to be great. Rome, of course, commenced this aggressive career with wars upon her neighbors, a cause for quarrel being quickly and easily found where every thing was to be gained and little to be lost. Thus, the rape of the Sabine women produced the first siege of the nascent city—a violation not only of the laws of nations, but of the laws of even the rudest state of nature, created its first enemies. The Sabines of Cures, animated by a warm desire for vengeance, presented themselves before Rome; their design was to blockade it, when chance rendered them masters of the citadel by the treachery of Tarpeia. She covenanted, as her reward for betraying the capital, for what they wore on their arms, meaning their ornamental bracelets; but they, disgusted with her action, threw their bucklers upon her and smothered her. After her, the rock from which criminals were precipitated was called the Tarpeian—a proof that there was at least some foundation for that now disputed legend. The two peoples then came to close action, and victory remained long undecided: the Romans gave way at the first charge, but were rallied by the voice of Romulus, and recommenced the fight with obstinacy and success. The carnage was about to become horrible, when the Sabine women, for whose honor so much blood was being spilt, threw themselves between the combatants, with disheveled hair, holding in their arms the fruits of their forced marriages, and uttering piercing cries. Their voices, their tears, their supplicating posture, relaxed the fury of the fight, and calmed the animosity of the combatants; the Sabine women became mediators between their relations and their husbands. Peace was made on the condition that the two people should from that time be one, and that the two kings should reign together.

Second Siege, b.c. 507.—Tarquin the Superb, not being able to recover by artifice the throne from which he had been expelled, sought to employ force. He had the address to interest several neighboring nations in his cause;—when they had a chance of success, Rome had always plenty of enemies around her. Porsenna, King of Clusium, then the most powerful monarch of Italy, raised a numerous army in his defense, and laid siege to Rome. In an assault, the two consuls were wounded, and the consequently disordered Romans could not withstand their opponents. The Etruscans attacked a bridge, the capture of which must lead to that of the city; but Horatius, surnamed Cocles from having lost an eye, alone opposed himself to the troops of Porsenna, while his companions broke down the bridge behind him. When they had completed the work, he threw himself into the Tiber and swam ashore.

The King of Clusium, having failed in his attempt, undertook to reduce the place by famine; but the bold action of a young Roman soon made him change his design. Mutius Scævola, animated by the same spirit that had governed Cocles, was determined to relieve his country from this dreaded enemy. He went to the Clusian camp, disguised as an Etruscan, entered the king's tent, and meeting with that prince's secretary superbly dressed, poniarded him instead of Porsenna. He was arrested, led before the king, and strictly interrogated, while the instruments of torture were ostentatiously displayed in his sight. Mutius, with a haughty air, and without being the least intimidated by their menaces, exclaimed, "I am a Roman; I know how to suffer; I know how to die!" At the same time, as if he wished to punish the hand which had so ill served him, he held it in the flame of a brazier till it was consumed, looking all the while at Porsenna with a firm and stern glance. "There are thirty of us," said he, "all sworn to rid Rome of her implacable enemy, and all will not make such a mistake as I have." The king, astonished at the intrepid coolness of the young Roman, concluded a treaty of peace, which delivered Rome from the most formidable enemy she had had to encounter. Among the hostages given by the Romans was Cloelia, a Roman maiden, possessed of courage beyond her sex or age. She persuaded her companions to escape by swimming across the Tiber. They succeeded, in spite of the numerous arrows discharged upon them in their passage. The boldness of the action met with high praise in Rome; but they were sent back to Porsenna, that public faith might not be violated. That prince, however, was so much pleased with such virtuous spirit that he restored the generous maidens to freedom, and made his alliance still more close with a city that could produce heroines as well as heroes.

Third Siege, b.c. 488.—Caius Marcius Coriolanus, exiled from Rome by the seditious tribunes, and by his own indomitable pride, so far forgot all patriotic feelings as to engage the Volscians to make war against his country. The Volscians, proud of the assistance of such a distinguished hero, made him their general; he took the field with vengeance in his heart. After a great number of victories, he marched straight to Rome, for the purpose of laying siege to it. So bold a design threw the patricians and the people equally into a state of the greatest alarm. Hatred gave way to fear; deputies were sent to Coriolanus, who received them with all the haughtiness of an enemy determined on making his will the law. The Roman generals, instead of boldly meeting him in the field, exhorted him to grant them peace; they conjured him to have pity on his country, and forget the injuries offered to him by the populace, who were already sufficiently punished by the evils he had inflicted upon them. But they brought back nothing but the stern reply, "that they must restore to the Volscians all they had taken from them, and grant them the right of citizenship." Other deputies were dismissed in the same manner. The courage of these Romans, so proud and so intrepid, appeared to have passed with Coriolanus over to the side of the Volscians. Obedience to the laws was at an end; military discipline was neglected; they took counsel of nothing but their fear. At length, after many tumultuous deliberations, the ministers of religion were sent to endeavor to bend the will of the angry compatriot. Priests, clothed in their sacred habiliments, advanced with mournful steps to the camp of the Volscians, and the most venerable among them implored Coriolanus to give peace to his country, and, in the name of the gods, to have compassion on the Romans, his fellow-citizens and brothers; but they found him equally stern and inflexible. When the people saw the holy priests return without success, they indeed supposed the republic lost. They filled the temples, they embraced the altars of the gods, and gathered in clusters about the city, uttering cries and lamentations; Rome presented a picture of profound grief and debasement. Veturia, the mother of Coriolanus, and Volumnia, his wife, saved their unhappy country. They presented themselves before him, and conjured him by all that he held most sacred, to spare a city which had given him birth, and which still contained his mother, his wife, and his children. His mother was a woman of great spirit—a Roman, almost a Spartan mother. She had, from his boyhood, stimulated him to the performance of noble and heroic deeds; she might be called the parent of his glory as well as of his vigorous person. Coriolanus loved his mother tenderly, almost idolized her, and could not resist her tears. He raised the siege, and delivered Rome from the greatest alarm it had ever experienced.

Fourth Siege, b.c. 387.—A colony of Gauls, confined for room in their own country, entered upper Italy, under the command of Brennus, 387 years before Christ, and laid siege to Clusium, in Tuscany. Accustomed already to command as a master in Italy, Rome sent three embassadors to Brennus, to inform him that that city was under the protection of the Roman republic. Offended by the rude reply of the Gauls, the embassadors retired indignantly, but violated the rights of nations by entering Clusium, and assisting in the defense of it. Brennus, highly irritated, demanded satisfaction, and Rome refused to give it. He marched directly against that already superb city. The two armies met on the banks of the river Allia, within half a league of Rome. The Romans, being the less in numbers, extended their ranks in order not to be surrounded, and by that means weakened their center. The Gauls, perceiving this, fell with fury on the cohorts of the center, broke through them, and attacked the wings, whose flanks this opening left exposed. Already conquered by the terror inspired by this bold maneuver, which bespoke a people accustomed to military tactics, the wings of the Roman army took to flight without drawing sword, and the main body, bewildered by the general rout which ensued, took refuge in Veii, instead of regaining Rome, which offered them the nearest asylum. Thousands of Romans fell under the sword of the Gauls; and if these people had marched straight to the city, instead of lingering to share the spoil, the Roman name would have been at an end.* They remained three days engaged in distributing the spoil, and three days saved Rome, whither the fugitives bore the news of the disaster the army and the consuls had sustained. They rendered the republic aware of what it had to expect from the victorious Gauls. The Senate, in the general alarm, took advantage of the time the barbarians employed in rejoicings for their victory. Not finding a sufficient force to defend the city, they threw all the men capable of bearing arms into the capital, and sent away all useless mouths; the old men, women, and children took refuge in the nearest cities. There only remained in Rome a few pontiffs and ancient senators, who, not being willing to survive either their country or its glory, generously devoted themselves to death, to appease, according to their belief, the anger of the infernal gods. These venerable men, in order to preserve to the last sigh the marks of a dignity which they believed would expire with them, put on their sacred vestments or their consular robes, placed themselves at the doors of their houses, in their ivory chairs, and awaited with firmness the decree which Destiny was about to pronounce on Rome. Brennus arrived three days after his victory. Surprised at finding the gates open, the walls without defense, and the houses without inhabitants, he suspected some ambush or stratagem. The continued silence and calm at length re-assured him. He placed his points of guard; then, while spreading his troops through the quarters of the city, the first objects that met his eyes were the venerable old men who had devoted themselves to death. Their splendid habits, their white beards, their air of grandeur and firmness, their silence even, astonished Brennus, and inspired a religious fear in his army. A Gaul, less touched with this august spectacle, and more daring than the rest, ventured to pluck innocently the beard of an ancient senator. The spirited old man dealt him a heavy blow with his ivory staff on the head. The irritated soldier killed the senator, and this became the signal for slaughter; all were massacred in their chairs, and the inhabitants who had not escaped were put to the sword. Brennus attacked the capital, but he was repulsed with loss. Despairing of taking it by force, he had recourse to blockade, to reduce it by famine. In order to avenge himself for the resistance offered by the Romans, he set fire to the city; and soon Rome presented nothing but its hills surrounded with smoking ruins.

The Gauls, inflated with their success, believed the whole country to be in a state of terror, and they preserved neither order nor discipline; some wandered about the neighborhood for the purpose of plunder, while others spent both days and nights in drinking. They thought the whole people shut up in the Capitol, but Rome found an avenger in Camillus. This great man, exiled by his ungrateful fellow-citizens, had retired to Ardea. He prevailed upon the young men of that city to follow him. In concert with the magistrates, he marched out on a dark night, fell upon the Gauls stupefied with wine, made a horrible slaughter, and thus raised the depressed courage of his fellow-citizens. They flocked in crowds to his standard, and, looking upon Camillus as their only resource, they chose him as their leader. But he refused to do any thing without the order of the Senate, and the people shut up in the Capitol. It was almost impossible to gain access to them. A young Roman, however, had the hardihood to undertake this perilous enterprise, and succeeded. Camillus, declared dictator, collected an army of more than 40,000 men, who believed themselves invincible under so able a general.

The Gauls, meanwhile, perceived the traces left by the young man, and Brennus endeavored, during the night, to surprise the Capitol by the same path. After many efforts, a few succeeded in gaining the summit of the rock, and were already on the point of scaling the walls; the sentinel was asleep, and nothing seemed to oppose them. Some geese consecrated to Juno, were awakened by the noise made by the enemy, and began to cry, as they do when disturbed. Manlius, a person of consular rank, flew to the spot, encountered the Gauls, and hurled two of them from the rock. The Romans were roused, and the enemy driven back; most of them either fell, or were thrown from the precipice, and very few of the party engaged regained their camp. The sleeply sentinel was precipitated from the Capitol, and Manlius was highly rewarded. Much irritated at his defeat, Brennus pressed the place still more closely, to augment the famine, which had begun to be felt even in his camp, since Camillus had made himself master of the open country. An accommodation was soon proposed; it was agreed that Brennus should receive a thousand pounds' weight of gold, on condition of his raising the siege, and leaving the lands of the republic. The gold was brought, but when it was weighed, the Gauls made use of false weights. The Romans complained of this; but Brennus, laughing at their remonstrances, threw his sword and baldric into the scale which counterpoised the gold, adding raillery to injustice. At that very moment, Camillus reached the capital, and advanced with a strong escort toward the place of conference. Upon learning what had passed, "Take back this gold to the Capitol," said he to the Roman deputies; "and you, Gauls," added he, "retire with your weights and scales; it is with steel only, that Romans should redeem their country." The parties soon proceeded to blows; Camillus brought up his troops, and a furious charge ensued. The Romans, maddened by the sight of their ruined country, made incredible efforts. The Gauls could not withstand them; they were broken, and fled on all sides. Brennus rallied them, raised the siege, and encamped a few miles from Rome. Camillus followed him with characteristic ardor, attacked him afresh, and defeated him. Most of the Gauls were either killed on the field of battle, or massacred in detail by the inhabitants of the neighboring villages; so that, it is said, a single one did not remain to carry back to his country the news of their defeat.

* In this terrible engagement nearly 40,000 Romans were slain.

Fifth Siege, b.c. 211.—This siege belongs to a very interesting period in the Roman history; it occurred in the course of what are called the Punic wars, which were the contests of two of the most powerful states then in existence, for supremacy. Rome and Carthage were like two suns; they had become too powerful for both to retain their splendor in one hemisphere. They were really the noblest conflicts in which Rome was engaged; there was a rivalry in generals and soldiers worthy of being sustained by the great republic; and though Rome was in the end the conqueror, and her generals were great, it is doubtful whether she can exhibit in her annals so perfect a captain as Hannibal. The Carthaginians suffer, in the opinion of posterity, in another way; the Romans were not only the victors, but the historians; Punic bad faith is proverbial in the Roman language, but we strongly suspect that a Carthaginian Polybius or Livy would have found as many sins against the laws of nations committed by one party as the other. The man was the painter, and not the lion.

After various and great successes, Hannibal, to terrify the Romans, presented himself before their city. The consuls, who had received orders to watch that the republic should receive no injury, felt it their duty to encounter him. When they were on the point of engaging, a violent storm compelled both parties to retire; and the same thing occurred several times; so that Hannibal, believing that he saw in this event something supernatural, said, according to Livy, that sometimes fortune and sometimes his will was always wanting to make him master of Rome. That which still more surprised him was, that while he was encamped at one of the gates of the city, the Romans sent an army out of one of the other gates into Spain; and that the very field in which he was encamped was sold at the same time, without that circumstance having diminished the value of it. In order to avenge himself, he put up to auction the goldsmiths' shops which were around the most public places in Rome, and then retired.

Sixth Siege, b.c. 87.—War being declared against Mithridates, King of Pontus, was the signal of discord between Marius and Sylla. These two rivals, whose animosity knew no bounds, demanded at the same time the command of the army. Sylla obtained it from the Senate, and immediately went to place himself at the head of his troops. Marius took advantage of his absence, and, with the assistance of the tribune Sulpicius, he so excited the people against the nobles that Sylla was deprived of his command which was conferred upon him. Sylla, far from obeying the sentence of the people, marched straight to Rome with his army, consisting of 40,000 men. This was the first time, since Coriolanus, that this great city had been besieged by one of its own citizens. Destitute of every thing, its only defense being a few soldiers got together in haste by Marius, it did not make a long resistance. Sylla entered as an enemy; the multitude mounted upon the roofs of the houses, armed with any thing they could lay hold of, and poured such a shower of stones and tiles upon the heads of his soldiers that they could not advance. Sylla, forgetful of what he owed to his country and to himself, cried out to his men to set fire to the houses; and, arming himself with a blazing brand, gave them the example. Marius, too weak to contend with his rival, abandoned to him the center of the empire. The conqueror affected great moderation, prevented the pillage of his country, reformed the government, raised the authority of the Senate upon the ruins of that of the people, put to death Sulpicius, with ten other senators, partisans of his rival, and embarked for Asia.

This second absence replunged Rome into fresh misfortunes; the faction of the people, of which Marius was the soul, excited by Cinna, took courage again. This consul, having won over some tribunes, caused so much trouble, that he was driven from the city and deprived of the consulate; but he succeeded in gaining to his quarrel a large army encamped in the Campania, and almost all the peoples of Italy. Marius, who had taken refuge in Africa, recrossed the sea, and came to join Cinna; he was immediately declared proconsul. It was proposed to give him fasces and lictors, but he rejected them: "Such honors," said he, "would not become a banished man." His party held a council, and it was determined to go and attack Rome: Sylla had set them the example.

Rome, always victorious against external enemies, but always weak against domestic attacks, saw herself besieged by four armies, commanded by Marius, Cinna, Sertorius, and Carbo. Masters of all the passages, they subjected the city to famine, and reduced its inhabitants to extremity. Pompeius Strabo came at last, but too late, to the succor of his country with an army. Rome, in a state of consternation, and seeing herself on the verge of ruin, sent deputies to the enemies to invite them to enter the city. A council was held. Marius and Cinna, after having marked out their victims, gave the city up to all the horrors of war. A multitude of virtuous Romans were immolated to the vengeance of the two leaders; Marius inundated his country with the purest blood of the republic. Birth and riches were unpardonable crimes; a nod of this tyrant's head was an order for death. This ferocious and barbarous man, after having exercised the most horrible cruelties, died a short time after this victory, in the middle of Rome itself, of which he had been the preserver and the executioner.

Seventh Siege, A.D. 408.—Alaric, King of the Goths, entered Italy, and advanced toward Rome to lay siege to it. On his route, a pious solitary came to throw himself at his feet, imploring him with tears to spare that city, which had become the center of the Christian world. "Father," replied the prince, "it is not my will that leads me on; I incessantly hear a voice in my ears, which cries—'On, Alaric, on! and sack Rome!'" He reduced it to the most frightful extremity, by closing every passage for provisions, and by making himself master of the navigation of the Tiber. Pestilence was soon added to famine. Rome was nothing but one vast cemetery: it became necessary to treat with the King of the Goths.

The deputies of Rome declared that the Roman people were willing to accept peace upon reasonable conditions; but rather than its glory should be stained, they would give battle. "Very good!" replied Alaric, with a loud laugh; "it is never so easy to cut the hay as when the grass is thickest!" They were forced to lay aside their ancient pride, and submit to circumstances. The conqueror ordered them to bring to him all the gold, silver, valuable furniture, and foreign slaves that were in the city. "And what will you leave, then, to the inhabitants?" asked the deputies. "Life!" replied Alaric. After long contestations, it was agreed that Rome should pay 5,000 pounds' weight of gold, 30,000 pounds' weight of silver, 4,000 silken tunics, 3,000 skins colored scarlet, 3,000 pounds' weight of spices, and, as hostages, give up the children of the most noble citizens. When these conditions were complied with, the King of the Goths raised the siege.

Eighth Siege, A.D. 410.—Two years after, Alaric, constantly provoked to vengeance by the perfidies of the Romans, presented himself again before the capital, and besieged Rome very closely. The siege was long, but very few circumstances relating to it have been preserved. On the 24th of August, the Gothic prince entered the city, of which some traitors had opened the gates to him during the night. Rome was sacked by the furious soldiery; its wealth, its valuable furniture, its public edifices, its temples, its private houses, became the prey of the flames. The blood of the citizens inundated the streets and public places; the women were dishonored, and then immolated upon the bodies of their slaughtered husbands and fathers; children were destroyed upon the bosoms of their mothers. Heaven seemed to arm itself in concert with the Goths to punish Rome: lightning reduced to dust what the flames had spared.

The Goths, however, respected the churches; these holy places were an inviolable asylum for all who sought refuge in them.

After the taking of Naples in 538, Belisarius shut himself up in Rome, and prepared to sustain a siege, if Vitiges would undertake to attack him. The new monarch, at the head of 150,000 men, marched toward the capital of Italy, asking of every one he fell in with on his route, whether Belisarius were still in Rome. "Prince, be satisfied on that point," replied a priest; "the only part of the military art Belisarius is ignorant of, is flight." This general had constructed a fort upon a bridge, at a mile from Rome, and had provided it with a sufficient garrison; but these base cowards, seized with fear at the approach of the Goths, took to flight, and dispersed themselves over the Campania. The next day, at dawn, Vitiges crossed the bridge with a great part of his army. As he advanced, he met Belisarius, who, at the head of 1,000 horse, had come to reconnoiter; his surprise was excessive at seeing the enemy; but without being daunted by their numbers, he halted, and received them at the head of his little troop. Here the valor and exploits of Belisarius approach the marvelous: in the hottest of the mêlée, the brave leader of the Romans was recognized by some deserters, who cried out from several quarters at once: "At the bay horse, comrades!—aim at the bay horse!" Assailed on all sides, he became a mark for every arrow. Inflamed with a generous courage, he drove off some, overthrew others, and cut down all that impeded his passage. The Romans, seeing the danger of their general, flew to his aid, surrounded him, warded off every blow directed against him, and made him a rampart of their bucklers and their bodies. The terrified Goths turned bridle, and were pursued to the camp; the rest of the army, however, stopped the career of the conquerors, and forced them to fly in their turn to a neighboring height, where they rallied. The combat was then renewed; and the Romans, too inferior in numbers, would scarcely have effected a retreat, but for the heroic valor of an officer named Valentinus. This new Cocles alone withstood the Gothic cavalry, and gave time to his comrades to regain the city; but the inhabitants shut the gates against them. In vain Belisarius shouted his name, and pressed to be admitted; the inhabitants were persuaded that he had perished in the fight, and could not otherwise recognize his countenance, from the blood and dust which disfigured it; they therefore paid no regard to his orders. In this extremity, Belisarius reanimated his little band, and turned with fury upon the enemy, who were close at his heels. The Goths, imagining that he was at the head of fresh troops from the city, stopped their pursuit, turned their horses' heads, and regained their camp. Belisarius re-entered the city in triumph, where he was received with transports of the most lively joy. Rome believed itself from that time safe from all reverses, beneath the ægis of this intrepid general. In this combat the Goths lost the élite of their cavalry.

On the eighteenth day of the siege, at sunrise, the Goths, led on by Vitiges, marched toward the gate Salaria. At the sight of their machines, Belisarius broke into a loud laugh, while the inhabitants were frozen with fear. The Goths had reached the bank of the ditch, when the Roman general, seizing a bow, took aim at a Gothic commander covered with a cuirass, and pierced him quite through the neck. This act was highly applauded by his troops, whose triumph was doubled by a second aim as fortunate as the first. Belisarius then commanded his soldiers to make a general discharge at the oxen which drew the machines. In an instant they were covered and transpierced with an iron shower. The astonished and discomfited Goths were forced to terminate their attack.

Although the attempts of Vitiges seemed generally to fail, he was on the point of taking Rome, to the north of the mole or tomb of Adrian, since called the castle of St. Angelo. It was necessary for the Goths to possess themselves of this place, to cross the Tiber. In spite of the arrows of the Romans, they had applied their ladders and begun to ascend, when the defenders of the mole bethought themselves of breaking off the numerous marble statues with which this monument was ornamented, and rolled the fragments upon the heads of the besiegers, who, beaten from their ladders by these enormous masses, were constrained to abandon their enterprise.

The next day, Belisarius dismissed all useless mouths from the city; he enrolled a great number of artisans; he changed the locks and bolts of the city gates twice a month; and caused instruments to be played upon the walls during the night. A Goth, remarkable for his height and famous for his exploits, covered with his cuirass, and with his helmet on his head, advanced from the ranks opposite the gate Salaria, and setting his back against a tree, kept up a continuous discharge of arrows at the battlements. An immense javelin, launched from a balist, pierced him through cuirass, body and all, and penetrating half its length into the tree, nailed this redoubtable warrior to it. A Massagete horseman named Chorsamantes, one of Belisarius's guards, accompanied by a few Romans, was pursuing a body of sixty horse on the plains of Nero. His companions having turned rein, in order not to approach too near to the enemy's camp, he continued the pursuit alone. The Goths seeing him thus deserted, turned round upon him: he killed the boldest of them, charged the others, and put them to flight. Chorsamantes pursued them to their intrenchments, and, more fortunate than prudent, he regained Rome in safety, and was received with loud acclamations. Some time after, having been wounded in a renconter, he swore to avenge himself, and kept his word. He went out alone, and made his way to the camp of the Goths. They took him for a deserter; but when they saw him shooting at them, twenty horsemen came out for the purpose of cutting him in pieces. He at first met them with the greatest audacity, and even checked them; but soon, environed on all parts, furious at the aspect of peril, and always the more redoubtable from the numbers of his enemies, he fell, covered with wounds, upon a heap of men and horses he had slain.

In a severe combat which was afterward fought, the Goths were repulsed with loss. Rutilus, a Roman officer, pierced by a dart, which was half-buried in his head, as if insensible to the pain, continued the pursuit of the enemy. He died the moment the dart was extracted. Another officer, named Azzes, returned from a charge with an arrow sticking close to his right eye. A skillful leech, named Theoclistes, cured him. Tragàn, the commander of a body of troops, while endeavoring to break through a battalion of Goths, received an arrow in his eye; the wood broke off at the moment of striking, and fell, but the steel, being quite buried, remained in the wound, without giving Tragàn much pain. Five days afterward, the steel began to reappear, pierced through the cicatrice, and fell out apparently of itself. Tarmut, a barbarian captain, an ally of the Romans, being left almost alone on the field of battle, was assailed by a crowd of enemies; but, armed with two javelins, he laid at his feet all who ventured to approach him. At length, covered with wounds, he was near sinking from weakness, when he saw his brother Ennes, chief of the Isaurians, approach with a troop of horse, and throw himself between him and his assailants. Reanimated by this unhoped-for succor, he recovered sufficient strength to gain the city, still armed with his two javelins. He only survived this astonishing effort of courage two days. Such were the principal exploits during the siege of Rome by Vitiges, who was obliged to raise it, after a year and nine days of useless attempts. Sixty-nine battles were fought, all very bloody, and almost all to the advantage of the Romans: they cost the King of the Goths more than the half of his numerous army. Belisarius had but a small force; Rome might have been taken easily: it had yielded to much weaker armies, but Belisarius was in Rome, and that great general, fertile in resources, was alone worth whole legions.

Ninth Siege, A.D. 544.—In the year 544, Totila, King of the Goths, and master of part of Italy, formed the blockade of Rome, and kept the passages so well, that no provisions could be got in, either by land or sea. He stopped the entrance by the Tiber at a place where its bed was narrowest, by means of extraordinary long beams of timber, laid from one bank to the other, upon which he raised, at the two extremities, towers of wood, which were filled with soldiers. The famine soon became so horrible, that wheat was sold at seven pieces of gold per bushel, which is nearly 90 shillings of our money, and bran at about a quarter of the sum; an ox, taken in a sortie, was sold at an unheard-of price. Fortunate was the man who could fall in with a dead horse, and take undisputed possession of it! Dogs, rats, and the most impure animals, soon became exquisite and eagerly-purchased dainties. Most of the citizens supported themselves upon nettles and wild herbs, which they tore from the foot of the walls and ruined buildings. Rome seemed to be only inhabited by pale, fleshless, livid phantoms, who either fell dead in the streets, or killed themselves.

That which was most frightful in this extremity of misery, was the fact that the leaders themselves were the cause of the public want; they devoured the citizens by their sordid avarice. The immense masses of wheat, which they had been a long time collecting, were only distributed at their weight in gold; and very shortly most of the wealth of Rome was concentrated among monsters, worthy of the severest punishment.

Belisarius, whose generous spirit mourned over the misfortunes of Rome, attempted all sorts of means to succor the unfortunate capital. He caused a large number of barks to be constructed, furnished with boarding all around, to protect the soldiers from the arrows of the enemy. These boards were pierced at certain distances, to afford facility for launching their own bolts and arrows. He caused these barks to be laden with great quantities of provisions, placed himself at the head of them, and, leading with some fire-boats, he ascended the Tiber, and set fire to one of the enemy's towers. But his enterprise not being seconded, he could not succeed in throwing provisions into the city; grief at his failure produced a sickness which brought him to the brink of the grave. Some Isaurian soldiers, who guarded the gate Asinaria, having slipped along the ramparts in the night, by means of a cord, came and offered Totila to give up the city to him. The king having assured himself of their fidelity, and of the possibility of the enterprise, sent with them four of the bravest and strongest Goths, who, having got into the city, opened a gate and admitted the besiegers. Bessus, who commanded in the place, fled away with his troops at the first alarm. In the house of this governor were found heaps of gold and silver, the fruits of his cruel monopolies.

At daybreak the King of the Goths repaired to the church of St. Peter, to return thanks to God for his success. The deacon Pelagius, who awaited him at the entrance of the holy temple, prostrated himself humbly before him, and implored him to save the lives of the inhabitants. Totila, who knew how to pardon as well as to conquer, granted the sacred minister what he asked, and forbade his soldiers, under the strongest penalties, to shed the blood of any one. When this order was given, the Goths had already slain 20 soldiers and 60 citizens. These were the only victims of the brutality of the victors; but if he spared the lives of the inhabitants, he deprived them of all means to support them. Rome was abandoned to pillage for several days, and nothing was left to the citizens but the bare walls of their houses. Senators, formerly opulent and proud, were seen covered with miserable rags, reduced to beg their bread from door to door, and live upon the alms they received from the barbarians.

Totila was preparing to demolish Rome; he had already leveled a third of the walls, and was about to set fire to the most superb edifices of the city, when he received a letter from Belisarius, which diverted him from his design. "To found cities," said this great man, "to maintain flourishing cities, is to serve society and immortalize ourselves; to overthrow and destroy them, is to declare ourselves the enemies of mankind, and dishonor ourselves forever. By the agreement of all peoples, the city into which you have entered, in consequence of your victory, is the greatest and most magnificent under heaven. It is not the work of a single man, or a single army. During more than thirteen centuries, a long line of kings, consuls, and emperors have disputed the glory of embellishing it, and the superb edifices it presents to your eyes are so many monuments which consecrate their memories; to destroy them is to outrage the past centuries, of which they eternize the remembrance, and to deprive future ages of a magnificent spectacle. My lord, reflect that fortune must declare itself in favor of you or my master. If you remain the conqueror, how you will regret having destroyed your most splendid conquest! If you should succumb, the treatment you have inflicted upon Rome will serve as a rule by which Justinian will treat you. The eyes of the universe are upon you; it awaits the part you are about to take, to accord you the title which will be forever attached to the name of Totila." Persuaded by this eloquent appeal, the King of the Goths contented himself with depopulating the city of Rome, in which he did not leave a single inhabitant.

Forty days after the retreat of Totila, Belisarius transported himself to Rome, with the design of repeopling that famous city, and repairing its ruins. He soon put it in a state to sustain a new siege. Upon learning this the King of the Goths quickly returned, and during three days made several attacks upon the city; but Belisarius repulsed them all, and forced him to retire with great loss.

Tenth Siege, A.D. 549.—In 549, Totila, without being discouraged by his defeat, once more laid siege to the capital of Italy. Diogenes, who commanded there, had had wheat sown within the inclosure of the walls, which might have supported the garrison some time. But the city was again betrayed by the Isaurians. The soldiers of that nation, dissatisfied with not having received their pay for some years, and having learned that their companions had been magnificently rewarded by Totila, resolved to follow their example. They agreed with the King of the Goths to open the gate confided to their guard, which perfidy they executed at the time appointed. Totila caused his trumpets to be sounded at the side opposite to that by which he entered the city. The garrison immediately hastened where the danger seemed most pressing, and by this artifice the Goths met with no resistance. The commander of the Roman cavalry, named Paul, of Cilicia, seeing that the city was taken, shut himself up, with 400 horse, in the mausoleum of Adrian, and took possession of the bridge which leads to the church of St. Peter. He was attacked by the Goths, whose efforts he so warmly repulsed, that Totila determined to reduce his party by famine. This intrepid little band remained a day and a night without taking food, and then determined to die with honor. After taking a last farewell, and embracing each other, they opened the gates with a determination to fall upon the enemy like desperate men, when Totila proposed moderate and honorable conditions to them. They accepted them, and all took arms under his banner. Totila, become master of Rome a second time, restored it to its pristine splendor, and re-established as many of the citizens as could be found. Narses, the general of the empire, having conquered and killed Totila, retook Rome, which opposed but a feeble resistance.

Eleventh Siege, A.D. 1084.—"The long quarrel of the throne and mitre had been recently kindled by the zeal and ambition of the haughty Gregory VII. Henry III., King of Germany and Italy, and afterward emperor of the West, and the pope had degraded each other; and each had seated a rival on the temporal or spiritual throne of his antagonist. After the defeat and death of his Swabian rebel, Henry descended into Italy to assume the imperial crown, and to drive from the Vatican the tyrant of the Church. But the Roman people adhered to the cause of Gregory: their resolution was fortified by supplies of men and money from Apulia; and the city was thrice ineffectually besieged by the King of Germany. In the fourth year he corrupted, it is said, with Byzantine gold, the nobles of Rome. The gates, the bridges, and fifty hostages were delivered into his hands; the anti-pope, Clement III., was consecrated in the Lateran; the grateful pontiff crowned his protector in the Vatican, and the emperor fixed his residence in the Capitol, as the successor of Augustus and Charlemagne. The ruins of the Sceptigonium were still defended by the nephew of Gregory; the pope himself was invested in the castle of St. Angelo, and his last hope was in the courage and fidelity of his Norman vassal. Their friendship had been interrupted by some reciprocal injuries and complaints; but on this pressing occasion, Guiscard was urged by the obligation of his oath, by his interest — more potent than oaths—by the love of fame, and his enmity to the two emperors. Unfurling the holy banner, he resolved to fly to the relief of the prince of the apostles; the most numerous of his armies, 30,000 foot and 6,000 horse, was instantly assembled, and his march from Salerno to Rome was animated by the public applause and the promise of the divine favor. Henry, invincible in 66 battles, trembled at his approach; recollecting some indispensable affairs that required his presence in Lombardy, he exhorted the Romans to persevere in their allegiance, and hastily retired, three days before the entrance of the Normans. In less than three years, the son of Tancred of Hauteville enjoyed the glory of delivering the pope, and of compelling the two emperors of the East and West to fly before his victorious arms. But the triumph of Robert was clouded by the calamities of Rome. By the aid of the friends of Gregory, the walls had been perforated or scaled, but the imperial faction was still powerful and active; on the third day the people rose in a furious tumult, and a hasty word of the conqueror, in his defense or revenge, was the signal of fire and pillage. The Saracens of Sicily, the subjects of Roger, and the auxiliaries of his brother, embraced this fair occasion of rifling and profaning the holy city of the Christians; and many thousands of the citizens, in the sight and by the allies of their spiritual father, were exposed to violation, captivity, or death; and a spacious quarter of the city, from the Lateran to the Colosseum, was consumed by the flames, and devoted to perpetual solitude."*

Twelfth Siege, A.D. 1527.—The emperor Charles V., irritated against the pope, Clement VII., his mortal enemy, charged the Duke of Bourbon, in 1527, to seek every means in his power to avenge him upon the pontiff. The duke was a renegade Frenchman, of considerable military skill, and a restless disposition. He had quarreled with his master, Francis I., and was deemed of so much consequence as to be countenanced by Francis's rival, Charles V., and to be intrusted with the highest military command he could confer. The duke was at the head of 14,000 men, who loved and adored him, and who swore, Brantôme says, "to follow him wherever he went, were it to the devil." Followed by these troops, he marched toward Rome, and immediately laid siege to it. The soldiers, animated by the desire of pillage, mounted to the assault with incredible energy, Bourbon encouraging them by his example. But as this prince, with characteristic ambition, was endeavoring to be the first upon the ramparts, he was killed by a musket-shot. The fall of the general, so far from relaxing the valor of his soldiers, excited their vengeance; they rushed more fiercely to the assault of the walls, they mowed down their defenders like grass, quickly made themselves masters of Rome, and committed the most frightful ravages.

This superb city, taken so many times by the barbarians, was never pillaged with more fury than it was by the hands of Christians. The pope took refuge in the castle of St Angelo, and was besieged with such rancor, that a woman was hung for passing up to him a basket of lettuce by a cord suspended from the castle. Cardinal Pulci, who was shut up with the pope, made an attempt to escape, which cost him his life. He had scarcely left the castle when he fell from his horse; his foot hung in the stirrup, and the animal dragged him at speed over the bridge of the castle. After being blockaded for a month, and reduced to great want of provisions, the pope was forced to capitulate with the Prince of Orange, who had succeeded the Duke of Bourbon in the command of the imperial troops. He agreed to pay 400,000 ducats, and to place himself at the disposal of the emperor. Charles V. affected regret at the detention of the pontiff.

Eight days before this event, a man dressed as a hermit, of about sixty years of age, went through the streets of Rome, about midnight, sounding a handbell, and pronouncing with a loud voice the following words: "The anger of God will soon fall upon this city!" The pope obtained nothing from the examination he made of this man; the severest tortures could draw no more from him than this terrifying oracle: "The anger of God will soon fall upon this city!" When the Prince of Orange became master of the city, he liberated him from prison, and offered him a considerable sum of money. He, however, refused reward, three days after disappeared, and was never again heard of.

* Gibbon.

The imperial army left Rome, loaded with a booty of more than 18,000,000 of crowns, every private soldier having an immense sum. The obsequies of the Duke of Bourbon were celebrated with great pomp, and his body was conveyed to Gaeta.

Thirteenth Siege, a.d. 1796–1799. — The temporal power of the popes had long ceased to be an object of jealousy for Christian princes; the small extent of their states, the respect which was entertained for their ministry, and their abstinence from military enterprises, preserved peace in a city which had formerly, and for many centuries, made the world tremble with the terror of its arms. Louis XIV. and Louis XV. had satisfied themselves with seizing the Venaissian county, to punish the popes for some affronts offered to their crowns; and the pontiffs, conscious of their weakness, had acknowledged their errors and disavowed the acts of their ministers. But it was not thus when the French Revolution broke out. Pius VI., irritated at seeing at once both his annates and the Venaissian county wrested from his hands, entered into the league of the kings against France. In no city were the French more hated than in Rome. Basseville, the French envoy, was massacred in a riot, which the government of the pope had allowed to be got up with more than suspected negligence. The troops of the pope were preparing to unite themselves with those of the other powers of Italy, when Bonaparte was seen to enter that country, in 1796, as a conqueror. His victories seemed to foretell the destruction of the Holy See. Republican enthusiasm was awakened on the banks of the Tiber; nothing was talked of but rebuilding the Capitol, and founding a new Roman republic.

The French general had conquered the duchy of Urbino, Romagna, and the march of Ancona. The terrified pope sued for peace; Bonaparte granted him at first a truce and then a peace. The pope yielded to the republic the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, which the French had already conquered, and all the shores of the Adriatic gulf, from the mouths of the Po to Ancona. A month after the pope weakly allowed some of his subjects to take up arms, in consequence of a supposed reverse suffered by Bonaparte. The latter contented himself with chastising some villages of Ferrara, which had excited the revolt. A third time Bonaparte pardoned him, and the pardon was ratified by the French Directory; Joseph Bonaparte was appointed embassador to Rome. Party spirit was however, too strong; the apparent moderation of the French could not bring the court of Rome to pacific sentiments. Its hatred against France was kept alive by the Queen of Naples, who threw open the ports of the Mediterranean to the English. In addition to this, a long hesitation to acknowledge the Cisalpine republic; then the nomination of General Provera to command the army of the pope, and a course of proceedings which announced the intention, but which did not give the means, of entering into a fresh war; the French embassador forced the pope to declare himself in a positive manner. Every thing seemed appeased; there was a calm; but it was such a one as precedes the eruption of a volcano. On the 28th of December, 1797, a fresh seditious movement broke out in Rome. Some men assembled round the house of the embassador, uttering revolutionary cries. Scarcely had they preluded by a few acts of apparent insurrection, when the troops of the pope came up, dispersed the rioters, and pursued them into the palace of the embassador, whither their fear had driven them. Joseph Bonaparte insisted on his residence being respected, and promised to give up the guilty; but he was answered by a shower of balls, by which his windows were broken to pieces. He interposed everywhere between those who struck and those who were stricken. One of his friends, the Adjutant-general Duphot, who was to have married his sister-in-law the next day, was an object of his greatest care; but he was assassinated close to his side; his inanimate body was stabbed by the ruffians in a hundred places; the French had great difficulty in rescuing it from the hands of these furious men. The court of Rome offered the French embassador all kinds of reparation; but the latter thought it not prudent or dignified to remain longer in a palace which had been so shamefully violated, where he and his whole family had been insulted, and whose floors were still stained with the blood of his friend. Cardinal Doria in vain had recourse to the Spanish ambassador to pacify him; the whole French legation quitted Rome. The Consistory believed, in this peril, that the court of Naples would keep its word, and would hasten to send its promised succors; but it received nothing but an excuse, to amuse or appease the French government, till the Neapolitan army was on its march. The Directory, however was inflexible; a month had scarcely passed away when a French army, led by General Alexander Berthier, was at the gates of Rome, and had taken possession of the castle of St. Angelo. On the 17th of February, 1798, the anniversary of the pope's election, an insurrection broke out in the capital. His palace was invested, but respect checked the insurgents at the entrance. They met with resistance nowhere. They abstained from violence or insult toward the pope, but they declared Rome free; they claimed for themselves the honor of being of the blood of the Catos and Scipios. A deputation arrived at the French camp; General Berthier mounted the steps of the Capitol, and saluted a new Roman republic; but the Romans had no longer the virtues of their fathers; nothing can bear less resemblance to another than modern Romans do to ancient Romans. Consuls, tribunes, and popular laws were once more to be seen in Rome; and their decrees wanted nothing but to be applied to a people who entertained a love of the republic. Its reign was short and tempestuous. While Bonaparte was in Egypt, the King of Naples supposed the time most fit for an outbreak of the Italian states, to liberate themselves from the domination of the French. He marched at the head of 70,000 Neapolitans, the real command of whom was intrusted to the Austrian general Mack, and entered the Roman territory. The French army which occupied it, only consisted of 16,000 men, disseminated over all the points. Championnet, who commanded them, thought it best to retire to upper Italy. The King of Sicily and General Mack entered Rome on the 25th of November, 1798; Championnet gathered together his army and stood his ground. Mack, after several days of hesitation, ventured to attack him on the other side of the Tiber. The French, though vastly inferior in numbers, repulsed the Neapolitans; in three days they made 11,000 prisoners. Mack beheld his columns flying in the greatest disorder, and being unable to rally them, abandoned the capital of the Christian world, covered himself with the Teverone, and was pursued by the French, who possessed themselves successively of Capua and Naples. This occupation lasted but a short time; the French under Schérer being beaten in upper Italy, abandoned Naples and Rome, to defend themselves against the Austrians and Russians. Ferdinand went back to Naples, and occupied Rome till it returned to its obedience to Pius VII.

Rome has since that time been more than once humbled by the French; but as nothing like a siege has taken place, the events of its further history do not fall within our plan.—Robson's Great Sieges.

ROMORANTIN, A.D. 1356. — However insignificant in itself, this siege commands a place in our record, as being the first in which cannon were employed. England's favorite hero, the Black Prince, having entered Sologne with hostile intentions, laid siege to Romorantin. The English were repulsed in their first assault; but were not disheartened. They continued their attacks, but still in vain, till some engineers advised an experiment to be made with the newly-discovered gunpowder. They planted some batteries of cannon so as to enable them to throw into the place a number of inflammable missiles. By this means they set fire to some buildings in the lower court of the castle. The conflagration soon extended to one of the towers. The besieged were then constrained to surrender to the conqueror, and were made prisoners of war. This is the first time that mention is made in history of artillery being employed for besieging places. It was ten years after the battle of Crecy, at which, it is said, cannon were first used in the field.

RONCESVALLES, A.D. 778.—In a gorge of the Pyrenees, on the frontier of Spain, in Navarre, stands the little village of Roncesvalles, which tradition says, witnessed in 778, the defeat and destruction of the rear guard of Charlemagne the Great, on his retreat from Spain; and the death of Roland the Brave, a celebrated hero of the romances of chivalry, and one of the knights of Charlemagne, of whom it is represented he was a nephew. The troops of Charlemagne were attacked as they were passing through the pass of Roncesvalles, by the Saracens and the mountaineers (the Gascons), and were defeated with great slaughter. With Roland the flower of the Frankish chivalry fell. Roland has formed the theme of a multitude of romances. His adventures are contained in the fabulous chronicle of Turpin, and the old French romances relating to Charlemagne and his knights. The celebrated epics of Boiardo (Orlando Innamorato) and Ariasto, (Orlando Furioso), relate to him and his heroic deeds.

RONCQ, A.D 1794.—In 1794 an engagement took place near Roncq in France, between the French and the Austrians, in which the latter were defeated.

RONDA, A.D. 1485.—Ronda, an ancient city of Spain, was the capital of the Moorish chief Aboo-Melik, in the fourteenth century. It remained in the possession of the Moors until 1485, when Ferdinand, King of Spain, finally took it by an attack so sudden and unexpected, that the Moors made but little resistance.

ROSSBACH, A.D. 1757. — Rossbach, in Prussian Saxony, is celebrated in modern history, for being the scene of the victory gained on the 5th of November, 1757, by Frederic the Great, over the French and imperialists. The Prussians lost but few men, while the allies suffered greatly.

ROUEN, A.D. 1204.—Rouen, a city of France, has been besieged several times. In the ninth century it was taken and pillaged by the Normans, who made it their capital. After the Norman conquest it became attached to the crown of England. In 1203, Prince Arthur of Brittany, was put to death by John, King of England, and in 1204 Philip Augustus, to avenge the death of Prince Arthur, laid siege to Rouen and took the city.

In 1417 it was retaken by the English, who finally lost it in 1449, eighteen years after they had disgraced themselves by their inhuman sacrifice of Joan of Arc.

SAALFELD, A.D. 1806.—Saalfeld, a town of central Germany, is memorable for the battle fought in its vicinity on the 10th of October, 1806, between the republican army of France, and the Prussians.

The republican army was commanded by Lannes and Augereau, and numbered some 25,000 men. The Prussian forces, with Prince Louis Frederic at their head, consisted of only eleven battalions, eighteen squadrons of hussars, and eighteen pieces of cannon. Not expecting any attack from the enemy, he had neglected to concentrate his troops, and now was obliged to contend with a far superior force. Lannes had disposed his army on the heights near Saalfeld, and had raised their enthusiasm to the highest degree by reading to them a proclamation from Napoleon. Prince Louis was stationed at Rudolstadt, to cover the cross march of Prince Hohenlohe, who was striving to reach the point of rendezvous assigned him by his commander-in-chief. Notwithstanding every thing seemed to conspire against the prince, he resolved to hold firm during the day, in order to gain time for the evacuation of the magazines which were collected close in his rear at Saalfeld. The increasing numbers of the French army around him—the turning of his right flank by Suchet, with a powerful body of light troops, which rendered his position no longer tenable, did not drive him from the ground; and when the attack commenced, the Prussians were entirely surrounded. Yet they made a gallant resistance, and thus enabled the artillery and chariots to leave Saalfeld in safety. When Prince Louis returned from the town, he found his soldiers still on the ground, but fast dropping off, by the murderous fire of the French. The ravages of the enemy soon converted their retreat into a rout, and the prince himself, while fighting bravely with the rear guard, and trying to restore order, was surrounded by the hussars, who not knowing his rank, ordered him to surrender, or he would be a dead man. The answer was a blow from his saber, which merely wounded his adversary, who in an instant, inflicted a blow which laid the prince dead at his feet. In this encounter the Prussians lost 1,200 prisoners, besides 800 killed and wounded, and thirty pieces of cannon.

SACILE, A.D. 1809.—Sacile, in Austrian Italy, was, on the 16th of April, 1809, the scene of a battle between the Austrians under the Archduke John, and the French under Prince Eugene Beauharnais, in which, after a desperate struggle, the latter were defeated.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, A.D. 1813.—This town is in Jefferson county, New York, and is situated on the shore of Black river bay, about eight miles east from Lake Ontario. It has one of the finest harbors on the lake; which is divided by a tongue of land extending from the lower part of the village into an outer and inner harbor.

During the war of 1812, Sackett's Harbor was the principal naval establishment of the Americans on Lake Ontario. Yet by the greatest negligence this important place was protected by a garrison of only about 500 men. These troops consisted of 250 dragoons, under Lieutenant-Colonel Backus; Lieutenant Fanning's artillery, 200 invalid soldiers, and a few seamen. In the middle of May, the British made preparations to assail Sackett's Harbor by water and land. The British squadron under Sir James Yeo, having 1,000 land troops under the command of Sir James Prevost, set sail from Kingston, and appeared off Sackett's Harbor on the 28th of May. The place was thrown into a state of intense excitement. Alarm-guns were fired, and the militia from the adjoining country was called in. General Brown assumed the command of the whole American force, which with the militia, amounted to nearly 1,000 effective men. A breastwork was hastily constructed on the only spot where the enemy could effect a landing, and the militia were posted behind it. The regulars were stationed in a line near the barracks, and public buildings; Lieutenant Chauncey with his men defended the stores at Navy Point, and Fanning with the artillery occupied the fortress. At daybreak on the 29th, the British troops embarked in boats, and advanced rapidly toward the shore. Brown ordered the militia to reserve their fire till the boats were within pistol shot. The silence was unbroken, save by the monotonous sound of the oars, as the British boats advanced. They arrived within a proper distance, and the Americans poured forth a volley of musketry upon them, which checked their advance. The British returned the fire from their boats; the American militia were seized with a panic, and broke and fled in disorder. General Brown succeeded in rallying about ninety of the fugitives, and posted them on a line with the regulars. And this line, only 600 strong, was about to contend with a force of 1,000 of the most experienced troops of England. The British having landed, advanced in good order toward the enemy. A warm conflict ensued. The Americans gradually gave way before the superior force of the enemy, contesting every inch of soil. At length, they threw themselves into the barracks, and protected by its walls, poured forth an incessant and destructive fire upon the assailants. The British replied with equal vigor, and seemed on the point of a victory, when Brown succeeded in rallying the fugitive militia, and led them by a circuitous route along the edge of the forest, as if intending to seize the boats and cut of the retreat of the British. This stratagem produced the desired effect; and the assailants rushed for their boats, leaving their dead and wounded behind. The fugitives regained their vessels, and the whole fleet withdrew to the Canadian shore. In this engagement the Americans lost about 100 in killed and wounded. Among the slain was Lieut. Col. Backus, and Lieutenant Fanning was severely wounded. The British lost about 450 men, killed and wounded.

SAGAN, A.D. 1759.—In the year 1759, a battle was fought at Sagan, a town of Prussia, between the Prussians and the Russians, in which the former were defeated with a considerable loss.

SAGUNTUM, B.C. 219. — Murviedro, a fortified city of Spain, occupies the site of the ancient city of Saguntum. The siege of Saguntum by Hannibal was a direct infringement of the treaty made between the Romans and Carthaginians, which stipulated that the Carthaginians in their operations in Spain, should not pass the river Iberus, nor molest the city of Saguntum. The siege of Saguntum was the origin of the Second Punic War. Hannibal had been reared by his father Hamilcar in the hatred of the Romans, and he had already formed a design for the invasion of Italy, in the hope of overthrowing the mighty rival of Carthage; and that he might not leave to the Romans a place of arms, and a powerful ally in Spain, after he had left that country, determined to occupy or destroy Saguntum.

The Saguntines had sent a deputation to Rome, asking aid against the Carthaginians; and the Romans paid no further regard to the representatives, than to send deputies into Spain with orders to observe the posture of affairs, and to inform the Carthaginian general, of the terms of the treaty. The answer which was given to these commissioners gave sufficient evidence of an approaching war; and it appears that, before the Roman commissioners could have made their report, the siege of Saguntum had actually been commenced by Hannibal.

The Carthaginian general was anxious to reduce Saguntum before any succors could arrive from Italy, or before any force could be collected against him, so as to fix the theater of the war in Spain. He pressed the siege, therefore, with great impetuosity, exposing his person in every assault, and exciting by his own example, with the pickaxe and spade, the parties at work in making his approaches. Though abundantly cautious not to expose himself on slight occasions, or from a mere ostentation of courage, yet in this siege, which was the foundation of his hopes, and the necessary prelude to the further progress of his enterprise, he declined no fatigues, and shunned no danger. The valor of the besieged, however, who exerted their every efforts to prolong the siege, in hopes of relief from Rome, detained the besiegers about eight months before Saguntum; and was at last deprived of great part of its spoils by the desperate resolution of the citizens, who chose rather to perish, with all their effects, rather than fall into the enemy's hands. The booty, however, which he saved from this wreck, enabled him by his liberalities, to gain the affection of his army, and to provide for the execution of his design against Italy.

War was now declared between Rome and Carthage, and Hannibal having made his dispositions for the safety of Africa and Spain, prepared for the execution of his favorite scheme, the invasion of Italy. He was in his twenty-eighth year when he entered upon this arduous and dangerous undertaking; an undertaking which, with the conduct of it, has raised his reputation for enterprise and ability to an equal, if not a higher pitch, than that of any other military leader. The Romans, a few years before, had raised an army of nearly 800,000 men, experienced soldiers, who were ready to assemble in any numbers, for any service; the march from Spain into Italy lay across tremendous mountains, and through the territories of fierce and barbarous nations; and in all things his path was beset with impediments such as few generals have surmounted.

He collected for this expedition 90,000 foot, and 12,000 horse. In his march to the Iberus, he met with no interruption. Thence to the Pyrenees, being opposed by the natives, he forced his way through their country; but being apprehensive of some inconvenience from such an enemy in his rear, he stationed Hanno, his brother, with 10,000 horse, and 1,000 foot, to observe their motions and keep them in awe, and this added to the desertion of some of his allies, and losses in combats with the barbarians, reduced his force to 50,000 foot and 9,000 horse, with thirty-seven elephants.

This celebrated march took place 219 years before Christ: in the year of Rome, 534, and in the consulate of Publius Cornelius Scipio, and Tiberius Sempronius Longus. The Romans, as usual on such occasions, raised two consular armies, and proposed, by immediate armaments directed to Spain and Africa, to fix the scene of war in the enemy's country.

Sempronius assembled an army and a fleet in the ports of Sicily, and had orders to pass into Africa. Scipio embarked with some legions for Spain, and, touching on the coast of Gaul, first learned that a Carthaginian army was marching by land into Italy. This intelligence determined him to land his troops at Marseilles, and to send out a detachment of horse to observe the country, and to procure further and more particular information of the enemy.

Hannibal had arrived on the Rhone at some distance above its separation into two channels, and about four days' march from the sea. In order to effect the passage of the river, he instantly collected all the boats that could be found on its extensive navigation. At the same time, the natives assembled in great numbers to dispute his passage. This caused a delay in crossing the river, but finally he succeeded in passing a body of troops to the opposite side, further up the river, who got in the rear of the Gaulish forces. The Gauls, attacked in front by Hannibal, and in the rear by the Carthaginian detachment, gave way without resistance, and were speedily routed. Hannibal, having thus lodged himself on the eastern banks of the Rhone, in a few days, without further interruption, passed the river with his elephants, baggage, and the remainder of his army.

Shortly afterward, Hannibal received information that a Roman army had arrived on the coast, and was disembarked at Marseilles. To gain further and more certain information of this enemy, he, nearly at the same time that Scipio had sent a detachment with the same intention, directed a party of horse to scour the country. These parties encountered each other, and after a smart engagement, returned to their respective armies, with certain accounts of the vicinity of an enemy.

Scipio hastened his march, anxious to fix the scene of the war in Gaul; and Hannibal, equally intent on removing, it if possible, into Italy, advanced with the utmost dispatch. In order to keep clear of the enemy, Hannibal directed his march at a distance from the sea-coast, and took his march along the bank of the Rhone. After marching four days from the place where he had passed the river, he came to its confluence with another which was probably the Isere. Here he found two brothers contending for the throne of their father, and gained a useful ally by espousing the cause of the elder. Being, in return for this service, supplied with arms, shoes, and other necessaries, and attended by the prince himself, who, with a numerous body, covered his rear, he continued his march during ten days, probably on the Isere; and about a hundred miles above the place where he had crossed the Rhone, began to make his way over the summit of the Alps, a labor which consumed fifteen days.

Harassed by the natives, who had occupied every post which could obstruct his march, and who assailed him from the heights, endeavoring to overwhelm his men in the gorges of the mountains, or to force them over the precipices, Hannibal gradually forced his way up toward the summit, tunneling such precipices as could not be surmounted, and hewing a path for his army with its train of elephants, with a perseverance and skill which has cast a halo of renown around his name.

Near to the summit of the ridge, at which he finally arrived by a continual ascent of many days, he had his way to form on the sides of frozen mountains, and through masses of perennial ice, which were covered with snow. Many of his men and horses, coming from a warm climate, perished by the cold, and his army, having struggled during so long a time with extremes, to which it was little accustomed, was reduced, when he descended the Pyrenees, to 20,000 foot and 6,000 horse.

The Roman consul, meanwhile, had, in search of his enemy, directed his march to the Rhone. Arriving at the point where Hannibal had crossed that river, he became satisfied that any further attempt to pursue him in this direction would only carry himself away from what was to be the scene of the war, and from the ground he must occupy in the defense of Italy. He, therefore, without loss of time, returned to his ships, sent his brother Cneius Scipio into Spain, with a greater part of the army, and he himself set sail for Pisa, where he landed, and put himself at the head of the legions which he found in that quarter. With these forces he passed the Po, and arrived at the Ticinus, when Hannibal came down into the plain country, at some distance below Turin.

We have thus given, under the head of the siege with which the third Punic war commenced, a brief description of the most arduous march ever undertaken by a military commander. The battles of the Trebia, Thrasymenus, and finally the memorable conflict of Nero and Asdrubal followed; and Hannibal, after successfully contending with almost insurmountable difficulties, and having kept his footing in Italy for more than fifteen years, was finally recalled to Africa, where his brilliant career was closed in his unfortunate battle with the army of Scipio at Zama.

Murviedro, the ancient Saguntum, is a fortress built upon the summit of a steep and rocky hill, at the bottom of which stands the modern town of Murviedro. The waters of the Mediterranean, in the days of Hannibal, approached to within a mile of its eastern walls; but at present they are five miles distant, a proof how much the sea has retired along that coast in the interval. Many remains of its former grandeur are still to be found by the curious antiquary, although its greatness has so much declined that the modern city contains but 6,000 inhabitants, and occupies only a corner of the ample circuit of the ancient walls. The modern fortress, which bears the name of San Fernando de Saguntum, stands on the summit of a mountain, round the base of which the ancient city was clustered, and consisted, when it was besieged by the French in 1811, of two redoubts, armed with seventeen pieces of cannon. The fortress was occupied by a Spanish garrison of 3,000 men. On the 28th of September, 1811, the French troops under Marshal Suchet took possession of the town of Murviedro, without resistance, and immediately invested the fortress. The French engineers, by means of their telescopes, discovered two old breaches in the walls, which were as yet only barricaded with wood, though the Spanish governor, Adrian, was endeavoring to erect a curtain of masonry behind them. Before this could be completed however, the French made a sudden assault; but they were received with such a spirited resistance that they were obliged to retire. Suchet now saw the necessity of making approaches in form. To do this it was necessary to reduce the little fort of Oropesa, which commanded in a narnow defile, the road by which alone artillery could be brought up from the great French arsenal at Tortosa. It was attacked, accordingly, and taken on the 11th of October by a Neapolitan division.

Suchet, meanwhile, marched against and defeated a considerable body of guerillas under Don Carlos O'Donnell, which had assembled in his rear; and, having brought up the heavy stores and cannon from Tortosa, the siege of Saguntum was renewed with vigor. A practicable breach having been made in the walls, a second assault was made on the 18th of October. But the French were again repulsed.

General Blake, commander of the Spanish forces in Valencia, was determined to save Saguntum, if possible. He accordingly made preparations for battle, and with an army of 22,000 foot, 2,500 horse, and thirty-six guns, set out from the city of Valencia on the evening of the 24th of October, and marched directly for the French position, under the walls of Saguntum. Suchet, on receiving intelligence of this movement, resolved to march out to meet the enemy before he arrived at the ground where he designed to give battle. With this intention the French general withdrew from the siege about 10,000 men, with thirty guns, and took up a position in a pass about three miles broad, which extends from the heights of Vale de Jesus, and Sancti Spiritus, to the sea, and through which the Spaniards were obliged to pass in approaching Saguntum from Valencia.

At eight o'clock on the following morning, General Blake attacked the French army at all points. The French, confident of victory, received the enemy with cool valor; and finally, after a brief struggle, the Spaniards were utterly defeated. General Blake seeing the day lost, returned toward Valencia; and Suchet, after assuring himself of his victory, returned to Saguntum. On the same day of the battle, the garrison of Saguntum capitulated. They had lost in the siege 500 men. This important victory gave the French general a firm footing in the kingdom of Valencia. He was master of an intrenched camp, with a fortified town inclosed within its limits, and the sea and harbor gave him unlimited means of obtaining reinforcements and supplies.

In the battle of Saguntum the army of General Blake lost 3,500 men killed, wounded, and taken prisoners. Suchet lost nearly 1,000 men. The siege of Saguntum was speedily followed by the siege and fall of the city of Valencia, and the complete subjugation, by the French, of the whole province.

ST. ALBANS, A.D. 1455.—The first battle of St. Albans, in England, was fought between the Yorkists, under the Duke of York, and the Lancasterians, under King Henry VI., on the 22d of May, 1455; and resulted in the defeat of the latter with the loss of about eighty men. Henry was wounded in the neck, the Duke of Buckingham in the face, the Earl of Stafford in the arm—all of them with arrows. The battle seems to have been won by the archers of the Yorkists. The Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, were slain, and as soon as they fell, their men threw down their arms and fled. Henry VI. was made prisoner.

The second battle of St. Albans was fought on the 17th of February, 1461, between the Yorkists, under the Earl of Warwick, and the Lancasterians, under Queen Margaret. The Yorkists were totally defeated with great loss. There fell on both sides, in this battle, about 2,000 men. By this victory the Lancasterians released Henry VI. from the hands of the Yorkists, the latter being obliged to abandon their royal prisoner in their flight.

ST. DIZIER. — St. Dizier, a town of France, on the Marne, was in the year 1544 besieged by the Emperor Charles V., of France; and on the 27th of June, 1814, a battle was fought near this place between the French army and the allies, in which the latter were signally defeated.

SAINT-FLORENT, A.D. 1793. — Saint-Florent, a fortified sea-port town of Corsica, was besieged in 1793 by the British. The French garrison made a long and obstinate resistance; but, after a long and arduous siege, it was finally taken by the besiegers.

SAINT JACOB, A.D. 1444.—A civil war desolated Switzerland in the year 1444; the tie which held the Helvetian republic together seemed about to be broken; Zurich saw at the feet of her walls the troops of seven cantons. Suddenly an immense army of foreigners, commanded by the Dauphin of France, afterward Louis XI., made its appearance on the frontiers of the country, and besieged the city of Basle. Menaced by these troops, greedy for blood and carnage, the citizens, in haste, informed the nearest troops of the confederacy of it, and demanded prompt assistance, and recalled within its walls 150 volunteers from Waldenbourg and Liestal, which Seevogel had conducted to the siege of Farnsbourg. From 4,000 Swiss who were besieging that castle, defended by a numerous nobility, 1,200 were detached under the command of officers from every canton, who received an order to drive back the French army and enter Basle. They were of the bravest of the little army which encompassed Farnsbourg. Though by no means ignorant of the peril that awaited them, they marched with the same buoyancy as if going to certain triumph. On the way, they met two monks of Neuchatel, who endeavored to represent to them the folly of so small a company pretending to oppose such an immense army as that of the Dauphin's: but one of the knights of the party, who by his grave and noble carriage appeared to have authority, responded: "If it must be so, and if we are unable to force a passage through their ranks, we will give our souls to God and our bodies to the enemy." After this energetic response, the two monks continued their route so much the more grieved to leave this joyous and lively band (as they called it), to run to their death, as they perceived among them 50 of their fellow-citizens of Neuchatel, under command of the knight, Albert de Fessot. These brave soldiers had not forgotten that one of the articles of the Convention of Sempach bore this clause—"that every Swiss shall sacrifice, if necessary, his life to his country," and that the chiefs had but lately renewed that obligation at Zug, in the name of all. At break of day, near the village of Prattelen, this little troop, already fatigued by a rapid march of three hours, met the Count of Dammartin with 8,000 horse. Neither that chief nor his brave officers could prevent his troops from abandoning the field of battle; they retreated toward Muttenz upon another body of 10,000 men. Then commenced a second battle, longer and more obstinate than the first, but much more glorious for the Swiss, whose strength and courage seemed to increase with the danger, and who attacked the enemy without waiting for the orders of their chiefs, or for a moment's repose. Disconcerted by this intrepidity, the French, who were broken at every point where they resisted, and forced to recross the river Birs, thought themselves only safe when in their own camp and under the eyes of the Dauphin, who could scarcely believe that his men had fled, much less that the number of the victors was so small. Here, content with his first efforts, would the soldier halt who battled for a tyrant; but the Swiss who fights for his country, his home, and his laws, thinks that the justness of his cause insures to him the event, and looks forward either to a complete victory or a glorious death. In vain did the chiefs of these warriors endeavor to stop them on the banks of the river; in vain did a messenger from Basle represent to them that an entrance into the city was impossible; their fiery courage brooked neither order nor counsel; though they had left 200 of their companions, dead or dying on the field of battle, and not fearing 40,000 of the enemy who awaited their approach on the opposite side of the river, they compelled their officers to place themselves at their head, and marched toward the bridge of Saint Jacob, which was defended by a battery and 8,000 men. Neither this corps, although continually reinforced by fresh troops, nor the artillery which thundered upon them, and against which they could oppose only their bodies and their pikes, compelled them to flight. With the hope, however, of obtaining a more ready passage, they threw themselves into the Birs, forded it with a rapidity irresistible, and covered with wounds, weakened by hunger and fatigue, and drenched with water, reached the opposite shore, which soon became the scene of their exploits. The Dauphin, accustomed to conquer, could scarce credit what he saw—a handful of men attacking an army with the same ardor as if they were equally matched. He caused them to be attacked upon all sides, and charged them himself at the head of a column, and, after having seen some of his bravest officers fall at his side, he succeeded in dividing the Swiss into two bodies Five hundred of these brave heroes, carrying all before them, and gaining the side of Basle, threw themselves into the hospital of Saint Jaques, whose high walls seemed to promise a longer and more useful defense. The other half found themselves inclosed in a little island in the Birs: there, pierced with arrows, bruised by stones thrown upon them from the bridge, and thundered against by the artillery, they dearly sold their lives. Accustomed to fight hand to hand, and being without the necessary arms to resist an enemy who attacked them from a distance, some snatched the bows from the expiring Frenchmen, and threw them to their companions; while others drew the reeking arrows from their wounds, and hurled them back to the enemy; or, battle-axe in hand, contended for the bodies of their slaughtered brethren, took them upon their shoulders, and carried them in triumph into the middle of the island, as if they would not separate, dead or alive. So long as the standard-bearers held aloft their colors, the combat continued with desperate fury; but when these could no more be seen, having fallen with those who carried them, then they felt their wounds, and falling, covered their bodies with their cherished flags. The intrepid Kichmatter alone escaped; he was found, two days after the battle, under a heap of his enemies, and pierced by seven wounds; he, however, lived and returned to his canton, of which he was for a long time after the chief magistrate. So, in the fields of Sicily, perished formerly 400 Romans, who devoted themselves to death in order to save the legions hemmed in by the Carthaginians, thus purchasing with their lives a perpetual honor; in like manner, Cxcidus, who commanded them, alone remained of all his companions, and showed by his glorious wounds the danger he had encountered, and the valor he had displayed.

Having vanquished this half, the Dauphin ordered all his forces to attack the 500 confederates who were in the hospital of Saint Jaques; the artillery was brought, and the walls overthrown; lighted torches were thrown upon the roof, and the Swiss soon found themselves surrounded by flames; from the walls of Basle, the citizens saw the perils and the exploits of their friends; 3,000 of them made an attempt to succor them, but meeting with a corps of 8,000 French, they prudently retired within the walls, thus leaving the Swiss exposed to an inevitable death. The small number of those who escaped the fire and falling walls, reassembled in the breach, and, at the moment when the sun shed his last ray over the scene of carnage, they fell upon the heaped bodies of the enemy, much less vanquished than fatigued with vanquishing.

From Prattelen to St. Jacob, 1,200 Swiss and 9,000 French covered, with their corpses, the plains of the ancient Rawaques.

Twelve men, who had been separated from their companions at the commencement of the battle, and who, notwithstanding their utmost efforts to rejoin their standard, returned to their country, but were treated as cowards, and dishonored as such, for having shamefully survived their comrades, and were scarce able to escape the punishment decreed by the fundamental laws of the country for all those who fled before their enemies, abandoned their post, or deserted their flag. The battle was fought on the 16th of August, 1444.

ST. SEBASTIAN, A.D. 1813.—St. Sebastian in Spain has been besieged several times. It was taken by the French in 1719, and 1794 and 1808, and was held by them until the memorable siege of the city by the English in 1813.

On the retreat of the French army after its defeat at Vittoria, Marshal Jourdan threw a garrison into St. Sebastian of between three and four thousand men, and the place was immediately afterward invested by the Spaniards. In the beginning of July, the fifth division of the army, with two Portuguese brigades, making a force of from 9,000 to 10,000 men, arrived before it from the siege, which was intrusted to Lieutenant-General Sir Thomas Graham.

A proportion of artillery, consisting of twenty-four pounders, with 1,500 rounds of ammunition per gun, six eight-inch howitzers, with 1,000, and four ten-inch mortars, with 500 rounds, and four sixty-eight pounders, with a proportion of shells, were in ships at Los Passages; and with the army there were six eighteen-pounders: this quantity of artillery was deemed adequate to the attack of the place.

The town of St. Sebastian is built on a peninsula running nearly east and west; the northern side being washed by the river Urumea, the southern by the sea. The front defenses, which cross the isthmus toward the land, are a double line of works, with the usual counterscarp, covered way, and glacis; but the works running lengthwise of the peninsula are only a single line, and trusting to the water in their front to render them inaccessible, they are built without any cover; and the northern line is quite exposed, from the top to the bottom, to a range of hills on the right bank of the river, at a distance of six or seven hundred yards from it. These walls being uncovered, appears an unaccountable oversight, as the Urumea, for some hours before and after low water, is fordable, and the tide recedes so much, that for some period there is a considerable dry space along the left bank of the river, by which troops can march to the foot of the wall.

Marshal Berwick, when he attacked St. Sebastian in 1719, aware of this circumstance, threw up batteries on those hills to break the town wall, and, while that was being effected, he pushed on approaches along the isthmus, and established himself on the covered way of the land front: as is but too frequently the case, as soon as the breach was practicable, the governor capitulated for the town, and the duke obliged him and the garrison to retire into the castle. It was now proposed to follow the same mode of attack, and as a preliminary, the garrison were to be driven from a post they occupied about seven or eight hundred yards in advance of the town, formed by the convent of St. Bartholomeo and a redoubt then in progress; and from a small circular work, which they made with casks on the causeway, four eighteen-pounders and two howitzers were put in battery for that purpose.

The operations against the town were commenced by the erection of batteries on the hills to the north of the Urumea, for twenty twenty-four-pounders, four eight-inch howitzers, four ten-inch mortars, and four sixty-eight pounder carronades; the guns to breach the sea-wall between the two towers, the carronades to be used with shells only, and the mortars to be directed against the land front and castle.

On the 14th of July, the first two batteries opened on the convent of St. Bartholomeo.

15th of July.—A false attack was made on the convent of St Bartholomeo, to ascertain if the enemy intended obstinately to defend it, which the troops, carrying further than was ordered, they were obliged to retire with some loss.

17th of July.—The end of the convent having been entirely beaten down, the 9th regiment and a Portuguese brigade assaulted and carried it with little difficulty.

Two more batteries for the eighteen-pounders and the two howitzers were thrown up in the night, in a situation to enfilade and take in reverse the defenses of the town.

On the night of the 18th of July the suburbs of St. Martin, which the enemy had burned, were occupied: they, however, continued to hold the circular redoubt.

Night between the 19th and 20th of July.—Approaches were struck out to the right and left of St. Martin.

On the 20th of July all the batteries opened.

In the night between the 20th and 21st of July, early in the evening, the enemy abandoned the circular redoubt: a working party of seven hundred men had been prepared to open a parallel across the isthmus, but the night proving extremely dark, tempestuous, and rainy, the men dispersed among the ruined buildings of St. Martin, and not more than two hundred could be collected together; therefore only about one third of the parallel and the right approach to it were opened.

On the 21st of July, Sir Thomas Graham sent a flag of truce with a summons to the governor, but he would not receive it.

In the night between the 21st and 22d of July, the left communication and the remainder of the parallel across the isthmus were opened; the parallel near its left crossed a drain level with the ground, four feet high and three feet wide, through which ran a pipe to convey water into the town. Lieutenant Reid ventured to explore it, and at the end of 230 yards, he found it closed by a door in the counterscarp, opposite to the face of the right demi-bastion of the hornwork; as the ditch was narrow, it was thought that by forming a mine in this extremity of the drain, the explosion would throw earth sufficient against the escarpe, only twenty-four feet high, to form a road over it; eight feet at the end of the aqueduct was therefore stopped with filled sand-bags, and thirty barrels of powder, of ninety pounds each, were lodged against it, and a saucissan led to the mouth of the drain.

On the 23d of July the breach between the two towers, about 100 feet in length, being considered practicable, the fire of all the guns was concentrated on a part of the wall to its left to effect a second breach and by evening, that also was considered practicable on a front of thirty feet. At the same time, the four ten-inch mortars and the sixty-eight-pounder carronades were turned on the defenses and on the houses in rear of the breach, to prevent the enemy working to form an obstacle to them.

The breaches were to have been stormed at daylight on the 24th, at which time the tide was out, and the troops were formed in readiness; but the houses at the back of the breach being on fire, it was supposed they would prevent the advance of the troops when they had gained the summit, and in consequence the order was countermanded.

The next night a trench was opened in advance of the parallel, to contain a firing party on the hornwork, during the assault.

The assault was ordered to take place at daylight on the 25th; the storming party, about 2,000 men, were to assemble in the trenches, and the explosion of the mine was to be the signal to advance.

The distance of the uncovered approach, from the trenches to the breach, was about 300 yards, in face of an extensive front of works, over very difficult ground, consisting of rocks covered with sea-weed, and intermediate pools of water; the fire of the place was yet entire, and the breach was flanked by two towers, which, though considerably injured, were still occupied.

At five A.M. the mine was sprung, and destroyed a considerable length of the counterscarp and glacis, and created so much astonishment in the enemy posted on the works near to it, that they abandoned them for the moment, and the advance of the storming party reached the breach before any great fire was brought to bear on them: on their attempting to ascend the breach, the enemy opened so heavy a fire, and threw down such a number of shells, etc., from the towers on the flanks, and from the summit of the breaches, that the men began to waver, and in a short time the assaulting party had returned into the trenches, with the loss of nearly 100 killed, and 400 wounded.

The advanced guard, with Lieutenant Jones, who led them, were made prisoners on the breach; of the other engineers, Captain Lewis was severely wounded, and Lieutenant Machell was killed. Lieutenant-Colonel Sir R. Fletcher was wounded at the same time in the trenches.

This assault does not appear to have failed from want of exertion, but from the fire of the place being left entire, and from the great distance at which the covered approaches were from the breach; the troops were stated in the Gazette to have done their duty, but that it was beyond the power of gallantry to overcome the difficulties opposed to them.

On this failure being reported to Lord Wellington, he came over from Lesaca, and decided upon renewing the same mode of attack, but on a much more extended scale, as soon as sufficient guns and ammunition should arrive from England; the augmentation to the attack was to extend the breach on the left to the salient angle of the demi-bastion of the main front, and from batteries to be established on the left of the attack, to continue it round the whole of its face, and to the end of the high curtain above it.

On the 27th of July, at seven A.M., the enemy made a sortie, to feel the guard of the trenches; they surprised it, and entering the parallel at the left, swept it to the right, carrying into the place 200 prisoners. In consequence of this loss, the guard was concentrated in a small portion of the left of the parallel, and the right of the trenches was only occasionally patrolled.

On the 28th of July, Marshal Soult attacked Lord Wellington, in the hope of relieving Pampeluna, and the result of the action not being known to Sir Thomas Graham, he, on the 29th, embarked all the artillery and stores at Los Passages, and sent the transports to sea; the siege was therefore converted into a blockade, the guard continuing to hold the trenches.

August 3d, the enemy surprised a patrol in the parallel, and made it prisoners.

On the 6th, the guns and stores were relanded at Los Passages, and on the 18th the additional artillery and ammunition arrived from England.

On the 24th, the entire of the trenches was again occupied, and the siege re-commenced.

On the left, two additional batteries for thirteen guns, to breach the face of the left demi-bastion and the curtain above it, at 700 yards' distance, were commenced, and on the right, cover was begun for seven additional howitzers, four sixty-eight-pounder carronades, twenty-one twenty-four-pounders, and sixteen mortars, being forty-eight pieces of ordnance, in addition to the thirty-two put in battery for the previous operation.

At midnight the enemy made a sortie, entered the advanced part of the trenches, and carried confusion into the parallel; in attempting, however, to sweep along its right, they were checked by a part of the guard of the trenches, and obliged to retire, carrying off with them about twelve prisoners.

At eight A.M. of the 26th of August, the batteries opened. On the isthmus, the thirteen guns were directed to breach the left demi-bastion of the main front, and the end of the curtain in continuation of the old breach, and the face of the left demi-bastion of the hornwork, which were all seen in a line, one above the other.

The fire of the batteries on the right was directed to breach the two towers, one on each flank of the old breach, and to continue that breach to the salient angle of the demi-bastion, and to breach the end of the curtain above it.

Two shafts were sunk to form galleries, to prevent the enemy mining under the advanced part of the trenches. In the night between the 26th and the 27th, the two last-erected batteries being at a long distance to breach, and not seeing the foot of the escarpes, cover was made for four of the guns in a preferable situation.

A party of 200 men was landed this night on the high rocky island of Santa Clara, and made prisoners of the enemy's guard on it, consisting of an officer and twenty-four men.

In the night between the 27th and 28th of August, the enemy made a sortie; but, profiting by past experience, such precautions had been taken of posting sentinels, etc., and the men were so prepared to stand to their arms, that they were immediately repulsed, without effecting the slightest mischief.

On the 29th of August a battery opened on the face of the demi-bastion of the main front; the eighteen-pounders and the howitzers were turned on the enemy's batteries, and several mortars and the carronades at the right attack were directed to the same object, and in the course of the day the enemy's fire was nearly subdued. It was afterward ascertained that they lost many men, particularly by the spherical case-shot, which they endeavored to imitate, by firing common shells filled with small balls, and bursting them over the heads of the troops, but without any effect.

The breaches appearing good and practicable on the 30th, it was deemed time to prepare the necessary debouches for the troops: at the advanced sap on the right, to break through the sea-wall, which was of masonry, four feet thick, and ten feet above the level of high water, three shafts were commenced, the first close at the back of the wall, the second twenty-five feet from the wall, and the third forty feet from the second: they were sunk eight feet below the surface of the ground, and a small return made to contain the powder; they were then each loaded with five hundred and forty pounds of powder.

At two A.M. the next morning, the three mines were sprung, and blew the wall completely down. The diameters of the entonnoirs were about thirty feet; they were immediately connected, and by ten A.M. formed a good passage out for troops, and accomplished the original object of securing all the works in their rear from the effect of any galleries the enemy might have run out to form mines in that direction. At the time of low water, about eleven A.M., the columns for the assault moved out of the trenches by the openings in front of the battery, and in a few minutes after the advance of the forlorn hope, the enemy exploded two mines, which blew down part of the sea-line wall; but as the troops were not in very close order, nor very near the wall, their loss was not great.

From the Mirador and Battery del Principe, on the castle, a fire of grape and shells was opened on the column, and continued during the time they were disputing the breach. The main curtain, even to the end breached, was strongly occupied by grenadiers, and the left branch of the hornwork was well manned, and from thence a heavy fire was maintained on the breach, a great part of which was exposed to it; but the tower of Amozquita, on the left of the breach, fortunately for the besieged, was not manned.

Up the end of the curtain, the breach was accessible quite to the terreplein; but the enemy's situation there was commanding, and the ascent was much exposed to the fire of the hornwork.

At the back of the whole of the rest of the breach was a perpendicular fall, from fifteen to twenty-five feet in depth, under which were the ruins of the houses which joined on to the back of the breach; and here and there was left an end wall of the houses, by which alone it was possible to descend. A line of retrenchment carried along the nearest standing parallel walls, was strongly occupied by the enemy, and which entirely swept the confined summit of the breach.

The storming parties advanced to the breach, and there remained on the side of it without being able to crown the top, from the heavy fire from the intrenched ruins within. Many desperate efforts were made to gain it, without effect, particularly up to the curtain; but the enemy maintained that post firmly. Fresh troops were sent on successively, as fast as they could be filed out of the trenches, with laudable perseverance; and the Portuguese, in two detachments, forded the river Urumea, near its mouth, in a very handsome style, under a heavy fire of grape and musketry.

The breach was now covered with troops remaining in the same unfavorable situation, and unable to gain the summit. Upward of two hours of continued exertion had elapsed, when, by a happy chance, a quantity of combustibles exploded within the breach, and the French began to waver; the assailants made fresh efforts; the ravelin and left branch of the hornwork were abandoned by the enemy; the retrenchment within the breach was soon after deserted by them; and the men by degrees got over the ruins and gained the curtain.

The troops being now assembled in great numbers on the breach, pushed into the town; the garrison, dispirited at its great loss, and intimidated at the perseverance shown in sending fresh men, was quickly driven from all its intrenchments, except the convent of St. Teresa, into the castle.

From the superior height of the curtain, the artillery in the batteries on the right of the Urumea were able to keep up a fire on that part during the assault, without injury to the troops at the foot of the breach, and being extremely well served, it occasioned a severe loss to the enemy, and probably caused the explosion which led to the final success of the assault.

The assailants had upward of 500 killed, and 1,500 wounded; of the garrison, besides the actual killed and wounded during the assault, 700 were made prisoners in the town. Of the engineers, Lieutenant-Colonel Sir R. Fletcher, Captains Rhodes and Collyer, were killed; and Lieutenant-Colonel Burgoyne, and Lieutenants Barry and Marshall, were wounded.

As soon as the town was carried, a communication was made from the left of the parallel to the salient angle of the ditch of the ravelin, through the counterscarp, which was blown in, and so into the town by the great gate; and preparations were made to reduce the castle.

The plan for the attack was to erect batteries on the works of the town, and breach some of the main points of the castle defenses, as the battery de la Reyna, the Mirador, and the keep, as well as the thin loop-holed walls connecting them.

On the 2d of September, a new battery for seventeen guns was commenced, occupying the whole terreplein of the hornwork, and another for three guns on the left of the cask redoubt.

A discussion for surrender was entered into with General Rey, but he broke it off.

By the 4th of September, the town, which caught fire soon after the assault, from the quantity of ammunition and combustibles of all sorts scattered about, was nearly consumed, and the fire became a great impediment to carrying the approaches forward.

Up to the 7th, the enemy had fired but very little since the assault; and by this evening, the roofs of the unburned houses and steeples had been prepared for musketry, to open at the time of the assault on the castle.

On the 8th, at ten, A.M., all the batteries opened on the castle; viz.—from the left of the attack:—No. 7, with three twenty-four pounders, against the Mirador; No. 8, with three eighteen-pounders, against the lower defenses; No. 9, with seventeen twenty-four pounders, against the Mirador and battery de la Reyna; island, with two twenty-four pounders, and one eight-inch howitzer, to sweep the back of the castle. From the right of the attack, thirty-three pieces of ordnance against the castle generally. The fire was extremely powerful and well-directed, plowing up every part of the confined space of the castle. The enemy kept concealed chiefly in little narrow trenches, which they had made along the front of the heights, but they evidently lost many men. About twelve, a white flag was hoisted, and the garrison surrendered prisoners of war. Their numbers had been reduced to 80 officers, and 1,765 men; of whom, 23 officers, and 612 men were in the hospital.

The loss of the besiegers during the attack was,—53 officers, and 898 men killed; 150 officers, and 2,340 men wounded; 7 officers, and 332 men missing.—Robson.

The victory of the English was stained with the cruelty of their troops after gaining possession of the place, and before taking the citadel. "O wretched day! O cruel night!" exclaims a cotemporary historian. "The troops seemed to neglect the most ordinary precautions in a place recently taken, and with one part of it still in the enemy's hands, to give themselves up to the most unheard-of excesses. Pillage, assassination, and rape were pushed to an incredible pitch, and the fire which broke out early in the night, after the enemy had retired to the castle, put the finishing stroke to this scene of war. On all sides were heard cries of distress from women who were violated, without regard either to tender youth, respected family, or advanced years; women were outraged in the presence of their husbands, daughters dishonored in the presence of their parents. One girl was the victim of the brutality of a soldier on the corpse of her mother! Other crimes more horrible still, which our pen refuses to record, were committed in that awful night; and the disorder continued for some days after without any efficient steps being taken to arrest them. Of above 600 houses of which St. Sebastian consisted on the morning of the assault there remained at the end of three days only thirty-six.

ST. QUINTIN, A.D. 1557.—St. Quintin is situated on the river Somme, in France, twenty-four miles north-west of Laon. Upon the abdication of Charles V. the utmost anxiety was felt throughout Europe in regard to the character and ability of his successor, and the policy which was to distinguish his reign. Under the government of Charles Spain had reached the zenith of her glory, and the power transferred to the hands of his son exceeded that wielded by any of his cotemporaries. By means of his connection with Mary of England Philip was also able in a great measure to direct the foreign policy of her government, and thus, in his double capacity of King of Spain and queen's consort of England, he exerted a commanding influence in the affairs of Europe.

Immediately after his accession to the throne Philip was reluctantly drawn into a war with his spiritual father, Paul IV., who rashly attempted to subvert the Spanish power in Naples. Under the lead of the renowned Duke of Alva, the troops of Spain were victorious at almost every point, and the warlike pontiff was compelled to make peace, after the most stubborn resistance, which nearly proved the ruin of his subjects, and drove them to the verge of rebellion. Philip's conscientious scruples, however, prevented him from prosecuting this war with the energy and vigor necessary to insure a brilliant campaign, and, notwithstanding his success, by the treaty of peace he was placed in the position of the vanquished rather than the victor.

Wishing to distinguish the commencement of his reign by a display of that military genius for which his father was so renowned, Philip resolved to carry the war into France in order to punish Henry II., who had violated the treaty of peace by sending an army across the Alps to the assistance of the pope. He immediately assembled his forces in the Netherlands, with the utmost secrecy and dispatch, and sent his confidential minister, Ruy Gomez, to Spain, in order to procure additional troops and the necessary means. In the mean time Philip himself visited England for the purpose of inducing that country to join him in the war against her ancient enemy. He finally succeeded in persuading his fond wife, Queen Mary, to take this step in spite of the universal opposition to it which was expressed by her counsellors and the nation. By forced loans she was supplied with means to equip a fleet and raise an army of 8,000 men, which was placed under the command of the Earl of Pembroke. With this reinforcement the Spanish forces numbered 12,000 cavalry and about 45,000 infantry.

The command of this army was given to Emanuel Philibert, Duke of Savoy, a general of great ability and experience, who had already been intrusted with important commands, although at this time but twenty-nine years of age. Emanuel accepted the command with the utmost alacrity, as it afforded him an opportunity of increasing his already brilliant reputation, and also of regaining possession of his dominions in Italy, from which he had been expelled by Henry.

In the mean time Henry was apprised of Philip's movements, and made every preparation for defense. He gave the chief command of his forces to Montmorency, the Constable of France, and one of the ablest of his generals, but a man of a rash and impetuous temper. Large numbers of the chivalrous gentry of France flocked to his standard, eager to engage in the defense of their homes. With these, and the addition of thousands of German mercenaries, he speedily assembled an army, inferior to the enemy in numbers, but superior in the spirit and character of most of its troops.

By the plan of the campaign arranged by the Spanish cabinet, the duke was directed to lay siege to some of the most important towns in the north of Picardy. He first attacked Rocroy, but meeting with unexpected resistance here, and finding that the possession of the town would not repay him for the delay the siege must occasion, he resolved to raise the siege and attack St. Quintin.

In order to divert the attention of the enemy from the point of attack the duke made a feint of laying siege to the town of Guise. As soon as he had drawn the French army in that quarter he changed his route, and marching into Picardy, invested St. Quintin with his whole force. This was one of the few fortified towns between Paris and the frontier, and a place of considerable strength and importance. Not expecting an attack in this quarter, the French had made no preparations for defense. The fortifications were in a dilapidated condition, nearly all the garrison had been drawn off to repel the expected attack of the Spaniards in another direction, and the place left in charge of an officer of inferior rank.

Under these circumstances, the fortress must have soon capitulated had it not received assistance from the celebrated Admiral Coligni, one of the ablest generals and most illustrious persons of the age. Placing himself at the head of 1,200 men, he succeeded in forcing a passage through the besieging army, and entered the place with about 700 of his men, the rest having been cut off. Reanimated by the presence of so renowned a general, the garrison recovered their spirits, and prepared for a vigorous and protracted defense. All who were not actively engaged in the defense of the place were sent away, and those remaining were put on short allowance. The falling walls were repaired, sorties were made, and the Spaniards expelled from the houses of the suburbs, of which they had taken possession. The houses and groves in the neighborhood, which afforded shelter to the Spaniards, were destroyed, and every means which skill or experience could suggest were made use of for the protection of the place and the annoyance of the enemy. In order to raise the spirits of his troops, the admiral affected to despise the preparations of his foes, and talked boldly of defending himself against ten times their forces. The confidence he endeavored to inspire in others he was far from feeling himself, and after a thorough examination of the resources of the place, he sent word to Montmorency that he should not be able to hold out more than a few days without a reinforcement. Montmorency immediately sent 2,000 men to his assistance, under the command of Dandelot, a younger brother of the admiral, and who much resembled him in energy and courage. Either through ignorance or design, the guide of this party led them into the midst of the enemy, by whom they were vigorously attacked and nearly cut to pieces. Dandelot, with the few who remained, succeeded in escaping under cover of the night.*

By this disaster, the besieged were completely dishcartened, and the admiral was obliged to exert all his influence to prevent them from yielding to despair. Without a reinforcement they felt that it was useless to contend against a force so overwhelming, as their fortifications were nearly destroyed, and but few were left to repair the breaches and repel the assaults of the enemy. The town was completely invested on all sides but one, where there was a marsh of great extent through which flowed a branch of the river Somme. Having concerted a plan with the constable, Coligni threw up an embankment across this marsh, and collected the water in a canal large enough to float small boats.

On the 9th of August, 1557, the whole French army was in motion, and early in the morning of the 10th, the constable took up his position on the borders of the morass, in sight of the Spanish host, which was encamped on the opposite side, at the foot of the eminence upon which stood St. Quintin.

He immediately opened a brisk cannonade upon the enemy, from a battery stationed upon a rising ground, in such a position as to sweep the opposite bank. Under cover of these guns, he dispatched a portion of his force to cross a ford, which was partially hidden from the view of the Spaniards, by some intervening hills. Taken by surprise, the Spaniards were thrown into confusion, and compelled to fall back upon the cavalry, who were stationed some three miles down the river, under the command of Count Egmont.

Elated by this temporary success, the constable prepared to pass his troops across the river. After much difficulty and delay, four or five small boats were procured and heavily laden with soldiers, who were compelled to land on the opposite side in the face of a heavy fire, from a body of troops stationed so as to command the landing. The boats also stuck fast in the quagmire, and some of the soldiers were suffocated in the mud while attempting to release them. In the mean time, the Duke of Savoy took advantage of this delay in the movements of the French, and called a council of war, and decided to attack them. Egmont was dispatched immediately to cross a ford of the river, and fall on the rear of the French, while the main body of the Spanish army, under the duke, advanced to support him. Disregarding the advice of Prince de Condé, who had descried the movements of the Spaniards, Montmorency refused to retire until the entire reinforcement, under Dandelot, had crossed. Many of those who had crossed the lake were killed or disabled, others suffocated in the morass, and of the whole number only four or five hundred succeeded in reaching St. Quintin. As soon as the last boat had departed, orders were given for an immediate retreat. Notwithstanding the superiority of the force opposed to them, the French at first retired in good order, but when they saw Egmont charging upon them with his formidable body of cavalry, they were struck with consternation, and the constable in vain endeavored to rally them from the confusion into which they were thrown. At the call of their leader they did indeed rally to the charge, and for a moment compelled their assailants to give way, but they could not long continue the unequal struggle, and soon the best soldiers of France were fleeing like sheep before the wolves. A portion of the infantry formed into a solid phalanx, and continued to retreat in good order, in spite of the utmost efforts of the cavalry to break their ranks, until the Duke of Savoy came up with the remainder of his troops, and turned his heavy guns upon them. They were then compelled to fly in their turn, and the rout was complete. Between 3,000 and 4,000 Frenchmen were killed on the spot, among whom was the Duke D'Enghein, a prince of the blood, together with 600 gentlemen. Montmorency, being dangerously wounded, and faint from the loss of blood, was taken prisoner. Besides the constable, the Dukes of Montpensier and Langueville, the Marshal St. Andre, and many other officers of distinction, 300 gentlemen, and nearly 4,000 private soldiers were taken prisoners. All the colors belonging to the infantry, all the ammunition, and all the cannon, excepting two pieces, were taken. On the side of the victors not more than 80 men were killed.

This battle, no less fatal to France than the ancient victories of Crecy and Agincourt, gained by the English on the same frontiers, bore a near resemblance to those disastrous events in the suddenness of the rout; in the ill-conduct of the commander-in-chief; in the number of persons of note slain or taken, and in the small loss sustained by the enemy. It filled France with equal consternation. Many inhabitants of Paris, with the same precipitancy and trepidation as if the enemy had been already at their gates, quitted the city and retired into the interior provinces. The king, by his presence and exhortations, endeavored to console and animate such as remained, and applying himself with the greatest diligence to repair the various fortifications of the city, prepared to defend it against the attack which he instantly expected. But happily for France, Philip's caution, together with the intrepid firmness of the Admiral de Coligni, not only saved the capital from the danger to which it was exposed, but gained for the nation a short interval, during which the people recovered from their terror and dejection, occasioned by a blow no less severe than unexpected, and Henry had leisure to take measures for the public security, with the spirit which became the sovereign of a powerful and martial people.*

* Prescott's Robertson.

Had Philip followed up his victory with the spirit and energy displayed by his father on like occasions, the capital of France would have been at his disposal. Instead, however, of yielding to the advice of his officers, and penetrating instantly into France, he gave orders to continue the siege of St. Quintin; saying that it was necessary to become master of this place in order to secure the retreat of his army in case of defeat. Believing that this would delay them but a few days, the officers were reconciled to these orders; although elated with their victory, they were impatient for still more brilliant achievments. Their expectations were disappointed, however, by the spirit and heroism of the besieged Frenchmen, and the skill and intrepidity of their commander. Knowing that the safety of his country depended upon the protraction of the siege, Coligni resolved to hold the place so long as a man remained to defend it, and perish in its ruins, rather than yield it into the hands of his foes. Inspired with the generous devotion of their leader, the garrison were well-nigh invincible. In spite of the strength of their assailants and the skill and energy with which they conducted the siege; in spite of the state of their fortifications, which in many places were a mere heap of ruins; regardless of their own fatigue and starvation, they resisted every proposition to surrender. On the seventeenth day after the renewal of the siege, the town was assaulted in eleven different places at the same time. After a long and obstinate conflict, during which the Spaniards were frequently repulsed, the town was at length carried, and both the admiral and his brother taken prisoners on the breach. Philip allowed his soldiers to plunder, but commanded them to preserve the churches and the saintly relics which they contained.

SALAMANCA, A.D. 1812.—The city of Salamanca is situated on the rocky heights on the right bank of Tormes, in Spain, forty-five miles north-east of Ciudad Rodrigo. The battle of Salamanca was fought on the heights of Arapeiles, four miles south-east of the city.

The battle of Salamanca was one of the fiercest fought struggles of the Peninsular War, and took place after a series of maneuvers, marches, and military evolutions, rarely paralleled in the history of war for brilliancy on the part of both the French and English armies. The allied English, Portuguese and Spanish armies, under the Duke of Wellington, consisted of 45,000 men, and, on the 22d of July, 1812, occupied the ground on the left bank of the Tormes, extending from two bold rocky heights, called the Arapeiles, to the river Tormes, below the ford of Santa Martha. The French army was about equal to the English in numerical strength and was commanded by Marshal Marmont. The French general observing that the Duke of Wellington had neglected to occupy the two rocky heights of the Arapeiles on the British right, resolved to take possession of them, and at noon, unperceived by the enemy, gained the more distant height, and immediately crowned it with heavy artillery. Encouraged by this success the French endeavored to gain possession of the other eminence; but the British made a dash at it, and succeeded in gaining it before the French were able to carry their plans into effect.

The acquisition of the more distant Arapeiles by the French, caused Wellington to change the position of his army; hence what was lately the right became the left, while the now right was pushed as far as Aldea Tejada on the Ciudad Rodrigo road. The commissariat and baggage-wagons were also ordered to the rear. This movement was made as preparatory for a general retreat to Ciudad Rodrigo; but Marmont determined to cut off their retreat and force Wellington into a battle. He pushed Thorniere's division, covered by fifty guns, to the extreme left to menace the Ciudad Rodrigo road. Brennier and Maucunne followed; while the march of all the French divisions toward the center was hastened, in order, with the remainder of the army, comprising four divisions, to fall on the flank of the British as they passed the French Arapeiles.

Thorniere's division, followed by Brennier's, advanced so rapidly that both bodies became gradually separated from the center. When the Duke of Wellington received intelligence of this movement on the part of the enemy, he saw his advantage immediately. "My dear Alava," said he to the Spanish general Alava, "at last I have them, Marmont is lost." His resolution was immediately formed, and his orders, with lightning speed, flew to the different portions of the army. The troops were put in motion, and as if by magic they rolled like a huge sea, through a storm of bullets directly across the enemy's line of march. Marmont beheld the whole plain filled with English soldiers, and found himself forced into a battle when in the midst of a complicated movement, and while a large gap existed between the center and left wing of his army. With the utmost gallantry he strove to recover his advantage. He dispatched orders to his left to close with his center; and the center to hasten to the left; but before his orders could reach those distant columns, the British were upon them.

* Prescott's Robertson.

The dark masses of troops which occupied the English Arapeiles, rushing violently down the interior slope of the mountain entered the valley between them and the enemy amid a whirlwind of bullets which seemed to shear away the very surface of the earth over which the soldiers moved, and steadily advanced across the plain with bayonets fixed toward the dark masses of the French infantry. Marmont beheld the advance of the British line with tranquillity, supposing that the terrible tempest would soon arrest it; but when he saw Packenham's division and D'Urban's cavalry, move at right angles directly across Thorniere's line of march, at the foot of a lofty peak, while other broad masses of crimson were marching against him in front, he felt that his hour had come. He hastened to the point of danger, when a fragment of a shell struck him inflicting a severe wound in his side. His fall decided the fate of the day; but the French troops, notwithstanding they had lost their commander, fought with a desperate valor which for a long time held the victory, as it were, in a balance.

It was just five o'clock when Packenham fell upon Thorniere. In an instant the French gunners were at their pieces. Under cover of these guns, and the fire of a crowd of light troops which were hurried to the front, Thorniere endeavored to change his front; but all in vain. The British line steadily advanced; the French light troops were scattered before them in all directions and falling on the half-formed line of Thorniere, Packenham's men aided by D'Urban's Portuguese cavalry, Harvey's English dragoons, and Arentschild's Germans, forced the French backward along the ridge. The French fell back at first gradually and in good order; but as the enemy pressed forward, attacking them in front, flank, and rear, their array was thrown into confusion; their cavalry was routed and driven among the foot; Thorniere himself was killed while striving to stem the torrent; the allied cavalry broke in like a flood into the openings of the infantry; and the whole division was thrown back, utterly routed, on Clausel's, which was hurrying up to its aid from the forest, with the loss of 3,000 prisoners.

Almost at the same time, Cole and Leith with their divisions, moved forward against that part of the enemy's left composed of Clausel's division, which hastily formed to oppose them, flanked by Le Marchant's heavy dragoons and Anson's light cavalry, all led by Sir Stapleton Cotton.

While warmly engaged with the infantry in front, the opening in the line was suddenly obscured by a cloud of dust, and in a moment a glittering band of helmets, came thundering down on their scattered lines; scarcely any opposition was attempted, and the British dragoons passed shouting through the crowd with their swords gleaming in the air. Lord Edward Somerset, with a single squadron, took five guns; 2,000 prisoners were made in a short time, and the French left was thrown back into the wood in its rear and in a military point of view, annihilated. But this great success was dearly purchased, by the death of Le Marchant, who died in the moment of victory. In the mean time, Pack's Portuguese advanced against the French Arapeiles, and the fourth and fifth divisions, after clearing the village, had with difficulty, driven Bonnet's troops back on Clausel's and Thorniere's broken remains.

Passing the village, they assailed the rock, but met with resistance on all sides, but Pack's men boldly ascended the height, and when within thirty yards of the summit, the French masses rushed out from their concealment and suddenly closed with their adversaries.

A momentary struggle ensued, a stream of fire burst forth on the summit of the hill, and the Portuguese were seen flying, followed closely by the French, to the bottom. The fourth division still driving Bonnet's troops before them, were attacked on one side by three battalions and some horse, and on another by 1,200 fresh adversaries who poured a volley upon them, which they were unable to withstand; their men staggered, Cole and Leith were both wounded, and finding they were beset on all sides, they fled down the ascent. Bonnet was wounded, but Clausel took the command. Ferey's troops assailed the front of the fourth division, and drove them into the hollow behind, the fifth was attacked by Brennier in the same way, and they being uncovered on the left, were overlapped, and lost ground, and even Clinton's reserve in the center, was assailed by a body of cavalry. The crisis of the battle had arrived, and all depended on bringing the reserves to the center where the decisive blows were to be struck. Beresford with great presence of mind, caused a brigade of the fifth division to change, so as to front the troops of the enemy, who had issued from the hollows behind the Arapeiles: this checked the incursion in that quarter, but Beresford received a wound which obliged him to leave the field.

Wellington, who was always near in time of danger, hastily ordered up Clinton's division from the rear, to charge the enemy, which proved successful. Halse's brigade, which, forming the left of that division, was most exposed to the Peak of Miranda; while masses of troops were marching against him in front, he hastened in person to the spot, when he was wounded in the arm and side by the explosion of a shell from a distant English battery; this event, however, made little change in the issue of the battle; it was just five o'clock when Packenham fell on Thomière, who being unprepared for such an attack, found it impossible to effect a change of front: nothing could be done but to resist as long as possible. The British columns were so formed that they were ready to charge at any moment.

The French gunners and a crowd of light troops made a useless attempt to cover the formation of the troops behind, for they were scattered in all directions by the British line, led by the gallant Packenham. D'Urban's Portuguese cavalry, supported by Harvey's English dragoons, and Arentschild's German horse, turned their left flank and got into the rear, while their right was already menaced by Leith with the fifth division.

Thomière's division was forced backward along the ridge, but not before they had tried every means of arresting the enemy, but the enemy pressing on them at all points, threw them into confusion, their cavalry were routed and driven among the foot, and Thomière himself, was killed while striving to stem the torrent; the allied cavalry breaking in like a flood, threw his whole division on Clausel's, which was hastening to its aid from the forest; with the loss of 3,000 prisoners, were swept away by hundreds; not for a moment did they pause, but marching firmly forward with the 11th and 61st regiments in the van, regained all the ground that had been lost; an impetuous charge of the French dragoons for an instant arrested the 53d; the southern ridge was regained. Ferey was mortally, Clausel slightly, wounded; the allied host after righting itself like a gallant ship after a storm, again bore on in blood and gloom, one vast cloud of smoke rolled along the basin, and within it was the battle in all its terrors.

Clausel, although all his plans were frustrated, still thought he might prevent the defeat from being a total ruin. Foy's division which formed the extreme right of the French, was now coming into action, and the balls from his pieces fell into the British ranks, the broken remains of the left were blended with the center, and retiring together toward the right, formed a compact body which took post on the heights behind the Ariba streamlet, and formed a complete line in front of the forest, that entirely hid the retreat of the reserved parks and artillery, and the flight of the fugitives, who were hurrying in disorder through its lanes toward Albade Tormes. Wellington immediately took measures to drive this strong rear guard from the ground and complete the victory. The first and light divisions, with part of the fourth, which was re-formed, were directed to turn their right; while Clinton and Packenham's divisions with Hope and the Spaniards in reserve, assailed their front. The French made a gallant resistance; Foy's light troops and guns with admirable skill, took advantage of every knoll and thicket to arrest the pursuers; and the marshy stream which ran from the wood down to the Tormes, and washed the foot of his last defensible ridge, was obstinately contested. But the British pushed on vigorously, and at length had the satisfaction of seeing the French disappear in the forest, while they stood as victors alone on the sable hill. The French army retreated without further molestation to Alba de Tormes, the castle of which commanded the only way of getting across the river. Clausel, with admirable diligence got his whole army across the river at Alba de Tormes during the night, and continued his retreat toward Valladolid. Wellington closely pursued the French to this place, where he took seventeen prisoners and 800 sick; but seeing no prospect of overtaking the enemy, who were retiring toward Bruges, he desisted from the pursuit and advanced toward Madrid.

The allies lost in the battle of Salamanca, 5,200 men, of whom 3,176 were British, 2,018 Portuguese, and eight Spanish. The French loss has never been divulged; but it must have been equal if not greater than that of the allies. On the French side, Generals Ferey, Thomière, and Des Graviers were killed, and Marshal Marmont and Generals Bonnet, Clausel, and Moret wounded. The allies lost General La Marchant killed, and Generals Beresford, Stapleton, Cotton, Leith, Cole, and Alton wounded. Wellington, himself, was struck by a spent ball on the thigh; but it did him no injury.

SALTILLO. See Buena Vista.

SAMARIA, B.C. 907.—Samaria, the capital of the kingdom of Israel, and the rival of Jerusalem, sustained several memorable sieges. Adad, King of Syria, entered into Palestine in the reign of Achab, and encamped before the walls of Samaria. He soon reduced the city to the last extremity. Adad, reckoning upon the certainty of conquering the states of Achab, offered that king peace upon the conditions of his giving up his treasures, his wives, and his children. Achab, being without resource, consented to his demands; but on the morrow, Adad having added propositions still more hard, the king resolved to defend himself to the last. At the moment Adad thought victory within his grasp, the footmen of the Prince of Israel advanced, attacked his vanguard, killed many of them, and pursued the rest to the camp. Achab with his troops fell upon the infidels, put them to flight, and enriched himself with their spoils.

Second Siege, B.C. 906.—The following year Adad returned into Palestine with a more formidable army. Achab marched to meet him, and gave him battle. The Syrians were routed, and lost, it is said, 100,000 men. Adad was made prisoner.

Third Siege, B.C. 891.—In the reign of Joram, the son of Achab, the capital of Israel once more beheld a formidable Syrian army at its gates. This siege was long and celebrated. Adad surrounded the city on all sides; no supplies could be brought in; the public magazines were exhausted, and the famine became so excessive that an ass's head was sold for ninety pieces of silver; and twelve bushels of pigeons' dung, which was used instead of salt, were worth five. Such distress made Joram fear that in their despair the people would open the gates to the enemy. To encourage the soldiers and watch the people, he every day visited the walls and the fortifications. While thus employed, a woman cast herself at his feet. "My lord and my king," said she, uttering fearful cries, "in the name of God, save an unfortunate!" "What would you with me?" replied the monarch; "if the Lord does not save you, think you that I, who am but a simple mortal, can? What have you to say to me?" "Lord, the woman you see with me said: 'Give me your son, and let us eat him to-day; to-morrow we will eat mine.' I killed my son, and we ate him, but this wicked woman, notwithstanding her promise, has concealed her child, and robbed me of the food that is my due." On hearing this horrid recital, the King of Israel tore his vestments, and exposed to the eyes of every body the hair shirt he wore next his skin. This prince, reduced to despair, threw the cause of so many evils upon Elijah, and wished to put him to death. But the man of God promised him that the next day the abundance should be so great that a measure of pure meal should be sold for less than one sicle, or thirty sols; but the prophet gained no believers. An officer upon whose arm the king was leaning, turned him into ridicule: "If the All-powerful," said he, "were to open the heavens, and shower down provisions, this would not be possible." "You will see," replied Elijah, "but you will enjoy no part of it." Four lepers, who dwelt near the gates of the city, urged on by despair, went to the camp of the Syrians in hopes of meeting with death, but what was their astonishment to find no one there! The enemy struck by a sudden panic, and thinking they heard the noise of a great army advancing, had taken to flight, and left every thing behind them. The lepers, after having satisfied their hunger, and put aside a great quantity of gold and silver, hastened to announce this happy news to the king. Joram feared it was a trick. At length, after being assured of the flight of the infidels, the people rushed in crowds to the camp, and the word of the prophet was fulfilled in all its circumstances. The king set the officer who had mocked the prophet, at the gate of the city, and the unfortunate man was smothered by the crowd of people, without being able to take a part in the unlooked-for abundance.

Fourth Siege, B.C. 721.—Salmanazar, King of Assyria, learning that Hosea had made himself King of Israel, which country he considered tributary to his power, and wished to shake off the yoke, besieged Samaria, and carried it by assault after a blockade of three years. Hosea was made prisoner, and carried away, with the greater part of his subjects, into Assyria. Thus ended the kingdom of Israel, or of the ten tribes.

Fifth Siege, B.C. 120.—Samaria, however, became again peopled, and continued to dispute precedency with Jerusalem till the government of Hyrcanus, son of Simon Maccabeus. This great sacraficator took it by escalade, after a siege of a year, and completely destroyed the city and fortifications. But Herod the Great rebuilt it, increased its extent considerably, and named it Sebasta, out of compliment to Augustus.—Robson.

SAN DOMINGO, A.D. 1586.—San Domingo, the capital city of the Dominican republic, on the south side of the island of Hayti, was taken by assault by the British under Sir Francis Drake, in 1586. The invaders pillaged the town mercilessly, and nearly destroyed it.

SAN JACINTO, A.D. 1836.—The village of San Jacinto is situated on Buffalo Bayou, near its entrance into Galveston bay, in Texas, about eighteen miles east of Houston. On the 21st of April, 1835, an important battle was fought near this place, between the Texans, and the Mexicans. The Texan army consisted of 700 men, of whom, sixty-two were cavalry, and was under the command of General Sam Houston; the Mexican army numbered over 1,800 men, and was commanded by General Santa Anna.

The right flank of the Mexicans occupied the extreme point of a skirt of timber on the bank of the San Jacinto, and their left was secured by a fortification about five feet high, constructed of packs and baggage, leaving an opening in the center of their breastworks, in which their artillery was placed. Their cavalry was posted upon the right wing. General Houston's plan of attack was as follows:—The center was composed of the 1st regiment under Colonel Burleson; the left wing of the 2d regiment under Colonel Sherman; the artillery under the command of Colonel George W. Hockley, was placed on the right of the 1st regiment, and four companies of infantry under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Henry Miltard, sustained the artillery upon the right. The horse, under Colonel Laman, was placed on the extreme right, and completed the Texan line. The cavalry was first dispatched to the front of the enemy's left, for the purpose of attracting their attention, while an extensive island of timber afforded the Texans an opportunity of concentrating their forces, and deploying from that point, agreeably to the previous design of the troops. Every evolution was performed with alacrity, the whole army advancing rapidly in a line, and through an open prairie, without any protection whatever to the assailing party. The Texan artillery advanced, and took station within two hundred yards of the enemy's breastwork.

General Houston was determined that his army should be victorious, or that every Texan soldier should die in the fight. He had caused Vince's bridge in his rear to be destroyed, that his troops might know that their means of escape was cut off, and calling upon them to remember the fate of their countrymen who were massacred by the Mexicans at Alamo,* bade them fight to the death, for they could expect no mercy at the hands of such an enemy.

The Mexicans also were actuated by a desperate motive to fight bravely. The bridge destroyed by Houston's orders, was the one they had crossed in their march to San Jacinto, and its destruction cut off their retreat, as well as that of the enemy. The Texans opened their artillery, and the crashing tempest of grape swept madly into the enemy's works, shattering bones and baggage in its destructive flight. The Texans eagerly awaited the signal to charge. At length it was given. "Charge!" shouted General Houston, "Remember the Alamo!" The battle cry was repeated; wildly the shout "The Alamo!" rung across the plain, and fell like a death-knell upon the ears of the Mexicans. Led by Houston, the Texans rushed frantically to the charge; the Mexicans awaited their approach in perfect order, and when the assailants were within sixty yards of the breastwork, they opened a violent fire of musketry upon them. But they fired too high. General Houston's horse, however, was struck by several bullets, and Houston himself was seriously wounded in the ankle. But the horse did not fall, and the heroic general spurred him on. The Texans followed their commander, reserving their fire. When they had arrived at a proper distance, and before the Mexicans had time to reload, they poured a destructive volley of rifles into the very bosoms of the Mexicans, and clubbing their pieces, for they had no bayonets, rushed to the breastwork. A terrible hand to hand conflict ensued; the Mexican bayonet clashed against the Texan rifle-stock. The Texans soon broke their rifles by their vigorous blows, and throwing away their useless pieces, drew their pistols, and discharging them once, hurled the empty weapons at the heads of the enemy, and drawing their bowie-knives, threw themselves in one mass upon the Mexican host.

The Mexicans stood their ground bravely; but nothing could resist the impetuous valor of the Texans; their keen blades flashed continually in the air, with lightning velocity, and were plunged incessantly into the bosoms of their foes. The field was strewn with the slain, and blood flowed in streams. The Mexicans endeavored to fly, but the unrelenting Texans pursued eagerly, and cut them down with their terrible weapons without remorse. The Mexicans were now flying in wild disorder, and General Houston vainly endeavored to stop the carnage; but the Texan troops panting for vengeance, ceased not from their bloody work. "While the battle was in progress," says General Rusk, "the celebrated Deaf Smith, although on horseback, was fighting with the infantry. When they had nearly reached the enemy, Smith galloped on ahead, and dashed directly up to the Mexican line. Just as he reached it, his horse stumbled, and fell, throwing his rider on his head among the enemy. Having dropped his sword in the fall, he drew one of his belt pistols, presented it at the head of a Mexican who was attempting to bayonet him, and it missed fire. Smith then hurled the pistol at the head of the Mexican, and as he staggered back, he seized his gun, and began his work of destruction.

"A young man by the name of Robbins dropped his gun in the confusion of the battle, and happening to run directly in contact with a Mexican soldier who had also lost his musket, the Mexican seized Robbins, and both, being stout men, rolled to the ground. But Robbins drew out his bowie-knife, and ended the contest by cutting the Mexican's throat. On starting out for our camp to enter upon the attack I saw an old man by the name of Curtis carrying two guns. I asked him what reason he had for carrying more than one gun. He replied: 'D——n the Mexicans; they killed my son and son-in-law in the Alamo, and I intend to kill two of them for it, or be killed myself.' I saw the old man again during the fight, and he told me he had killed his two men; and if he could find Santa Anna himself, he would cut out 'a razor-strap from his back.' When the Mexicans were first driven from the point of woods where we encountered them, their officers tried to rally them, but the men cried, 'It's no use, there are a thousand Americans in the woods.' When Santa Anna saw Almonte's division running past him, he called a drummer, and ordered him to beat his drum. The drummer held up his hands and told him he was shot. He called then to a trumpeter near him to sound his horn. The trumpeter replied that he also was shot. Just at that instant a ball from one of our cannon struck a man who was standing near Santa Anna, taking off one side of his head. Santa Anna then exclaimed: 'D——n these Americans! I believe they will shoot us all.' He immediately mounted his horse and commenced his flight."

* On the 6th of April, 1836, the Alamo at Bexar, which was occupied by Colonel Travis, with 185 Texans, was taken, after an obstinate and valorous defense, by an overwhelming Mexican force. Every human being in the Alamo was slaughtered, except a woman, her child, and a negro, and after their slaughter, the dead were dragged out and piled together with wood, in one vast hecatomb, and burned to ashes!

Among the heroes who fell this day was the famous Colonel Crockett.

The Mexicans were now flying for their lives. They had left behind them nearly seven hundred men, dead and dying on the field of battle, and constant additions were made to the slain by the enraged Texans, who followed close upon their rear. The Mexican cavalry spurred their horses toward Vince's Bridge. The victors pursued eagerly, and when they arrived on the bank of the river an appalling scene ensued. The Mexicans, finding the bridge destroyed, were struck with terror. Some plunged their horses into the stream, and were either swept down by the current, or becoming entangled one with another, sunk beneath the turbid waters. Those who gained the opposite shore were unable to urge their weary horses up the steep bank, and fell back into the water, sinking to rise no more. Others, dismounting, hurled themselves into the river, and endeavored to swim across, but they were soon lost amid the mass of struggling men and horses in the stream, and perished miserably. To add to the terrors of this scene, the Texans on the shore maintained an incessant fire upon the drowning masses of men and horses; hundreds went down together; the waters were crimsoned with their gore, and the deep stream was literally choked with dead bodies. A similar scene was also enacted near the Mexican encampment in the rear of the battle-ground. The fugitives were here compelled to pass a deep marsh, and as their only hope of safety they plunged into the mire and water, and endeavored to force their way through; but the Texans were close behind, the morass was deep and impassable. They sank in its quicksands by scores, and the survivors escaped only by using the ghastly bridge formed by the dead bodies of their comrades. At length, sated with slaughter, the Texans returned to their camp. The battle of San Jacinto was won; the bloody day at the Alamo was avenged, and Texas was free. Almonte, the Mexican general, was made prisoner on the day of the battle; on the following day Santa Anna himself was captured while attempting to make his escape alone. General Houston had completely entrapped his wily foe, and Santa Anna, the scourge of Texas, was in the hands of those who would have gladly executed him on the spot; but the Texans were saved from the reproach of this deed by the firmness of General Houston. Santa Anna was spared, and was afterward released by the Texan government.

In the battle of San Jacinto the Texans lost seven men killed, and about thirty men wounded; the Mexicans lost 630 men killed, beside a multitude who perished in the marsh and bayous, 280 wounded, and nearly 800 prisoners. Among the slain were one general officer, four colonels, two lieutenant-colonels, seven captains, and twelve lieutenants. About 900 hundred stand of English muskets, 300 sabers, and 200 pistols, beside 300 valuable mules, 100 excellent horses, and 12,000 dollars, together with a great quantity of provisions, clothing, tents, ammunition, etc., etc., fell into the hands of the victors.

SAN MARCIAL, A.D. 1813.—On the 31st of August, 1813, a battle was fought between the French army under Soult, and the allied armies of England, Spain and Portugal, under Wellington. After an obstinate conflict the French, pushed by superior numbers, were obliged to retire with a loss of about 3000 men killed and wounded. General Vandermærs was killed and four other generals of inferior grade, wounded. The allies lost 2,683 men killed and wounded, of whom 1,680 were Spaniards.

SANTIAGO, A.D. 1817–18.—The battles of Santiago are the most memorable in the annals of Chili. The first, called the battle of Chacabuco, was fought in 1817 between the Spaniards and the Chilians, under General San Martin. The Spaniards were totally defeated. The battle of Maypu was fought in the province of Santiago, between the Spaniards and the Chilians under General San Martin, who was again victorious. These defeats proved fatal to the cause of the Spaniards in Chili, and finally sealed the independence of the country.

SARAGOSSA.—Saragossa stands on the river Ebro, in Spain, 176 miles N. E. of Madrid. It is a very ancient city, having been founded, it is said, by the Phœnicians or Carthaginians. Toward the close of the fifth century, it was taken by the Goths, who were expelled in 712 by the Saracens; and at length, in 1017, it was made the capital of a separate Moorish state. In the year 1106 it was besieged and taken by Alphonso of Arragon. It is known in modern history from the obstinate resistance made by its inhabitants under Palafox, in 1808–9 to the French, commanded successively by Marshals Mortier and Lannes. The siege lasted, with some slight intermission, from July 15, 1808, to February 21, 1809; when, after a loss of about 6,000 men killed in battle, and over 30,000 men, women, and children, carried off by famine, pestilence, and the fanatical excesses that raged in the unfortunate city, it surrendered to the French. Sir William Napier's account of the siege has stripped it of more than half the romance that formerly invested it. The "heroic" Palafox, for more than a month preceding the surrender, never came forth from a vaulted building which was impervious to shells, and in which there is too much reason to believe that he and others, of both sexes, lived in a state of sensuality, forming a disgusting contrast to the wretchedness that surrounded them. In obstinacy, fanaticism, and savage cruelty, the Saragossans seem to have borne a striking resemblance to the Jews besieged by Titus. The loss of the French in the siege did not exceed 4,000 men.

SARATOGA.—See Stillwater.

SARDIS, B.C. 548.—Sardis is a ruined city of Asia Minor, at the foot of Mount Tmolus, 50 miles north-east of Smyrna. After the battle of Thymbra, between Cyrus and Crœsus, the conqueror advanced directly against Sardis, the capital of Lydia. Crœsus marched out of the city to give him battle; and after an obstinate contest the Lydians were forced to retire within their city. Cyrus immediately laid siege to the place, and succeeded by stratagem in making himself master of the citadel. At daybreak he entered the city without resistance; and the citizens purchased their lives by bringing the conqueror all their gold and silver.

B.C. 502.—Under the reign of Darius Ochus, the Athenians embarked in an expedition against Sardis. They succeeded in burning the city, with the exception of the citadel; but the citadel proved impregnable, and the Lydians and Persians, highly exasperated, attacked the besiegers with such fury that they drove them back to Ephesus, and destroyed many of their ships. This unprovoked attack on Sardis was the source of all the subsequent wars between Greece and Persia, which produced so many calamities to both countries.

SARNUS, A. D. 553.—Sarno, a town of Naples, occupies the site of the ancient city of Sarnus. The battle of Sarnus was fought in the year 553, between the army of Justinian, Emperor of Rome, and the Goths. The latter were defeated, and Teias, the Gothic king, slain. This battle put an end to Gothic sway in Italy.

SAUCHIE BURN, A.D. 1488.—Near this place, in 1488, about one mile west of Bannockburn, in Scotland, a battle was fought between the troops of James III. and his rebellious subjects. The king was defeated, and being severely wounded in the battle, sought refuge in a mill near by, where he was assassinated.

SAVANNAH, A.D. 1778.—This flourishing city stands on the south bank of the Savannah river, eighteen miles from its mouth. It is the capital of Chatham co., Georgia, and is one of the most important places of that State.

At the close of the year 1778, the British army, after a war of nearly four years, had made but little progress toward the suppression of the "rebellion" in the American provinces. The British arms had hitherto been directed against the northern and middle States, but with little effect. The Americans retained possession of the greater portion of the country. New York, indeed, was in the hands of the English, but the Americans were masters of almost every other part. Sir Henry Clinton, who commanded at New York, resolved to carry the war into the southern provinces, hoping to find the people less willing or less able to resist his arms, than their stubborn northern brethren. He directed his first operations against Savannah, which was apparently the weakest point at the South. On the 27th of November, 1778, Lieutenant-Colonel Campbell sailed from Sandy Hook, with over 2,000 land troops, convoyed by Commodore Hyde Parker. The fleet arrived at Tybee Island, off the mouth of the Savannah, on the 23d of December; and on the morning of the 29th, the vessels and transports having crossed the bar, the troops were landed above Five Fathom Hole, three miles below the town, and opposite Brewton Hill. The whole country on both banks of the Savannah, from its mouth to a considerable distance, was a continuous tract of marsh land, intersected by the St. Augustine and Tybee creeks. From the point at which the British landed, a causeway, leading across a rice-swamp, and flanked on each side by a deep ditch, extended to the city. The city itself stands upon a high bluff, of an altitude of forty feet, and then, as now, was approachable by land on three sides; on the east by a road which crossed the marsh upon a causeway leading from Brewton's Hill; on the west by a road and causeway over the deep swamp of Musgrove's creek, and on the south by the roads from White Bluff on Vernon river, and from the Ogeechee Ferry, which unite near the town. The British advanced by the causeway on the east. Six hundred yards from the landing-place rises an abrupt eminence, called Brewton's Hill, upon which a house owned by a Mr. Gerridoe, was situated. This house was occupied by a detachment of patriots. As the vanguard of the British army, which consisted of the 71st regiment of Royal Scots, approached the house, they were attacked by the Americans in the house. Captain Cameron and two of his company were killed, and the Highlanders, furious at the loss of their captain, rushed forward and attacked the Americans with so much impetuosity that they were driven into the adjacent woods. The English took possession of the height; and Campbell, from its summit, saw the American army drawn up in battle order about half a mile east of Savannah. General Howe was at Sunbury, when he received intelligence of the arrival of the British, and without delay hastened to Savannah to prepare for the invasion. Howe also received information that General Prevost, with the British troops under his command, was on his way to invade Georgia; and when the American general reached Savannah, he found the place a scene of tumult and confusion. The American army, even after the militia from the adjacent country had come in, consisted only of about 900 men. But Howe, believing that the enemy was weaker than it appeared, resolved to defend the town, and when the British arrived within sight they found him ready for battle. The American army was so disposed that its two wings extended on the two sides of the great road leading to Savannah. The center occupied the head of the causeway; the right wing, under Colonel Isaac Huger, covered the marsh in front, and was flanked by a wooded swamp, and 100 Georgia militia, under Captain Smith of South Carolina, and the left wing, under Colonel Elbert, forced the rice-fields, and was flanked by the river. One piece of cannon was planted at each extremity of the American line, and two pieces occupied the head of the causeway where it entered the main road in the center. After Campbell had formed his army on Brewton's Hill, he moved forward, and took a position within eight hundred yards of the American line. By the movements of the Americans, Campbell soon discovered that they expected and even desired that he should engage their left wing. In order to excite the belief that he intended to do so, he drew off a part of his forces to form on his left, and also displayed his light infantry in that quarter of his line. This was about three o'clock in the afternoon. Campbell intended, however, to attack the right wing of the Americans, and having accidentally fallen in with a negro named Quamino Dolly, who offered to guide his troops by a by-path, through a woody swamp on the enemy's right, he directed Sir James Baird to follow the guide, and fall upon the rear of the American right, by surprise. The New York troops, under Colonel Trumbull, were ordered to support the light infantry, while Baird and Trumbull, under the guidance of the negro, were threading the labyrinth of the forest-covered swamp. Campbell prepared for an attack in front. Meanwhile, the republicans opened their artillery upon the British; the army of Campbell remained silent and motionless.

Sir James Baird and his troops soon emerged from the swamp on the White Bluff road, and pushing forward attacked Walton's Georgia brigade, in flank and rear. Walton was wounded, and with a great portion of his troops was taken prisoner. As soon as Campbell saw that Baird had reached his position, he suddenly opened a cannonade on the enemy, and pushed forward his troops to a charge in front. The charge of the Hessians and English was so impetuous, that the American line was broken, and Howe, perceiving the growing panic and confusion, ordered a retreat over the causeway across Musgrove's swamp, west of the town. Colonel Roberts with his artillery hastened to that point to cover the retreat. The British were already there to dispute the passage. After a hot conflict the American center and left wing gained the causeway, and escaped; the left wing under Colonel Elbert, however, were unable to force the passage, and were driven into the marsh. The tide was high and only those who were able to swim, escaped, and these lost their guns and accouterments. The others were drowned or made prisoners. During the pursuit many of the citizens of Savannah were bayoneted in the streets; but after the action was over, Colonel Campbell, who was as humane as he was brave and skillful, ordered his troops to spare the lives and property of the inhabitants. The like credit can not be given to Commodore Parker, whose brutal treatment of the prisoners committed to his care, has branded his name with lasting infamy. The American army retreated as far as Cherokee Hill, eight miles distant, where they rendezvoused; and the whole army pushed up the Savannah as far as Zubley's Ferry, where they crossed the river into South Carolina. The British took immediate possession of Savannah. The Americans in this action lost 100 men killed or drowned in the swamp, and 453 taken prisoners. Among the latter were thirty-eight officers. The English lost about twenty men in killed and wounded. The fort at Savannah, with forty-eight pieces of cannon, twenty-three mortars and howitzers, 817 small arms, ninety-four barrels of gunpowder, 1,545 cannon-shot, 104 case-shot, 200 shells, nine tons of lead, military stores, shipping on the river, and a large quantity of provisions, fell into the hands of the victors.

Siege of 1779.—On the 3d of September, 1779, a French fleet, consisting of twenty ships of the line and eleven frigates, having on board 6,000 soldiers, suddenly appeared off Tybee island. He had come to assist the Americans in driving the British out of the southern States. So sudden was his appearance that four British vessels fell into his hands without a struggle. General Prevost, with the British troops under his command, occupied Savannah, and the American army, under General Lincoln, was at Charleston, South Carolina. D'Estaing apprised Lincoln of his arrival, and a plan was arranged to besiege Savannah immediately. Prevost, upon the appearance of the French fleet off Tybee, commenced vigorously to put the city in a state of defense. He recalled his detachments from the advanced posts, and sent orders to Colonel Maitland, who commanded at Beaufort, to rejoin him as soon as possible. He also recalled the detachment that occupied Sunbury; and began in earnest to strengthen the fortifications of the city. Every hand not otherwise engaged was busily engaged in this work; and the chief of the engineers, Colonel Moncrief, pressed into his service 300 negroes, collected from the neighboring plantations. Thirteen redoubts, and fifteen batteries, with lines of communication, and a strong abatis in front, were soon completed. The batteries were mounted with seventy-six pieces of cannon, which were manned by seamen from the ships in the harbor. The French fleet disappeared on the evening of the 4th; and Prevost took advantage of their absence to strengthen the works on Tybee island. The garrison at this place was also increased by 100 men under Colonel Moncrief. The fleet returned on the 6th; and on the 9th some French troops were landed on the south side of Tybee island. Moncrief saw that resistance was useless, and spiked the guns and fled to Savannah. The English fleet in the Tybee river now sailed up to Five Fathom Hole, and the next day the cannons were removed from the ships of war, with a few exceptions, to the shore, and mounted on the fortifications. Prevost now felt prepared to receive the enemy. General Lincoln marched from Charleston immediately after receiving intelligence of the arrival of the French fleet, and encamped at Zubley's Ferry, on the Savannah river. He thence detached Count Pulaski, with his legion and the troops under General McIntosh, toward Savannah, with orders to attack the British outposts.

Meanwhile the French fleet had anchored off the bar at the mouth of the Savannah, and D'Estaing was landing his troops at Beaulieu, about thirteen miles below the city. Pulaski and McIntosh, after several skirmishes with the enemy, succeeded in reaching the French army at Beaulieu, and thus reinforced, D'Estaing advanced toward Savannah. McIntosh returned to Miller's plantation, about three miles from Savannah, where, on the 16th, he was joined by Lincoln. On the same day D'Estaing advanced to within three miles of Savannah, and imperiously summoned Prevost to surrender to the King of France.* Prevost asked for a truce until the next day, to consider the subject. But the British general did not think of surrendering. His only object was to gain time, for he was in hourly expectation of the arrival of Maitland, with 800 men from Beaufort. During the interval of the time, Maitland arrived, and thus reinforced, Prevost informed the French admiral that he intended to hold out to the last.† General Lincoln with his force, which consisted of about 2,000 men, having joined the French, the allied armies prepared to take the town by regular approaches. The French army consisted of about 3,000 men. The whole British force in Savannah, was 2,850 men, including a few militia, some Indians, and 300 negroes. The French established their quarters on the right of the place, the Americans on the left. The besiegers first broke ground on the 23d of September. Trenches were opened, and so vigorously did the besiegers apply their tools, that in the course of twelve days, fifty-three pieces of cannon, and fourteen mortars were mounted in battery. The besieged were active in their efforts to retard the works of the enemy. On the 24th of September, a number of British troops under Major Graham, made a sortie; but they were driven back by the besiegers with loss. On the 27th, another sortie was made under Major McArthur, with a like result. The operations of the besiegers were not affected; and on the morning of the 14th, all the batteries being completed and manned, the allies opened a terrific cannonade on the British works and the city. The French frigate Truite bombarded the place from the water. The besiegers launched carcases into the town, and several houses were set on fire. Terror reigned in Savannah. The fearful storm shattered houses, and filled the streets with fallen timbers. Women and children were killed, and strong men shuddered as they saw their fate. Families sought refuge from the iron tempest in cellars, and there breathing the infected air, and living in close contact with damp walls, they contracted mortal diseases. But, although the city itself suffered so much from the fire of the besiegers, the works of the British remained uninjured. By sap and mine the besiegers slowly but surely approached the British batteries and redoubts; and had the French admiral had the patience to push his approaches further, the town would certainly have been taken. But D'Estaing could not brook the tardiness of the siege; he found the autumn stormy, and he had been informed that a British fleet was approaching. He called a council, and the engineers informed him that ten days must elapse before the British lines could be reached by trenches. Upon this he insisted that the siege must be raised, or the place be carried by storm. Lincoln chose the latter alternative, and the work was commenced on the morning of the 9th of October. The abatis in front of the enemy's line was fired by Major L'Enfant and five men amid a volley of musketry from the garrison. The wood was green, however, and the flames were soon extinguished. Before daybreak on the 9th of October, General Lincoln, and Count D'Estaing, having formed the flower of their army in three columns, advanced through a thick fog to the assault, under cover of a heavy fire from all the batteries. The storming force consisted of about 3,500 French soldiers, and 1,100 Americans, of whom 600 were regular troops. The principal column was commanded by D'Estaing in person, assisted by General Lincoln; another column was under the command of Count Dillon, and the third was commanded by General Isaac Huger. The first was to assail the Spring Hill redoubt, on the right of the British line; the second was to endeavor to gain the rear of the British line toward the river on the east, and the third was to make feigned attacks in front to create a diversion in favor of the others. On through the gloom, the fog, and darkness, marched those gallant men. They reached the redoubt unseen. The sun arose, the fog dispersed, the Britons saw their foes. Now gleamed the black redoubt with the fearful light of war. Swift through the ranks of the advancing foe, a leaden tempest rushed. Rank after rank went down, and screams of anguish rose. Down went D'Estaing. They bore him sorely wounded to his camp. Yet onward pressed the Americans, regardless of the terrific storm; they passed the abatis, they leaped the ditch; they entered the redoubt, and on it they planted the flags of France and South Carolina. The fight now raged with fury. Maitland uniting the British grenadiers and marines, ordered Colonel Glazier to drive the assailants back. Glazier at the head of his men rushed furiously to the attack. The combatants closed, and near the standards a fearful conflict ensued. The standards fell, and their brave defenders were thrown back through the abatis. In the struggles around the flag-staffs, the gallant Serjeant Jasper received a mortal wound. He had just secured them to the parapet of the redoubt, when a rifle ball pierced him and he fell into the ditch. He was borne to the camp, where he shortly afterward died. "Tell Mrs. Elliott," said the expiring hero, "that I lost my life supporting the colors she presented to our regiment."*

* "The Americans observed with extreme displeasure and jealousy, that the summons was made exclusively in the name of the King of France." Botta, Vol. ii. p. 205.

† "Any four hours before the junction of Lieutenant-Colonel Maitland, was sufficient to have taken Savannah." Lee's Memoirs.

While D'Estaing and Lincoln were engaged at the Spring Hill redoubt, Huger and Pulaski were assailing the enemy's works on different sides of the town. Huger having fruitlessly endeavored to force the enemy's line on the east, retreated after losing twenty-eight men. At the same time Pulaski, with about 200 horsemen, endeavored to force his way into the town, a little to the eastward of the Spring Hill Redoubt. Waving his banner over his head, the noble Pole led his men forward; he passed the abatis, and his men followed eagerly. The British opened their artillery upon the assailants, and in the midst of a tornado of grape-shot, Pulaski fell, mortally wounded. His men vainly strove to breast the iron hail which, sweeping in all directions, cut down every thing before it. They fell back, and soon the whole force of the allied army retired before the fire of the enemy. The ground was laden with dead and dying Americans and French; and over the piles of corpses like a funeral pall floated the gloomy cloud of battle. Some of Pulaski's solfliers found the dying hero, and bore him from the field. At ten o'clock the besiegers showed a white flag, and asked a truce with leave to bury the dead and carry off the wounded. The truce was granted by Prevost, and while the troops were engaged in removing the killed and maimed, D'Estaing and Lincoln held a consultation regarding future operations. Lincoln wished to continue the siege; but D'Estaing, whose loss was great, decided on an immediate departure. The siege was raised, and on the 18th the allied armies retreated. The French retired to Caustin's Bluff whence on the 20th they returned to their ships at Tybee. The Americans retreated to Zubley's Ferry, and thence to Charleston. In this siege the French lost 637 men, in killed and wounded; the Americans lost 457. The British lost 120 men killed and wounded. Count Pulaski died a few days afterthe battle. His name lives in the heart of every American.

* The American standards displayed on this occasion were those of the 2d South Carolina regiment. They had been embroidered and presented to that regiment by Mrs. Susanna Elliott three days after the battle at Fort Moultrie, where Jasper particularly distinguished himself. See Charleston.

SAVIGLIANO, A.D. 1799.—A battle was fought near Savigliano, in Italy, on the 18th of September, 1799, between the French and the Austrians, in which the latter were defeated.

SAVINDROOG, A.D. 1791.—Savindroog, is a strong hill fortress in South India. The fortress stands upon a rock which rises half a mile in perpendicular height, and is surrounded by an impenetrable jungle. This fortress in 1791, although deemed impregnable, was taken by the British troops, without the loss of a single man.

SCHELLENDORF, A.D. 1813.—At Schellendorf in Prussia, a cavalry combat was fought between the French and Prussians in 1813, in which the latter were defeated.

SCHELLENBERG, A.D. 1764.—Schellenberg, in Bavaria, was, in the year 1764, the scene of a battle between the troops of Marlborough, and the army of the Duke of Bavaria. After an obstinate engagement, the Bavarians were defeated with great loss.

SCHENECTADY, A.D. 1691.—On the 8th of February, 1691, a party of 200 Frenchmen and Canadians, and fifty Indians, attacked Schenectady, in New York State, then a thriving village, and at midnight, bursting open the gates of the stockade which surrounded the town, fell upon the defenseless and unsuspecting inhabitants, massacred them without mercy, and laid the town in ashes. Sixty-three persons were murdered and 27 carried into captivity. Sixty-three houses and the church were burned. A few persons escaped to Albany, traveling almost twenty miles in the snow, with no other covering than their night-clothes. Twenty-five of them lost their limbs in consequence, being bitten by the frost.

SCHOHARIE, A.D. 1778.—On the 2d of July, 1778, an engagement took place between a party of regular troops and Schoharie militia, and 400 Indians, on the upper branch of the Cobleskill, in New York. The Americans, who were under the command of Captain Christian Brown, were overpowered by the superior force of the Indians. Fourteen were killed, ten wounded and missing, and the remainder escaped.

SCHWEIDNITZ, A.D. 1761.—Schweidnitz, a town of Prussian Silesia, has been repeatedly besieged; but our space limits us to the description of two sieges only.

The capture of Schweidnitz offers a fresh proof that no precaution is unnecessary in war. The smallest negligence in the service of places contiguous to the enemy, is most frequently punished by unexpected reverses. Five hundred prisoners were negligently guarded in the fortress of Schweidnitz. Among them was a Major Rocca, a clever Italian partisan. This major formed the idea of placing the fortress in which he was confined in the hands of the Austrians. He had the address to insinuate himself so completely into the good graces of the commander, that he had liberty to walk among all the works, to become acquainted with the places of all the sentinels and of all the corps-de-garde; he frequently saw the Austrians, prisoners like himself, intrigued in the city, and regularly informed General Laudon of all he saw, perceived, or imagined, that would facilitate the surprise of Schweidnitz. According to these instructions, the general drew up his plan of attack, which he executed in the night, between the 30th of September and the 1st of October. He distributed twenty battalions in four attacks, one upon the Breslau gate, another upon the Striegau gate, the third upon the fort of Boeckendorff, and the fourth upon the Water fort. M. de Zastrow, governor of Schweidnitz, having some suspicions of the enemy's intentions, called his garrison to arms about the middle of the night, and spread them about the works; but he committed the faults of not giving his officers instructions how to act, of not sending cavalry to a certain distance on the look-out, and of not discharging fire-bombs to throw a light upon the approach of the enemy. The Austrians advanced to the pallisades, without being discovered. There were only 12 cannon fired upon them, and the musketry was so weak that it did them no harm. The guard of the Striegau gate was surprised, and they penetrated thence through the works. During this confusion, the Austrian prisoners threw off the mask, took possession of the interior gate of the city, threw it open to the enemy's advancing troops, and made themselves masters of the whole place. The only person who held out was the commander of the Water fort; but his resistance was useless.

Such an unexpected misfortune changed all the plans of the King of Prussia, who could only, during the remainder of this campaign, defend, against a superior enemy, the fortresses and territories he had left.

Second Siege, A.D. 1762.—The principal object of the next campaign was, for the King of Prussia, the recapture of Schweidnitz. Frederic had not one man more than was requisite for the execution of this important enterprise. Seventy thousand Austrians composed the army of Marshal Daun and the corps of Laudon, Hadduck, Brentano, De Beck, and Ellershausen. The Prussian army was not inferior, but troops must be detached from it for the siege, of which M. de Tauziern had the direction. He invested the place on the 4th of August, and opened the trenches on the 7th; they commenced at Briqueterie, and turned toward Warben, to embrace the polygon of Jauernick, upon which the principal attack was directed. M. de Guasco made a sortie, but it did not answer his expectations; the Prussian dragoons beating the Austrians back into the place. The King of Prussia thought that Laudon, in order to succor the place, would take the route of Sibelberg, Warther, and Langen-Brelau; he went, therefore, to place himself at Pfaffendorff, while he caused the post of Peila to be taken by the Prince of Bevern. Every thing happened as the King of Prussia had foreseen. Marshal Daun took the route of Langen-Brelau, attacked the Prussians at Peila, was beaten, and retreated. The check experienced by Marshal Daun gave M. de Guasco a bad augury of the fate of the place, and he made an attempt to obtain an advantageous capitulation, with a free departure for his garrison. The King of Prussia refused to comply, because it would have been a capital error to allow 10,000 men to march out of a city, of which, with a little patience, he should render himself master; the Prussian army would be weakened at least by 4,000 men necessary to garrison Schweidnitz, and the Prussian strength would be lessened to the amount of 14,000 men. The King of Prussia repaired in person, on the 20th of September, before Schweidnitz, in order to push on the works with more vigor. Lefebvre, the chief engineer, was opposed to Gribeauvel, esteemed one of the first men of the age for the defense of places. Lefebvre was soon outwitted by the activity of the French engineer, who countermined his mines and thwarted all his plans. Frederic was obliged to take the details of the siege upon himself; the third parallel was lengthened; a battery in breach was placed there; ricochets were there established against Briqueterie, with another battery upon Kuhberg; and the works of the Austrians were taken in rear. Some branches of the mines of the besieged were likewise sprung. The garrison made two sorties, and dislodged the Prussians from a crowned tunnel, from which they wished to debouch by fresh branches. These maneuvers prolonged the duration of the siege, because they rendered a subterranean war necessary. All the cannon of the place were, however, either *évasés or dismounted; provisions were beginning to be scarce, and the enemy would have been compelled to surrender on that account, if a bomb, falling in front of the powder-magazine of Jauernick, had not set fire to it, knocked down a part of that fort, and killed three hundred Austrian grenadiers. This accident, which laid the place open, obliged M. de Guasco to beat a parley; he surrendered himself and his garrison prisoners of war, on the 9th of October, and they were marched away into Prussia.—Robson.

SEDGEMOOR, A.D. 1685.—This is the name of a wild tract of land in the county of Somerset, between King's Weston and Bridgewater, in England. The battle of Sedgemoor was fought on the 5th of July, 1685, between the army of Lord Monmouth, who assumed the throne of England, and that of James II., under Feversham, near Bridgewater. The battle was obstinate and bloody. After a combat of three hours, the rebels gave way, and were pursued with great slaughter. About 1,500 fell in the battle and pursuit. The victors lost 300 men killed and wounded. Monmouth fled from the field of battle over twenty miles, till his horse sunk under him. He then changed clothes with a peasant in order to conceal himself. The peasant was discovered by the pursuers, who now redoubled the diligence of their search. At last the unhappy Monmouth was found lying in the bottom of a ditch, covered with fern; his body depressed with fatigue and hunger; his mind by the memory of past misfortunes, and by the prospect of future disasters. He burst into tears when seized by his enemies; and he seemed still to indulge the fond hope and desire of life.

Though he might have known, from the greatness of his own offenses and the severity of James's temper, that no mercy could be expected, he wrote him the most submissive letters, and conjured him to spare the issue of a brother, who had ever been so strongly attached to his interests; but James replied, that by usurping the title of king he had rendered himself incapable of pardon. Finding all efforts vain he assumed courage from despair, and prepared himself for death with a spirit better suited to his rank and character. The favorite of the people was attended to the scaffold with a plentiful effusion of tears. He warned the executioner not to fall into the error which he had committed in beheading Russell. This caution served only to dismay the executioner. He struck a feeble blow on Monmouth, who raised his head from the block, and looked him in the face, as if reproaching him for his failure. He gently laid down his head a second time, and the executioner struck him again and again to no purpose. He then threw aside the axe, and cried out that he was incapable of finishing the bloody office. The sheriff obliged him to renew the attempt, and at two blows more the head was severed from the body. Thus perished, on the 15th of July, 1685, in the thirty-sixth year of his age, a nobleman, who, in less turbulent times, was well qualified to be an ornament of the court, and even to be servicable to his country.

* Rendered too wide at the mouth.

SEEFIN.—During the ninth century, in the space of 110 days, ninety engagements took place in the vicinity of Seefin, a small town of Asiatic Turkey, between the adherents of Alee and of Moawiyah, in which it is asserted 70,000 Mohammedans perished.

SELASIA, B.C. 223.—No sooner had Cleomenes ascended the throne of Sparta than he engaged in a war with the Achæans. The Achæans finding themselves in the greatest danger, applied for succor to Antigonus, King of Macedon, who immediately formed an alliance with them. In the early part of the summer (223 B.C.), Antigonus put himself at the head of the Macedonians and Achæans, and advanced into Laconia. His army consisted of 28,000 foot, and 1,200 horse. Cleomenes's army amounted to no more than 20,000 men. As Cleomenes had anticipated an irruption from the enemy, he had fortified all the passes by posting detachments of his troops in them, and by throwing up intrenchments and cutting down trees, after which he formed his camp at the defile of Selasia. This defile was formed by two mountains, one of which had the name of Eva, and the other that of Olympus. The river Olneus, ran between them, on the banks of which was the road to Sparta. Cleomenes imagined, and with good reason, that the enemy would endeavor to force a passage into Laconia, through this avenue, and he was not deceived. Having thrown up a strong intrenchment at the foot of these mountains, Cleomenes posted his brother Euclidas on the eminence of Eva, at the head of his allies, and planted himself on Olympus with the Lacedæmonians, and a party of foreign troops, and placing at the same time along each bank of the river a detachment of the cavalry and foreign auxiliaries. When Antigonus arrived at the defile, after reconnoitering Cleomenes's position, he did not think proper to attack him; but encamped at a small distance in the plain. Neither side for several days ventured to offer battle. At length Cleomenes, who was in want both of money and provisions, and was not only in arrear with his foreign troops to the amount of a considerable sum, but found it extremely difficult to maintain his Spartan force, determined to venture a battle.

When the signals were given on both sides, Antigonus detached a body of troops, consisting of Macedonian and Illyrian battalions alternately disposed, against those of the enemy posted on Mount Eva. This second line consisted of Acarnanians and Cretans, and in the rear of these 2,000 Achæans were drawn up as a body of reserve. He drew up his cavalry along the banks of the river, in order to oppose the enemy's horse, and caused them to be supported by 1,000 of the Achæan foot and the same number of Megalopolitans. Then placing himself at the head of the Macedonians and light-armed foreign troops he advanced to Mount Olympus to attack Cleomenes. The foreigners were disposed into the first line, and marched immediately before the Macedonian phalanx, which was divided into two bodies, the one in the rear of the other, because the ground would not admit the forming a larger front.

The action began at Mount Eva, when the light-armed troops who had been posted with an intention to cover and support the cavalry of Cleomenes, observing that the rear of the Achæan cohorts was uncovered, immediately wheeled about and attacked them. Those who endeavored to gain the summit of the mountain found themselves vigorously pressed by the enemy and in great danger, being threatened in front by Euclidas, who was on the heights, at the same time that they were charged in their rear by the foreign troops, who assaulted them with the utmost impetuosity. Cleomenes, the Megalopolitan, and his citizens were posted among the Macedonian cavalry, who were supported by the Illyrians, and had received orders not to remove from that post till a particular signal should be given. Philopœmen observing that it would not be difficult to fall upon this light infantry of Euclidas, and rout them entirely, and that the critical moment for the charge had arrived, communicated his opinion to such of the king's officers as commanded the cavalry. They, however, would not listen to the advice of a commander so young and inexperienced. Philopœmen was not to be diverted from his purpose by this rebuff; but at the head of his own citizens he attacked and repulsed that body of infantry with great slaughter. The Macedonians and Illyrians being disengaged by this operation from what before had retarded their motions, boldly marched up the hill to attack their enemies. Euclidas was now to engage with a phalanx whose whole force consisted in the strict union of its parts, the closeness of its ranks, the steady and equal force of its numerous and pointed spears, and the uniform impetuosity of that heavy body, which by its weight overthrew and bore down all before it. In order to prevent this inconvenience an able officer would have marched down the mountain with such of his troops as were lightest armed and most active, to have met the phalanx. He would have attacked them as soon as they began to ascend, and would then have harassed them on every side. The inequalities of the mountain, with the difficulty of ascending it entirely uncovered, would have enabled him to open a passage through this body of men, and to have interrupted their march by putting their ranks into confusion, and breaking their order of battle. He would also have fallen back by degrees, in order to regain the summit of the mountain as the enemy advanced upon him, and after he had deprived them of the only advantage they could expect from the quality of their arms and the dispositions of their troops, he might have improved the advantage of his post in such a manner as to have easily put them to flight. Instead of acting in this manner, Euclidas continued on the top of the mountain, flattering himself that victory would infallibly attend his arms. He imagined in all probability that the higher he permitted the enemy to advance, the easier it would be for him to precipitate their troops down the steep declivity; but, as he had not reserved for his own forces a sufficient extent of ground for any retreat that might happen to be necessary for avoiding the terrible charge of the phalanx, his troops were crowded together in such a manner as obliged him to fight on the summit of the mountain where they could not long sustain the weight of the Illyrian arms, and as his men could neither retreat nor change their ground, they were soon defeated and he was slain by their enemies. During this action the cavalry of each army had also engaged on the plain.

The two kings began their engagement on Mount Olympus, with their light-armed troops and foreign soldiers, of whom each had about 5,000. As the action took place in the sight of each sovereign and his army, the troops vied with each other in signalizing themselves, as well in parties as when the battle became general. Man to man, and rank to rank, all fought with the utmost vigor and obstinacy. Cleomenes, when he saw his brother defeated on Mount Eva, and his cavalry beginning to give ground in the plain, was apprehensive that the enemy would pour upon him from all quarters, and therefore thought it advisable to level all the intrenchments around his camp, and cause his whole army to march out in front. The trumpet having sounded, a signal for the light-armed troops to retreat from the space between the two camps, each phalanx advanced with loud shouts, shifting their lances at the same time, and began the charge. The action was very hot. At one time the Macedonians would fall back before the valor of the Spartans, and at another, the Spartans in turn would recede before the weight of the Macedonian phalanx. At length the troops of Antigonus, advancing with their lances lowered and closed, charged the Macedonians with all the impetuosity of a phalanx that had doubled its ranks, and drove them from their intrenchments. The defeat then became general; the Lacedæmonians fell in great numbers, and those who survived fled from the field of battle in the greatest disorder. Cleomenes, with only a few horse, retreated to Sparta. The most of his foreign troops perished in this battle, and no more than 200 Lacedæmonians escaped out of 6,000. This battle made Antigonus master of Sparta.—Rollin.

SELINUNTUM, B.C. 412. — After the memorable defeat of the Athenians before Syracuse, the Segestans, who had declared in favor of the Athenians against the Syracusans, fearing the resentment of their enemies, and being attacked by the inhabitants of Selinuntum in Sicily, implored the aid of the Carthaginians. The latter, anxious to possess themselves of Selinuntum, which was an exceedingly wealthy and prosperous city, consented to send succor to the Segestans. A large army was immediately raised, and intrusted to the care of Hannibal, the grandson of Hamilcar, who had been defeated and slain by Gelon at Hymera. Hannibal, fired with the desire to revenge his family and his country, and to wipe away the stain which the defeat of his grandfather had placed upon his father and himself, left Carthage with the determination to return home a conqueror or to leave his body on the field of battle. He landed at a place called the Well of Lilybeum, and his first enterprise was the siege of Selinuntum. The attack and defense were equally vigorous, the very women fighting in the defense of their city with a bravery above their sex. After a long resistance, the city was at length taken by storm, and was given over to the soldiers to plunder. Hannibal exercised the most horrible cruelties. He spared neither age nor sex. This city had been built 240 years.

SELKIRK, A.D. 1645.—In 1645 a battle took place near Selkirk, in Scotland, between the troops of the Marquis of Montrose and the army of General Leslie. The army of the marquis was totally defeated.

SEMPACH.—This small town in Switzerland, on the east bank of Lake Sempach, in the canton of Lucerne, is famous in Swiss history, for the victory gained in its vicinity on the 9th of July, 1386, by a Swiss force of about 1,400 men over 4,000 Austrians, commanded by the Archduke Leopold II. The battle was fierce and bloody. The hardy Swiss rushed frantically to the fight; but, borne back on the points of the long lances of the Austrians, they were enabled to break their ranks. At length, many of the Swiss having fallen, Arnold Von Winkelried, a knight of Unterwalden, cried out to his comrades, "I will make a path for you, faithful, beloved friends; think of my family," and rushing upon the wall of Austrian lances, grasped several of the weapons in his hands, and regardless of the thrusts, bore their owners with him to the ground. His countrymen beheld his death, and with shouts of rage rushed through the opening he had made, and attacked the Austrians with such valor that they were soon put to rout. In this battle Leopold was slain, and 2,000 Austrians fell in the conflict and the pursuit. The Swiss lost only 200 men. The Swiss on the anniversary of this day, hold a national celebration in honor of the gallant knight of Unterwalden, and those who fell with him.

SENNEFFE, A.D. 1674.—This village in Belgium is celebrated from its vicinity having seen one of the most sanguinary conflicts of modern times. Here, on the 11th of August 1647, a French army, under the famous Prince of Condé, attacked the rear guard of the confederates, commanded by the Prince of Orange (afterward William III., King of England), and gained a considerable advantage. But, not satisfied with this, Condé imprudently attacked the main body of the confederates, who had taken up a very strong position, on which, notwithstanding the most astonishing efforts, he could make no impression. The loss on both sides was nearly equal; and such was the slaughter, that over 20,000 men were left on the field of battle. To use the words of Voltaire, "La grande et celebre bataille de Senef ne fut qu' un carnage." Both armies withdrew the next day, neither attempting to molest the other. This was the last great battle fought by the Prince of Condé.

SERINGAPATAM, A. D. 1799. — This celebrated fortress is situated at the west angle of an island in the Cavery, nine miles north-east of Mysore in India. Seringapatam was besieged by the English in 1791, and in 1792 when Tippoo Saib purchased a peace by ceding half his dominions and paying a large sum of money to the British. In the last siege, of which we insert the details, Tippoo was killed, and the dynasty of Hyder Ali terminated.

Two English armies directed their course toward Seringapatam, the capital of the kingdom of Mysore. General Harris crossed the Cavery on the 31st of March, and established himself at two miles from the south-west of that city; he there waited for General Stuart, who joined him seven days after with a body of troops detached from the army of Madras. Confident in the strength of the works which surrounded the island in which Seringapatam is situated, Tippoo Saib made no effort to oppose this junction. The works were furnished with 400 pieces of cannon, and constructed with the greatest care. For some time he satisfied himself with defending his outworks. The resistance of the sultan, on this point, was as short as it was useless. General Stuart made the Indian troops fall back to within 800 toises of the western angle of the place, and carried an intrenchment which separated him from General Harris, so that Seringapatam was completely invested, and the first parallel was immediately opened. Battery in breach was commenced on the 1st of May; by the 4th it was deemed practicable. Four regiments were selected to mount the breach. General Harris, the more to surprise the sultan, deferred giving the signal till the moment of the greatest heat, in the middle of the day. The English troops and the sepoy grenadiers marched out of the trenches, crossed the pebbly bed of the Cavery under a murderous fire, and mounted to the breaches effected in the fausse-braie and the rampart. The combat was bloody and obstinate. Tippoo Saib, taken by surprise, and rendered desperate by the fear of loss of empire and life, faced death wherever the greatest peril threatened: he perished in the mêlée, together with his principal officers. All the fortifications were carried, but the children of the sultan still defended themselves in the palace, which contained his family, his wives, and his treasures. General Harris promised safety and protection to the inhabitants of the palace, and they surrendered immediately. The body of Tippoo was sought for, and found beneath a heap of slain, near one of the gates; he was recognized by his family, and deposited in the tomb of his father, Hyder Ali. The treasures of his palace were distributed among the victorious army. After the taking of Seringapatam, Tippoo's children, his relations, and the princes engaged in alliance with him, submitted. This operation rendered the English absolute masters of the peninsula of India.

SEVASTOPOL, A.D. 1854.—Sevastopol, latterly the principal naval station of Russia on the Black Sea, stands near the southern extremity of the Crimea, on the north side of a point of land, extending west about ten miles, and on the south side of one of the finest bays in the world.

A detailed account of the siege of Sevastopol would require more space than the limits of our volume can afford; nay, it would require a volume of itself; we must therefore content ourselves by giving merely the events of the siege, dwelling on such portions as we deem of most interest to our readers.

On the 14th of September, the allied army of 70,000 men, embracing English, French, and Turkish troops, under the command of Lord Raglan and Marshal St. Arnaud, landed at Eupatoria in the Crimea. It was conveyed in 100 vessels, and escorted by the entire allied fleet of war ships, then in the Black Sea. Twelve thousand men were left at Baltschik (Turkey), with an immense force of artillery.

On the 18th the armies proceeded toward the great point of their destination, and then for the first time for 500 years, the soldiers of two nations who before had been implacable foes, marched against a common enemy.

On the 20th was fought the battle of the Alma, a detailed description of which will be found in another portion of this volume, and amid constant alerts and skirmishes, while being fearfully thinned by cholera, the allies marched upon and took possession of Balaklava, about seven miles south-east of Sevastopol.

On the 23d a powder magazine belonging to the Russian army, exploded at Perekop, and 430 men were killed.

On the 26th, Marshal St. Arnaud, who commanded the French army, was obliged, by sickness, to resign his command, and left for Constantinople. He died a few days afterward.

The allies on the 5th of October prepared for besieging Sevastopol in due form, and from this day to the 12th, the Russian garrison of Sevastopol, had, by a partial bombardment, 120 men killed and 480 wounded.

On the 17th of October, the allies commenced to bombard Sevastopol both by sea and land. The Russians replied with spirit, and the besiegers soon found that the city was a very different place from what they had expected, and that they had to deal with brave, active, and persevering enemies, always on the watch to take advantage, and commanded by skillful and enterprising officers.

On the 18th a siege battery exploded in the French lines, and 230 men were killed. Four hundred and sixty-five Russians were killed on the same day by an explosion in the Redan.

On the 19th, the allied ships stood in very near to Sevastopol, and recommenced the bombardment. The fire was returned by the Russians with such spirit that in the evening the fleet was obliged to retire, much damaged.

On the 23d, the Russian garrison in Sevastopol made a sally and captured a French battery of eleven guns.

The works of the allies were gradually advancing, yet they had gained thus far no decided advantage; the Russians knew the vast superiority of earth-works over every species of fortification, and under the superintendence of their indefatigable and skillful engineer, Todleben, worked incessantly with the mattock and spade. The allies, meanwhile, suffered fearfully. Toward the end of October a great diminution in the numbers of the troops began to be felt; there was a steady drain, in one way or another, of from forty to fifty men a day.

On the 25th of October was fought the Battle of Balaklava. General Liprandi, with 30,000 Russians, made a desperate attack on the allied troops. In an attempt to turn their right flank, the Russians routed the Turkish troops and took two batteries. Owing to an indiscreet order, Lord Cardigan's division of English light cavalry, charged the Russian batteries, but were routed with a loss of about 600 men and horses, the squadron of 17th Lancers being nearly totally cut off; the Russians suffered severely from the heavy cavalry of the English, but maintained the batteries they had taken. The work in the trenches now became very trying to the besiegers. From the first, the British army was deficient in numbers for such an undertaking. Severe labor, change of climate, and unusual exposure, exhausted them. The French, however, made more progress in the works, and the English were overtasked by an endeavor to keep pace with them. The guns, too, became shaky from continual service. The Russians in this arm excelled the allies; their guns could bear more frequent firing, from the excellence of the iron of which they were composed.

On the 26th, 8,000 Russians made a sortie from Sevastopol, but were repulsed by the besiegers, with a loss of 1,000 men.

By the 30th of October, the position of the allies was rendered very much worse by the closing in upon them of the Russians in their rear; but the sea on the side of Balaklava being protected by the fleet, was still open up to them.

The Russians removed every combustible part from their houses and buildings, so that, with the exception of flesh and blood, the allies had nothing to fire against, but stone walls and mounds of earth. The most keen and active hunter could not be more cunningly and anxiously on the watch for a shot, than were the whole bodies of riflemen in both armies during the siege. But now, as winter approached, the English troops became sensible of the miseries of their situation. With bad weather sickness increased, and the wants of the soldiers were not duly attended to. Amid a scene of universal misery, caused by the negligence of officials, a spectacle was now presented which will ever be remembered. Miss Nightingale, with a band of "ministering angels," was to be seen moving gently around the couches of sick and wounded soldiers, laving with soft hands their burning brows, and administering comfort and consolation to all. At this period of the siege, Russian spies of a bold character occasionally made their appearance in the allied camp, and generally succeeded, after acquiring all the information they desired, in making good their escape.

On Sunday, the 3d of November, was fought the battle of Inkerman. Early in the morning, during a dense fog, the Russian army, increased by reinforcements from the Danube, and animated by the presence of the Grand Dukes Michael and Nicholas, attacked the right of the English position before Sevastopol.

The Russian plans of attack were as perfect as possible, and nothing but the desperate valor of the English troops could have prevented their carrying into effect their threat of driving the besiegers into the sea. "The battle of Inkerman," says Mr. Russel, "admits of no description. It was a series of dreadful deeds of daring of sanguinary hand-to-hand fights, of despairing rallies, of desperate assaults—in glen and valleys, in brushwood glades and remote dells, hidden from all human eyes, and from which the conquerors, Russian or British, issued only to engage fresh foes, till the battalions of the czar gave way before our steady courage, and the chivalrous fire of France." The battle continued till near night, when General Forey's division of the French army drove the Russians into the city, but in the attempt to enter with them, the French were routed with great loss. In this grand struggle, 45,000 Russians were engaged, and their artillery was relieved no less than four times.

Lord Raglan reported the English casualties thus:—43 officers, 32 sergeants, 4 drummers, 383 rank and file killed; 103 officers, 122 sergeants, 17 drummers, 1,710 rank and file wounded; 1 officer, 6 sergeants, 191 rank and file missing. Killed, 462; wounded, 1,952; missing, 191. Total, 2,612. General Canrobert announced the French loss as follows:—"The French army has suffered to the extent of 1,726 killed or wounded. We have bitterly to regret the loss of General de Lourmel, since dead from his wounds. It is my painful duty also to acquaint you with the death of Colonel du Camas, of the sixth regiment of the line, killed at the head of his troops." The Russian Invalide officially reported the Russian loss to be 42 officers, and 2,969 men killed, and 206 officers, and 5,791 men wounded, giving the total of 9,008 killed and wounded. The number of prisoners taken by the allies not given. Three English generals were killed, and four severely wounded.

The fire of the allies on Sevastopol was almost entirely suspended. On the 18th, the Russians were reinforced by 20,000 men. The besiegers experienced sufferings, almost unparalleled. The rain fell incessantly, and misery stared them in the face at all points. Food was scarce; the roads were impracticable, and their camp was a wilderness of mud; a picture of dirt and woe. On the 2d of January, 1855, there were 3,500 sick in the British army before Sevastopol, and their illness was for the most part, caused by hard work in bad weather, and by exposure to wet, without any adequate protection.

The Russians not only opened their new year, on the 12th of January, with the usual ringing of the bells, and other gayeties, but with a tremendous cannonade, and a spirited sortie. They were expected, however, and repulsed with great loss.

On the 19th of January, the historian of the war makes this striking remark: "Except Lord Raglan, Lord Lucan, and Sir R. England, not one of our generals now remain of those who came out here originally: the changes among our brigadiers and colonels have been almost as great—all the rest have been removed from the army by wounds, sickness, or death—and so it is of the men." The superior resources of the French began now to be felt; ground was gradually relinquished to them, and the front, which it cost the British so much strength and health to maintain, was necessarily abandoned to the more numerous and less exhausted army. The French received reinforcements continually, while the English were not dwindling, but being swept away: the grave and the hospital swallowed their men by thousands—between the 1st of December, and the 20th of January, 8,000 sick and wounded men were sent down from camp to Balaklava, and thence on shipboard!—from the battle of Inkerman to this period, 1,000 men of the brigade of guards had been "expended, absorbed, used up, and were no more seen!" Every night was enlivened with a skirmish, and with sharp-shooting behind the parapets, and in the broken grounds between the lines. The Russians, throughout had plenty of men, with a superabundance of materiel—the English had not space for a hundredth part of the cannonades, bombardments, fusillades, sharp-shooting, sorties, and all kinds of annoyances kept up by the Russians: in justice, it must be said, that no place was ever more earnestly, actively, and bravely defended.

Between the 15th and the 31st of January, the Russians made three fearful sorties from Sevastopol, but were invariably repulsed.

Toward the middle of February, the earthworks on both sides had been so nearly perfected, that even the bombardment from mortars of great size produced but little apparent effect. The Russian force, in rear of the allies, was now estimated at 35,000 men: the allies were completely besieged; but the fleet still maintained its position, and secured a free communication with the sea.

As soon as the 21st of February, the allies became aware of the immense labors being carried on by the Russians in the north division of the city, on the other side of the harbor. There were not less than 3,000 men employed in the works, and the correspondent of the Times then foretold the exact purpose for which they were preparing: they were securing themselves a place of retreat. They received almost boundless supplies, without the allies being apparently able to hinder them.

The siege was not unmarked by some of those occasional intercourses which teach men that, although opposed in deadly strife, they are human creatures. Now and then an hour's truce, for the purpose of burying the dead, brought Russian officers out of the town, and civilities were exchanged.

The railway between Balaklava and the camp, now began to be in operation, and was a source of intense wonderment to the Cossack pickets.

The rifle-pits, which are a novelty in siege warfare, next became the objects of constant struggle. They were simple excavations in the ground, in front, and to the right and left of the Malakoff tower, about six hundred yards from the works of the allies. They were faced round with sand-bags, loop-holed for rifles, and banked up with earth thrown from the pits. They were, in fact, little forts or redoubts, to act against the besiegers, armed with rifles instead of cannon. Each could contain ten men, and there were six of them. They were so well protected and covered by the nature of the ground, that neither English riflemen nor French sharpshooters could touch them. Some of the severest fighting of the siege took place for the possession of these pits, which were peculiar objects of French interest, as being in front of their lines. On the 22d of March the French obtained three of these important holes, and immediately commenced a sharp fusillade against the Mamelon and Round Tower, from the sandbags.

Toward the end of March, a happy change was effected for the besiegers: food became plentiful, and camp comforts were even superabundant.

On the 9th of April, the long-expected second bombardment of 530 guns was opened simultaneously by the allies upon the defenses of Sebastopol, amid wind and torrents of rain, with an atmosphere so thick, that even the flashes of the guns were invisible. They were warmly responded to by the Russians. By the 18th, however, the fire slackened on both sides: each seemed glad to avail themselves of a little respite.

On the 19th, a grande reconnaissance was made by the Turkish forces, assisted by the English and French. It was a picturesque march, answered all the intended purpose, and was a great relief to the monotony of the siege. Contests were daily and nightly taking place, each worthy of being made episodes in a great poem. "Deeds of daring," of firm courage and devotion, were enacted in numbers by officers and men: the contest on both sides was truly "a strife of heroes;" but it must be left to the bards of future ages.

The French lines were now within a few hundred yards of the Mamelon, and the British advanced parallel inclined toward the Round Tower. The progress was steady, but it was dearly bought: the Russians contested every inch of ground bravely.

The Russian night-attacks were more frequent, but they were, in all cases, repulsed with loss, although well planned and bravely carried out. The principal disadvantage to the British arose from the havoc made among their best soldiers; the bravest would go to the front, and were the first victims. Races and cricket matches were got up—but, after a few trials, died out. The gallant troops tried all they could to keep up their spirits; but the real game going on was too serious.

On the 16th of May the allies were delighted by a welcome reinforcement. The Sardinian troops began to arrive; and, in addition to the gratification derived from such a circumstance, they were surprised by their warlike and splendid appearance. It was something new to the weather-beaten warriors, to see troops so newly and handsomely equipped.

On the 19th of May the allied army completed its fourth parallel toward Sevastopol. Of English, French, Turks and Sardinians, there were 200,000 men operating in the Crimea.

On the 23d of May the French fought a severe battle with the Russians before Sevastopol. The Russians had formed between the central bastion and the sea a large place d'armée where they proposed assembling considerable forces to make sorties. In the night the French attacked these works, which were defended by nearly the entire garrison. The combat was fierce, and lasted during nearly the whole night. The French carried and occupied half the works. The French had 1,600 killed and wounded, and the Russians were supposed to have lost 6,000 men.

On the 24th the French carried the remaining half of the Russian place d'armée, after a fierce struggle, in which the French lost about 2,000 men, and the Russians 2,500.

On the 6th of June, for the third time, the fire of the allies was opened along the whole range of positions; the thunder of 300 French guns and mortars, and 157 on the side of the English, awakened their echoes and hurled their bolts against Sevastopol.

On the 7th, the Mamelon and White Towers at Sevastopol were captured by the English and French troops. The French took 60 guns and over 400 prisoners. The Russians had 4,360 men, put hors de combat; the French lost 4,000 men and the English had 165 men killed and missing, with 500 wounded.

On Sunday, the 17th of June, the allies opened a fearful fire on the Malakoff and Redan towers, preliminary to an assault, which was maintained during the entire day. We copy the following glowing account of this assault from the historian of the siege, the wonderfully-graphic correspondent of the London Times:

"The plan of attack originally proposed was that the allies were to open a cannonade for three hours on the Malakoff and Redan after dawn on the morning of the 18th; that the French were to assault the Malakoff, and that when they had gained possession of it we were to attack the Redan. As the latter work is commanded by the former, it would not be possible to carry or to hold it till the Malakoff was taken.

"The fire which we opened on Sunday morning (the 17th), preliminary to the assault, was marked by great energy, weight, and destructiveness. In the first relief the Quarry battery, commanded by Major Strange, threw no less than 300 8-inch shells into the Redan, which is only 400 yards distant, and the place must have been nearly cleared by the incessant storm of iron splinters which flew through it. Throughout Sunday our artillery fired 12,000 rounds of the heaviest ordnance into the enemy's lines, and on the following day we fired 11,946 rounds of shot and shell. The Russian fire was weak and wild. Had the three hours' cannonade and bombardment which Lord Raglan decided on administering to the Russians before we assaulted been delivered to them, it is very probable that we should have but a small body of troops prepared to receive us at the parapets; and it must be esteemed a very unfortunate circumstance that his lordship was induced to abandon his intention in deference to the wishes of General Pelissier. General Pelissier, in requesting the English general to change the original plan of attack and to forestall the hour which was at first agreed upon, is not stated to have assigned any specific reason for the alteration, but it is reported that he wished to anticipate the enemy, who were about, as he was informed, to make an assault on the Mamelon. He felt, too, that the masses of French whom he had prepared could not be concealed from the Russians for any length of time, and that they would soon be revealed by the noise which always attends the movements of large bodies of men.

"As the 34th regiment advanced, the supports, by some means or another, got mixed together with them, and some confusion arose in consequence. On crossing the trench our men, instead of coming upon the open in a firm body, were broken into twos and threes. This arose from the want of a temporary step above the beam, which would have enabled the troops to cross the parapet with regularity; instead of which they had to scramble over it as well as they could; and, as the top of the trench is of unequal height and form, their line was quite broken. The moment they came out from the trench the enemy began to direct on their whole front a deliberate and well-aimed mitraille, which increased the want of order and unsteadiness caused by the mode of their advance. Poor Colonel Yea saw the consequences too clearly. Having in vain tried to obviate the evil caused by the broken formation and confusion of his men, who were falling fast around him, he exclaimed, 'This will never do! Where's the bugler to call them back?' But, alas! at that critical moment no bugler was to be found. The gallant old soldier, by voice and gesture, tried to form and compose his men, but the thunder of the enemy's guns close at hand and the gloom of early dawn frustrated his efforts; and as he rushed along the troubled mass of troops which were herding together under the rush of grape, and endeavored to get them into order for a rush at the batteries, which was better than standing still, or retreating in a panic, a charge of the deadly missile passed, and the noble soldier fell dead in advance of his men, struck at once in head and stomach by grape-shot. The signal for our assault was to be given by the discharge of two service rockets, which were to have been fired when the French got into the Malakoff, and the latter were to have hoisted a flag as a signal of their success.

"It is certain that the French did for a short time establish themselves in the Malakoff, but they were soon expelled with loss, and I saw with my own eyes a large triangular blue and black flag waving from the Malakoff all during the fight. The moment the rockets were fired, the light division rushed out of cover; in a quarter of an hour this infantry

Balaklava was over, so far as any chance of success was concerned. The second division, seeing that the flank attacks had failed, wisely kept under cover, and suffered but a trifling loss. Had they foolishly advanced, we should have to deplore greater and more useless slaughter. The fourth division were guided down by their active Quartermaster-general, Colonel Wyndham, and took ground in the trench to the left, but it would seem as if they attacked a little too near the apex of the Redan. Poor Sir John Campbell seems to have displayed a courage amounting to rashness. He sent away Captain Hume and Captain Snodgrass, his aid-de-camps, just before he rushed out of the trench, as if averse to bring them into the danger he meditated, and fell in the act of cheering on his men. The losses of the fourth division were very great. The 57th, out of the 400 men, had more than a third killed and wounded.

"The brigade under Major-General Eyre, which was destined to occupy the Cemetery and to carry the Barrack batteries, consisted of the 9th regiment, 18th regiment, 28th regiment, 38th regiment, and 44th regiment. Four volunteers from each company were selected to form an advanced party, under Major Fielden, of the 44th regiment, to feel the way and cover the advance. The 18th Royal Irish followed as the storming regiment. The brigade was turned out at 12 o'clock, and proceeded to march down the road on the left of the Greenhill battery to the Cemetery, and halted under cover while the necessary dispositions were being made for the attack. General Eyre, addressing the 18th, said, 'I hope, my men, that this morning you will do something that will make every cabin in Ireland ring again!' The reply was a loud cheer, which instantly drew on the men a shower of grape. The skirmishers advanced just as the general attack began, and, with some French on their left, rushed at the Cemetery, which was very feebly defended. They got possession of the place after a slight resistance, with small loss, and took some prisoners, but the moment the enemy retreated their batteries opened a heavy fire on the place from the left of the Redan and from the Barrack battery. Four companies of the 18th at once rushed on out of the Cemetery toward the town, and actually succeeded in getting possession of the suburb. Captain Hayman was gallantly leading on his company when he was shot through the knee. Captain Esmonde followed, and the men, once established, prepared to defend the houses they occupied.

"As they drove the Russians out, they were pelted with large stones by the latter on their way up to the battery, which quite overhangs the suburb. The Russians could not depress their guns sufficiently to fire down on our men, but they directed a severe flanking fire on them from an angle of the Redan works. There was nothing for it but to keep up a vigorous fire from the houses, and to delude the enemy into the belief that the occupiers were more numerous than they were. Meantime the Russians did their utmost to blow down the houses with shell and shot, and fired grape incessantly, but the soldiers kept close, though they lost men occasionally, and they were most materially aided by the fire of the regiments in the Cemetery behind them, which was directed at the Russian embrasures; so that the enemy could not get out to fire down on the houses below. Some of the houses were comfortably furnished. One of them was as well fitted up as most English mansions, the rooms full of fine furniture, a piano in the drawing-room, and articles of luxury and taste not deficient. The troops entered the place about four o'clock in the morning, and could not leave it till nine o'clock in the evening. The Russians blew up many of the houses and set fire to others, and when our men retired, the flames were spreading along the street. The 18th regiment lost 250 men. The 9th regiment succeeded in effecting a lodgment in the houses in two or three different places, and held their position as well as the 18th. A serjeant and a handful of men actually got possession of the little Wasp battery, in which there were only twelve or fourteen Russian artillerymen. They fled at the approach of our men, but when the latter turned round they discovered they were quite unsupported; and the Russians, seeing that the poor fellows were left alone, came down on them and drove them out of the battery. An officer and half-a-dozen men of the same regiment got up close to a part of the Flagstaff battery, and were advancing into it, when they, too, saw that they were by themselves, and, as it was futile to attempt holding their ground, they retreated. About fifteen French soldiers on their left aided them, but as they were likewise unsupported they had to retire. Another officer with only twelve men took one of the Russian Rifle Pits, bayonetted those they found in it, and held possession of it throughout the day. Meantime, while these portions of the 5th and 18th, and parties of the 44th and 28th were in the houses, the detachments of the same regiments and of the 38th kept up a hot fire from the Cemetery on the Russians in the battery and on the sharp-shooters, all the time being exposed to a tremendous shower of bullets, grape, round shot, and shell. The loss of the brigade, under such circumstances, could not but be extremely severe. One part of it, separated from the other, was exposed to a destructive fire in houses, the upper portion of which crumbled into pieces or fell in under fire, and it was only by keeping in the lower story, which was vaulted and well built, that they were enabled to hold their own. The other parts of it, far advanced from our batteries, were almost unprotected, and were under a constant mitraille and bombardment from guns which our batteries had failed to touch.

"Some of the officers got away in the great storm which arose about eleven o'clock, and blew with great violence for several hours.

"The detachments from the hard-working and little noticed Naval Brigade consisted of four parties of sixty men each, one for each column, but only two of them went out, the other two being kept in reserve; they were told off to carry scaling-ladders and wool-bags, and to place them for our storming parties. It is not to be wondered at if they suffered severely. On that eventful day, fourteen men were killed, and forty-seven men were wounded. Two men were killed, and several others were wounded by the bursting of one of our sixty-eight-pounders, in the left attack. Among the latter was Major Stuart Wortley, who was injured by the explosion. As soon as the two storming columns got out of the parallel the sailors suffered severely. When the men retreated, overwhelmed by the storm from the enemy's battery, several officers and men were left behind wounded, and endured fearful agonies for hours, without a cup of water or a cheering voice to comfort them. Lieutenant Kidd got into the trench all safe, and was receiving the congratulatious of a brother officer, when he saw a wounded soldier lying out in the open. He at once exclaimed—"We must go and save him!" and leaped over the parapet in order to do so. He had scarcely gone a yard, when he was shot through the breast and died in an hour after. Only three officers came out of action untouched. Captain Peel, who commanded the detachment, was shot through the arm.

"The natural consequence, in civilized warfare, of such a contest as that which took place yesterday, is an armistice to bury the dead. It was our sad duty to demand it, for our dead lay outside our lines, and there were no Russian corpses in front of the Redan or Malakoff. Somehow or other, the rumor got abroad that there would be an armistice early in the day, and we hoisted a white flag in the forenoon, but there was no such emblem of a temporary peace displayed by the Russians.

"Our batteries and riflemen ceased firing, and the Russians crowded the tops of the parapets of the Redan and of the Round Tower (Malakoff) batteries, and did not harass us by any fire, but of course it was dangerous to go out in front of the lines till they hoisted the white flag also. The advanced trenches were filled with officers and soldiers eager to find the bodies of their poor comrades; but they could not stir out of the parallels. They waited patiently and sadly for the moment when friendship's last melancholy office could be performed. Boats were at last seen to leave the roads of Sevastopol, and to meet boats from the fleet at the entrance, and it became known that the Russians had acceded to an armistice, and that it was to take place at four o'clock in the afternoon. To pass the weary time away, there was nothing to do but to watch the Russians at work repairing their batteries—labors which they continued during the armistice subsequently—and to make out the bodies which lay scattered about in front of the Redan and Malakoff. It was agonizing to see the wounded men who were lying there under a broiling sun, parched with excruciating thirst, racked with fever, and agonized with pain—to behold them waving their caps faintly or making signals toward our lines, over which they could see the white flag waving, and not to be able to help them. They lay where they fell, or had scrambled into the holes formed by shells; and there they had been for thirty hours—oh! how long and how dreadful in their weariness! An officer told me that one soldier who was close to the abatis, when he saw a few men come out of an embrasure, raised himself on his elbow, and, fearing he should be unnoticed and passed by, raised his cap on a stick and waved it till he fell back exhausted. Again he rose, and managed to tear off his shirt, which he agitated in the air till his strength failed him. His face could be seen through a glass; and my friend said he never could forget the expression of resignation and despair with which the poor fellow at last abandoned his useless efforts, and folded his shirt under his head to await the mercy of Heaven. Whether he was alive or not when our men went out I can not say; but five hours of thirst, fever, and pain, under a fierce sun would make awful odds against him. The red coats lay sadly thick over the broken ground in front of the abatis of the Redan, and blue and gray coats were scattered about or lay in piles in the raincourses before the Malakoff."

In this repulse, the allies lost in killed and wounded over 5,000 men. Every one of the English commanders was slain, with two French generals—Mayrau and Brunet—distinguished men. The Russians lost about 4,000 men, killed and wounded. Two superior officers were slain, and two generals and twelve superior officers were wounded.

On the 20th of June Lord Raglan died,

STORMING OF THE MALAKOFF.

and the command of the British army devolved upon General Simpson.

During the month of July, the Russians made several severe sorties, but were as often repulsed, and the allies made steady progress in their advance toward the doomed city. With their hosts of sappers, the French made daily approaches to mining the principal fortifications, and in July, the Russian commander became so aware of the peril of his situation, that he informed his government he could not hold the city much longer. The Court of St. Petersburg ordered the bold assault to be made on the lines of the Tchernaya, in the hope of compelling the allies to raise the siege, and of regaining Balaklava. The Russians then put forth their energies in one more desperate attack.

Battle of the Tchernaya.—On the morning of the 16th of August, Generals Liprandi and Prince Gortschakoff, with 40,000 Russians, advanced to the attack. The French divisions were encamped on the summit of the hills between which runs a road which crosses the river Tchernaya, over a stone bridge in the valley. The bridge was defended by a small redoubt. The Sardinians had batteries regularly fortified on all the heights overlooking the ford on the road to Tchorgoun, and had the upper end of the valley completely within their range. On the other side of the river on the top of a hill, similar in every respect to those already described, they had an intrenched outpost composed of two companies of infantry.

The attack commenced about five o'clock, the first shots being heard near the Sardinian position. The fire almost immediately opened along the whole line, but it was soon rendered evident that the chief aim of the Russian commander was to force the passes communicating with the valley of Balaklava, and thus to turn the flank of the French position on the hills, and break their chain of communication with the Piedmontese troops. There are two principal routes or openings in this direction. One is formed by a break in the line of hills stretching across the plain, leaving a passage between its east end, and a part cut off, as it were, and assuming the form of an irregular Mamelon. This Mamelon, as well as the line of hill, was held by French troops. The second pass is between the Mamelon and the opening to Tchorgoun, and along this the river finds its way as it comes out of the gorge to wind through the valley. Through the first-named opening the high road from Simpherpol to Balaklava passes, and nearly opposite to it is a handsome stone bridge, spanning the river by two arches. This bridge is approached on either side by a gradual incline, the road being carried over a series of land arches. The river, under ordinary circumstances, is fordable at this part. At the second opening there is no bridge across the river, excepting that for the aqueduct; the water spreads out, and is readily fordable. The passage of this ford was commanded by the guns of a redoubt held by the Sardinians.

It was in the neighborhood of the stone bridge and the ford above, that the severest part of the struggle took place. The numbers of dead lying about these two positions are greater than in any other part of the field of action. The Russians, as they approached along the road to the bridge, and on each side, were mown down by the fire of the artillery of the allies, and on the opposite side, the French, who were defending the passage, suffered from the fire of the Russian artillery, which had been brought up on the heights on the east of the road and valley. On two occasions the Russians succeeded in crossing the bridge, and in considerable numbers began to climb up the sides of the Mamelon and the end of the hill occupied by the French, but the fire of the Rifles above drove them back. It is stated that at one time the Russians were forced back by the 62d French infantry at the point of the bayonet, but this is doubtful. As they retired across the river, the artillery of the allies committed great execution among them. Some of the French troops assert that the passage of the bridge by the Russians could have been easily prevented, but that it was purposely permitted, with the motive of entrapping them into more certain destruction. Be this as it may, the cross fire which was opened between the hills from the rifles of the infantry, and the direct fire of the artillery, caused great havoc among their ranks, and after the fight the bodies of the killed were found to be thickly strewn as far as sixty or seventy yards on the French side of the river. The aqueduct is not carried along by the side of the river, but, for the sake of having a higher level, is placed at the foot of the hills for some distance, the curves and windings of which it closely follows. The aqueduct is deep, and not easily crossed. Between it and the hill side there is usually a deep ditch. Many of the Russians had not only crossed the river, but, pursuing their way, had also crossed the aqueduct. To enable them to do this, they had been provided with numerous small platforms, just long and broad enough to form so many bridges across the aqueduct; these they had carried with them. In some places many wounded and dead were found lying in the ditch between the hill-side and the bank upon which the aqueduct is raised. The small wooden platforms carried by the men could be joined together so as to form rafts, if required, for use on the river; but pontoons also were amply provided for the construction of regular bridges for the passage of cavalry or artillery. A great number of these small rafts, and also some pontoons were left on the field, and taken by the allies.

The Russians gave one "Hurrah," as if they intended to come up to the scratch, but instead of suiting the action to the word, they wheeled about, and flung themselves down the hill-side in complete disorder, the Sardinian artillery again playing upon them as before. Some hundreds threw down their arms, and surrendered to the French, sooner than run the gauntlet once more across the aqueduct and the river. The remnant of the column got under cover on the other side of the stream, and remained there for some minutes, until two battalions of Piedmontese came out upon the plain, and throwing out skirmishers, advanced upon the river. The Russians now retired in haste, and not in very good order, skirmishing as they went, until they reached the high ground on which their cavalry and the reserve of their artillery were stationed. During the pursuit the Piedmontese made some prisoners. The moment was propitious for a charge of cavalry, who might have cut them up completely.

Major Grovac, the second on the Sardinian etat-major, accordingly brought down their four squadrons, but the colonel objected to charge in face of the Russian cavalry force, fully 5,000 in number, unless he was supported by French or English. A message was accordingly sent to General Maurice, the French general commanding the cavalry, requesting him to push forward a body of his men in the rear of the Piedmontese, but he declined, alleging that he had positive orders not to pursue, having returned a similar answer to General Erbillon, who commanded on the heights. This is extraordinary, but true, and the only thing one can say about it is to express a hope that there was some good reason for it, not visible at first sight. The greater part of the Russian artillery now retired, followed up for a short distance by the French Chasseurs de Vincennes; the cavalry then advanced in an immense line, forming a crescent, from out of which issued three guns which fired away to protect the retreat till the last column had wound its weary way up the road to Mackenzie's Farm, or disappeared among the hills toward Tchionlion.

The scene which presented itself on the banks of the river, after the battle, below the canal, was something fearful beyond description, much more fearful than the ordinary horrors of a battle-field. The canal itself was choked with dead, most of whom had doubtless fallen into it living, after rolling down the hill-side, and found repose in its muddy waters; broken muskets, bags of bread, cartridges, one dark red stain on the white gravel, often alone marked the spot where the men first fell. On toward the bridge the dead lay thicker and thicker. On the banks of the river about it, and in the river itself, they were "heaped and piled," mostly fine men, in the prime of life—many with a vieux grognard air, which bespoke long years of service. Nearly every one had a brandy-bottle, either actually in his hand or lying near him, or broken under him in his fall.

In this battle the allies lost about 1,000 men, killed and wounded; the Russians lost nearly 6,000 men, killed, wounded, and made prisoners. Among the slain were the Russian generals Read, Weiman, and Cyerwiky.

The next fortnight Prince Gortschakoff may be said to have devoted to providing for the safety of his army. He had great reason to fear the next bombardment would be fatal; he established a means of communication between the battered ruins of the south side of Sevastopol and that north side upon which so much labor and time had been expended; he built a strong raft-bridge across the harbor, threw up earthworks along the cliff to protect it, and drew his army together in compact lines between the sea and the heights of Mackenzie.

On the 5th of September the awful catastrophe was entered upon. All was preparation with both besiegers and besieged; the former girding up their loins for the great struggle, the latter doing all that could be done to meet it manfully. General Pellissier had had a long interview with General Simpson the preceding day, in which the plan of attack was settled.

The allies opened the fire of their terrible batteries on the 5th of September, and maintained an incessant cannonade until the 8th, the day fixed upon for the final assault. The following is the most important part of the dispatch of General Pelissier, comprising a full account of the French assault on the Malakoff:

"A little before noon all the troops were in readiness, and in perfect order on the points indicated, and the other arrangements had been punctually executed. General de Salles was ready; General Bosquet was at the fighting post which he had chosen in the sixth parallel; and I, with Generals Thiry of the artillery, Niel of the engineers, and Martimprey, the chief of my staff, was at the Brancion redoubt, which I had chosen for my head-quarters.

"All our watches had been regulated. At noon precisely all our batteries ceased to thunder, in order that they might be adjusted to a longer range, so as to reach the reserves of the enemy. At the word of their chiefs, the divisions of Generals M'Mahon, Dulac, and De la Motterrouge, left the trenches. The drums and the clarions beat and sounded the charge, and to the cry of "Vive l'Empereur!" a thousand times repeated along the whole line, our intrepid soldiers precipitated themselves upon the enemy's defenses. It was a solemn moment. The first brigade of M'Mahon's division, the first regiment of Zouaves leading, followed by the 7th of the line, and having the 4th Chasseurs à Pied on its left, sprang to the left face and the salient of the Malakoff work. The breadth and depth of the ditch, the height and steepness of the slope, rendered the ascent extremely difficult to our men; but finally they gained the parapet, manned with Russians, who, in default of muskets, picked up whatever came to hand—mattocks, stones, or rammers—and used them as weapons. Then took place a hand-to-hand struggle—one of those exciting combats in which nothing but the intrepidity of our soldiers and their chiefs can give them the victory. They immediately sprang into the work; they drove back the Russians who continued to resist, and, in a few seconds afterward, the flag of France was finally planted on the Malakoff.

"At the right and center, with that same impetuous dash which had overthrown so many obstacles and forced the enemy to fly, the divisions of Dulac and De la Motterouge, led by their chiefs, had seized the little Redan at the Careening Bay, and also the Curtain, forcing their way even as far as the second enceinte that was being constructed. Everywhere we were in possession of the works attacked. But this first and brilliant success had near cost us very dear. Struck by a large splinter from a bomb in his right side, General Bosquet was compelled to quit the field of battle. I confided the command to General Dulac, who was admirably seconded by General de Liniers, chief of the staff of the 2d corps.

"The engineers who accompanied the storming columns were already at work; they filled up the ditches, opened passages, and threw across bridges. The second brigade of General de M'Mahon advanced rapidly to reinforce the troops in the Malakoff. I gave the signal agreed upon with General Simpson for the attack on the Great Redan, and shortly after for the attack on the town.

"The English had 200 meters to cross under a terrible fire of grape. This space was soon strewed with dead; nevertheless, this did not stop the march of the storming column, which advanced toward the capital of the work. It descended into the ditch, which is nearly five meters deep, and, despite all the efforts of the Russians, it scaled the escarpe, and carried the salient of the Redan. There, after the first brunt of the engagement, which cost the Russians dear, the English soldiers found in front of them only a vast open space, crossed by the balls of the enemy, who kept himself close behind some distant traverses. Those who came up hardly replaced those who had been disabled. It was not until they had sustained for nearly two hours this unequal contest that the English decided on evacuating the Redan. They did so with so firm an aspect that the enemy did not dare to follow them.

"In the mean time, on the left, at the appointed signal, the columns of Levalliant's division, commanded by Generals Couston and Trochu, dashed headlong against the left flank of the central bastion and the left lunette. In spite of a shower of balls and projectiles, and after a very sharp contest, the spirit and vigor of these brave troops triumphed at first over the enemy's resistance, and notwithstanding the accumulated difficulties in their front, they forced their way into the two works. But the enemy, having fallen back on his successive traverses, kept his ground everywhere. A murderous fire of musketry was opened from every ridge. Guns unmasked for the first time, and field-pieces brought up to several points, vomited grape and decimated our men. Generals Coustan and Trochu, who had just been wounded, were obliged to give up their command. Generals Rivet and Breton were killed; several mine-chambers, fired by the enemy, produced a moment of hesitation. At length an attack in their turn by numerous Russian columns, compelled our troops to abandon the works they had carried, and to retire into our advanced places d'armées.

"Our batteries on this part of the attacks, skillfully conducted by General Lebœuf, aided so devotedly and intelligently, as on all occasions, by Rear Admiral Rigault de Genouilly, changed the direction of their fire while increasing its intensity, and compelled the enemy to take shelter behind the parapets. General de Salles, causing d'Autemarre's division to advance, was preparing during this time a second and formidable attack; but as we had secured the possession of the Malakoff, I sent word to him not to let it advance.

"Our possession of this work, however, was energetically disputed.

"By means of the batteries from the maison en croix, of the guns of his steamers, of field guns brought to favorable points, and of the batteries on the north side of the roadstead, the enemy deluged us with grape and projectiles of every kind, and committed great ravages in our ranks. The powder magazine of the Russian postern battery had just exploded, thereby increasing our loss, and causing the eagle of the 91st to disappear for a moment. A great many superior officers and others were either wounded or killed. The Generals de Saint Pol and de Marolles died gloriously, and Generals Mellinet, de Pontèves, and Bourbaki, had been wounded at the head of their troops. Three times the division of Dulac and de la Motterouge seized the Redan and the curtain, and three times they were obliged to fall back before a terrible fire of artillery and the dense masses arrayed in front of them. Nevertheless the two field-batteries of reserve from the Lancaster battery descended at a trot, crossed the trenches, and boldly stationed themselves within half-range. They succeeded in driving away the enemy's columns and the steamers. A part of these two divisions, supported in this heroic struggle by the troops of the Guard, who on this day covered themselves with glory, made good their footing in the entire left of the curtain, from which the enemy could not drive them. During the renewed combats of the right and the center, the Russians redoubled their efforts to reconquer the Malakoff. This work, which is a sort of earthen citadel of 350 meters in length and 159 meters in width, armed with sixty-two guns of different caliber, crowns a Mamelon which commands the whole interior of the Karabelnaia quarter, takes in reverse the Redan which was attacked by the English, is only 1,200 meters from the south harbor, and threatens not merely the only anchorage now remaining for the ships, but the only means of retreat open to the Russians, namely, the bridge thrown across the roadstead from one bank to the other.

"Thus during the first hours of the strife of the two armies, the Russians constantly renewed their attempts; but General M'Mahon, in resisting these incessant attacks, was assisted successively by Vinoy's brigade of his division, by the Zouaves of the Guard, General Wimpffen's reserve, and a part of the Voltigeurs of the Guard; in all directions he resisted the enemy, who were everywhere repulsed. The Russians, however, made a last and desperate attempt. Formed in deep column, they thrice assailed the breast of the work, and thrice they were compelled to retire with enormous loss before the solidity of our troops.

"After this last struggle, which ended about five in the evening, the enemy resolved to abandon the spot, and only his batteries continued until night to send us some projectiles, which no longer did us much harm.

"The detachments of the engineers and artillery, who during the combat were gallantly fighting or actively engaged in their special work, quickly set about carrying out the works that were pressing in the interior of the fort under the direction of their officers.

"According to my orders, Generals Thiry and Nief instructed Generals Beuret and Frossard, commanding the artillery and engineers of the second corps, to take all necessary steps for establishing ourselves firmly in the Malakoff, and on that part of the curtain which was in our power, so that we might, in case of need, resist a night attack of the enemy, and be in a position to drive him the next day from the Little Redan of Careening bay, the maison en croix, and all this portion of his defenses.

"The arrangements became, however, unnecessary. The enemy, hopeless of retaking the Malakoff, took an important resolution—he evacuated the town.

"Toward the close of the day I had suspicion of this, for I had seen long lines of troops and baggage defile along the bridge and reach the north bank, and the conflagrations which arose in every direction soon removed all doubt. I should like to push forward, gain the bridge, and cut off the enemy's retreat; but the besieged was at every moment blowing up one or other of his defenses, his powder magazines, and his establishments. These explosions would have destroyed us in detail, and so they rendered the idea impracticable. We remained in position until the day should arise upon this scene of desolation.

"The sun in rising lighted up this work of destruction, which was very much greater than we had been able to imagine. The last Russian vessels, anchored the evening before in the roadstead, were sunken; the bridge was disconnected; the enemy had only reserved his steamers, which carried off the last fugitives and some infatuated Russians who were still walking among the fires in this unhappy city. But presently these men, as well as the steamers, were driven to seek refuge in the indentations of the bank north of the roadstead.

"Thus terminated this memorable siege, during which the army of relief has been twice defeated in order of battle, and the offensive and defensive means of which have attained to colossal proportions. The besieging army had, at its various attacks, 800 guns in battery, which have fired more than 1,600,000 times; and our approaches, excavated in the course of 336 days, in rocky ground, and presenting an extent of more than eighty kilometers (twenty leagues) have been executed under the constant fire of the place, and disturbed by incessant combats day and night.

"The day of September 8th, on which the allied armies proved themselves superior to an army almost equal in number, not invested, intrenched behind formidable defenses, provided with more than 1,100 guns, protected by the guns of the fleet, and of the batteries north of the roadstead, and still disposing of immense resources, will remain an example of what may be expected from an army, brave, disciplined, and inured to war."

As soon as the French tri-color was seen waving over the parapet of the Malakoff, the English prepared for their attack upon the Redan.

At a few minutes past twelve the British left the fifth parallel. The enemy's musketry commenced at once, and in less than five minutes, during which they had to pass over 200 yards from the nearest approach to the parapet of the Redan, they had lost a large portion of their officers, and were deprived of the aid of their leaders, with the exception of acting Brigadier-General Windham, and Captains Fyers, Lewis, and Maude: the rest had been struck down by the volleys of grape and rifle-balls which swept the flanks of the work toward the salient. As they came nearer, the enemy's fire became less fatal. They crossed the abatis without much trouble: it was torn to pieces by their shot; the men stepped over and through it with ease. The light division made straight for the salient and projecting angle of the Redan, and came to the ditch, which is about 15 feet deep. The escalade party proceeded to plant their ladders, but they were found too short!—had they not been so, they would not have been of much use, as there were but six or seven brought to the place. But the officers set their men the example of leaping into the ditch, scrambling up the other side, and thence getting on the parapet with little opposition, as the Russians who were in front ran back, and opened a fire upon them from behind the traverses and breastworks. When upon the parapet, the soldiers seemed bewildered; their gallant officers cheered them on, coaxed them on, but instead of following them, they persisted in firing, loading and firing! The officers began to fall fast. The small party of the 90th, much diminished, went on gallantly toward the breastwork, but they were too weak to force it, and joined the men of other regiments, who were keeping up a brisk fire upon the Russians from behind the traverses. Colonel Windham had got into the Redan with the storming party of the light division, below the salient on the proper left face, but all his exertions were as futile as those of the officers of the 90th, 91st, and the supporting regiments.

As the light division rushed out in the front, they were swept by the guns of the Barrack battery, and other pieces on the proper right of the Redan, loaded heavily with grape, which thinned them grievously before they could reach the salient or apex of the work they were to assault. The columns of the second division issuing out of the fifth parallel, rushed up immediately after the light division, so as to come a little down on the slope of the proper left face of the Redan. The first embrasure was in flames, but running on to the next, the men leaped into the ditch, and, with the aid of ladders and each other's hands, scrambled up on the other side, climbed the parapet, or poured in through the embrasure which was undefended. Colonel Windham was one of the first men in on this side. As they entered through the embrasures, the few Russians who were between the salient and the breastwork retreated behind the latter, and got from behind the traverses to its protection. From this place they poured in a thick fire on the parapet of the salient, which was crowded by the men of the light division, and on the gaps through the inner parapet of the Redan; and the British began to return the fire of the enemy without advancing behind the traverses, loaded and fired as quickly as they could, producing little effect, as the Russians were all covered by the breastwork. Groups of riflemen likewise kept up a galling fire from behind the lower traverses, near the base of the Redan. As soon as the alarm of the attack was spread, the Russians came rushing up from the barracks, and increased the intensity of the fire, from which the English were dropping fast, and increasing the confidence of the enemy by their immobility. In vain their officers by word and deed encouraged them on; they were impressed with an idea that the Redan was mined, and that if they advanced they should be blown up. The courage of the officers only made them a mark for the Russian fire, and they fell as soon as they advanced. All was confusion, regiments were confounded, and men refused to obey any but their own officers. We are at a loss to account for the conduct of Colonel Windham, it was that of a hero,—indeed, he is the British hero of the day; but he must have seen that with such a handful of men his efforts were unavailing: he gathered together one little band after another, only to have them swept down by the enemy's guns: his own escape was miraculous. The men kept up a smart fire from behind the lower parts of the inner parapet, but no persuasion or commands could induce them to come out into the open space and charge the breastwork. While the men were thus being terrifically thinned, the Russians gained reinforcements, not only from the town, but from the Malakoff. Thrice did Colonel Windham send officers to Sir E. Codrington, who was in the fifth parallel, begging of him to send up supports in some order of formation; but all these three officers were wounded as they passed from the ditch of the Redan to the rear, and the colonel's own aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Swire, of the 17th, a gallant young officer, was hit dangerously in the hip, as he went on his perilous errand. Supports were, indeed, sent up, but they came up in disorder from the fire to which they were exposed on their way, and arrived in driblets only to increase the confusion and carnage. Finding that he could not collect any men on the left face, Colonel Windham passed through one of the cuts of the inner parapet, and walked over to the right face at the distance of 30 yards from the Russian breastworks, to which he moved in a parallel line, exposed to a close fire, but, wonderful to say, without being touched. When he got behind the inner parapet at the right face, he found the same state of things as that which existed at the left. The men were behind the traverses, firing away at the Russians, or blazing at them from the broken parts of the front, and the soldiers who came down from the salient in front only got behind these works for cover while they loaded and fired at the enemy. The colonel got some riflemen and a few men of the 88th together, but no sooner had he brought them out than they were killed, wounded, or dispersed, by a concentrated fire. The officers aided Colonel Windham, and became the special marks of the enemy's riflemen. The narrow neck of the salient was too close to allow of any kind of formation, and the more the men crowded into it, the more they got out of order, and the more they suffered from the enemy's fire. This miserable work lasted for an hour. The Russians were now in dense masses behind the breastwork, and Colonel Windham walked back again across the open space to the left, to make one more attempt to retrieve the day. The men on the parapet of the salient, who were firing at the Russians, sent their shot about him, and the latter, who were pouring volley after volley on all points of the head of the work, likewise directed their muskets against him, but he passed through this cross-fire in safety, and got within the inner parapet on the left, where the men were becoming thinner and thinner. A Russian officer now stepped over the breastwork, and tore down a gabion with his own hands; it was to make room for a field-piece. Colonel Windham exclaimed to several soldiers who were firing over the parapet, "Well, as you are so fond of firing, why don't you shoot that Russian?" They fired a volley, and missed him, and soon afterward the field-piece began to play on the head of the salient with grape. Colonel Windham saw there was no time to be lost. He had sent three officers for reinforcements, and, above all, for men in formation, and he now resolved to go to General Codrington himself. Seeing Captain Crealock, one of the 90th, near him, busy in encouraging his men, and exerting himself with great courage and energy to get them into order, he said, "I must go to the general for supports. Now mind, let it be known, in case I am killed, why I went away." He crossed the parapet and ditch, and succeeded in gaining the fifth parallel through a storm of grape and rifle-bullets in safety. Sir Edward Codrington asked him if he thought he really could do any thing with such supports as he could afford, and said he might take the Royals who were then in the parallel. "Let the officers come out in front—let us advance in order, and if the men keep their formation, the Redan is ours," was the colonel's reply. But he spoke too late—for at that very moment the British were seen leaping down into the ditch, or running down the parapet of the salient, and through the embrasure out of the work into the ditch, while the Russians followed them with the bayonet and with heavy musketry, and even threw stones and grapeshot at them as they lay in the ditch. Large masses of Russians, supported by grape from several field-pieces, had poured upon the broken, confused parties of the British, and crushed them as if beneath an avalanche. The pursuing Russians were soon forced to return by the fire of the English batteries and riflemen, and under cover of that, many escaped to the approaches.

At eight o'clock, the Russians began quietly to withdraw from the town, after having placed combustibles in every house, with a view of making a second Moscow of Sevastopol. With great art, the commander kept up a fire of musketry from his advanced posts, as if he meant to endeavor to regain the Malakoff. Before two o'clock in the morning the fleet had been scuttled and sunk. About two o'clock flames were observed to break out in different parts of the town, and to spread gradually over the principal buildings. At four, explosion followed upon explosion, and the Flagstaff and Garden batteries blew up; the magnificence of the scene being heightened by the bursting of the numberless shells contained in the magazines. During all this time, the Russian infantry proceeded in a steady, uninterrupted march over the bridge to the north side, so that by six o'clock the last battalion had passed over; the south side of Sevastopol was thus evacuated, and left to its persevering and brave conquerors.

In his retreat, the Russian general, Prince Gortschakoff, maintained the character for generalship he had so fully earned in his defense of Sevastopol. As the place was no longer tenable against the troops and artillery brought against it, nothing could be better than his arrangements for the safety of his army. He fought till the place crumbled away beneath him, and then made a judicious retreat with a very small loss of men. The amount of stores found in the town, after such a contest, seems almost incredible; the capture of four thousand cannon is a thing unheard-of in the history of war.

An eye-witness thus describes the interior of Sevastopol after the conclusion of the siege:

"For the last two days I have passed several hours each day in riding over the whole of the city and batteries. Sevastopol, as you know, is divided into two parts by the Dockyard creek. The city (properly so called) is very large; its houses, public buildings, and churches, were for the most part nearly new, very handsome, and built of a clean white stone. They are now all crumbling smoking, ruins. The streets were wide and planted with trees. Its forts — large casemated buildings, constructed for three tiers of guns facing the entrance of the harbor—were also very handsome and solid, but are now also in ashes.

"On the other side of the Dockyard creek (separated from the city) the public buildings, docks, quays, and basins are on a scale of still greater magnificence. These buildings, although much shattered by our shells, are still standing, the enemy having, I believe, failed to explode a mine under them, owing to their hurried departure. Here were collected vast stores of clothing and other military materials.

"As an instance of the frightful loss the Russians must have sustained in men during the last bombardment and assault I may mention that one of these vast range of buildings proved to have been an hospital. On entering it our people found about 1,000 dead bodies lying in their beds! The horror of this scene far exceeds any I have ever witnessed. They were evidently the bodies of men who had been brought down from the batteries as they fell wounded, but so rapid must have been the accumulation that the medical men were overpowered with numbers, and thus these poor creatures were unheeded, left in their beds to die. Many must have been dead for days, and, horrible to relate, among them a few were found still alive! This number, of course, excludes the hundreds and thousands who were found lying in all parts of the works after the assault. I can not help feeling a pity for the enemy now in their discomfiture, and admiring them for their heroism in defending their much-beloved city. I have heard that a Russian officer (a prisoner) said 'If our men only knew how to fight as they know how to die, they would be the finest troops in the world!'

"Around the great buildings on the eastern side of the Dockyard creek was a town of small houses, called the Karabelnaia suburb, once probably occupied by artisans and mechanics. Such is a short and hurried account of the general features and appearance of the city.

"I will now give you some description of the works which were thrown up for its defense. They are all on the same plan—an earthen rampart of amazing thickness, riveted with gabions and fascines; a ditch cut out of the earth, which, being rocky, stood at a high angle, about twenty feet deep, and even more, at the most vulnerable points. Inside these works the enemy, having had plenty of time to work, and knowing the fearful effect of our vertical fire from mortars, had constructed numerous and thick traverses, and under these traverses were large bomb-proofs, some used as magazines, the rest as dwelling-houses for the defenders; in fact, all along, inside the terre plein of the work, were deep holes in which their men could find shelter. These bomb-proofs were most solidly constructed, sometimes of masonry, but chiefly of large beams (taken from the wrecks of their ships), and covered with earth. Such was the general nature of their works. Their guns were of heavy caliber, and the gunners were perfectly sheltered from musketry by rope mantlins. But the Russians did not stop here. As soon as they found that any point in particular was threatened by the advance of our sap they immediately commenced a second and inner line of works at that point. The second line was equally well made, and mounted with small carronades and field guns. At the Bastion du Mât, which you will remember was long the point to which the French directed their attention, there were no less than four lines of these inner-works, one behind the other. This will give you some slight idea of the perseverance and activity of the enemy in anticipating and providing against an attack on any particular point. The circuit of these works is enormous, and I fancy they had always about 40,000 men or more ready to defend them. When you consider that when we first arrived hardly a vestige of any of these works existed, you will consider they deserve still more credit for their exertions.

"The general plan of these works was a series of redans (with indented flanks), open at the gorge. They only deviated from their plan in one instance, and it was, in my opinion their ruin—I mean at the Malakoff works. So anxious were they about this spot, and so fearful of its being turned and taken by the rear, that they made here an inclosed work with a ditch all round of twenty feet. Now, in the first place, the whole of the interior of the work became by these means so incumbered with traverses that there was little room to concentrate large masses of troops, in addition to which you will perceive that, if once taken, it became a citadel for the captors, and so it proved."

In the final assault on Sevastopol the allies lost 2,019 men killed, 6,399 wounded, and 1,586 missing; the Russians lost 11,328 men in killed, wounded, and missing. It will be seen from this that as many as 21,674 men were either killed or horribly mutilated in a few hours, at the close of a siege which had endured for 349 days.

The actual losses of the belligerent parties in actual combat in this dreadful siege, are variously estimated; but they may be stated in round numbers as follows:—

English,	killed,	wounded	and missing,	20,000
French,	"	"	"	30,000
Turks,	"	"	"	2,000
Sardinians,	"	"	"	1,000
Russians,	"	"	"	80,000

Aside from this, both parties sustained heavy losses through disease and exposure.

SHREWSBURY, A.D. 1403.—Shrewsbury is situated on a peninsula formed by a bend in the river Severn, in the county of Salop, in England, fifty miles south of Liverpool. On the 21st of July, 1403, a desperate battle was fought near this town, between the royal army commanded by Henry IV., and that of the rebel Earl of Northumberland, under the command of the famous Lord Percy, surnamed Hotspur. The evening before the battle, Percy sent a manifesto to Prince Henry, in which he renounced his allegiance, set that prince at defiance, and, in the name of his father, the Earl of Northumberland, and his uncle, as well as his own, enumerated all the grievances of which he pretended the nation had reason to complain. Henry replied to this defiance, by saying that he had no time to lose in writing an answer; that he would prove by the sword that the quarrel of the Percies was false and feigned; and that he had no doubt but that God would give him a victory over perjured traitors. The next morning was fought one of the most obstinate and bloody battles recorded in English history. Hotspur's force consisted of 9,000 knights, squires, yeomen, and archers, "withouten raskaldry," in all numbering about 14,000 men. The royalists were of the same strength, and both armies were composed of men of tried valor. As soon as they were arrayed in front of each other, the king, apprehensive of the result, sent the abbot of Shrewsbury to his opponent, with proposals of peace, which, after a long hesitation, were rejected by the advice of the Earl of Worcester. "Then banner, advance!" cried Henry. The two armies moved like two opposing whirlwinds to the shock. The air resounded with the adverse shouts of "St. George!" and "Esperance, Percy!" and the archers on both sides discharged their arrows in murderous clouds. Percy and Douglas, who had long been rivals for glory, and were esteemed two of the most valorous knights in Christendom, now fought side by side. With thirty attendants they rushed into the very heart of the royal army, cutting their way through the dense mass, and overthrowing every thing before them. The king's guards were dispersed; the Earl of Stafford, Sir Walter Blount, and two others, who to deceive the enemy, wore royal arms, were mistaken for the king, and slain; the royal standard was beaten to the ground, and the Prince of Wales received a ghastly wound in his face. The object of Percy and Douglas was to kill or secure the king; but he by the advice of the Scottish Earl of March, had changed his armor, and was performing the duty of a valorous soldier in a distant part of the field. The two chiefs, disappointed in their purpose, determined to cut their way back through the enemy, who had closed behind them; and they had nearly effected their purpose, when Hotspur fell. An arrow, shot apparently at random, had pierced his heart. With his fall, his followers lost all confidence and courage, and fled in all directions. The battle continued three hours. There are said to have fallen on that day, on both sides, near 2,300 noblemen; but the persons of greatest distinction were on the king's. About 6,000 private men perished, of whom, 4,000 were of Percy's army. The Earl of Worcester, and Douglas were taken prisoners: the former was beheaded at Shrewsbury; the latter received all that courtesy which was usually shown to foreign prisoners of high rank.

The Earl of Northumberland, on hearing of the defeat of his son at Shrewsbury, dismissed his forces, and came with a small retinue to the king at York. He pretended that his sole intention in arming, was to mediate between the parties: Henry thought proper to accept of the apology, and even granted him a pardon for his offense.

SHROPSHIRE, A.D. 51.—In the year 55, B.C., the Romans first invaded Britian; and after ravaging the country, they withdrew, being rather the nominal than the real possessors of the island. Nearly 100 years afterward, Britain was again invaded, by the Romans who advanced into the country without encountering any opposition, until they had arrived at Shropshire, on the banks of the Severn. Here Caractacus, a British chieftain, had drawn up his army to await the approach of the enemy. He had taken possession of a very advantageous position upon an inaccessible mountain, washed by a deep and rapid stream. As soon as the British chieftain saw the Romans approaching, he went from rank to rank, exhorting his men to fight to the last for liberty and life. His words were received by his soldiers, with shouts of enthusiasm and valor. But what could undisciplined bravery avail against the attack of an enemy skilled in all the arts of war, and inspired by a long train of conquests? After an obstinate resistance, the Britons were totally routed, and a few days afterward Caractacus himself fell into the hands of the Romans, through the treachery of Cartismandan, Queen of the Brigantes, with whom he had taken refuge. The capture of this general was received with such joy at Rome, that Claudius commanded that he should be brought from Britain, in order to be exhibited as a spectacle to the Roman people. Accordingly on the day appointed for that purpose, the emperor, ascending his throne, ordered the captives, and Caractacus among the number, to be brought into his presence. The vassals of the British king, with the spoils taken in war, were first brought forward; these were followed by his family, who with abject lamentations, were seen to implore for mercy. Last of all came Caractacus, with an undaunted air, and a dignified aspect. He appeared no way dejected at the amazing concourse of spectators that were gathered upon this occasion; but casting his eyes on the splendors that surrounded him, he said: "Alas! how is it possible that a people possessed of such magnificence at Rome, could envy me an humble cottage in Britain." Claudius, the Roman emperor was affected with the British hero's misfortunes, and won by his address. He ordered him to be unchained upon the spot and set at liberty with the rest of the captives.—Goldsmith.

SIEDLECE. See Warsaw.

SIETA AGNAS, A.D. 1808–1836.—Sieta Agnas, a village of Spain, has been the scene of two battles. The first was fought between the Spaniards and the French under General Moncey. The Spaniards were defeated. The second was fought between the royal troops of Spain, under General Ovalle, and the Carlists. The latter were defeated.

SILLISTRIA, A.D. 1854. — Sillistria a strongly fortified town in European Turkey, has been besieged four times by the Russians. In 1773, and in 1809 it resisted every effort of the Russians to capture it; but in 1829, after a long and arduous siege the Russians captured it. In 1854, it was again besieged by the Russians; but its gallant garrison preserved it, intact notwithstanding the most strenuous exertions on the part of the besiegers.

SMOLENSKO, A.D. 1812.—The ancient and venerable city of Smolensko, in Russia, is situated on two hills, which there restrain within a narrow channel the stream of the Dnieper, 250 miles west south-west of Moscow.

On the 9th of May, 1812, Napoleon set out from St. Cloud; and on the 16th of June he crossed the Vistula; on the 22d of that month he formally declared war against Russia. On the 24th of June he crossed the Niemen, and entered the Russian territories, and thus commenced his famous invasion of Russia, which was ended with the burning of Moscow, and the disastrous retreat of the French army. The Russians retreated as the French advanced. On the 28th of June the French emperor entered Wilna, where a diet was immediately assembled, and Poland was declared free and independent. On the 17th of July he left Wilna and pushed on for Witepski, where his troops went for a short time into quarters for refreshments.

On the 15th of August the French army crossed the Dnieper at several fords in order of battle, with the emperor in the center on horseback, and at Liady, entered the territories of Old Russia. Advancing forward, Marshals Ney and Murat, who headed the leading columns of the army, overtook, near KRASNOI, General Newerofskoi, who with the Russian rear guard, was slowly retreating in the direction of Smolensko. A battle ensued, and the Russian general, attacked by a force stronger than his own, was forced to quicken his retreat toward Smolensko. Murat's cavalry pursued the fugitive Russians hotly; and the sight presented by that noble body of horse, led by the chivalrous general, who, attired in his most magnificent uniform, urged on his men with all that reckless ardor which characterized him, must have been truly magnificent and exciting. Murat also detached some of his light squadrons to the head of the retreating column, which being overtaken and stopped, the horsemen who formed the advance were speedily driven into the ranks of the infantry, which was pressing on from behind with all the eagerness of a flight for life. Newerofskoi, at this critical moment, evinced all the coolness and courage of an experienced general. Instantly dividing his army into two hollow squares, which were soon afterward united into one, he retired slowly and in good order over the immense plains which adjoin the Dnieper. The French charged upon the Russians repeatedly, and in some instances broke through the hedge of bayonets, and cut down the Russian officers in the very center of the square. Yet the squares were formed again, and the Russians, still forming a lesser square when the larger was broken or weakened by loss, steadily retired during the whole day, repulsing, by a heavy rolling fire, the repeated charges of the French cavalry, and at length, after sustaining enormous losses, at the approach of night reached Korytnia, with unbroken ranks. On the following day Newerofskoi effected a junction with Raeffskoi, and with their united forces these generals threw themselves into Smolensko, resolved to defend themselves to the last extremity. On the 16th of August, the French army arrived in the vicinity of Smolensko. At four o'clock in the morning of that day, the troops of Murat and Ney appeared before Smolensko, and Napoleon having arrived an hour afterward, ordered an immediate attack on the citadel of the place, by Ney's corps. This attack was repulsed by the Russians under Raeffskoi, who with Newerofskoi and 19,000 men, were now shut up in the city. The Russian generals, however, awaited with anxious expectation the arrival of the main body of the Russian army; and at length their eyes were gladdened by the sight of the vast clouds of dust, which concealed an army of 120,000 Russians under Barclay and Bagrathion, who were hastening from Krasnoi to the relief of their comrades. Bagrathion was the first to enter, and having secured the important communication of the bridges, instantly reinforced the Russians in the town. Napoleon, believing that the enemy was resolved to defend Smolensko, with all his forces, immediately made his dispositions for a general attack on the following day. His army, exclusive of the corps of Junot, which were not come up, amounted to 180,000 men, and 500 pieces of cannon. The Imperial Guard was in the center; Murat, Ney, and Davoust, at the head of their respective forces, were prepared to commence the attack at once. The emperor planted his tent in the midst of the first line, almost within cannon-shot of the city.

"Never," says Alison, "was a nobler spectacle presented in military annals than the French army exhibited on the day preceding the grand attack on Smolensko. The simultaneous converging of so vast a multitude, from all directions to the westward, presented to those that watched their movements, from the domes of the cathedral of Smolensko, at first a confused multitude of men, horses, artillery, and chariots, who covered the earth as far as the eye could reach; but by degrees, order began to appear in the chaos; the different corps and squadrons took up their allotted ground; the artillery ranged itself on the prominent eminences, and the admirable arrangements of modern discipline appeared in their highest luster. Silently the troops defiled out of the crowd, and took up their appointed stations; no sound of drums or trumpets was heard, as on a day of parade; the solemnity of the occasion, the awful nature of the contest which awaited them, had impressed every heart."

But the Russian general did not accept the challenge of the French emperor. Early the next morning they were seen in full retreat toward Elnia. Napoleon was bitterly disappointed at this result, for he was confident of victory. He endeavored in various ways to cut off their retreat and force them into a battle; but all his efforts were fruitless, and he instantly ordered the storming of Smolensko. It is stated that Murat was opposed to this movement, and tried to dissuade the emperor from making it; but finding his efforts in vain, the King of Naples was so much incensed, that he planted himself in front of one of the most formidable of the Russian batteries, and remained standing immovable, and unhurt amid a tempest of balls which was cutting down men at his very side by scores. The French advanced bravely to the assault, and after a fierce fight succeeded in firing the town by means of their howitzers. But the Russians made a determined resistance, and the French at nightfall had not entered the town. At seven o'clock in the evening, Napoleon ordered the assaulting columns to withdraw to the main body of the army, which lay in the vast semicircle around the place. In the conflicts which took place around Smolensko, during the 16th and 17th of August, 16,000 Russians were either killed, wounded, or made prisoners; while the French loss was nearly as great. On the night of the 17th, the Russians abandoned Smolensko, and on the following day the French entered the town in triumph. From Smolensko, Napoleon proceeded on his path toward Moscow, victorious in every battle, until the burning of the Russian capital forced his army again to approach Smolensko, in a manner which presents a strong contrast to their triumphal entry into the territory of the Muscovites.

On the 9th of November, 1812, the different corps of the retreating French army commenced arriving at Smolensko. The soldiers had impatiently longed for the appearance of that day; but they found the place a heap of blackened ruins, and Napoleon, fearing the utter destruction of his army from the overwhelming force which the Russians were concentrating in his rear, resolved to urge on the retreat. On the retreat from Smolensko, the grand army was reduced to 36,000 effective men, which was divided into four columns, which marched as on the previous part of the retreat in succession; the emperor with the Old and New Guard came first; next that of Prince Eugene; then Davoust, while Ney still continued to bring up the rear. On the 14th the Old Guard occupied Krasnoi without meeting with any resistance from the Russians; but the second division, under Prince Eugene, was compelled to fight his way through forces immensely superior in numbers. Davoust also was in imminent danger. Kutusoff, the Russian general, made preparations to attack Davoust's column, with his entire force. For this purpose he divided his army into three columns, the first, under General Tormosoff, who had been called to the main army since the death of Bagrathion, was destined to advance toward the great road beyond Krasnoi, in the direction of Orcha, so as to threaten the communications of Napoleon, and prevent him from sending succor to either Davoust or Ney; the second under Prince Gallitzin was ordered to advance upon Krasnoi, and attack the enemy in front, while the third, under Milaradowitch, was directed to permit the corps of Davoust to defile along the road toward Krasnoi, till the whole body was past, and then fall upon their rear.

But Napoleon, receiving intelligence of the perilous position of Davoust, resolved to release him from danger. "I have long enough acted the emperor," said he, "now is the moment to be a general again," and seizing his sword, he himself advanced on foot at the head of his soldiers, from Krasnoi toward Smolensko. Early in the morning of the same day (Nov. 17th), the division of Roguet of the Guard, had surprised and defeated a Russian detachment in the village of Ojarowski, and the Russian general rendered cautious from this circumstance, allowed Napoleon time to make his dispositions for the approaching battle. The battle of Krasnoi, as it is called, was commenced by Prince Gallitzin, with the Russian center, which attacked General Roguet and the Young Guard. A desperate struggle ensued. Squadrons of Russians, like immense avalanches, fell upon the devoted little band, and crushed them beneath their very weight, and established themselves on the banks of the Lossmina, near the center of the French position. And now to share in this disaster came the column of Davoust, enveloped in clouds of Cossacks, who vainly endeavored to break the array of their march. Napoleon's position was critical in the highest degree. The enemy's fire was hurling death in his front and flank, the French troops flying before the withering tempest, speedily filled Krasnoi, and at this fearful moment the army of Tormasoff, appeared like a grim specter on the road to the right between Krasnoi and Liady. Napoleon saw that unless he immediately retreated all would be lost. Slowly and sadly the emperor led back the bleeding remnant of his troops to Krasnoi, and thence cleared his way to Liady, before Tormasoff crossed the road. Prince Gallitzin now advanced rapidly and carried the village af Krasnoi by assault; and Milaradowitch pressed upon Davoust's column with the utmost ardor. At length Tormasoff arrived on the ground and fell upon the column of Davoust in flank, and the corps of that marshal, assailed by such immense numbers, was almost totally destroyed.

Meanwhile the corps of Marshal Ney, which brought up the rear, left Smolensko on the morning of the 17th after blowing up part of the ramparts. The Russian general immediately made preparations to cut off this portion of the French army. He established his army in two columns on the great road facing both ways, in order to prevent any attempt at a rescue by the French troops who had got on toward Liady. Ney's column, ignorant of their danger, approached the banks of the Dassiminer, under cover of a thick fog, on the 18th, when they were suddenly assailed by repeated discharges of grapeshot from forty pieces of cannon; while the whole heights on their front and flank, appeared crested by dense black columns of infantry and artillery ranged in order of battle. The Russian general summoned Ney to surrender; but the heroic marshal replied, "A marshal of France never surrenders!" and forming his column of attack he led his troops with the utmost intrepidity against the opposing host. His soldiers, after the most tremendous exertions, found it impossible to force a passage through the Russian army, and Ney was compelled te retire on the road toward Smolensko. But after marching an hour in this direction he suddenly turned toward the north, and moved toward the Dnieper, which stream he finally succeeded in crossing with the broken remains of his corps. He was severely harassed by the Russians under Platoff in his retreat after crossing the Dnieper. For more than sixty miles he marched in the midst of hordes of Cossacks who hovered incessantly around his wearied columns. On one occasion the Cossacks got the start of his advanced troops, and the sudden apparition of flashes of artillery in the midst of the darkness of the forest, announced that they were surrounded by their enemies. The bravest fell back in dismay, and gave themselves up for lost; but the marshal, with admirable presence of mind, ordered the charge to be beat, and exclaimed. "Comrades, now is the moment; forward. they are ours!" At these words, the surprised soldiers, imagining that the enemy were cut off, resumed their courage, and the Cossacks, dreading an overthrow, fled in confusion. At length, after undergoing innumerable hardships, the heroic commander brought the remnant of his corps to the neighborhood of Orcha; and the emperor, who heard with the utmost joy of their approach, sent Eugene's corps to their assistance, which enabled them to rejoin in safety the other corps of the army. Napoleon exclaimed, when he heard of Ney's safe arrival, "I would have given three hundred millions from my coffers, rather than to have lost Marshal Ney!"

The whole French army was now assembled near Orcha; and the emperor immediately resumed his retreat, marching directly for the Beresina, and the fearful scenes which attended the passage of that river, afford a fitting conclusion to the disastrous expedition of Napoleon to Russia.

SOBRAON, A.D. 1846.—On the 10th of February, 1846, a battle was fought between the British army and the Sikhs, near Sobraon, a town of north-west India, on the river Sutlej, 25 miles north-west of Ferozepoor. The British army consisted of 35,000 men, and was commanded by Sir Hugh Gough. The battle was most obstinate and bloody, the Sikhs fighting like demons; but they were unable to resist the steady valor of European troops, and after a dreadful contest they were dislodged, and all their batteries taken. The fugitives fled in the utmost confusion to the river in their rear, and in attempting to cross over a floating bridge the weight of the masses caused it to break down, and more than 10,000 were killed, wounded, or drowned. So obstinate, however, had been their resistance, that the British lost 2,383 men.

SOLWAY MOSS, A.D. 1542.—On the 25th of November, 1542, a battle was fought on Solway Moss, a dry marsh, about seven miles in circumferenee, in the county of Cumberland in England, adjoining the frith of Solway, between the English under Oliver Sinclair, and the Scots under Dacres, and Musgrave. The Scots were defeated, and put to flight. The loss on either side in this battle was inconsiderable.

SOLYGIA, B.C. 423.—In this year the Athenians set out to invade Corinth with a fleet of eighty ships, which carried 2,000 heavy-armed of their own people, and with some horse transports, on board of which were 200 horsemen. They were also attended by some of their confederates, by the Milesians, the Adrians, and Carysthians. The commander of this armament, was Nicias, son of Nicerotus. They came to anchor near the village of Solygia, about a mile distant from the city of Corinth. The Corinthians with all their forces, marched to Solygia, under the command of Brutus, and Lycophron. A battle ensued in the plain between Solygia and Corinth, which resulted in a total defeat of the Corinthians, of whom 212 were slain; among whom was their General Lycophron. The Athenians lost somewhat less than fifty men.

SPRINGFIELD, A.D. 1780.—On the 23d of June, 1780, a battle took place between an American force under General Greene, and the British troops under General Knyphausen, near Springfield, New Jersey. The British succeeded in firing the village, which, with the exception of three buildings, was reduced to ashes. Having effected this work of destruction, the invaders retreated, followed by the exasperated Americans, who pursued them with a continual fire, as far as Elizabethtown. The Americans lost in the battle, thirteen killed, and fifty-eight wounded and missing. The British loss is unknown.

SPURS, BATTLE OF THE A. D. 1302.—The first "Battle of the Spurs," was fought near Courtrai, in Belgium, on the 11th of July, 1302, between the Flemings and the French. The latter were defeated with immense loss; 8,000 gilt spurs were taken from the killed or vanquished knights by the conquerors, from which circumstance the battle derived its name. In 1382 the French took and sacked Courtrai, for the avowed purpose of avenging this defeat. The French also took Courtrai in 1793.

The second Battle of the Spurs was fought on the 16th of August, 1513, between the French under Louis XII., and the army of Henry VIII. of England, during the siege of Therouanne. The French fled on the first shock of the advanced guards of the enemy, consisting of Germans and English; the panic shot through the whole mass of the army; and 10,000 of the best cavalry of Europe were pursued almost four miles by three troops of German, and a few hundreds of English horse. From the energetic use of spurs during the flight and pursuit, the French with their characteristic humor named this engagement the Battle of the Spurs.

STAMFORD.—The town of Stamford in England, stands on the Welland river, eleven miles west of Peterborough. Early in 1470, the ninth year of the rign of Edward IV. of England, an insurrection broke out in Lincolnshire. The whole army consisted of nearly 30,000 men, and was commanded by Sir Robert Welles. A battle took place on the 13th of March, 1470, near Stamford, between the king's army, and the insurgents, in which the latter, unable to stand against the heavy artillery and superior weapons of the royalists, were defeated with great loss. Their leaders were taken, and while the meaner prisoners were dismissed, Sir Robert Welles, and Sir Thomas Delalaurde, were beheaded.

STANDARD, BATTLE OF THE.—In the year 1138, a battle was fought at Northallerton, in the county of York, England, between the English and the Scots. The King of the Scots was defeated, and he himself, as well as his son Henry, narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the English. This battle is called the battle of the Standard, from a high crucifix, erected by the English on a wagon, and carried along with the army as a military ensign.—Hume.

STILLWATER, A.D. 1777.—This village is in Saratoga county, New York, on the west bank of the Hudson river, twenty-four miles north of Albany.

General Gates took command of the northern division of the American army, on the 17th of August, 1777. At that time, Burgoyne, the British commander, was at Fort Edward, and was in a state of the utmost alarm and perplexity, having just received the account of the defeat of an expedition which he had sent to Bennington, with orders to seize a quantity of provisions and clothing which the Americans had deposited at that place. General Gates, upon seeing the disposition of the enemy to halt at Fort Edward, marched up the Hudson to Stillwater, with the intention of fortifying himself there. Stillwater is almost thirty miles south of Fort Edward, and at this distance the American commander was enabled to observe the movements of the enemy, and prepare to either receive or attack him. Gates, however, by the advice of Colonel Kosciusko, who had been appointed, the previous year, engineer of the army, determined to make his encampment on an extensive plain at the foot of Bemus's Heights. Bemus's Heights are located on the west bank of the Hudson, about four miles south of Stillwater. The ground rises from the plain, gradually tapering, as it ascends, from a breadth of about half a mile until it forms a narrow defile one hundred feet in width. A high rocky cliff faces the river, commanding all approaches from the opposite shore. At the time of the battle, all the country in this vicinity was covered with dense forests, interspersed with an occasional clearing. The Americans threw up a line of fortifications along the brow of the hill toward the river. This breastwork was about three quarters of a mile in length, and was defended with three strong batteries; one at each extremity, and one in the center. The center battery was so planted that it commanded the entire valley and river. A trench was thrown up, from the foot of the hill across the plain to the river's edge, where a heavy battery was planted. This battery protected a floating bridge which crossed the river, and commanded the plain on the opposite shore. A road passed along the margin of the river, and at a point where it crossed Mill creek, a small stream about half a mile north of the extremity of the bluff of Bemus's Heights, a breastwork was constructed along the banks of the stream toward the river. At the extremity near the water a strong battery was placed. These fortifications, which were made under the direction of Kosciusko, were completed about the 15th of September. Meanwhile, the enemy was approaching. General Lincoln, with a body of about 2,000 Americans, had got in the rear of the British, and had performed several effectual operations. The British stations on lake George had fallen into his hands, and he had captured a vessel laden with provisions for the British army. He had also taken the British garrisons at Mount Hope, and Mount Defiance, and had even laid siege to Ticonderoga. The latter place, however, proved too strong, and he raised the siege, and prepared to attack the enemy in the rear. Burgoyne seeing the danger of having his supplies from the lakes cut off, and perhaps alarmed by the threatening movements of Lincoln, determined to move forward to Albany at all hazards. A bridge of boats was constructed across the Hudson, and on the 13th and 14th of September, the whole British army passed over to the opposite shore. They encamped on the plains and heights of Saratoga, within about five miles of the American position. On the 15th he commenced his march toward the south, and on the 18th he arrived at a place, now called Wilbur's basin, about two miles from the American encampment. Here he made preparations for battle.

The entire army of Burgoyne, consisted of 5,000 men; (about 3,000 only were actually engaged in this battle). His chief officers were Major General Phillips, of the artillery, Brigadier-General Fraiser, commander of the light infantry and grenadiers; Brigadiers Powell and Hamilton; General Baron de Riedesel and his aids, Gall and Specht, and Colonel Breyman, Earl Balcarra, Major Ackland, and others of a lesser rank.

The entire American army in camp and field consisted of about 7,000 men (2,500 only were brought into the field on this occasion), and was composed of the brigades of Learned, Stark, Poor, Warner, Whipple, Patterson, Bailey, Fellows, Glover, Brichetts, Walcott, and Tenbroeck; the gallant band of sharp-shooters under Colonel Morgan of Virginia, and the regiments of Dearborn, Cilley, Brooks, Hull, and Scammel.

On the morning of the 19th of September the clear frosty air vibratied with the reveillé of both armies. The two generals were making preparations for the approaching struggle. The right wing of the British army was posted on some high grounds which descend gradually toward the river, and was covered by the grenadiers and light infantry under General Fraiser and Colonel Breyman. The front and flank were covered by those loyalists Canadians and Indians who still remained in the camp. The left wing and the long train of artillery, under Generals Phillips and Reidesel, occupied the low grounds near the river.

The American army was drawn up in the same order from the river to the heights. The right which was the main body of the army, consisting of Patterson's, Glover's, and Nixon's brigades, was on the hills near the river, and the narrow flats below them. The center occupied an elevated plain some distance from the river, and was composed of the brigades of Learned, Bailey, Wesson, and the regiments of Massachusetts and New York, under Jackson and James Livingston. The left wing consisted of General Poor's brigade, including the regiment of Cilley, Scammel and Hale of New Hampshire; the regiment of Henry Livingston and Vancourtlandt, of New York; the Connecticut militia under Cook and Latimer, Morgan's riflemen, and the infantry under Dearborn. This portion of the army occupied the heights about three fourths of a mile from the river, and was under the command of General Arnold. The right wing was commanded by General Gates. The American generals resolved to await the attack of the enemy, rather than to assume the offensive. Burgoyne on the contrary, determined to attack the Americans at once. He accordingly made his dispositions for the attack. Generals Reidesel and Phillips were directed to advance with the artillery on the road along the bank of the river, and the Indians, loyalists, and Canadians, in front, were ordered to attack the American advanced parties in the center. Meanwhile Burgoyne and Fraiser, were to march by a circuitous route through the woods, with the intention of turning the left flank of the enemy, when the two divisions should form a junction. When this junction should be made, which was to be announced by the firing of three minute guns, the artillery of the left wing, was to open on the American left and center, and under cover of their fire, the infantry was ordered to charge down upon the Americans, who would thus be attacked on flank and in front simultaneously. At ten o'clock the whole British army was in motion. Phillips and Reidesel, with the artillery, were slowly advancing along the road, and Burgoyne and Fraiser were marching the one toward the west, along the stream which empties into Wilber's Basin, and the other with Colonel Breyman, along a circuitous road toward the left of the American position. The American general was apprised of every movement of the enemy, yet he remained inactive. At length Arnold, burning with impatience, detached a body of horse under Colonel Morgan, and some infantry under Major Dearborn, to attack the Canadians and Indians on the heights. Dashing through the forest the cavalry advanced toward the enemy, followed by the foot-soldiers running at full speed. As they reached a deep ravine they encountered the enemy, and a furious conflict ensued. The Canadians and Indians were repulsed by one vigorous charge of the cavalry; but with such fury did the Americans rush on the enemy that the men were scattered, and became entangled in the woods. Here they were assailed by the enemy in great force, and were obliged to retire with considerable loss, the British taking twenty-two of them prisoners. Meanwhile a detachment of loyalists, Canadians, and Indians, encountered the American advanced guards on a level spot of ground near Mill creek. The conflict was sharp and bloody; but the British were at length compelled to fly, leaving thirteen dead on the plain, and thirty-five prisoners in the hands of the Americans. While these skirmishes were taking place in front, Burgoyne and Fraiser were rapidly advancing toward the Americans, in order to attack them in front and flank. Arnold, at the same time, was endeavoring to execute a similar maneuver upon him. Neither party was aware of the movements of the other, so dense was the forest, and so uneven the ground. Suddenly, and entirely unexpected, the two armies met on a level plain near Mill creek, and no sooner had they arrived within sight of each other than a terrific battle commenced. Arnold led on his men with a shout that roused the echoes through the woods; the British rushed forward to meet them, and the fight raged with the utmost fury.

At length, after battling furiously with the enemy, the Americans were compelled to fall back before their overwhelming numbers. The enemy, finding the left of the Americans so well defended, made a quick movement to their right, and fiercely attacked the left flank of the same wing. Arnold, meanwhile, had rallied his forces, and was reinforced by four regiments, under Lieutenant-Colonels Cilley, Brooks, and Scammel, and Majors Dearborn and Hull, and the British, fearing that Arnold, by cutting through their line, would separate their wings, hastened to strengthen the points attacked, by a reinforcement. And now the battle raged with tenfold fury. The Americans, charging into the very faces of the enemy, fought with an energy which threw the British into confusion, and at some points forced them to give way; but at this crisis, General Philiips, guided by the din of the battle, pushed his troops, with a portion of the artillery, under Captain Jones, through the woods, and appeared on the field of action at the very moment when victory seemed to have declared for the Americans. Assailed by fresh troops, and the terrific fire of the artillery, the Americans, wearied by their almost superhuman exertions, were forced back to their lines. The fight had raged with the utmost fierceness for more than an hour. It was now nearly three o'clock. Each army halted to breathe, and refresh for another and more furious combat. They were about a mile from each other, and between them stood the dense forest. The British commenced the first hostilities, by opening their artillery on the Americans. Their fire did no damage, and the Americans did not respond. Burgoyne now ordered the woods to be cleared with the bayonet, and soon the British columns were seen emerging from the forest, and advancing with fixed bayonets across the plain toward the American line.

On they came, their measured tread alone disturbing the silence of the field. As they neared the enemy's intrenchment, they fired a volley, and sprang forward to the charge. Then, and not until then, did the Americans respond. With yells of defiance they sprang over the wall, and fell on the assailants like a cataract, carrying the British before them in their impetuous charge, to the verge of the woods. Here both armies stood as in a balance, fighting with an animosity unparalleled. The British, gathering their energies, pushed forward with such vigor that the Americans were driven across the clearing to their intrenchments. Here the battle again raged; and again, by a tremendous effort, the Americans hurled back their foes. And thus, until night drew its dark mantle over the scene, the battle continued, victory declaring itself for neither party, and even after night-fall the soldiers maintained the fearful strife: but at length, exhausted with fatigue, bruised and bleeding, the warriors sullenly ceased the fight, and the Americans withdrew to their lines. The British encamped on the field of battle. The next day Burgoyne, perceiving that he could not dislodge the enemy from his fortified position, pitched his camp within cannon-shot of the American lines, hoping that time would afford him an opportunity of operating with greater effect.

In this battle the British lost about 500 men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The Americans lost 64 killed, 217 wounded, and 38 prisoners. Both parties claimed the victory. The British, it is true, kept the field of battle; but as the progress of General Burgoyne toward Albany was effectually checked by the Americans, the advantage remained certainly with the Americans.

In point of the number of the slain, this battle may appear insignificant; but there have been very few battles marked with such determined valor and endurance on both sides. Never was a battle fought between civilized nations before, characterized with such deeds of personal valor. The personal interests of every man in the American army were at stake; they were fighting for their country, their fire-sides, and their very lives, for if defeated, they were liable to be punished as rebels to the crown of England. Actuated by such impulses, they fought with a valor that did not require the encouragement of their officers. Posted singly in trees, and behind bushes and logs, the American marksmen picked off the enemy one by one, and Burgoyne himself nearly fell a victim to this method of warfare. And while we speak of the valor of the Americans generally, we must not neglect to award deserved praise to one who, in after years, brought everlasting disgrace on his memory. At this battle, General Benedict Arnold comported himself with a valor which spoke volumes in favor of his patriotism and fidelity. And from this battle also we may date the first disaffection in the mind of that officer. General Gates, in his dispatches, failed to mention Arnold's name. In truth, Gates was jealous of Arnold's reputation and popularity, and harsh words having passed between the two officers, in regard to the omission of Arnold's name in his dispatches, the latter officer demanded his pass to join General Washington, which Gates granted him.

Arnold, however, upon reflection, seeing that it would sully his reputation by leaving the army when another battle was momentarily expected, remained in the camp. He was, however, deprived of his command, for on the arrival of General Lincoln, Gates gave the charge of the right wing of the army to that officer.* Both armies now

* Until 1778, Benedict Arnold nobly sustained and fought for the cause of liberty. Arnold was born in Norwich, Connecticut, in January, 1740; he was a brave soldier, impulsive and generous, until he allowed his passions to get the better of his judgment. Lossing, in his History of the United States, thus narrates the treason of Arnold, and the capture, trial, and execution of Major John Andre: "While the French army were landing upon Rhode Island, and preparing for winter quarters there, Clinton was bargaining with Benedict Arnold for the strong military post of West Point, and its dependencies, among the Hudson Highlands, and with it the liberties of America, if possible. Benedict Arnold was a bold soldier, but a bad man. Impulsive, vindictive, and unscrupulous, he was personally unpopular, and was seldom without a quarrel with some of his companions in arms. Soon after his appointment to the command in Philadelphia, he was married to the beautiful young daughter of Edward Shippen of that city. He lived in splendor, at an expense far beyond his income. To meet the demands of increasing creditors, he worked zealously in strengthening their position. The Americans had received an accession of 2,000 men by the arrival of General Lincoln, and had received a seasonable supply of ammunition from Albany. Their powder was expended to such a degree, after the engagement, that had Burgoyne attacked them immediately, they would have been certainly defeated, for they had only a single round of cartridges left. The Americans extended and added to their fortifications; and the British threw up intrenchments which were defended with heavy batteries. The English were constantly on the alert to avoid surprise, and the Americans exerted themselves to the utmost to cut off the enemy's forage. Constant and animated skirmishes took place between the foraging parties of the British and the pickets of the Americans. The British general was alarmed at the rapid increase of the American army; his Indian allies also were deserting to the enemy in great numbers, and he saw that unless speedily relieved, his army would be placed in the utmost danger. He wrote letter after letter to Howe, imploring aid, but the American pickets were so vigilant, that, with a single exception, they never reached their destination. To these letters, at all events, he received but a single reply, a letter written in cypher from General Clinton, at New York, informing him that he should attack Forts Montgomery and Clinton on the west bank of the Hudson, with 2,000 men, and thus create a diversion in his favor. Burgoyne immediately dispatched two officers in disguise, and various other persons, by several routes, to Clinton, with a full account of his precarious situation, entreating him to promptly execute the movement he had proposed. Burgoyne, although disappointed in the amount of assistance he had expected from Clinton, still hoped that after the reduction of the forts, the British would advance up the river, and induce the Americans to send detachments to meet them, or to change their position, in either of which cases an opportunity would be given him to gain an advantage, and open his passage to Albany. The first of October arrived, and the British general had heard nothing further from Clinton. The army began to suffer for want of provisions, and the general was obliged to put his soldiers on short allowance. The enemy, ever vigilant and wary, would not allow a man or a particle of food to reach his camp. At length he saw the necessity either to fly or fight. Fly he would not; and, therefore, fight he must. Accordingly, on the morning of the 7th of October, he put himself at the head of 1,500 regular troops, with two twelve-pounders, two howitzers, and six six-pounders. Phillips, Reidesel, and Fraiser, accompanied him. The camp on the high grounds was placed in the charge of Generals Hamilton and Specht, and the guard of the redoubts near the river was committed to Brigadier Gell. The British troops moved toward the enemy's left, with a view to learn whether a passage could be forced, and also to cover a foraging party sent out for the relief of the immediate necessities of the army. Several companies of loyalists and Indians were pushed forward through the by-paths, to act as a check on the rear of the American left flank.

The British regulars had advanced to within about three quarters of a mile of the enemy's left wing, when they were discovered by General Gates. Scarcely were the movements of the enemy known to the Americans, ere the Canadians and Indians that had been sent in advance of the British troops, attacked the American outposts near Mill creek and drove them back toward the republican lines. When they reached a spot within half a mile of the breastworks, the Americans made a engaged in fraudulent acts, which made him hated by the public, and caused charges of dishonesty and malpractices in office to be preferred against him before the Continental Congress. A court-martial appointed to try him, convicted him, but sentenced him to a reprimand only. Although Washington performed that duty with the utmost delicacy, Arnold felt the disgrace. It awakened vengeful feelings, which, operating with the pressure of debt, made him listen with complacency to the suggestions of a bad nature. He made treasonable overtures to Sir Henry Clinton, and by a correspondence, for several months (under an assumed name, and with propositions couched in commercial phrases), with the accomplished Major André, Clinton's adjutant-general, he bargained with the British commander to betray West Point and its dependencies into his hands. For this service he was to receive a brigadier's commission and fifty thousand dollars in cash. By patriotic professions Arnold obtained the command of West Point in 1780; and the time chosen for the consummation of his treasonable designs was, when Washington was absent, in September, in conference with the French officers, in Hartford, Connecticut. Arnold and André met, for the first time, on the 22d of September, at Haverstraw, on the west side of the Hudson, and arranged a definite plan of operations. Clinton was to sail up the river with a strong force, and, after a show of resistance, Arnold was to surrender West Point into his hands. The sloop of war Vulture, which conveyed André up the river, was driven from her anchorage by shots from an American cannon on shore, and he was obliged to cross to the eastern side of the Hudson, and make his way toward New York by land. At Tarrytown, 27 miles from the city, he was stopped (September 23), and searched by three young militia-men, John Paulding, Isaac Van Wart, and David Williams, who, although André offered them large bribes if they would allow him to pass, refused, and, upon searching him, found papers concealed in his boots. They took him to the nearest American post. The commander could not seem to comprehend the matter, and unwisely allowed André to send a letter to Arnold, then at his quarters opposite West Point. The alarmed traitor fled (September 24) down the river in his barge, and found safety on board the Vulture. André was tried as a spy, found guilty, and hanged at Tappan, opposite Tarrytown, October 2, 1780, while the real miscreant escaped. Although Arnold did not accomplish his wicked designs, he received the stipulated reward for his treasonable services. Washington would have spared André if the stern rules of war had permitted. "The young soldier has always been more pitied than blamed; while the name of Arnold will ever be regarded with the bitterest scorn." Arnold went to England, after the war, and died in London in 1801.

BURGOYNE SURRENDERING HIS SWORD TO GATES.

stand, and a sharp skirmish ensued. The enemy, however, was too strong, and the republicans were on the point of flying, when they were suddenly reinforced by Colonel Morgan, with his mounted riflemen, and a body of infantry. Like a whirlwind, that stalwart body of horse dashed into the thickest of the enemy, scattering them like chaff, and driving them back in confusion to the British line.

The Second Battle of Stillwater.—In a recently-cleared space of ground, Burgoyne was making preparations for the action. His left wing, consisting of the grenadiers under Major Ackland, and the artillery under Major Williams, occupied a slight eminence behind Mill creek, on the borders of a wood. The center was composed of British and German soldiers, and was commanded by General Phillips and the Baron de Reidesel. The right wing consisted of light infantry, and was under the direction of Earl Balcarras. In front of the right wing General Fraiser, with 500 picked men, was stationed, with orders to fall on the left flank of the enemy as soon as the attack should be made in front. Morgan interpreted the enemy's design, and by his advice General Gates made active preparations to defeat it. Poor and Learned, with the troops of New York, and New Hampshire, were detached with orders to attack the British left; and Morgan, with 1,500 men, including his sharp-shooters, were ordered to make a circuitous route to the high grounds on the right of the enemy, and to attack the flanking party of General Fraiser, at the same time that Poor and Learned should engage the British left. It was now two o'clock in the afternoon. The soldiers of Massachusetts and New York, advanced slowly up the slight acclivity, on which Ackland and Williams with the British grenadiers and artillery were stationed. A deep silence prevailed. From the height, the cannon of the British frowned grimly on the advancing columns. Suddenly their black nostrils were illuminated by a vivid flame; the air was stunned by a terrific explosion, and a storm of shot tore through the branches of the trees over the heads of the Americans. And now a wild uproar arose. The Americans poured volley after volley on the enemy, shouting madly as they rushed forward to the very muzzles of the cannon, and fought hand-to-hand with the artillerymen. The struggle for the possession of the pieces was terrific. One of the cannons was taken and re-taken five times; but at length the Americans with an almost superhuman effort forced back its defenders, and Colonel Cilley, leaping astride of the cannon, waved his sword over his head and shouted in exultation at its capture. Then cramming its mouth with its fiery food, he wheeled its muzzle toward the retreating British, and sent their own shot spinning through their ranks. In this struggle which was as obstinate as it was bloody, Major Ackland, who had behaved with the utmost bravery, was wounded, and Major Williams was made prisoner. On the loss of their officers the British fled in disorder, leaving the Americans in possession of the field.

Meanwhile Morgan, on the enemy's right, fell with the force of a tempest on General Fraiser's flanking party. The attack was so furious, and so entirely unexpected that the British were at once thrown into confusion, and retreated precipitately to their lines. Morgan now urged his men full against the right flank of the enemy. The shock was fearful. The British, disordered, and panic-stricken at the impetuous charge of the enemy, wavered, and being at this moment vigorously assailed in front by Major Dearborn, with some fresh troops, they scattered and fled. But by the endeavors of Earl Balcarras they were rallied, and were led back to the fight. The Germans and Hessians who formed the center of the British center, stood firm in spite of the defeat of the two wings. General Arnold, who had watched the course of battle with an eagle eye, saw that the time for a decided blow had arrived. Although deprived of his command, and even having no authority to fight, yet he could no longer remain an idle spectator. Leaping to his saddle, he galloped his horse toward the field of battle. His approach was hailed by his former troops with loud cheers, and placing himself at the head of three regiments of Learned's brigade, he led them against the British center. His men followed their heroic leader with loud and enthusiastic shouts, and charged down upon the enemy like an avalanche. The Hessians withstood the first assault with firmness, and the Americans recoiled. But Arnold, dashing through the midst of his men, in a frenzy of excitement, commanding, and entreating, rallied them for a second assault. Animated to the highest pitch of enthusiasm by the gallantry of their commander, the Americans rushed on the enemy with resistless impetuosity. The Hessians were scattered in all directions by the terrific shock, and fled in terror. The battle now raged along the whole line. General Fraiser was everywhere conspicuous in the British ranks, endeavoring to turn the tide of victory. But while the battle was at its height, he was struck by a rifle-ball, and fell, mortally wounded. His fall was the signal of defeat. Burgoyne himself now took command, and endeavored vainly to rally his terror-stricken troops. The arrival of 3,000 New York troops under General Tenbroeck, completed the panic, and the whole British line gave way, and fled in confusion to their intrenched camp. Generals Phillips and Reidesel, with the artillery, gallantly covered their retreat. But the British had scarcely entered the camp before they were fiercely attacked by the Americans, who, rushing through the storm of grape-shot and bullets, battled fiercely with the enemy over the parapet. "Arnold, especially," says Botta, "in this day appeared intoxicated with the thirst of battle and carnage." At the head of the troops of Patterson and Glover, he assaulted the works defended by the British under Earl Balcarras, and driving the enemy from their strong position, endeavored to force an entrance into the camp. But the English made a stand and received him with such firmness that he was obliged to abandon the attempt. He then led his men toward the right flank of the enemy, through the very midst of the fire of both armies, and joining Learned's brigade he led them against the Canadians and loyalists who were stationed between Balcarras's position in the intrenchments, and the Germans under Colonel Breyman who formed the British right flank. This part of the line was flanked by a stockade redoubt on either side. Arnold directed Colonel Brooks with his men to attack the redoubt, and led the balance of his brigade against the front.

The enemy received the assailants with firmness, and a sanguinary conflict ensued. At length, however, toward evening the Canadians and loyalists gave way, and Arnold led his men into the very intrenchments of the enemy. But at the moment of victory his horse was shot under him; and the general himself received a severe bullet wound in the same leg which had already been shattered by a musket-ball received in the assault of Quebec two years before. The gallant general was conveyed from the field. His men still continued the attack. The Germans had fled at the approach of Arnold, leaving their commander, Colonel Breyman, mortally wounded on the plain. An important point of the camp, therefore, was left exposed to the enemy. Burgoyne strove to rally the Germans to defend it; but so great was the panic which existed in their ranks, that they refused to return to their post. At the approach of night the Americans, thoroughly exhausted by their arduous exertions of the day, suspended hostilities and encamped for the night. The division of General Lincoln, which had remained in the American intrenchments during the battle, at about midnight was brought out to relieve those upon the field. On this Burgoyne saw the necessity of changing his position. Accordingly he removed his army during the night about a mile north of his first position, whence he intended to retreat to Fort Edward. Early on the following morning the Americans took possession of the deserted camp of the British. Several pieces of artillery, all the baggage of the Germans, and a quantity of ammunition fell into the hands of the victors. During the day, several skirmishes took place between detached parties of the two armies, in one of which General Lincoln was wounded. The Americans lost on this occasion about 100 in killed and wounded. The British loss was about 700 in killed, wounded, and prisoners. General Fraiser, Sir Francis Clarke (Burgoyne's aide-de-camp), and Colonel Breyman, were among the slain.

General Gates, prior to the second battle of Stillwater, anticipating the retreat of the enemy, had detached General Fellows, with 1,500 men, to occupy the heights on the east bank of the Hudson, opposite Saratoga, in order to prevent the enemy from fording the river at that point. He now sent another detachment to take post higher up, near Fort Edward, and at the same time ordered a picked corps of 2,000 men to advance and occupy the high grounds beyond Saratoga, near Lake George. By these movements the British army would be inclosed on every side. Burgoyne, on hearing this, determined to retreat toward Saratoga, situated six miles up the river, on the same side, before the enemy was aware of his intention. At nine o'clock on the evening of the 8th of October, the whole British army commenced its march; toward midnight a heavy rain commenced falling, and the badness of the roads, and the weakness of the horses, which were famishing with hunger, retarded their progress so greatly that the army did not reach Saratoga until the evening of the 9th. The retreat of the British was so sudden that the hospital with 300 sick and wounded, and a great number of wheel-carriages, were abandoned to the enemy. The invalids received the best treatment from the Americans. As they retired, the British burned the houses, and destroyed every thing that was of no further use to them. General Gage commenced the pursuit at about noon, on the 10th of October. The British army, after passing the night of the 9th at Saratoga, took up their march on the 10th, and, crossing Fishkill creek a little north of the town, encamped upon the heights whose slope is now occupied by the village of Schuylerville. Meanwhile the Americans had moved forward with such rapidity that by four o'clock in the afternoon of the 10th, they reached the heights to the south of Fishkill creek. The creek, therefore, divided the two armies, that of Burgoyne having encamped on the north side, and that of Gates on the south; and the two armies were so near that they were within sound of each other's music. Burgoyne saw that there was no hope of crossing the river in the vicinity of Saratoga, and resolved to push up the river till he arrived opposite Fort Edward, and then to force a passage to the east bank in the face of the troops stationed at that place. He sent forward a company of workmen, under the escort of Fraiser's sharp-shooters, to repair the bridges, and open the road to Fort Edward. He also sent a detachment of troops to take possession of that fort. The Americans, however, who were spreading out on all sides, taking possession of every eminence, soon drove in the working party; and the British troops found the fort occupied by the enemy. Thus hemmed in, Burgoyne saw no other method of escape than an immediate retreat, without baggage or artillery. The Americans had lined the eastern shore of the Hudson with troops, who maintained an incessant fire on the boats laden with supplies for the British, which had attended the movements of the army up the river. Many of the boats were taken, and a number of men lost on both sides. The British, therefore, were reduced to the necessity of landing the provisons, and transporting them, exposed to the fire of the enemy, over the hills to the camp. In the midst of all these calamities a sudden gleam of hope broke through the cloud of despair which hung over the British army, and they were near gaining an advantage which would have relieved them entirely from their dangerous position. General Gates was informed that the small detachment which Burgoyne had sent on the road toward Fort Edward, was the entire vanguard and center of the British army. He determined therefore to fall upon what he supposed to be the rear guard of the enemy only, which remained near the Fishkill. Burgoyne, hearing of the proposed movement of the enemy, saw at once that, should it be made, the Americans would fall an easy prey into his hands. Accordingly he made his dispositions to receive the enemy. Leaving a strong guard at the battery on the creek, he posted his troops in ambush behind a thicket in the rear. In the morning a thick mist arose, concealing every object from view, and Gates resolved to take advantage of the fog, to pass the creek, and seize the battery on the opposite bank. Three brigades, commanded by Generals Glover, Nixon, and Morgan, were ordered to cross the Fishkill and attack the enemy's camp. At early dawn, Morgan set out with his men. The fog was so thick that he could see but a few yards in advance of him. He had proceeded but a short distance when he fell in with the British pickets, who fired upon him, killing several men. Nixon crossed the creek and surprised a British picket. Glover was on the point of following him when a deserter from the British crossed the creek and informed him that the whole British army was in the camp ready to receive them. Gates was immediately informed of the true state of affairs, and he revoked his former orders, directing that the troops should return to their former positions. Intelligence of the incident was conveyed to Nixon, who hastily retired from his dangerous position; but as the sun arose the fog was dispelled before he had time to withdraw with the whole of his force, and his rear guard was exposed to the fire of the British artillery, which inflicted considerable loss on the retiring columns. In a moment Burgoyne saw his only hope of victory fall to the ground. His situation was indeed terrible. Nothing but an absolute surrender would save his army from annihilation. He was completely surrounded by the enemy. The positions of the two armies were now as follows: The British were on the heights near the Fishkill. Their camp was fortified and extended about half a mile in the rear, and the heavy guns were planted chiefly on an elevated plain, northwest of the ground on which Schuyerville now stands. The main body of the American army, under Gates, occupied the high grounds on the south shore of the Fishkill. In front of the British position on the east bank of the Hudson, 3,000 American troops, under General Fellows, were posted behind strong intrenchments, and in the rear of the British, Morgan, with his men, were stationed. The Americans occupied Fort Edward, and had a fortified camp in the vicinity of Glenn's Falls. Small detachments of American militia were posted in every vicinity in the neighborhood of the British camp, closely watching every movement of the enemy. The British soon began to feel the most pressing want of food and water. Every part of their camp was exposed to the fire of cannon and musketry. Neither officers, soldiers, invalids, women, nor children, were safe from the missiles of the enemy. The British army, by deaths and desertion, was reduced one half. Burgoyne anxiously awaited some intelligence of the movements of Clinton, whom he hoped would march to his relief; but this hope finally died away, and on the evening of the 12th the British generals held a council, in which it was decided to retreat, if possible, before morning. They sent out scouts to ascertain the best route for the retreat; but they returned with the intelligence that every path was blocked up by the enemy.

On the morning of the 13th, it was ascertained that the whole stock of provisions was sufficient only to sustain the army three days longer. A second council of war was called, which was attended by the captains of companies as well as the generals and field officers. The meeting was held in a large tent, which, during the deliberations, was perforated several times with bullets from the Americans, and a cannon-ball, it is said, swept across the table near which Burgoyne and several other generals were sitting. After a short deliberation, it was decided, without a single dissenting voice, to open a treaty and enter into a convention with General Gates, for an honorable surrender. Late in the afternoon a flag was sent to General Gage, with a note, requesting him to name the hour in which it would suit him to receive a field officer to confer with him on a matter of great importance to both armies. "At ten o'clock, at the advanced post of the army of the United States," was the reply. At the appointed hour Lieutenant Kingston, Burgoyne's adjutant-general, appeared, bearing the following note from the British general:

"After having fought you twice, Lieutenant-General Burgoyne has waited some days in his present position, determined to try a third conflict against any force you could bring against him. He is apprized of your superiority of numbers and the disposition of your troops to impede his supplies and render his retreat a scene of carnage on both sides. In this situation, he is impelled by humanity, and thinks himself justified by established principles and precedents of state and war, to spare the lives of brave men upon honorable terms. Should Major-General Gates be inclined to treat upon that idea, General Burgoyne would propose a cessation of arms during the time necessary to communicate the preliminary terms by which, in any extremity, he and his army mean to abide."

Negotiations were thus commenced, and continued until the 16th, when every thing was agreed upon, and the paper ready for the signatures of the commanding officers.

The paper was superscribed, "The convention between Lieutenant-General Burgoyne and Major-General Gates." The principal articles, omitting those relating to the accommodation and provision of the vanquished army to Boston, were in substance as follows: "That the British army should march out of the camp with all the honors of war, to an appointed place, where they were to deposit their arms and leave their artillery; that they were to be allowed a free embarkation and passage to Europe from Boston, upon condition of their not serving again in America during the present war; that the army was not to be separated, especially the officers from the men; that the officers should be admitted to parole, and permitted to wear their side-arms; that all private property should be retained, and the public property to be delivered by the British upon honor; that no baggage should be searched or molested; that all persons, of whatever country, appertaining to, or following the camp, were to be fully comprehended in the terms of capitulation, and that the Canadians should be returned to their own country in safety."

Before signing these conditions, which were undoubtedly very honorable to the British army, Burgoyne, having received intelligence that Clinton had moved up the Hudson and reduced Fort Montgomery, felt disposed to break up the treaty entirely; but, on learning of the British general's hesitancy, Gates, on the 17th, drew up his men in battle order, and sent a message to Burgoyne informing him that he must either sign the paper or prepare for battle. With the advice of his officers Burgoyne reluctantly signed the "Convention," and preparations were made immediately to surrender in due form.

The ceremony of the surrender is thus described by an eye-witness:

"An armistice of three days, with a view to surrender was asked. Six of the tallest men in our army, with the best clothes we could procure, and with caps so high that we had to look twice to see the tops, were selected to meet the flag. Terms of surrender were finally concluded. Our brigade was ordered to march down the hill and parade on the road leading south, with all the music of the brigade in the center, playing 'Yankee Doodle.' We were but just paraded, when the British general, officers, and staff, and General Gates and staff met close by where I stood in the ranks, and so near that I could hear all that was said. An American officer said: 'General Burgoyne—General Gates.' 'Your servant, sir'—'Your servant, sir,' passed around. General Burgoyne then said: 'Through the misfortune of war, General Gates, I am your prisoner.' 'It is not through any misconduct of yours, General Burgoyne,' replied Gates. Then came the British troops in columns, as richly dressed, clean, and sizable men as ever I saw. I saw not a smile on the face of Americans or British.

"Next came the Hessians—and how shall I describe the most miserable, filthy, ill-looking beings I ever saw in human form? But the fag-end was the women, I suppose. Many of them led horses, upon the backs of which were thrown large oblong bags, sewed up at the ends. These bags contained provisions, blankets, clothing, utensils, etc., and in many cases were the heads of children sticking out above the horses' backs, through holes in the bags. Sometimes there were two smaller children on the other side to balance. Our orders were to maintain a respectful silence; but this last was too much! One ventured a suppressed laugh; his neighbor took the disease in a more violent form, until in a few moments the whole American lines were convulsed with the most uproarious laughter, and all at the expense of the poor Hessians, their women, children, and equipage."

General Gates, respecting the feelings of the vanquished, ordered his army to retire within their lines that they might not witness the shame of the English when they piled their arms. After the troops had laid down their weapons, Burgoyne, in the presence of the whole American army delivered his sword to the victorious general. The British troops then took up their line of march for Boston.

The number of prisoners surrendered on this occasion was 5,791, of whom 2,412 were Germans, and 3,379 English. Two twenty-four-pounders, four twelve-pounders, thirty-three howitzers of various caliber, and three mortars; in all forty-two pieces of artillery, fell into the hands of the victors, together with 4,647 muskets, 72,000 cartridges, and a great quantity of other ammunition, powder, shells, balls, etc. This glorious victory produced the utmost joy throughout the Union. Congress voted a gold medal to Gates in honor of his services, and the whole country resounded with his name. "All hoped," says Botta, "and not without reason, that a success of this importance would at length determine France and other European powers that waited for her example, to declare themselves in favor of the Americans. There could be no longer any question respecting the future; all danger had ceased of espousing the cause of a people too feeble to defend themselves."

STOCKACH, A.D. 1799.—Stockach is a city of south Germany, and is situated on a river bearing the same name. The battle of Stockach was fought between the republican army of France, and the Austrians, on the 26th of March, 1799. Jourdan, the commander of the French forces, saw the importance of gaining possession of this place, for here all the roads to Swabia, Switzerland, and the valley of the Neckar united, and he could not continue his retreat beyond this point without abandoning his communications with Massena, who commanded a large force of republicans. The Austrians commanded by the archduke, were in great numbers on the river Stockach, a small stream which runs in a winding channel before the village of the same name, and terminates in lake Constance; their center occupied the plain of Nellemberg in front of the river, their right extending along the same plain toward Liptingen, their left from Zolbruch to Wahlevies. On the side of the republicans, the center was commanded by Souham, the right by Ferino, and St. Cyr, whose vanguard was led by Soult, the left wing. The left wing was to attack Liptingen, where Meerfeld was stationed; and the principal effort was to be made in that quarter, in order to turn the Austrians, and compel them to retreat by the single chaussée of Stockach, when necessity would oblige them, in case of any disaster, to lose all their artillery.

All the columns were in motion at five in the morning, and the advanced guards of Soult soon came in sight of the videttes of Meerfeld. The attack of the French was so vigorous, that Meerfeld was driven from Liptingen, and thrown back in confusion into the forests near Stockach. They were soon driven out from their place of retreat; the infantry retreated in great disorder to Stockach, and the cavalry toward Maeskirch. At the same time, the two armies were engaged along the whole line. Souham in the center repulsed the light troops of the Austrians as far as Wahleveis and Ossingen on the river, and threatened the plateau of Nellemberg, while on the right, Ferino was also actively engaged A heavy cannonade was heard along the whole front of the army; a decisive success had here been gained on one point, the Austrian right was turned, and the French were already quite sure of victory. As soon as the archduke was aware of the impression made upon the right wing of his army, he hastened to that part of the field, accompanied by twelve squadrons of cuirassiers, and six battalions of grenadiers, while a powerful body of horse were stationed on the plain of Nellemberg, to protect the retreat of the army, in case they were driven to that extremity. These movements, which were adapted at the decisive moment, changed the fortunes of the day, and another advantage was also gained by a fault of Jourdan's, in dividing his forces by sending orders to St. Cyr to advance to Maeskirch to cut off the retreat of the imperialists. A violent struggle now took place in the woods of Liptingen, which Soult had gained in the first moment of success. The archduke with fresh troops advanced to the attack, the French defended themselves with great valor, and one of the fiercest combats that occurred in the whole war took place, and lasted, without ceasing, for several hours. Three times the republicans advanced out of the woods upon the enemy, and three times, notwithstanding the most desperate efforts, they were driven back by the perseverance of the Germans. At length, the imperialists became the assailants; the archduke, at the head of the Hungarian grenadiers, charged in person. Prince Furstemberg, and Prince Anhalt Bemburg were killed while leading on their respective regiments, and the flower of the army, on both sides, perished under the terrible fire which overspread the battle-field. St. Cyr long and obstinately maintained his ground; but at length, finding the principal efforts of the Austrians were directed against his wing, and that their reserves were coming into action, he ordered Soult to leave the wood, and retire into the plain of Liptingen. This perilous movement was performed by that superior officer, with admirable steadiness; but, when they reached the open country, they were charged by Kollowrath, at the head of the grenadiers and cuirassiers, which the archduke had in reserve. This effort proved decisive. In vain Jourdan charged with the French cavalry; they were broken and driven back in confusion by the superiority of the cuirassiers, and the general-in-chief came near being made a prisoner in the flight. The infantry, in consequence of this overthrow, were obliged to retreat; two regiments were surrounded, and made prisoners, and St. Cyr, who was now entirely cut off from the center of his army, only escaped being destroyed, by throwing himself across the Danube, being fortunate to find one bridge which was not occupied by the enemy. This great success, and the separation of St. Cyr from the remainder of the army, was decisive of victory. Souham and Ferino, with the center and right, had maintained their position against a superior number, but had gained no advantage; and now that the left wing was separated from them, and unable to render any assistance, they could not maintain their ground any longer against the victorious troops of the archduke. Notwithstanding, the French had fought bravely against the superior forces of their enemy, and the loss on both sides being nearly equal, amounting to about 5,000 men to each party, yet, by the separation of the left wing, they had sustained all the consequences of a serious defeat; and now their principal object was, to endeavor to reunite the scattered divisions of the army by a retreat to the passes of Black Forest. Jourdan was so much affected with the result of this action, that, after reaching the defiles of the forest, he surrendered the command of the army to Ernouf, the chief of the staff, and went to Paris, to lay his complaints as to the state of the army before the Directory.

STOCKHOLM, A.D. 1501.—Stockholm, the capital of the kingdom of Sweden, has sustained several sieges, which our limits forbid describing. One of the most memorable of these sieges, took place in the year 1501, when it was besieged by the Swedes, for the crown of Denmark. The city was defended by the army of Christina, Queen of Denmark. The siege of 1520, is still more memorable. The city was besieged by the cruel and treacherous Christian II; but the garrison under the command of the heroic woman Christina Gyllenstierna, widow of Sten Sture, made a desperate resistance. The besieged, however, finally capitulated, on favorable terms; but the perfidious monarch, shamefully violated the treaty, and massacred the inhabitants without mercy.

STONINGTON, A.D. 1814.—On the 8th of August, 1814, while a British fleet was lying off the harbor of Stonington, Connecticut, a brig of eighteen guns was ordered to bombard the town. The inhabitants, totally unprepared for this attack, were for a time in some confusion; but at length they procured two eighteen-pounders, and opened them upon the brig with so much vigor, that she was greatly damaged. She finally cut her cables and retired, after having inflicted some slight damages on the town, and Sir Thomas Hardy, the commander of the British squadron, alarmed at this warm reception, weighed anchor, and made no further attempts on the coast of Connecticut.

STONO FERRY, A.D. 1779.—A severe engagement took place on the 20th of June, 1779, at Stono Ferry, about thirty miles from Charleston, South Carolina, between a detachment (about 1200 strong) of the American army, under General Lincoln, and a body of 800 British troops, under Colonel Maitland. The British occupied a strongly intrenched position at Stono Ferry, and on the morning of the 20th of June they were attacked by Lincoln's troops. The battle raged hotly for about an hour and a half, neither party gaining a decided advantage. At length, however, Maitland being reinforced by troops from General Prevost, the Americans found it necessary to retreat, which they did in good order, bearing their wounded off the field. The Americans lost in killed and wounded 146, and 155 missing. The British lost about one hundred in killed and wounded.

STONY CREEK, A.D. 1813.—On the 8th of June, 1813, a battle occurred between the American army, under Generals Winder and Chandler, and the British, under General Vincent, near Stony creek, in Canada. The American army was taken by surprise, and was defeated, with a loss of 100 men taken prisoners, and four pieces of artillery. Among the prisoners were Generals Winder and Chandler. The loss in killed and wounded on both sides was nearly equal. The Americans retreated to Fort George, on the Canada shore of Lake Ontario.

STONY POINT, A.D. 1779.—This place is situated on the west bank of the Hudson river, at the head of Harvestraw bay, in Orange co., New York, about forty-two miles north of the city of New York.

The Americans with great labor and expense had constructed fortifications at Stony Point, and Verplanck's Neck, situated nearly opposite each other, the first on the west, and the second on the east side of the river. These were eligible sites for forts, making a formidable defense for the passage of the Americans at King's Ferry, thus affording a free communication between the troops of New England, and those of the central and southern States. General Clinton, the commander of the English army, at New York, therefore resolved to dislodge the Americans from these important posts. Accordingly on the 30th of May, Clinton in person, sailed up the river with a strong force. On the morning of the 31st, the troops were landed in two divisions, the one on the west side of the river, under Clinton, a little above Haverstraw, and the other on the east side, eight miles below Verplanck's Point. The flotilla was under the command of Admiral Collier. The American garrison at Stony Point consisted of only about forty men, and finding the enemy so near, and not being prepared to receive them, evacuated the fortress, and withdrew to the Highlands. The British troops then took possession of the fort without molestation. The garrison of Fort Fayette at Verplanck's Point, consisted of seventy men, and upon the approach of the enemy made active preparations to receive them; but the next morning the guns of the captured fortress at Stony Point were opened upon Fort Fayette; and the little garrison, finding themselves assailed in front by the guns of Stony Point, and in rear by the British under Vaughan, surrendered themselves prisoners of war, on very honorable terms. Washington deeply lamented the loss of these important fortifications, and resolved to make an immediate effort to recapture them. He removed the main body of his army to Middlebrook toward the Highlands, and established his head quarters at Smith's Clove, some distance in the interior. The English had labored industriously in completing the works at Stony Point and had already reduced them to the condition of an almost impregnable fortress. Nature and art combined, made it one of the strongest places on the continent. It was situated on a huge rock which rose out of the water and an isolated bluff at high tide; and was strongly defended by a double row of abatis and outworks. The north, south, and east sides of the rock were washed by the waters of the Hudson, and the west side was covered by a deep and dangerous marsh. The garrison consisted of nearly 700 British troops; and to protect it as well as that at Fort Fayette, Clinton had descended the river only as far as Philipsburg, now called Yonkers. On the 23d of June Washington removed his quarters to New Windsor, the command at West Point was intrusted to General M'Dougal, and the various garrisons and redoubts and passes along the river between West Point and Stony Point, were strengthened and guarded. On the 1st of July, General Wayne with the light infantry of the line was stationed in the vicinity of the Dunderberg, between Montgomery and Clove Spring, where the main body of the army remained.

Washington now resolved to execute his intended operations against Stony Point, and Fort Fayette. The garrison of Stony Point was commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Johnson; that of Fort Fayette, by Lieutenant Colonel Webster. The two garrisons were about equal in strength. Several small British vessels of war were stationed in the bay, within cannon-shot of both forts. Washington charged General Wayne with the attack of the fort at Stony Point; and General Howe with that of Fort Fayette. At noon on the 15th of July, Wayne, with a strong detachment of light infantry, marched from his quarters toward Stony Point. The day was intensely hot, and the troops, after marching over high mountains, through deep defiles and tangled thickets, and wading streams and marshes, arrived, greatly fatigued, at about 8 o'clock in the evening, within a mile and a half of Stony Point. General Wayne here halted in order to reconnoiter the enemy's works. Having accomplished his purpose unobserved by the English, he returned, and forming his troops in columns, moved forward toward the fort, under the guidance of a negro slave belonging to a gentleman in the vicinity. This negro had ingratiated himself into the favor of the British officers in the garrison; and had gained a knowledge of the countersign. The Americans commenced their march at half past eleven o'clock at night. Two strong men, disguised as farmers, accompanied by Pompey, the negro, marched on in advance of the army. They approached the first sentinel, and having given the countersign, Pompey entered into conversation with him. While the sentinel was thus engaged, he was suddenly seized and gagged by the men. The second sentinel met with the same fate; and the whole army, with the exception of 300 men, who were left in the rear under General Muhlenburg, to act as a reserve, crossed the marsh, and reached the western foot of the promontory unperceived by the English. Wayne now divided his troops into two columns, and placed himself at the head of the right, which was composed of the regiments of Febiger and Meigs. The left consisted of Colonel Butler's regiment, and two companies under Major Murfey. In the van of the right column marched 150 volunteers under the gallant Lieutenant Colonel de Fleury; and the vanguard of the left consisted of one hundred volunteers under Major Stewart. The muskets of these troops were unloaded; but they advanced with fixed bayonets. These composed the forlorn hope. An avant-guard of forty picked men under Lieutenants Gibbon and Knox marched on in advance of the whole army, to remove the abatis and other obstacles. At about midnight the advanced parties advanced to the attack; De Fleury toward the southern, and Stewart toward the northern portions of the promontory. Stealthily and silently the Americans ascended the slopes. They neared the enemy's pickets on the heights. A few pistol-shots warned them that their approach was discovered; but relying solely on the bayonet, the assailants vigorously pressed forward. The sharp roll of drums aroused the garrison from their slumbers; and the loud cry, To arms! to arms! resounded from within the walls. The English artillerymen flew to their pieces, the soldiers grasped their muskets, and a terrible fire of artillery and musketry was opened on the Americans. The two main divisions of the Americans followed closely in the rear of the vanguard, and pushed forward through the iron tempest, overcoming every obstacle, until the heads of the two columns met in the center of the works, where they arrived simultaneously. At the inner abatis, Wayne received a contusion in the hand by a musket-ball. "March on; carry me into the fort!" cried the gallant officer, "I will die at the head of my column." They bore him forward, and recovering from the effects of the shock, he joined in the shouts that arose as the two columns met as victors in the center of the fort. Colonel De Fleury, with his own hand, struck the royal standard that floated upon the walls. The garrison surrendered at discretion as prisoners of war. The humanity of the Americans imparted additional luster to their brilliant achievement. "The conquerors," says Botta, "abstained from pillage, and from all disorder; a conduct the more worthy to be commended as they had still present in mind the ravages and butcheries which their enemies had so recently committed in Carolina, in Virginia, and in Connecticut. Humanity imparted new effulgence to the victory which valor had obtained." The Americans lost 15 men killed, and 83 men wounded. Of the slain, nearly all belonged to the forlorn hope of Gibbon. The English lost 63 men killed; and Johnson, with 543 officers and men were made prisoners. Wayne immediately apprised Washington of the victory in the following laconic letter:

STONY POINT, 16*th July*, 1779,
2 o'clock, A. M.

DEAR GENERAL:

The fort and garrison, with Colonel Johnson, are ours.

Our officers and men behaved like men who are determined to be free.

Yours, most sincerely,
ANTH. WAYNE.

GENL. WASHINGTON.

General Howe, who had been sent to attack Fort Fayette, did not arrive in time to dislodge the garrison; and Clinton having sent reinforcements to the menaced point, Howe withdrew. The next morning Wayne opened the guns of Stony Point on Fort Fayette; but receiving intelligence of the approach of Clinton, Washington ordered the works at Stony Point to be demolished; the ordnance and stores to be removed, and the place evacuated. He had accomplished all that he had originally intended, namely, to make himself master of the artillery and stores of the fort, to destroy the works, and bring off the garrison. He therefore ordered General Wayne to retire with the artillery, stores, and prisoners, which he did successfully, after having demolished the fortifications. The patriots throughout the land hailed this brilliant victory with the loudest demonstrations of joy. Congress decreed their acknowledgments to Washington and to Wayne, to De Fleury, Stewart, Gibbon, and Knox. Wayne received a gold medal, struck in honor of his glorious achievement, and De Fleury and Stewart were presented with similar medals of silver. The value of the military stores taken at Stony Point, was distributed among the soldiers, as a reward for their gallant behavior on this occasion.

STRASLUND, A.D. 1713.—Charles XII. of Sweden, when he had taken refuge in Turkey, after being beaten by Peter of Russia, at length exhausted the obstinacy which had detained him so long at Demirtocka, meditating on means to excite the Ottoman Porte against his great rival, passed all at once, with characteristic energy, from excessive inactivity to equally excessive exertion. He set out from Demirtocka with prodigious speed, crossed the hereditary states of the emperor, Franconia and Mecklenburg, on horseback, and arrived at Straslund when least expected. His first proceeding was to protest against the sequestration of the city of Stettin. He hastened to declare that, not having made any convention, he was not obliged to recognize that which his generals had done in his absence, to place Pomerania and Stettin in a state of sequestration. With a character so obstinate as that of this prince, no other argument could be employed but force. Frederic William, King of Prussia, declared that he would not allow the Swedes to enter Saxony, and immediately joined the league of the Russians, Saxons, and Hanoverians. In order to force, with the strong hand, the King of Sweden to hold his engagements, he ordered a body of Prussian troops to advance close to Stettin. Charles XII. took possession of Anclam, Wolgaste, and Gripswalde, in which were Prussian garrisons; nevertheless, with a slight show of prudence, he dismissed the Prussian troops without violence.

At the commencement of the following campaign, the Swedes dislodged the Prussians from the isle of Usedom, and made prisoners of a detachment of 500 men. By this act of hostility they broke the neutrality of the Prussians, and became the aggressors. Frederic William, jealous of Charles's glory, and irritated at this proceeding, declared war against Sweden. Twenty thousand Prussians joined the Saxons and the Danes in Pomerania. Europe then beheld two kings, in person, besieging another shut up in Stralsund; but this king was Charles XII., fighting at the head of 15,000 warlike Swedes, loving to idolatry the heroism of their prince. Besides, his great reputation and the prejudices of the universe fought in his favor. In the army of the allies, the King of Prussia examined the plans, decided upon the operations, and persuaded the Danes to adopt his views. The King of Denmark, a bad soldier, and not at all military in his tastes, had only come to Stralsund in the hope of seeing Charles XII. humiliated. Under these two kings the Prince of Anhalt was the soul of all the military enterprises. "He was," says the King of Prussia, in his Memoirs, "a man of a violent and obstinate character, who, with the valor of a hero, had the experience of the finest campaigns of Prince Eugene. His manners were ferocious, his ambition boundless; deeply versed in the art of sieges, a fortunate soldier, a bad citizen, he was capable of all the enterprises of both Marius and Sylla, if fortune had seconded his ambition." This army laid siege to Stralsund, a city on the shores of the Baltic, the Swedish fleet being able to supply it constantly with provisions, munitions, and troops. Its situation is strong; an impracticable marsh defends two thirds of its circumference; the only way by which it is accessible is furnished by a good intrenchment, which from the north extends to the sea-shore, and touches on the marsh toward the east. In this intrenchment were encamped 12,000 Swedes, with Charles XII. at their head. The besiegers removed successively all the obstacles opposed to them. The first point was to drive away the Swedish fleet from the coasts of Pomerania, in order to deprive the Swedes of the succors they might receive by sea. Nevertheless the King of Denmark was unwilling to risk an action with a squadron he had on those coasts. All the influence of the King of Prussia was required to persuade him of the necessity for such a contest. The two kings were spectators of the action, which took place at a short distance from the shore, and threw the sea open to the allies. The Prussians afterward drove the Swedes from the isle of Usedom, and took the fort of Pannamende at the point of the sword. They shortly afterward prepared to attack the intrenchments. A Prussian officer singularly facilitated this undertaking, the most difficult and most dangerous of the whole siege. Being perfectly acquainted with the ground, he knew that the arm of the sea which washes the intrenchments was neither deep nor muddy; he sounded it by night, and found that it was possible to ford it, to turn this post by its left, and thus take the Swedes in flank and rear. This project was successfully executed. They attacked them by night; while one Prussian corps marched straight to the intrenchments, another passed along the sea-shore, and were in the Swedish camp before they were perceived. The surprise of an unexpected attack, the confusion natural to a night affair, and, above all, the numbers of the body which fell upon their flanks, threw them quickly into a state of rout; they abandoned their intrenchments, and sought refuge in the city. Enraged at being deserted by his own troops, Charles would have continued to fight alone. His generals dragged him from the scene of action, and had much difficulty in saving him from the hands of the allies; all who did not promptly gain Stralsund were either killed or made prisoners. The numbers taken in this attack amounted to more than 400 men. The more closely to press the city, it became necessary for the allies to render themselves masters of the isle of Rugen, whence the besieged could likewise obtain succors. The Prince of Anhalt, at the head of 20,000 men, crossed in transports the space which divides Pomerania. This fleet kept the same order of battle the troops observed on the land. They pretended to land on the eastern coast, but turning suddenly to the left, the Prince of Anhalt disembarked his troops at the port of Strezow, where the enemy did not expect him. He posted himself in a quarter of a circle, so that his two wings leaned upon the sea, and during the whole day caused intrenchments to be dug, fortified by chevaux de frise. His disposition was such that two lines of infantry supported his intrenchment. His cavalry formed the third, with the exception of six squadrons which he had posted within the lines, in order to be able to fall upon the left flank of those who might attack him on that side. Charles XII., deceived by the Prince of Anhalt's feint, could not arrive in time to oppose the disembarkation. Aware of the importance of this isle, he advanced by night upon the Prussians, although he had but 4,000 men. He marched at the head of his infantry, which he led to the very edge of the ditch, assisting to pull up the chevaux de frise which bordered it with his own hands; he was slightly wounded in this attack, and General Dureng was killed at his side. The inequality of numbers, the darkness of the night, the six Prussian squadrons; but still more than all, the king's wound, made the Swedes lose the fruits of their valor. Fortune had turned her back upon that nation; every thing seemed to tend to its decline. The king retired to have his wound dressed; his discomfited troops fled. The next day 1,200 Swedes were made prisoners at Lafich-Schanz, and the isle of Rugen was entirely occupied by the allies. After this misfortune Charles XII. returned to Stralsund. That city was almost reduced to extremity. The besiegers having gained the counterscarp, had already begun to construct their gallery upon the principal fosse. It was the character of the King of Sweden to bear up firmly against reverses; he endeavored to withstand his ill-fortune, and was able to preserve an inexpressible sang-froid under all circumstances. The citizens, far from murmuring, filled with admiration for their master, whose exertions, sobriety, and courage astonished them, had all become soldiers under him. One day, when the king was dictating letters for Sweden to a secretary, a bomb fell upon the house, penetrated the roof, and burst close to the king's apartment. At the noise of the bomb and the crash of the house, which seemed falling about their ears, the pen fell from the hand of the secretary. "What's the matter?" said the king, with a tranquil air; "why don't you write on?" "Oh, sire, the bomb!" "Well," rejoined the king, "what has the bomb to do with the letter I am dictating to you? Go on!" When he saw the breach open, he wanted to defend it in person, the besiegers threatening to give a general assault. His generals threw themselves at his feet to conjure him not to risk his life so uselessly. Seeing their prayers had no effect, they pointed out to him the danger to which he exposed himself of falling into the hands of his enemies. This apprehension at length made him determine to abandon the city. He embarked in a light boat, in which he passed, favored by the darkness, through the Danish fleet which blockaded Stralsund, and gained with much trouble one of his own vessels, which conveyed him to Sweden. Fourteen years before, he had left this city as a conqueror about to subdue the world; he returned thither a fugitive, pursued by his enemies, despoiled of his finest provinces, and abandoned by his army. As soon as the king was gone, the garrison of Stralsund capitulated, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war.—Robson.

STRATTON, A.D. 1643.—On the 16th of May, 1643, a battle was fought on the height near Stratton in Devonshire, England, between the army of Charles I., and the forces of Parliament under Edward Waller the poet. The latter were defeated with considerable loss, and Waller was obliged to fly to Bristol.

SUDBURY, A.D. 1676.—On the 18th of April, 1676, during King Philip's war, a fierce battle was fought at Sudbury, Mass., between the Indians and the gallant band of Captain Samuel Wadsworth, who with at least two thirds of his men were slain. A monument marks the place where the action took place, and where the remains of the dead are deposited.

SYBARIS, B.C. 508.—Sybaris was situated ten leagues from Crotona, which occupied the site of the present city of Naples, in the kingdom of Naples, which is nearly identical with the Magna Græcia of antiquity.

Sybaris was one of the most powerful and wealthy cities of Magna Græcia. Four neighboring states and twenty-five cities were subject to it, so that it was able alone to raise an army of 300,000 men. The opulence of Sybaris was soon followed by luxury and indolence. The citizens employed themselves in nothing but banquets, games, shows, parties of pleasure, and carousals. Public prizes and testimonials were bestowed on those who gave the most magnificent banquets, and even cooks were publicly rewarded when they invented new dishes and dainties. The Sybarites carried their delicacy and effeminacy to such a height, that they carefully removed from their city, all such artificers whose work was noisy, and would not allow any cocks within its walls, lest their shrill piercing crow, should disturb their balmy slumbers. These evils were heightened by dissension and discord, which at last proved their ruin. A faction headed by a certain Telly, expelled from Sybaris 500 of the wealthiest citizens, who fled to Crotona. Telly demanded that they should be delivered up to him, and upon the refusal of the Crotonians, war was declared between the two cities. The Sybarites marched 300,000 men into the field, and the Crotonians only 100,000. But the latter army was commanded by the famous champion Milo, who was robed in a lion's skin, and had armed himself with a huge club like a second Hercules. The Crotonians gained a complete victory. So great was the slaughter, that of the immense Sybarite army only a few escaped, and their city was almost entirely depopulated.

SYRACUSE, B.C. 414.—Syracuse, a famous city of Sicily, was founded by a colony from Corinth about the year 736, B.C. It rapidly rose to the highest distinction, both by its advantageous position, and the commercial enterprising spirit of its inhabitants. The modern city occupies only a small portion of the site of the ancient city, and its population in 1831 was 16,805.

When the Athenians besieged Syracuse it was divided into three parts, viz.: the island, Achradina, and Tyche. The island, situated to the south was called Nasos, and Ortygia. It was connected to the continent by a bridge. Achradina was situated on the sea side, toward the east, and was the most beautiful and best fortified quarter of the city. Tyche extends along Achradina westward, from the north toward the south, and was very well inhabited. It had a celebrated gate called Hexapylum, which led into the country, and was situated to the north of the city. Epipolæ was a hill without the city, which it commanded. It was situated between Hexapylum and the point of Euryclus, toward the north and west. It was exceedingly steep in several places, and for that reason of very difficult access. At the time of the siege in question, it was not surrounded by walls; the Syracusans defended it with a body of troops against the attacks of the enemy. Euryclus was the pass or entrance which led to Epipolæ. On the hill of Epipolæ was a fort called Labdalum. The river Arrapus ran at almost half a league distance from the city. The space between the city and the river, was an extensive and beautiful plain, terminating in two marshes; the one called Syraco, whence the city derived its name, and the other Lysemelia. The river Arrapus emptied into the great harbor; near its mouth, southward, was situated a castle called Olympia, in which were stored great riches. It was about 500 paces from the city. Syracuse had two harbors, very near one another, and separated only by the island. The harbors were called respectively the great harbor, and the small harbor. The latter was also called Lœtus. Both harbors were surrounded by the buildings of the city. The entrance to this port was only 500 paces wide. It was formed on one side by the point of the island Ortygia, and on the other by the little island and cape of Plemmyriam, which was commanded by a castle of the same name. Above Achradina was a third port, called the harbor of Trogilus.

Nicias, the commander of the Athenian forces, who had arrived with his fleet and army at Catana, in Sicily, having learned that the Syracusans were preparing to march against him, determined at once to sail for Syracuse. This enterprise was both bold and dangerous. He could not, without running the utmost hazard, attempt to land his army in the presence of an enemy who were prepared to attack him with the greatest energy as soon as he should offer to make a descent. Nor was it safer for him to march his troops by land, because, as he had no cavalry, while that of the Syracusans was very strong, upon the first advice they should receive of his march, they would fall upon, and overwhelm him by the superiority of their forces. To extricate himself from this perplexity and enable him to seize upon an advantageous port, which a Syracusan exile had pointed out to him, Nicias had recourse to stratagem. He caused a piece of false information to be conveyed to the enemy.

This was, that by means of a conspiracy which was to take effect on a certain day, the Syracusans might seize on his camp, and possess themselves of all the arms and baggage. The Syracusans, on this assurance, marched toward Catana, and encamped near Leontium. The moment the Athenians had received intelligence of this, they embarked with all their troops and ammunition, and in the evening steered for Syracuse.

The Athenian fleet consisted of 136 ships, 100 of which had been fitted out by the citizens of Athens, the rest belonged to the allies. On board of these vessels were 5,000 heavy-armed soldiers, 2,200 of whom were Athenian citizens; and 1,300 light infantry, of whom eighty were Cretans, 700 were Rhodians, 120 were exiles of Megara, and 400 were inhabitants of various other countries. There was but one company of horse, consisting of eighty troopers, who had embarked on board a vessel proper for transporting cavalry. Thirty vessels carried the provisions and sutlers, with masons, carpenters, and their several tools. The whole fleet was followed by 100 vessels, for their service, exclusive of merchant ships, of which there were great numbers. All this fleet had sailed from Corcyra, to which place the Athenians had proceeded with their ships and army to join those of their allies; but both the fleet and land forces were afterward considerably enlarged. The Syracusans having learned of the coming of this fleet before its arrival at Catana, had sent deputations to all parts of the island, to ask assistance of some, and send succor to others. They had garrisoned all the forts and castles in the country, reviewed all the soldiers and horses; examined all the arms in the magazines, and settled and prepared all things in a manner most fitted to meet and drive the enemy from their country.

Early the next morning after their departure from Catana, the Athenians arrived in the great harbor. They landed near Olympia, in the place which had been pointed out to them, and there fortified themselves. In the mean time, the Syracusans, finding themselves shamefully over-reached, immediately returned to Syracuse, and a few days afterward drew themselves up in battle array, before the walls of the city. Enraged by the successful stratagem of the enemy, they were determined to drive them into the sea. Nicias immediately marched out of his trenches, and a battle was fought. Victory for a long time did not declare for either party; but suddenly a heavy rain, accompanied by thunder and lightning, came down, and the Syracusans, who were inexperienced, the greater part of them having never carried arms before, were frightened at the tempest, while their enemies laughed at it, and regarded nothing but their foes, whom they considered more to be dreaded than the storm. The Syracusans, after making a long and vigorous resistance, were forced to give way, and retreated in good order into the city, after having thrown a body of troops into the temple of Olympia, to prevent its being plundered. After the battle, the Athenians, who were not yet in a condition to attack Syracuse, retired with their fleet into Naxos and Catana, to winter there, with a design to return and lay siege to the city, in the beginning of the next spring. The Syracusans immediately commenced to fortify the city. They took into the city, by a wall, all the tract of land toward Epipolæ, from the northern extremity of Tyche, descending westward toward the quarter of the city afterward called Neapolis, in order to remove the enemy to a greater distance, and to give them more trouble in making their contravallation, by obliging them to give a larger extent to it. They also garrisoned Megara and Olympia, and drove stakes into all those parts of the sea-shore, where the enemy might make an easy descent. Both the Corinthians and the Lacedæmonians had, at the request of the Syracusans, consented to send them succors.

In the mean time, Nicias had received some reinforcements from Athens. These consisted of 250 troopers, who, the Athenians supposed, would be furnished with horses in Sicily, (the troops bringing only the furniture) and thirty horse-archers. They also sent him three hundred talents, that is $355,000, to assist in defraying the expenses of the siege. Nicias now began to prepare for action. The Syracusans hearing that the Athenians had received a reinforcement of cavalry, and would soon lay siege to the city, and knowing that the enemy could not possibly approach it, nor make a contravallation, unless they should possess themselves of the hill of Epipolæ, which commanded Syracuse, they resolved to guard the only avenue by which the enemy could reach it. All other portions of the hill, save this pass, were steep, rugged, and inaccessible. They therefore marched down into the meadow bordered by the river Arrapus, where they reviewed their troops, and then appointed 700 foot, under the command of Diomilus, to guard the pass which led to the hill. Diomilus was ordered to hasten to the hill at the first signal which should be given for that purpose. Nicias, however, conducted his design with so much secrecy, prudence, and expedition, that he arrived at the port of Tragilus, near Leontium, which was but six or seven furlongs from Epipolæ, without the knowledge of the Syracusans. He here disembarked his land forces, and then repaired with his fleet to Thupsus, a small peninsula near Syracuse, the entrance to which he closed with a staccato. His land forces marched with the utmost expedition to seize on Epipolæ, by the pass of Euryclus, before the enemy who were in the plains of Arrapus, had the slightest notice of their arrival. At the first news of the arrival of the Athenians, the 700 soldiers, commanded by Diomilus, hastened to the pass in the utmost confusion. They were immediately attacked by the enemy, and a sharp skirmish ensued. The Syracusans fought with the greatest valor; but overpowered by numbers, they gave way before the enemy, and finally fled, leaving 300 of their men, and their leader, dead upon the field. The Athenians, after erecting a trophy, built a fort on the summit of Epipolæ, in order to secure their baggage, and most valuable effects, in it, whenever they should be forced to fight, or work at the circumvallation. Shortly afterward the Athenians received from the inhabitants of Egesta 300 horses, to which some of their Sicilian allies added 100 more, which with the 250 sent from Athens, made a body of 650 horse. The plan laid down by Nicias for taking Syracuse, was to surround the city on the land side with a strong contravallation, in order to cut off all communication with the place from without, hoping that his fleet would afterward enable him to prevent the Syracusans from receiving any succor or provisions by sea. Accordingly, having left a garrison at Epipolæ, he advanced toward the northern extremity of Tyche, and halting there, he employed his whole army in throwing up a line of contravallation to shut up the city, northward from Tyche, as far as Trogilus, situated on the sea-side. This work was carried on with a rapidity which terrified the Syracusans. They thought it absolutely necessary to put a stop to the work, and therefore they sallied out with the fixed design of hazarding an engagement. The armies on both sides were now beginning to face each other; but the Syracusan generals, observing that their own army was in disarray, and could not easily be formed in proper order, made them all wheel off again into the city, except a party of their horse. These, keeping the field, prevented the Athenians from carrying stones, and straggling to any distance from their posts. But an Athenian band of heavy-armed, supported by the whole body of their cavalry, attacked and put to flight the Syracusan horse, with great slaughter.

On the day following, some of the Athenians began to raise a wall along the northern side of the circle; while others were employed in carrying stones and timber, which they laid down in heaps all along the place called Trogilus, near to the line marked out for the circumvallation, which was to reach, by the shortest compass, from the great harbor on one side to the sea on the other. But the Syracusans, who were principally guided by the advice of Hermocrates gave up all thoughts of sallying out for the future with the whole strength of the city to give battle to the Athenians. It was judged more advisable to run along a wall in length, which would cut the line in which the Athenian works were designed to pass, and which, could they effect it in time, must entirely exclude the enemy from perfecting their circumvallation. Nay, further, in case the enemy should come up in a body to interrupt the work, they might give them full employ with one division of their force, while another party might raise pallisades to secure the approaches; at least, as the whole of the Athenian force must be drawn out to oppose them, they would be obliged to discontinue their own works. To raise, therefore, the projected work, they issued out of the city; and beginning at the foot of the city wall from below the Athenian circle, they carried on thence a transverse wall, cutting down the olive-trees in the sacred grove, of which they built wooden turrets to cover their work. The Athenian shipping had not yet come round from Thapsus into the great harbor. But the Syracusans continued masters of all the posts upon the sea, and consequently the Athenians were obliged to fetch up all necessary stores from Thapsus across the land.

When it appeared to the Syracusans that all their pallisades and the transverse wall were sufficiently completed, in which the Athenians had given them no manner of interruption, as they were under apprehensions that, should they divide their force, they might be exposed to a defeat, and at the same time were ardently intent on perfecting their own circumvallation—the Syracusans drew off again into the city, leaving only one band of heavy-armed for the guard of their counter-wall.

In the next place, the Athenians cut off the pipes, which by subterraneous ducts conveyed the drinking-water into the city; and having further observed that the Syracusans kept within their tents during the heat of the day, but that some had straggled into the town, while those posted at the pallisades kept but a negligent guard, they picked out 300 of their heavy-armed, and strengthening them with a choice party of their light-armed soldiers, ordered them to march with all possible speed and attack the counter-work. The rest of their force were to march another way, since, headed by one of the generals, it advanced toward the city, to employ the Syracusans in case they sallied; while the other detachment, headed by the other general, attacked the pallisade which covered the sallyport. Accordingly, the 300 assaulted and carried the pallisade, which those who were posted for its guard abandoned, and fled for shelter behind the works which inclosed Temenites. The pursuers, however, entered with them; but had no sooner got in than they were again forcibly driven out by the Syracusans with considerable loss. But now the whole army, wheeling about, demolished the counter-work, and pulled up the pallisade. The piles, of which it was composed, they carried off in triumph, and erected a trophy.

The next morning the Athenians resumed their work of circumvallation, and continued it across the crag which is above the marsh, and lies on the quarter of Epipolæ that looks toward the great harbor. This was the shortest cut for their circumvallation downward, across the plain and the marsh, till it reached the harbor. Upon this, the Syracusans, issuing again, raised another pallisade, beginning from the city, and stretching quite across the marsh. They also drew up an intrenchment along the pallisade, entirely to prevent the Athenians from continuing their works quite down to the sea. The latter, when they had perfected their work along the crag, were bent on demolishing the new pallisade and intrenchment of the Syracusans. For this purpose, they had ordered their shipping to come about from Thapsus into the great harbor of Syracuse. They themselves, at the morning's dawn, marched down from Epipolæ into the plain; and then, crossing the marsh, where the mud was hardest and best able to bear, by the help of boards and planks which they laid upon the surface, they carried almost the whole length of the pallisade and intrenchment early in the morning, and were soon masters of the whole. This was not effected without a battle, in which the Athenians were again victorious. The routed Syracusans fled different ways; those who had composed their right, toward the city; and those who had composed their left, toward the river. But with a view to intercepting the passage of the latter, the 300 chosen Athenians marched with all speed to seize the bridge. The Syracusans, alarmed at this movement, as the body consisted of the bulk of their horse, faced about on the 300, and put them to flight, and then broke in upon the right wing of the Athenians. By so unexpected a shock the first band in that wing was thrown into disorder. Lamachus, who commanded the left wing, observing this, advanced to their support. Having crossed a ditch that lay between, seconded only by a few, while the bulk of his party made a full stop, he was instantly slain; as were also five or six of those by whom he was accompanied. The Syracusans now made a precipitate retreat, since the rest of the Athenian army was coming up to attack them.

But now, such of the Syracusans as had fled at first toward the city, having gained leisure to observe such turns in their favor, caught fresh courage from the sight; and, forming again into order, stood their ground against the body of Athenians which faced them. They also sent a detachment to attempt the fort on Epipolæ, concluding it to be unmanned for the present, and might at once be taken. This detachment in fact made itself master of the outwork; but the fort itself was defended by Nicias from all their attempts. Nicias, being much out of order, had been left to repose himself within the fort. He therefore issued orders to his servants to set fire to all the machines and the timber which were lying before the wall; for he was convinced that thus alone, in such a total want of hands for their defense, any safety could be earned. The event answered his expectation; for when the flames began to mount, the Syracusans durst not any longer come near, but thought proper to desist and march away.

For now the Athenians, who by this time had chased the enemy from off the plain, were remounting the ascent to defend their fort, and at the same instant of time, their fleet, conformable to the orders they had received, was standing into the great harbor. The Syracusans upon the high ground beheld the sight, which occasioned them and the whole Syracusan army to retire precipitately into the city; concluding themselves no longer able, without an augmentation of their present strength, to hinder the completion of the Athenian works quite down to the sea.

After this, the Athenians erected a trophy, and, in pursuance of a truce, delivered up their slain to the Syracusans, and received in exchange the body of Lamachus, and of those who fell with him.

The junction of their whole armament, both of their land and naval force, being now completed, they began again, from Epipolæ and the crag, to invest the Syracusans with a double wall, which they were to continue quite down to the sea. The necessary provisions to supply their army were brought in from all the coasts of Italy. Many cities of Sicily, which had hitherto stood aloof, declared now for the Athenians, and came to their alliance.

Nicias, who was now sole general, since Lamachus was dead, was filled with hope. The Syracusans on the contrary, seeing themselves blockaded, both by sea and land, lost all hopes of being able to defend their city any longer, and soon, made proposals for an accommodation. Gylippus, who was on his way to their assistance, having been sent by the Lacedæmonians, heard, on his passage, of the extremity to which the Syracusans were reduced, and, looking upon their city as lost, he abandoned Syracuse to its fate. He nevertheless sailed forward toward Sicily, with a view of preserving, if possible, to the nations of Italy, such cities as were subject to them on that island. Nicias, confiding in his own strength, and believing that Syracuse would soon capitulate, regarded Gylippus's approach as a matter of no moment, and consequently took no precaution to prevent his landing. He termed him a trifling pirate, not worthy, in any manner, of his notice.

The fortifications of the Athenians were now almost completed. They had drawn a double wall, nearly half a league in length, along the plain and the marshes, toward the great harbor, which it almost reached. There now remained on the side toward Trogilus, only a small part of the wall to be finished. The Syracusans, therefore, were on the brink of ruin; hopeless and despairing, they resolved to surrender. But at the very moment that the articles of capitulation were being drawn up, prior to their presentation to Nicias, a Corinthian officer named Gongylus arrived from Corinth, on board a galley with three banks of oars. At his arrival all the citizens flocked around him. He informed them that Gylippus would be with them immediately, and that other ships of war would soon arrive from Corinth. The Syracusans, surprised, nay, stupefied by this intelligence, could scarcely believe what they heard.

While they were thus fluctuating between fear and hope, a courier arrived from Gylippus to inform them of his approach, and to order them to march out to meet him with their troops. He himself, after having taken a fort in his way, immediately marched in battle array toward Epipolæ, and, ascending the hill by the pass of Eurycus, as the Athenians had done, he prepared to attack the fort, while the Syracusans, with a body of his troops, should make an assault on the enemy's works. The Athenians, exceedingly surprised at his arrival, drew up hastily and without order, under the walls. Gylippus, however, having ordered his forces to halt, dispatched a herald to the Athenians, proclaiming that "in case they would evacuate Sicily within the space of five days, with their arms and baggage, he would readily grant them peace." Nicias did not condescend to reply to this proposal. His soldiers heard it with disdain, and one of them, laughing loudly, asked the herald "whether the arrival of one Lacedæmonian cloak and staff should inspire the Syracusans with contempt for the power of the Athenians." Upon the return of the herald both sides prepared for battle. Gylippus stormed the fort on the hill, and cut to pieces all who were found in it. The same day an Athenian galley, with three banks of oars, was taken by the Syracusans as it was entering the harbor. After this the Syracusans and their allies set about erecting a counterwork along Epipolæ. Beginning at the city they carried it upward toward the single wall of the Athenians, which had an oblique direction, and intended that in case the Athenians could not prevent its completion, it should entirely exclude them from perfecting their circumvallation. The Athenians, after having finished the wall which extended to the sea, towards the great harbor, returned to the hills. Gylippus, perceiving a weak spot in the single wall which the Athenians had built on the hills of Epipolæ, marched thither with his troops; but being discovered by the Athenians, who were encamped without their works, he was forced to retire. The Athenians immediately strengthened that part of the wall, and raised it higher. They then took the guard of it themselves, while their allies were fixed in the several posts of the remainder of the intrenchment.

Nicias also judged it expedient to fortify the spot called Plemmyrium. "If this were fortified," he thought, "the importation of necessaries for the army would be better secured; because then, from a smaller distance, they could at any time command the harbor where the Syracusan shipping lay; and, should it be their ill fortune to be straitened by sea, might easier fetch in supplies than in the present station of their fleet at the bottom of the great harbor." Now also he began, with greater attention than before, to study how to distress them by sea; convinced, since the arrival of Gylippus, how little room he had to hope for success by land. To this spot, therefore, he ordered his fleet, and drew his land forces down, and immediately erected three forts. In these the greatest part of the baggage was laid up; and the transports and light ships were immediately stationed there. To this project the havoc which afterward ensued among the seamen is principally to be ascribed; for, as they suffered in this station under scarcity of water, and the mariners were frequently obliged to fetch both water and wood from a distance, since near at hand they were not to be had, the Syracusan horse, who were masters of the country, slaughtered them in abundance. The Syracusans had posted a third part of their cavalry at their fortress of Olympia, to bridle the marauding excursions of the enemy at Plemmyrium.

Nicias, having received intelligence that the Corinthian fleet was advancing, sent twenty galleys against it, ordering them to cruize about Locri and Rhegium and the capes of Sicily, in order to intercept them.

Gylippus, in the mean time, was employed in building the counter-wall along Epipolæ, making use of the very stones which the Athenians had laid ready in heaps for the continuation of their own work. It was also his daily custom to draw up the Syracusans and allies in order of battle, and lead them out beyond the point of the counter-wall; which obliged the Athenians to draw up likewise, to observe their motions. And, when Gylippus judged he could attack them with advantage, he instantly advanced, and, the charge being given and received, a battle ensued in the space between their respective works; but so narrow that no use could be made of the Syracusan and confederate horse. The Syracusans and allies were accordingly defeated. They fetched off their slain by truce, and the Athenians erected a trophy. But Gylippus, having assembled the army round him, made a declaration in the presence of them all, that the defeat was not to be charged to their want of bravery, but to his own indiscretion, in ranging his battle in too confined a spot between the works, and that he would soon give them an opportunity to recover both their honor and his own. Accordingly, the very next day, he led them against the enemy, after having exhorted them in the strongest terms to behave in a manner worthy of their ancient glory. It was the opinion of Nicias, and in general of all the Athenians, that though it was not their own interest to bring on an engagement, yet it was highly necessary for them to put a stop to the wall which the enemy was erecting to hinder their progress; for, by this time the Syracusans had extended their wall beyond the extreme point to which the Athenians had brought their circumvallation. He therefore marched his troops against the Syracusans. Gylippus brought up his men beyond the spot where the walls terminated, on both sides, in order that he might extend his battle. Then charging the enemy's left wing with his horse he put it to flight, and shortly afterwards he defeated the right. The following night the Syracusans carried on their wall beyond the circumvallation of the Athenians, and thus deprived them of all hopes of being ever able to surround them.

After this success, the Syracusans, to whose aid the Corinthian fleet had arrived, unperceived by the Athenian ships, after arming several galleys, marched into the plains with their cavalry and other forces, and took a great number of prisoners. They sent deputies to Lacedæmonia and Corinth to desire reinforcements. Gylippus, in person, went through all the cities of Sicily to solicit them to aid him in expelling the Athenians from the island. The greater part of them complied with his request, and sent powerful succors to Syracuse. Nicias, finding his troops lessen, while those of the enemy increased daily, began to be discouraged. He not only sent expresses to Athens to acquaint them of the state of affairs, but likewise wrote to them in the strongest terms, demanding reinforcements and aid. In his letter, after representing the danger in which his army was placed, he requested that they should appoint a person to succeed him in command, because he was affected with a nephritic disorder, which prevented him from sustaining the weight of the command. He imagined that he deserved this favor at their hands on account of the many services he had done them when in the vigor of his life. He concluded by urging them to use all possible expedition in the execution of whatever resolution they might arrive at; for the ready supplies which the Syracusans received in Sicily would soon enable them to act. And moreover, that unless they exerted themselves the Lacedæmonians would steal a march upon them as they had done before, and arrive at Syracuse before them. The Athenians were strongly affected by this letter; still they did not think it proper to appoint him a successor. They nominated, however, two officers who were under him, namely Menander and Euthydemus, to assist him till other generals should be sent. Eurymedon and Demosthenes were chosen to succeed Lamarchus and Alcibiades, the former having been slain during the siege, while the latter had been recalled before. Eurymedon set out immediately with ten galleys, and with a supply of twenty talents of silver ($19,375), to assure Nicias that a speedy succor should be sent him. In the mean time Demosthenes set about raising troops and contributions in order to set sail for Syracuse early in the spring.

Meanwhile Gylippus returned from his tour through Sicily, with as many men as he could raise in the whole island. He advised the Syracusans to fit out the strongest fleet in their power, and to hazard a battle at sea. This advice was warmly seconded by Hermocrates, who exhorted the Syracusans not to abandon the empire of the sea to their enemies. The advice was approved, and accordingly a large fleet was equipped. Gylippus led out all his land forces in the night time to attack the forts of the enemy at Plemmyrium. Thirty-five Syracusan galleys, which were in the great harbor, and 45 which were in the lesser, where was an arsenal for ships, were ordered to advance toward Plemmyrium, to amaze the Athenians, who would see themselves attacked both by sea and land at the same time. The Athenians, however, apprised of the movement of the enemy's fleet, lost no time, but instantly manned 60 ships, to intercept the Syracusan fleet. With 25 galleys they engaged the 35 Syracusan ships, in the great harbor, and with the others went to meet the other squadron that was coming from the arsenal. A sharp battle immediately ensued in the mouth of the great harbor. The dispute was long and obstinate; one side exerting themselves to clear the passage, and the other to obstruct. The Athenians, who were posted in the forts of Plemmyrium, having flocked to the shores, to view the battle, Gylippus attacked the forts unexpectedly at daybreak, and having carried the greatest of them by storm, the soldiers who defended the other two were so terrified that they abandoned them in a moment. After this advantage, the Syracusans sustained a considerable loss. The Syracusan squadron that was engaged at the mouth of the harbor, having forced their way through the enemy's fleet, by sailing forward in a disorderly manner, and continually running foul upon one another, gave the Athenians an opportunity to regain the day. Falling upon this disordered squadron, the Athenian fleet quickly routed it, and then fiercely attacked those ships of the enemy which had been victorious in the great harbor. They sunk 11 Syracusan galleys, and made a slaughter of all their crews, those of their ships excepted, to whom they gave quarter. Having afterward drawn ashore the shattered remains of the vanquished Syracusan ships, and piled them into a trophy on the little isle, before Plemmyrium, they retired into the main encampment. The Syracusans also raised their trophies for the taking of the trust-forts. One of these forts they leveled to the ground, but the other two they repaired and garrisoned.

In this surprisal of the forts, many Athenians were slain, and many were made prisoners, and a great stock of wealth deposited there became the prize of the enemy. For, as the Athenians had made use of these forts by way of magazine, much wealth belonging to merchants, and corn in abundance, were found within; much also of the stores belonging to the captains of the ships of war, inasmuch as forty masts for galleys, and other materials of refitment, had been laid up there; and three galleys were hauled ashore to be careened. Nay, this surprisal of Plemmyrium was one of the chief, if not the greatest source of all the distress which the Athenian army suffered in the sequel; for no longer was the sea open to them for the secure importation of necessary supplies. From this time the Syracusans rushed upon them thence, and awed all their motions. The convoys could no more get in without fighting their way. Beside that, in all other respects, it struck a great consternation, and even a dejection of mind among the troops.

There happened also a skirmish in the harbor of Syracuse, about the piles which the Syracusans had driven down in the sea before their old docks, that their vessels might ride in safety behind them, and the Athenians be unable to stand in among them to do any damage to their shipping. Close up to those piles the Athenians towed a raft of prodigious size, on which turrets and parapets to cover the defendants were erected, while others in long boats fastened cables round the piles, and, by the help of a machine convenient for the purpose, drew them up; and such as they broke, a set of divers sawed them off close at the bottom. The Syracusans, in the mean time, were pouring their missile weapons upon them from the docks, which were plentifully returned by those posted on the raft. In short, the Athenians plucked up the most of the piles, but one part of the staccade was exceeeingly difficult to be demolished, as it lay out of sight; for they had driven down some of the piles in such a manner that their heads emerged not above the surface of the water. This rendered all access exceeding dangerous; since, ignorant where they lay, a pilot would be apt to bulge his vessel as if it were upon a shelve. But even these, the divers, for a pecuniary reward, searched out and sawed away. And yet, as fast as this was done, the Syracusans drove down a fresh set of piles. The contrivances, both of annoyance and prevention, were strenuously exerted on both sides, as might justly be expected from two hostile bodies posted so near one another; the skirmishings were often renewed, and every artifice of war was successively practiced.

The Syracusans esteemed it of the utmost importance to attempt a second engagement, both by sea and land, before the Athenians should receive succors from Athens. They had concerted fresh measures for a battle at sea, profiting by the errors they had committed in the last action. They made great changes in their galleys, making the prows shorter, and at the same time stronger and more solid than before. For this purpose they fixed great pieces of timber, projecting forward, on each side of the prows, and to these beams they joined beams by way of props. By this they hoped to gain the advantage over the galleys of the Athenians, which, with their slight prows, did not dare to attack an enemy in front, but only in flank. Gylippus first advanced with all his infantry toward that part of the contravallation of the Athenians, which faced the city, while the troops of Olympia marched toward the other. Immediately afterward the Syracusan galleys set sail to engage the enemy's fleet. Nicias, although unwilling to venture a second battle, was forced to do so by the urgent solicitation of the newly-appointed officers, Meander and Euthydemus. The Athenian fleet consisted of 75 galleys, while the Syracusans' numbered 80. The first day, the fleets continued in sight of each other in the great harbor, without engaging; only a few skirmishes passed, after which both parties retired, and at the same time the land army drew off from the intrenchments. Two days afterward, the Syracusans, earlier in the morning than before, but with the same parade of their land and naval force, came out to attack the Athenians. The two fleets shortly afterward engaged. Victory did not continue long in suspense. The Athenians, after making a short and slight resistance, retreated. They lost in this engagement seven galleys, whose crews were either slaughtered or taken prisoners. The Syracusans were highly elated by this victory, and felt assured that they must soon conquer by land as well as by sea. At this crisis, Demosthenes and Eurymedon arrived with a fleet of 73 gorgeously ornamented galleys, on board of which were 5,000 fighting men, and 3,000 archers, slingers, and bowmen. All these galleys were richly trimmed, their prows being adorned with shining streamers, and as they were rapidly propelled over the water by the stout rowers, animated by the sound of clarions and trumpets, they presented a magnificent appearance. Demosthenes flattered himself with the hope that he should be able to carry the city at the first attack, but having been defeated in his assault upon the wall which cut off the contravallation of the besiegers, this hope vanished. The Syracusans were, indeed, alarmed at the arrival of this fleet. They could not see the end, nor even the suspension of their calamities; but their courage seemed to increase with their distresses. Demosthenes now confined himself to the attack of Epipolæ, believing that if he should once master it, the wall would be quite undefended. As there was no going up to it in the day-time without being discovered, he marched thither in the night with all his forces, who were supplied with provisions for five days. The Athenians ascended the hill by the pass of Euryclus unperceived by the sentinels. They stormed and took the fort, and killed the most of those who defended it. Demosthenes taking advantage of the ardor of his troops, marched rapidly toward the wall. In the mean time Gylippus with his forces marched out of the intrenchment to repel the enemy. But the darkness of the night was so great that they were suddenly attacked by the enemy before they were aware of their presence. Thrown into complete disorder by this unexpected assault, the Syracusans were routed and put to flight, and the enemy would have taken their works, had not a party of Bœotians, who composed a part of Gylippus's force, suddenly turned back upon the Athenians. With loud shouts the Bœotians, presenting their pikes, threw themselves upon the Athenians. A sharp conflict ensued, but the Athenians, disordered and confused, were repulsed with fearful slaughter. Terror reigned supreme in their ranks. The Athenians in the dark, not knowing friend from foe, dealt their blows indiscriminately, and many of them were slain by their own comrades. At length, turning, they fled in a confused mass down the hill, and many of them, leaping from the top of the rocks into the depths below, were killed by the fall. Those who escaped straggled from one another up and down through the fields and woods, and were cut to pieces by the enemy's horse the next day. Two thousand Athenians were slain during this engagement, and a great quantity of arms fell into the hands of the Syracusans, the fugitives having thrown them away in order to facilitate their escape.

After this great loss the Athenians were filled with consternation. Many of the troops in their intrenchments died daily, either by the diseases of autumn, or by the foul air of the marshes near which they were encamped. Demosthenes was now of opinion that they had better raise the siege, and quit the country, before it was too late in the season to set sail. New troops having arrived from various parts of Sicily, to the aid of the Syracusans, the Athenians were so terrified, that orders were given to the fleet to prepare for sailing with the utmost expedition. When all things were ready, at the very moment they were going to set sail (wholly unexpected by the enemy, who were far from surmising that they would leave Sicily), the moon was suddenly eclipsed in the middle of the night. Nicias and his whole army were so much terrified at this phenomenon, being entirely ignorant of its cause, that they decided to remain 27 days longer before they set sail. But they were not allowed time for this. The news of the intended departure of the Athenians being soon spread throughout Syracuse, a resolution was taken to attack the besiegers both by sea and land. The Syracusans began the fight by attacking the intrenchments of the besiegers, and gained a slight advantage over the enemy. On the next day they made a second attack on the intrenchments, and also at the same time sailed with 76 galleys against 86 of the Athenians. Eurymedon, who commanded the right wing of the Athenian fleet, extended his ships along the shore, in order to surround the Syracusans. This management proved fatal to him; for as he was detaching from the main body of the fleet, the Syracusans attacked the center, which they forced, and then drove their ships against him with such fury that he was driven into the gulf called Dascon. There he was entirely defeated. Eurymedon lost his life during the engagement.

The Syracusans after defeating the right wing of the enemy, gave chase to the other galleys, and ran them on shore. Gylippus, who commanded the land army, perceiving that the Athenian ships were forced aground, and not able to return to their old quarters in the great harbor, went down with a part of his troops, in order to charge such soldiers as would be compelled to fly to the shore; and to give his friends a better opportunity of towing off such galleys as they should have taken. However, he was repulsed by a troop of Tyrrhenians who were posted on that side. The Athenians flew to sustain their allies, and obliged Gylippus to retire with loss as far as the marsh called Lysimelia, which was near the place of action. The Athenians saved all of their ships, except eighteen, which the Syracusans had captured with their crews, whom they cut to pieces. After this, resolving to burn the rest of the enemy's fleet, the Syracusans filled an old vessel with combustibles, and having set fire to it, drove it against the Athenians, who nevertheless extinguished the flames, and drove back the old ship. Both sides erected trophies; the Syracusans for the defeat of Eurymedon, and the advantage they had gained before, and the Athenians for having driven part of the enemy into the marsh, and put the other to flight.

But the minds of the two nations were very differently disposed. The Syracusans, lately dejected and downcast, by the arrival of Demosthenes with his fleet were now full of joy and hope. The Athenians, on the contrary, were filled with gloom and apprehension, and thought only of retiring from the country.

The Syracusans, to deprive them of all resource, and prevent their escaping, shut up the mouth of the harbor, in which was the Athenian fleet, with galleys placed across, and fixed with anchors and iron chains. At the same time they made due preparations for battle in case the Athenians should have the courage to engage them again. The Athenian generals seeing themselves thus hemmed in, held a consultation, and after much discussion resolved to hazard another sea fight. With this view they determined to leave their old camp and their walls, which extended to the temple of Hercules; and to intrench themselves on the shore, near their ships in the smallest compass possible. Their design was to leave a guard to protect their baggage and sick, and to fight with the rest on board all the ships they had remaining. They intended to retire to Catana in case they should be victorious, or, if defeated, to burn their galleys, and march by land to the nearest city belonging to their allies. All this being fully determined upon, Nicias immediately filled 10 galleys (the others having lost their oars), with the flower of his infantry, and drew up the balance of his army, in battle array along the shore. The Athenians provided themselves with harping-irons, in order to grapple the ships of the enemy, and close with them, before they could make use of their heavy beaks. But the Syracusans perceiving this covered the prows and upper works of their galleys with leather, in order to prevent them being so easily seized. The commanders on both sides having exhorted their men to fight nobly during the coming strife, gave the signal for battle, and the two fleets advanced against each other. The Athenians easily took their ships which defended the mouth of the harbor; but when they were attempting to break the chains in order to widen the passage the Syracusan ships came upon them from all quarters. As nearly 200 galleys came rushing on each side toward one narrow spot, there must have been necessarily very great confusion. The galleys crowding together, could not easily advance, retire, nor turn back. The beaks of the Syracusan galleys, for this reason, did but little execution; but the discharges were furious and frequent. The Athenians were overwhelmed by showers of stones, which came upon them from every quarter, committing dreadful havoc; whereas, they defended themselves only by shooting darts and arrows, which by the motion of the ships from the agitation of the water, could not be well aimed, and consequently did but little execution. At length the heavy-armed soldiers of the Syracusan forces, attempted to enter the enemy's ships in order to fight them hand-to-hand; and it often happened that, while they were climbing into a ship of their enemy, their own vessel would be grappled by several others, and thus two or three galleys would be entangled together, occasioning the greatest perplexity and confusion. The officers were distracted with many cares, and in the midst of all the turmoil and noise their orders, when given, were not heeded. The Athenians were determined to force a passage, whatever might be the consequences, that they might secure a return into their own country, while the enemy employed their every effort to prevent this, that they might gain a complete and more glorious victory. The two land armies of the contending parties, which were drawn up on the highest part of the shore, and many of the citizens of Syracuse running to the walls, all gazed upon the spectacle with the most intense anxiety. Many of the citizens not daring to look upon the scene, ran to the temples, and kneeling, implored the gods to give success to the defenders of their city. The spectators of the battle, looked upon the scene as from an amphitheater. They simultaneously shuddered at every movement of the contending fleets, and the expressions of joy, hope, fear, sorrow and dismay, which arose from all, testified to the interest which they took in the battle. They stretched out their hands toward the combatants, as if to animate them to renewed exertions, and then toward heaven, to implore the succor and protection of the gods. And thus, both in the camp of the Athenians, and in that of the Syracusans, nothing was to be heard during the engagement, but shouts of victory, or shrieks of despair. At length the Athenian fleet, after a long and desperate resistance, was put to flight, and driven to the shore. And now a shout of victory arose both from the Syracusan galleys and from their camp, which seemed to rend the very air, and which conveyed tidings of joy to those who were in the city. The Syracusans erected a trophy, but the Athenians dejected and overpowered, retired to their camp, on the shore, and did not even request that their dead might be delivered over to them for burial. Two alternatives now only remained to them; either again to attempt the passage, or to abandon their fleet to the enemy, and retire by land. Demosthenes proposed the former; but the sailors, in the deepest affliction, refused to obey, fully satisfied that it would be impossible for them to sustain a second engagement. The second method was therefore adopted, and accordingly they prepared to set out in the night, to conceal the march of their army from the enemy. But Hermocrates, who suspected their design, was very sensible that it was of the utmost importance, not to suffer so great a body of forces to escape, since they might otherwise fortify themselves in some part of the island and renew the war. But the Syracusans were too much engaged in their rejoicings over their late victory, to heed his advice, and march against the enemy. Hermocrates, therefore, sent out a few horsemen, who were to pass as friends to the Athenians, and ordered them to cry aloud, when within hearing distance of the enemy's camp: "Tell Nicias not to march until daybreak, for the Syracusans lie in ambush for him, and have seized on all the passes." This false advice stopped Nicias at once. He did not even set out the next day, in order that his soldiers might have more time to prepare for their departure. In the mean time, however, the enemy had seized upon all the avenues of escape. On the third day the Athenians set out upon their march. Terrible indeed must have been the feelings of the soldiers as they quitted their camp. The ground was strewn with the dead bodies of their companions, and as each soldier passed the mutilated remains of a former associate and beloved friend, his mind was seized with a horror which nothing could shake off. But the sick and wounded who were left behind were causes of much greater affliction to the hearts of the Athenians, than were even the dead. Bursting out into prayers and lamentations, they occasioned a wild irresolution of thoughts to those who were abandoning them. The poor creatures, crawling upon the ground, and calling upon the name of friends or acquaintances, they entreated that they might not be left behind. Some encountering old comrades, rose, and with a spasmodic exertion, clasped their arms about their necks, and were thus dragged along, while they could keep their hold; but when their strength failed them they fell, giving the departing soldiers a last farewell in a torrent of curses and hideous howls.

The armies marched in two bodies drawn up in the form of a phalanx; the first being commanded by Nicias, and the second by Demosthenes, with the baggage in the center. During their march they were continually annoyed by the enemy, every one of the passes being guarded. They were obliged to dispute every inch of their way. The Syracusans were unwilling to hazard a battle against an army still formidable (being even now 40,000 strong), and which despair alone might render invincible. The Athenian generals, seeing the miserable condition of their troops, being in extreme want of provisions, and a great many of them wounded, judged it expedient to retire toward the sea by a way quite contrary to that which they then marched, and to make directly for Camarina and Gela, instead of proceeding to Catana as they first intended. They set out in the night, after lighting a great number of fires. The vanguard, commanded by Nicias, went forward in good order; but about half the rear guard, with Demosthenes at their head, lost the way. On the next day, the Syracusans overtook him about noon; and, having surrounded him with their horse, drove him into a narrow place inclosed with a wall, where his soldiers fought like lions. At length, toward the close of the day, covered with wounds, and oppressed with fatigue, Demosthenes and his soldiers surrendered at discretion, on condition that they should not be put to death, nor sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. About 6,000 soldiers thus surrendered. On the same evening Nicias arrived at the river Erineus, which he passed, and encamped on a mountain. The next day the Syracusans came up with him, and summoned him to surrender at discretion as Demosthenes had done. Nicias, however, could not at first be persuaded that Demosthenes had really surrendered; but upon discovering that he had done so, he offered to pay the expenses of the war, upon condition that he should be permitted to leave the country with his forces, and give as many Athenians as hostages, as he should be obliged to pay talents. This offer the Syracusans rejected with scorn, and at once commenced the attack. The Athenians, although in want of all things, nevertheless sustained the charge the whole night, and the next morning marched to the river Asinarus. No sooner had his soldiers reached the banks of the river, than mad with thirst, for during their stay in the mountain, no water had passed their lips, they precipitated themselves into the stream, and drank eagerly. The Syracusans fell upon them while they were drinking, and a terrible slaughter ensued. The poor wretches, unable to defend themselves, where killed while in the very act of drinking, until the water was discolored with their gore, and their carcasses lay heaped one upon another in the river, fairly impeding its current. Nicias, seeing every thing lost, surrendered himself prisoner to Gylippus, choosing rather to fall into his hands than into those of the Syracusan generals. Eighteen thousand of the Athenians were killed, and a great number were made prisoners. The victors adorned the trees that bordered the banks of the river, with the arms taken from the prisoners; and then crowning themselves with chaplets of flowers, and dressing their horses in the richest caparisons, and cropping the manes of those of their captives, they triumphantly entered into Syracuse. The next day a council was held to deliberate on what was to be done with the prisoners. Diocles, one of the leaders of the greatest authority among the people, proposed that all the Athenians who were born of free parents, and all such Sicilians as had joined with them, should be imprisoned in the quarries, and only half a pint of water, and a small loaf of bread, be given them daily; that all the slaves and allies should be publicly sold; and that the two Athenian generals, Demosthenes and Nicias, should be first scourged with rods and afterward put to death. This cruel proposal was adopted, and, in spite of the remonstrances of Gylippus, who wished to carry them to Sparta, since he had taken them, Nicias and Demosthenes were barbarously put to death. Thus, in the year 413 B.C., terminated the siege of Syracuse, after a continuance of twelve months.

Second Siege, B.C. 403.—In the year 403 B.C., Himilco, the Carthaginian general, with an army of 300,000 foot (some authors say 30,000 only), and 3,000 horse, marched toward the city of Syracuse, from the landward side, with the intention of laying siege to it. At the same time, 200 Carthaginian ships of war, followed by 500 barks, entered the harbor. The land army encamped at about a mile and a half from the city, and Himilco immediately offered battle to the inhabitants. But the Syracusans declined, and Himilco felt satisfied that he would soon be master of the city. In the mean time he laid waste the suburbs of Syracuse; he ravaged Achradina, and plundered the temples of Ceres and Proserpine. He beat down the tombs which stood outside the city, and fortified his camp with them. But while he was thus engaged a pestilence suddenly arose in his army. The summer was at its height, and the heat was intense. The plague first began among the Africans, of whom a large portion of the army consisted. His men died by scores, and at length the survivors and the healthy could no longer bury the dead, nor administer to the sick. This plague had very uncommon symptoms. The infected were seized with violent dysenteries, raging fevers, and in the midst of their pains madness would possess them, and they bit and tore any person that approached them. Dionysius, perceiving the pitable condition of the Carthaginians, immediately attacked them. The Syracusans met with but little resistance: the Carthaginians, already conquered by disease, submitted themselves to the swords of their enemies. The Carthaginian fleet was burned or taken almost to the last ship. All the inhabitants, even the old, the young, and the feeble, went out of the city to witness the conflagration. In the mean time the Syracusan army was dealing death upon the enemy at the other side of the city. Night put an end to the slaughter, and then Himilco entreated Dionysius to allow him to return home with the remains of his shattered army. He offered 300 talents ($274,666), all the specie he had, as a ransom. Dionysius allowed only the Carthaginians to depart. With these Himilco stole away in the night, leaving the Africans to the mercy of the conqueror.

After the death of Dionysius, Syracuse was involved in great trouble. Dionysius the younger was expelled, and afterward restored himself by force of arms, and exercised great cruelties there.

Third Siege, B.C. 214.—Two hundred years after the siege of Syracuse by the Athenians, the city was besieged by the Romans, during their second war with the Carthaginians. The Syracusans having declared for the Carthaginians, the Romans at once declared war against them. The government of Syracuse was at this time in the hands of Hippocrates and Epicycles, whom the people had elected supreme magistrates of the city. After entering and taking Leontine, Marcellus, the Roman consul, advanced with his forces toward Syracuse. He determined to besiege the place by sea and land; by land on the side of the Hexapylum; and by sea on that of the Achradina, the walls of which were washed by the waves. He gave Appius the command of the land forces, and reserved that of the fleet to himself. It consisted of sixty galleys of five benches of oars, which were crowded with soldiers armed with bows, slings, and darts, to scour the walls. There were a great number of other vessels laden with machines of all descriptions, used in attacking places. When the Romans attacked them both by sea and land, the Syracusans were struck dumb with terror, imagining that they could not possibly resist such numerous forces, and so furious an assault. But by the assistance of one single man, they were enabled to repel the enemy. That man was Archimedes.

He had for many years been engaged in making all manner of engines and machines, which could be used either for attack or defense in a siege, and now that they were needed he brought them into service. As soon as his machines began to play on the land side, they discharged upon the Roman infantry all sorts of missive weapons, and stones of an enormous size, with so much noise, force, and velocity, that nothing could stand before them; they overturned and crushed whatever they encountered, and spread terrible disorder throughout the ranks. On the side toward the sea, behind the walls, he erected vast machines, which suddenly letting fall enormous beams, with immense weights at their ends upon the Roman ships, sunk them to the bottom. Besides this he caused an iron grapple, attached to a chain, which in turn was fastened to a lever, to be let down suddenly among the besiegers' ships; and having caught hold of the prow of a galley, an enormous weight was swung from the other end of the lever, which consequently lifted the galley entirely out of the water, stern downward. Then suddenly unclasping the grapple, the vessel fell into the sea with such force, that it immediately filled and sunk. Other vessels were drawn toward the shore by means of ropes and hooks, and after being whirled about, they were dashed to pieces against the rocks that projected below the walls, and their crews perished. Large galleys, frequently seized and suspended in the air, were rapidly whirled about, presenting a dreadful spectacle to the beholders. After their crews had been thrown out by the violence of the motion, the galleys were suddenly precipitated into the sea, by the unclosing of the jaws of the engine. Marcellus at great expense had prepared a machine called Sambuca, on account of its resemblance to a musical instrument of that name. He selected two galleys of five benches, from which he caused half of the oars to be removed, that is to say, each galley was provided with oars on one side only. The galleys were then joined together two and two, on the side without oars, forming as it were one enormous vessel. The machine, which consisted of a ladder, four feet wide, was, when erect, of equal height with the walls of the city. It was laid at length upon the sides of the two galleys joined together, and extended considerably beyond their beaks. Upon the masts of these vessels were fixed cords and pulleys. When the machine was to be brought into use, the cords were affixed to its extremity, and men at the stern drew it up by pulleys, while others at the head assisted in raising it with levers.

Marcellus caused six of these machines to be prepared, and after they were completed, ordered one of them to be brought forward to the foot of the walls, but no sooner had Archimedes discovered it, than he discharged three enormous stones one after the other upon it. All of the stones took effect, striking upon the machine with amazing force and noise, shattering and totally disjointing it. Marcellus, perplexed and discouraged, drew off his galleys with all possible rapidity, and sent orders to the land forces to retreat also. He then called a council of war, at which it was resolved to approach close under the walls; if it was possible, the next morning before daybreak. For Archimedes' engines, they thought, being very strong, and intended to act at a great distance, would then discharge themselves over their heads. But Archimedes had provided against all contingences. He had prepared machines long before, that carried to all distances, a proportionate quantity of darts and beams, which being very short, required less time for discharging them, and consequently their action was more rapid than the others. Besides, he had caused holes to be made in the walls, in which he placed Scorpions, machines made in the nature of a cross-bow, which, although they did not carry far could be discharged with the utmost rapidity. When the Romans had gained the foot of the walls, and considered themselves well-covered, they were assailed with showers of darts and huge pieces of rocks, which fell directly upon their heads, for the engines played from every quarter of the wall.

This obliged them to retire. But in their retreat they were overtaken by cloud after cloud of arrows, stones, darts, and beams, which committed great havoc upon their ranks. Their galleys also were driven back by the vigorous discharges of the terrible machines. And the Romans could not possibly assail the enemy in return. For Archimedes had placed his engines under cover of the walls; so that the Romans, infinitely distressed by an invisible foe, seemed to fight against the gods. Marcellus, although much perplexed, and at a loss what to do, still could not refrain from jesting at the undignified manner in which his troops had retreated. "Why," said he, "do we contend against this mathematical Briareus, who, sitting on the shore, as if he were but in jest, drives us from him, and overwhelms us with such a multitude of darts. Why, even the hundred-handed giants in the fable could not equal him." Marcellus had reason for complaining of Archimedes alone, for in truth, all the other Syracusans were no more that the members of the engines and machines of that great geometrician, who was himself the soul of all their power and operations. All other weapons were unemployed; his were the only offensive and defensive arms of the city. At length, the Roman soldiers were so terrified, that if they saw but a rope or stick moving on the walls of the city, they cried out that Archimedes was leveling some infernal machine at them, and turned their backs and fled. Marcellus, seeing this, gave up all thoughts of carrying the place by assault, and leaving the matter to time, turned the siege into a blockade, with the determination of reducing the place by famine. To Archimedes alone were the Syracusans indebted for the preservation of their city at that time If he had not been with them, the Romans would have inevitably taken the place by force of arms.

After Marcellus had resolved to confine himself to the blockade of Syracuse, he left Appius before the city, with two thirds of the army, advanced with the other into the island, and brought over several cities to the Roman interest. At the same time Hamilcar, the Carthaginian general, arrived in Sicily with a great army, in hopes of reconquering it, and expelling the Romans. His forces amounted to 20,000 foot, 3,000 horse, and twelve elephants, with which he marched against Agrigentum, which he retook from the Romans, with several other cities lately reduced by Marcellus. Thereupon, the Syracusan garrison, which was yet entire, determined to send out Hippocrates with 10,000 foot, and 1,500 horse, to join Hamilcar. Marcellus, after having made a vain attempt on Agrigentum, was returning to Syracuse. As he drew near Acrilæ, he unexpectedly discovered Hippocrates busy in fortifying his camp, and falling upon him before he had time to draw up his army, he cut 8,000 of them in pieces. After gaining this victory, Marcellus returned against Syracuse, and having sent off Appius to Rome, he appointed Q. Crispinus in his place. The siege and blockade had now lasted two years, and Marcellus, almost absolutely despairing of being able to take Syracuse either by force (because Archimedes continually opposed him with invincible obstacles) or by famine, as the Carthaginian fleet, which had returned more numerous than before, easily threw in convoys, deliberated whether he should continue before Syracuse to push the siege, or turn his endeavors toward Agrigentum. But before he came to a final determination, he thought it proper to try whether he could make himself master of Syracuse by some secret intelligence. There were many Syracusans in his camp, who had taken refuge there in the beginning of the troubles. A slave of one of these secretly carried on an intrigue, in which fourteen of the principal citizens of Syracuse were engaged. These persons came in companies to consult with Marcellus in his camp, concealed under nets in fishermen's boats. The conspiracy was on the point of taking effect, when a person named Allatus, through resentment for not having been admitted into it, discovered the whole to Epicydes, who put all the conspirators to death. This enterprise having thus miscarried, Marcellus could think of nothing, but the shame of raising a siege which had consumed so much time, and in which he had lost so many ships, and men. An accident supplied him with a recourse, and gave new life to his hopes. Some Roman vessels had taken one Damippus, a Spartan, whom Epicydes had sent to negotiate with Philip, King of Macedon. The Syracusans being very desirous to ransom Damippus, several conferences were held between the besiegers and the besieged about it. The conferences were held in a place near the port Trogilus, and as the deputies visited several times, a Roman soldier took notice that the tower was but slightly guarded, and thought that a number of men might easily be introduced into it. He made a good estimate of its height, and without loss of time, communicated his plan to Marcellus. The Roman general did not neglect the soldier's advice, but assured himself of its worth by his own observation. He provided himself, therefore, with proper scaling-ladders, he chose a time when the Syracusans were celebrating a festival in honor of Diana, during which they drank freely, and gave loose to mirth, and advancing to the tower with 1,000 chosen troops, in profound silence, he gained the top of the tower. They now soon scaled the walls in that vicinity, and having thrown down the gate of Hexapylum, they took possession of that part of the city called Epipolæ, whence he easily gained the quarter called Tyche. Epicydes, whose quarters were in the farthest part of Ortygia, hearing that the Romans had seized on Epipolæ and Tyche, went with his forces to drive them from their posts; but finding much greater numbers than he expected, already in the town, after a slight skirmish he retired. Marcellus, to destroy the city, tried gentle methods with the inhabitants; but the Syracusans rejected his proposals, and their generals appointed the Roman deserters to guard Achradina, which they did with great care, knowing that if the town was taken, they must die. Marcellus then turned his arms against fort Euryclus, which he hoped to reduce in a short time by famine. Philodemus, who commanded there, kept him in play for a considerable length of time, in hopes of succor from Hippocrates and Hamilcar; but finding himself disappointed, he surrendered the place, on condition of being allowed to march out with his men, and join Epicydes. Marcellus, now master of Euryclus, blocked up Achradina with his fleet, so close, that it could not hold out much longer without new supplies of men and provisions. But Hippocrates and Hamilcar soon arrived, and it was resolved that the former should attack the old camp of the Romans, without the walls, commanded by Crispinus, while Epicydes sailed out upon Marcellus. Hippocrates was vigorously repulsed by Crisipinus, who pursued him up to his intrenchments, and Epicydes was forced to return into Achradina, with great loss, and narrowly escaped being taken prisoner by Marcellus. The unfortunate Syracusans were now in the greatest distress for want of provisions; and to complete their misery a plague broke out among them; of which Hippocrates and Hamilcar died, with many thousands more. Hereupon, Bomilcar sailed to Carthage again for fresh supplies, and returned to Sicily with a large fleet; but hearing of the great preparations of the Romans at sea, and probably fearing the event of a battle, he unexpectedly steered away. Epycides who had gone out to meet him, was afraid to return into a city, half conquered, and therefore fled for refuge to Agrigentum. The Syracusans, enraged at this dastardly conduct, assassinated the governors he had left, and proposed to submit to Marcellus. For this purpose they sent deputies, who were graciously received. But the garrison, which consisted of Roman deserters and mercenaries, raising fresh disturbances, killed the officers appointed by the Syracusans, and chose six new ones of their own. Among these was a Spaniard named Mexicus, a man of great integrity, who, disapproving of the cruelties of his party, determined to give up the place to Marcellus. In pursuance of which, under pretense of greater care than ordinary, he desired that each governor might have the sole direction in his own quarter; which gave him an opportunity to open the gates of Arethusa to the Roman general. And now Marcellus being at length master of the city, gave signal proof of his clemency and good nature. He suffered the Roman deserters to escape; for he was unwilling to shed the blood even of traitors. It is said that when he surveyed the beautiful city from a neighboring eminence, that he wept, when he thought how soon it would be changed to a scene of misery and desolation when it came to be sacked and plundered by his soldiers. For the troops demanded the plunder, and not one of the officers dared oppose them. The city was soon abandoned to the soldiers. It is reported that the riches pillaged in Syracuse at this time, exceeded all that could have been expected at the taking of Carthage itself. An unhappy accident interrupted Marcellus's joy, and gave him cause for the deepest regret. When the Roman soldiers were pillaging the city, Archimedes, at a time when all Syracuse was in confusion and uproar, was quietly seated in his closet, like a man of another world, intent upon the study of some geometrical problem. So much was he absorbed in thought, that he heeded not the turmoil without, nor the report of the city being taken.

A soldier suddenly entered his room and bade him follow him to Marcellus. Archidemes begged him to stay a moment till he had solved his problem, and finished the demonstration of it. The soldier, who neither cared for his problem nor demonstration, was enraged at his delay, and drawing his sword, killed him instantly. Marcellus was deeply afflicted when he heard the news of his death, and afterward erected a splendid monument to his memory.

TAGINA, A.D. 552.—The battle of Tagina was fought in Italy, near Todi, between the Goths and the Romans. The Roman army consisted of 30,000 men, and was under the command of Narses, a general of the Emperor Justinian. The Gothic army was greatly superior in numbers, and was commanded by Totila, king of the Goths. The battle was bloody and obstinate, and resulted finally in the total defeat of the Goths, of whom 6,000 were slain. Totila was killed while fighting at the head of his men. On the death of Totila, Teias was made king by the Goths; but the next year he was defeated on the Sarnus by the Romans, and Gothic sway in Italy was terminated.

TAGLIACOZZO, A.D. 1268.—In the year 1268, a battle was fought near Tagliacozzo, a town of Naples, between the army of Charles of Anjou and the troops of Conradin, son of the Emperor Conrad IV. The latter was defeated. This battle put an end to the rule of the Hohenstauffen dynasty in Italy.

TALAVERA DE LA REGNA, A.D. 1809.—On the 27th and 28th of July, 1809, a bloody and obstinate battle was fought between the French army, under Joseph Bonaparte, and Marshals Jourdan and Victor, and the English and Spanish troops, under the Duke of Wellington, near Talavera de la Regna, on the Tagus, in Spain. The battle was obstinately contested, and after the conflict had been prolonged two days, resulted in the total defeat of the French. The victory cost the English 6,268 men in killed and wounded. The French lost 8,791 men, killed and wounded.

TARENTUM, B.C. 212.—Some years after the entrance of Hannibal into Italy, the Tarentines, an inconstant, fickle people, believing Rome without resources, opened their gates to the Carthaginians; but they could not force the citadel, which was held by a Roman garrison. These soldiers kept the enemy at bay for a length of time. Rome having regained its superiority, turned its attention to Tarentum, and resolved to punish it for its infidelity. The consul Q. Fabius laid siege to it, and found means to terminate his important enterprise very speedily. Hannibal had placed in the city a body of Brutians, the commander of whom was passionately in love with a woman whose brother served in the army of the consul. This brother, with the consent of his general, threw himself into Tarentum, and, aided by the caresses of his sister, gained the confidence of the officer. In a party of pleasure, he prevailed upon him to deliver up to the Romans the quarter of the city intrusted to his guard. When measures were ready the soldier made his escape, and informed Fabius of his success. The consul gave the concerted signal to the Romans who defended the citadel, and to the Brutians, and placed himself, with a chosen body of troops, immediately opposite the place agreed upon. The noise of trumpets and of loud cries issued at the same moment from the citadel, the port, and the vessels at anchor. The consul, concealed at his post, maintained a profound silence. The general officer who guarded the quarter of the city near which Fabius was in ambush, seeing all quiet, thought he had nothing to fear, and flew toward the side whence the tumult came. The consul, perceiving this, planted his ladders against that part of the wall where the Brutian cohorts were posted, and entered quietly into the city. He broke down the nearest gate, which gave access to more troops, and advanced toward the public place. The besieged defended themselves there for some time; but, overwhelmed by numbers, they were obliged to disperse. A great carnage ensued. Tarentum was pillaged, and, it is said, 87,000 pounds' weight of gold rewarded the victors. Fabius had the wisdom to be satisfied with the money and rich movables; with the exception of a single brazen statue from the hand of Lysippus, he let the statues and pictures remain, using this memorable expression: "Let us leave the voluptuous Tarentines their angry gods, whom they had so ill served." Had all Roman generals followed the example of Fabius, and left objects of luxury and indulgence to the peoples they had corrupted, Rome would not, in its turn, have fallen a victim to sensuality and the corruption employed to support it.—Robson.

TARIFA, A.D. 1811.—In the year 1811, Tarifa, in Spain, then in the occupation of the British, was besieged by the French, under Generals Victor and Laval. The British made a most heroic resistance, and at length the French were obliged, after sustaining heavy losses, to withdraw from the place. In this defense Colonel (afterward Lord) Gough, greatly distinguished himself.

TEMESWAR, A.D. 1849.—Temeswar, a fortified town of south Hungary, was taken in 1552 by the Turks, under Solyman. The conquerors mercilessly sacked the city. The Turks held possession of Temeswar until 1716, when the city was besieged and taken by the famous Prince Eugene. In 1849 Temeswar was besieged by the Hungarian insurgents. The siege was protracted for 107 days, when it was relieved by General Haynau. As the battle of Temeswar was the decisive blow which defeated the cause of the Hungarian patriots, we will, under this head, devote a few lines to the narration of the principal events connected with the late Hungarian war.

The succession of the crown of Hungary was declared hereditary to Austria in 1687. Although the two countries were united under one crown, yet the separate rights of Hungary were repeatedly guarantied by the sovereign. One of the dictal enactments expressly states that "Hungary, in her entire system of legislature and government, is a free and independent kingdom, and is therefore to be ruled and governed by her legally-crowned hereditary kings, according to her national laws and customs."

For centuries the Austrian government has striven to encroach upon the constitutional rights and privileges of Hungary, with the desire of bringing the country entirely under Austrian rule. The Hungarian Diet made frequent remonstrances, and voted reforms continually; but the Austrian government rejected them all. In 1848, however, the Diet passed acts for the emancipation of the Hungarian peasantry from feudal burdens; for trial by jury, and for the freedom of the press. The emperor assented to these enactments, on the 11th of April. Immediately afterward, however, the Austrian government contrived to incite insurrections among the Servians and Wallacks, who early in June were in open revolt.

On the 19th of September, General Jellachich, who had taken possession of the Littorole, crossed the Drave with 48,000 men, invested with full authority to act against the Diet of Hungary; but on the 29th of the same month he was defeated in a pitched battle near Stuhlweissenburg.

Had the Hungarian leaders at that time possessed resolute leaders, the career of Jellachich would have been ended at Stuhlweis-senburg. The Austrian general begged for a truce of three days, which was granted him. He took advantage of this truce, and suddenly withdrew with a part of his army to Vienna. A Hungarian army now crossed the Austrian frontier, but soon retreated to Presburg. In December another Austrian army invaded Hungary under Prince Windischgrätz. The Hungarians sustained several defeats at the hands of this general. At length after the successes of Radetzky in Italy, the Austrian government on the 4th of March, 1849, promulgated an edict by which Hungary and its dependences were divided into "Crown lands" of the empire of Austria; and the Hungarian constitution was declared null and void. On the 9th of March, the Diet declared these measures illegal; and on the 14th of April the deposition of the House of Hapsburg from the sovereignty was decreed. The war was now prosecuted with great vigor by the Hungarians; they were everywhere victorious, and after being defeated in five battles, the Austrians, Croatians, and the Russian allies, had lost in April nearly every military position they had gained. On the 21st of April, the Hungarian army under Gen. Arthur Görgey approached the fortress of Buda, which with the city of Pesth, was in the possession of the Austrian army under Windischgrätz. The garrison of Buda was commanded by Henzi. Gorgey had anticipated a weak resistance, and ordered his vanguard at once to make an assault. But the Hungarians were hurled back by the musketry of the Austrians, and Gorgey saw the necessity of besieging the place in due form. Kossuth, the Governor of Hungary, was of a different opinion, and advised Görgey to surround the place with 100,000 peasants whom he offered to raise for him, to prevent a sortie, while Görgey with the main body of the Hungarian army should pursue the Austrians and prevent them from concentrating any large force in Hungary; but Görgey was resolved to reduce the place, and devoted a month to the prosecution of the siege. By the 20th of May, a practicable breach was made in the fortifications of Buda, by the breaching cannon of the besiegers; and on the 20th a storming party of volunteers were ordered to make an assault. The storming party was successful, and the fortress of Buda, together with Pesth, the capital of Hungary, fell into the hands of the Hungarians. The Austrians made a gallant resistance. Henzi died like a hero. Aver, an Austrian colonel, perished by his own hands. He was stationed on the aqueduct and chain-bridge of Buda, and after he had discovered that all was lost, not wishing to survive the disgrace of a defeat, he tossed a lighted cigar into a powder-barrel which communicated with a mine beneath the bridge, and was killed by the explosion which followed.

Meanwhile, however, the Austrian government was not idle. By the 10th of June large Russian armies were collected on the frontiers, and in July, they simultaneously poured into Hungary, from the north and east, while the Croats, under Jellachich, advanced from the south, and the Austrians under Baron Haynau from the west.

Hungary was surrounded by an immense army composed of fresh troops, admirably equipped, and drawn from two powerful empires, while lines of railroads from Cracow, to Vienna and Gratz, facilitated the combination of its elements. The struggle was soon terminated. The Hungarians sustained defeat after defeat. On the 5th of August the Hungarians under Dembinski were signally defeated at Szöregh. Kossuth, who with a part of the House of Representatives had withdrawn to Arad, anxiously awaited the result of this battle. Couriers were incessantly flying to and fro between Arad and Szöregh; and soon the Hungarian army were seen on the same road flying in the utmost confusion, routed, dispirited, and scattered in every direction. Dembinski was wounded in the shoulder by a bullet. He fell from his horse, and was conveyed into a peasant's hut; the Hungarian army for twenty-four hours was without a commander. When Dembinski was again at the head of his army, he ordered his army to retreat toward Temeswar, which was at that time closely invested by the Hungarians under Vecsey.

The news of Dembinski's defeat at Szöregh reached Kossuth at Arad. The town was soon filled with fugitives, and the most fearful confusion arose. Citizens and soldiers, men, women, and children rushed hither and thither in wild disorder, making eager preparations to fly from the city. At length, on the eighth of August, they were relieved from some of their anxiety by the arrival of Görgey's army before Arad. Nagy Sandor, who commanded them, was ordered by Kossuth to march at daybreak on the 9th to take Vinga, and secure the communication with Vecsey's besieging army at Temeswar. He consented, and on the 11th of August, made all necessary arrangements with his whole force to free the road to Temeswar. But on the same night Kossuth received the intelligence that the Hungarians had been defeated in a battle near that city.

The battle of Temeswar was the decisive engagement of the war. Temeswar is a strong fortress, and it was occupied by a heroic garrison. Lieutenant-Field-Marshal Rukowena, who held the command, defended every point of the town, resolutely refusing all summons to surrender, even when the roofs were fired over his soldiers' heads and the walls were in ruins. Typhus and intermittent fevers, the cholera and famine, shook the courage of the old warrior as little as did the red-hot balls of Vecsey, the Hungarian commander. The heroic old soldier did not fight in vain. General Haynau had time to arrive to his succor, and a bloody battle ensued before the walls of the fortress. General Bem had also hastened to the assistance of the besiegers at Temeswar, and arrived in time to participate in the battle. The contest was obstinate, and for a long time was doubtful. The Austrians fought valorously, and were confident of victory, for they expected reinforcements every moment. The Hungarians also anxiously awaited the arrival of Görgey with the main body of the army; but he did not come up. The Austrians, on the contrary, were reinforced at a critical moment by the corps of Prince Lichtenstein, while other troops were seen advancing as rapidly as possible to their aid. Animated to the highest pitch by the reinforcement, the Austrians continued the fight with renewed ardor; the Hungarians, on the other hand, dispirited and sick at heart, gradually fell back; the Austrians urged on the strife; Bem was injured seriously by the fall of his horse, which, covered with wounds as he was, he could not control, and the Hungarians finally turned and fled in wild confusion. The timely appearance of Lichtenstein, and the non-arrival of Görgey snatched the victory from the hands of the Hungarian general. The immediate result of the loss of this battle was the relief of Temeswar. Haynau, in the evening of the same day (August 10th) entered the gates of the fortress at the head of his troops. He had arrived at a timely moment; the place was crowded with sick and wounded; and the appearance of the fortifications, as well as of the defenders, showed that its fall would have been speedy had it not been relieved. On the 11th of August Görgey arrived in Arad, and had an interview with Kossuth, which resulted in the resignation of the latter as governor, and the appointment of the former as dictator of the country. Kossuth departed from Arad an honored exile. Görgey became dictator, but for the space of forty-eight hours only. Suddenly, and apparently seduced by ambition and vanity, he surrendered to the Russians at Villagos on the 13th of August, unconditionally, not even securing the lives of his friends. The struggle of the Hungarians for freedom was over. The city of Peterwarden next capitulated to the Austrians; and, finally, on the 27th of September, Comorin followed its example, and this event put an end to the war. Many of the chiefs of the revolution fled into Turkey; others suffered military execution. The forces which the Hungarians brought into the field during the war never exceeded 135,000 men, with 400 pieces of cannon; against whom were opposed in the final campaign 150,000 Russians and 110,000 Austrians, aside from Servian and Wallack insurgents, amounting all together to upward of 300,000 men.

TEWKESBURY.—Tewkesbury is situated on the Avon, near its confluence with the Severn, on the border of Worcestershire in England, ninety miles north of London. In a field south of the town, still called from the circumstance, the "Bloody Meadow," was fought, on the 4th of May, 1471, a decisive engagement between the Yorkists under Edward IV., and the Lancastrians under Queen Margaret and her son. The Lancastrians had intrenched themselves at Tewkesbury in a strong portion of a field near the town, protected in the rear by the extensive walls of the abbey, and having in front and on the flanks a country so deeply intersected with dikes and hedges and lanes, that "it was a ryght evill place to approach as could well have been devysed." On the morning of the 4th of May Edward commenced the attack with a heavy cannonade which was returned with spirit. But it was soon evident that the enemy had the advantage in the number and weight of his guns and the multitude of his archers, who poured showers of arrows within the intrenchments. Still the Lancastrians did not flinch, and after some time the Duke of Somerset, with a chosen band, stole by a circuitous route to the top of an eminence near the foot of which was stationed a corps, commanded by the king in person. Suddenly they charged it in flank; but fortunately for Edward, two hundred spearmen who had been detached to a neighboring wood, observing the movement, fell unexpectedly on the rear of the assailants, who were thrown into disorder and fled for their lives. It may be that this failure disheartened the Lancastrians. The defense grew fainter every minute. Soon the banner of the Duke of Gloucester, next that of Edward himself, waved within the intrenchments, and Somerset, as we are told, suspecting the Lord Wenlock of treachery, rode up to that nobleman, and at a stroke beat out his brains. The victory was now won. The Lancastrians were totally defeated with a loss of a great many persons of distinction, and 3,000 soldiers left on the field. Of the prisoners the most important was the Lancastrian Prince of Wales, who was taken to Edward in the field. To the question, what brought him to England, he boldly but ingenuously answered, "To preserve my father's crown and my own inheritance." The ungenerous Edward, insensible to pity, struck the young prince on the face with his gauntlet, and the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, Lord Hastings and Sir Thomas Gray, taking the blow as a signal for further violence, hurried the prince away, and dispatched him with their daggers. Margaret was thrown into the tower, and King Henry expired in that prison a few days after the battle of Tewkesbury, beneath the dagger, so it is believed, of the Duke of Gloucester, afterward Richard III. Margaret was ransomed in 1475 by Louis XI., King of France, for 50,000 crowns. The battle of Tewkesbury was the last engagement between the Houses of York and Lancaster.

THAMES, A.D. 1813.—The river Thames flows through Canada West between lakes Huron and Erie, and after a south-west course of 160 miles, empties into Lake St. Clair.

In the month of September, 1813, General Harrison concentrated his army at Put-in-Bay, on Lake Erie. His whole army consisted of 6,000 foot, and 1,000 horse. Perry's victory on Lake Erie, made the Americans masters of that lake; and the foot soldiers were embarked on the American vessels for the purpose of sailing against Malden in Canada West, which was then occupied by the British under General Proctor, while the cavalry were to proceed by land to Detroit. Proctor, on receiving intelligence of Perry's victory, became alarmed, and withdrew his troops from Malden, taking with him all the horses and cattle, and retreating toward the Thames. The Americans having effected a landing on the Canada shore, pursued the enemy with untiring ardor. On the 30th of September, Harrison was joined by Colonel Richard M. Johnson, with the cavalry from Detroit, and halting one day to refresh the troops, he resumed the pursuit on the 2d of October. The British in their haste to escape, abandoned guns and shells, and in the hope to retard the pursuit of the Americans, destroyed the bridges and planted other obstacles in their path. On reaching the Thames, Proctor advanced up the river; but on the 4th Colonel Johnson, with the mounted Kentuckians, marching two or three miles in advance of the main body, came upon the British army, drawn up in battle array on the banks of the Thames at the Moravian settlement. Unable to retreat in any thing like military order, Proctor had no alternative but to check the enemy by a general battle. The British general had chosen an admirable position. His regular troops, 800 in number, were stationed upon a dry strip of land, flanked on the right by a swamp, and on the left by the river. His 2,000 Indian allies, under Tecumseh, were posted at the eastern extremity of the swamp. The two armies remained within sight of each other during the night of the 4th, inactive. Early on the morning of the 5th, the Americans prepared to attack the enemy. Colonel Johnson, with his thousand mounted riflemen, opened the battle. Dividing his force into two columns, he placed his brother, Lieutenant-Colonel James Johnson, at the head of one, with orders to attack the British troops on the left, while he led his column against the Indians on the right. These two columns, side by side, slowly advanced toward the enemy: the American infantry followed close behind. Suddenly the two columns of horse diverged, and swept toward their respective enemies with lightning speed. The advance of Colonel James Johnson's column was checked for a moment by a sharp fire from the British regulars; but, driving their spurs into their horses' sides, the gallant Kentuckians, with a yell of rage, plunged into the British line with a force which rent it in twain. Then, turning suddenly, the horsemen delivered their fire, and again drove their horses upon their panic-stricken foes. It was the work of a moment. The victory was won in that quarter of the field, and almost the entire British force was entreating for quarter. Proctor, with forty men and some mounted Indians, fled at the first onset, leaving his carriage, private papers, and even his sword behind him. Colonel Richard M. Johnson, meanwhile, with his troopers, dashed into the swamp; but not finding a firm footing for their horses, they could not charge, and affording fair targets for the Indian marksmen, they were being rapidly picked off, when Johnson ordered them to dismount and take to cover. The Indians, led by their chieftain, whose bravery stands forth in bold relief when compared with the cowardly conduct of Proctor, fought with the utmost gallantry, and for a few minutes the battle was hot and bloody. Johnson was desperately wounded; yet he maintained his ground, urging on his men with voice and example. At length Tecumseh fell, mortally wounded,* and the Indians with a whoop of rage and despair fled in all directions. Victory was with the Americans. About 2,500 American troops took part in this engagement, and of this number only fifty were killed or wounded. Six hundred prisoners, a large quantity of stores, ammunition, etc., and six pieces of cannon,† fell into the hands of the victors. The remainder of the British army dispersed in the woods, and after undergoing incredible hardships, re-

* Tecumseh, it is said, was slain by Colonel Richard M. Johnson, himself.

† Among these guns three were captured from the British during the Revolutionary war, and surrendered at Detroit by General Hull.

assembled at Ancosta, at the head of Lake Ontario.

THEBES IN BŒOTIA, B.C. 1252.—The history of this famous siege has been rendered immortal by the tragic muse; few of our readers can require to have its details repeated to them. The unfortunate Œdipus, on quitting his kingdom, left it to the government of his two sons, Eteocles and Polynices, who agreed to mount the throne alternately. Eteocles, as the elder, reigned first; but, at the termination of his year, he was so enamored of the power he had tasted that he violated his oath, and endeavored to exclude his brother from the throne. Polynices took up arms, and sought on all sides for partisans to assist him against the usurper. Adrastus, King of the Argives, roused all Greece in his favor. The contest was long and sanguinary, and the chief loss fell upon the adherents of Polynices. After many fruitless battles beneath the walls of Thebes, the brothers resolved to terminate their quarrel by a single combat. The two armies were drawn up as witnesses of the fight, and as securities for its fairness. The unnatural enemies entered the prescribed lists, and attacked each other with such deadly animosity, that both fell dead upon the spot. It is feigned that, when their bodies were burned, the spirit of hatred remained unextinct even in their remains, and that the flames separated as they arose. Their antipathy was preserved in their posterity, breaking out into needless but bloody wars.

SECOND SIEGE, B.C. 518.—The Lacedæmonians, upon becoming masters of Thebes, made the inhabitants but too sensible of the weight of their yoke. Pelopidas, too noble to submit quietly to slavery, conceived the design of delivering his country; he addressed himself to the banished citizens, and he found them enter freely into his views. Many of his friends in the city were eager to share his enterprise; and one of them named Charon, offered his house as a retreat for the conspirators. When they had secretly taken the most prudent precautions to insure success, Pelopidas drew near to the city. Before entering it he held a council, in which it was agreed that all should not depend upon one cast of the dice, but that a small number should try their fortune first. Pelopidas and eleven of his brave companions accepted this perilous commission; they warned Charon of their approach, and proceeded toward Thebes, dressed as sportsmen, followed by hunting-dogs, and carrying in their hands nets and weapons of the chase. Before entering the city they discarded their hunting appointments, assumed the guise of simple countrymen, and slipped in at various gates, all directing their course to the house of Charon. Philidas, one of the conspirators, that same evening gave a grand entertainment, at which Philip and Archias, the Lacedæmonian governors, were the most honored guests. When these two were sufficiently warmed with wine to be insensible to any thing but their pleasures, the conspirators proceeded to action, and, dividing themselves into two bodies, commenced by the easy immolation of Philip and Archias. Pelopidas and his party went straight to the house inhabited by Leontidas, one of the tyrants, who, on being roused from his sleep, seized his sword and struck the first conspirator that approached him dead at his feet; but he found a more successful opponent in Pelopidas; the brave Theban quickly laid the tyrant by the side of his unfortunate compatriot. After this bold attempt, the banished Thebans quickly joined the patriotic little band, and laid siege to the citadel. The Lacedæmonians were soon forced to capitulate; and this memorable enterprise, conceived by the genius of Pelopidas, and executed almost entirely by his own hand, procured the liberty of Thebes. We are sorry we can not add that that liberty was secured; the glory or prosperity of Thebes is an anomaly in history: it belongs principally to one generation. Pelopidas was the friend and companion of Epaminondas, with which great man—one of the greatest of all antiquity—the sun of Thebes arose and set.

THIRD SIEGE, B.C. 334.—After the celebrated battle of Chœronea, which laid the liberties of Greece at the feet of the ambitious Philip of Macedon, that king placed a garrison in Thebes; but scarcely had the inhabitants learned the death of Philip, when they arose in mass, and slaughtered the Macedonians. Alexander, the son of Philip, afterward styled the Great, passed through the straits of Thermopylæ, rendered immortal by Leonidas and his Spartans, entered Greece, and marched directly toward the revolted city. On the way he said to those who accompanied him, "Demosthenes, in his harangues, called me a child when I subdued Illyria; he styled me a giddy youth when I punished the Thessalians: we will now show him, under the walls of Athens, that I am a man grown." His appearance in Bœotia, like the rest of the actions of his life, was carried into effect as soon as decided upon. When he reached the walls of Thebes, he was satisfied with requiring that Phœnix and Prothulus, the principal promoters of the insurrection, should be given up to him. The Thebans, however, insultingly replied by demanding Philotas and Antipater, Alexander's generals and friends; and the young monarch found himself under the painful necessity of proceeding to extremities. Thebes had rendered such services to his father, that he proceeded to the infliction of punishment with great reluctance. A memorable battle ensued, in which the Thebans fought with ardor and courage; but, after a protracted struggle, the Macedonians, who were left in the citadel, taking the Thebans in the rear, while the troops of Alexander charged them in front, they were almost all cut to pieces. Thebes was taken and pillaged.

In the sack of this city, a lady of high quality exhibited an instance of courage and virtue too extraordinary to be passed by in silence. A Thracian officer, struck by her beauty, employed violence to satisfy his passion; and then characteristically proceeded to the indulgence of his avarice, by demanding of her where she had concealed her treasures. The lady, whose name was Timoclea, told him that she had cast them all into a well, which she pointed out to him. While he was leaning over the brink, looking with greedy avidity for the treasure, she suddenly exerted all her strength, pushed him in, and beat him to death with stones. Timoclea was arrested, and led before Alexander; but, with all his errors, the young Macedonian had too much generosity of character not to be struck by such an action, and he pardoned her. We wish we could say he was equally lenient toward the Thebans; but the unfortunate city was razed to the ground, and 30,000 of its inhabitants were sold into slavery.

THEBES, IN PALESTINE, B.C. 1214.—Abimelech, the son of Gideon, took Thebes by assault. There was a vast tower in the center of the city, in which the inhabitants had sought refuge. Abimelech was hastening to make himself master of this tower, when he received a mortal blow from the fragment of a millstone thrown upon his head by a woman. Enraged at the idea of dying so basely by the hands of a woman, Abimelech commanded one of his followers to plunge his sword into his breast, and he died instantly.

THERMOPYLÆ, B.C. 480—The appellation Thermopylæ means the pass of Hot-springs. It is a defile on the shore of the Malian gulf, on the north-east coast of Greece, near the mouth of the Hellada, between the steep precipices at the east termination of Mount Œta and the sea. The defile is about five miles in length, and where narrowest, was not anciently more than sixty paces across. At the narrowest part of the pass are hot-springs, from which circumstance, as above seen, the defile has derived its name.

In the year 485 B.C., Xerxes, immediately after the death of Darius, ascended the Persian throne, and in the fourth year of his reign he invaded Greece with an immense army. He passed from Asia into Europe by crossing the straits of the Hellespont, upon a bridge of boats. His army was so numerous that it occupied seven days and seven nights in passing over the straits, although those who were appointed to conduct the march, incessantly lashed the poor soldiers with whips to quicken their speed. The Persian land army which Xerxes had brought out of Asia, consisted of 1,700,000 foot, and 80,000 horse, which, with 20,000 men that were absolutely necessary, at least, for conducting and taking care of the carriages and camels, made in all 1,800,000.

When he passed the Hellespont the nations that submitted to him made an addition to his army of 300,000 men, which made all his land forces together amount to 2,100,000 men.

His fleet, when it set out from Asia, consisted of 1,207 ships of war, all of three banks of oars. Each vessel carried 300 men, natives of the country that fitted them out, beside 30 more that were either Medes or Persians, or of the Sacæ, which made in all 277,610 men. The European nations augmented his fleet with 120 vessels, each of which carried 200 men; in all 24,000. These added to the others, amounted together to 301,610 men. This fleet consisted entirely of large ships of war, and aside from it, the small galleys of 30 and 50 oars, and the transport ships amounted to 3,000. If we reckon but 80 men in each of these vessels, the whole number amounts to 240,000 men. Thus when Xerxes arrived at Thermopylæ, his land and sea forces together made up the number of 2,641,610 men, without including servants, eunuchs, sutlers, and other people of like classes, which usually follow an army. Their number at this time was at least equal to that of the forces; so that the whole number of those that followed Xerxes in this expedition amounted to 5,283,220. In this computation, Herodotus, Plutarch, and Isocrates agree.

The inhabitants of Lacedæmon and Athens, the two most powerful cities of Greece, and those against which Xerxes was most exasperated, were not indolent or asleep while so formidable an army was approaching. They sent deputies to Argos, into Sicily to Gelon, tyrant of Syracuse, to the isles of Corcyra and Crete, to desire succors from them, and to form a league against the common enemy; but on this trying occasion their allies failed them. Thus were the Lacedæmonians and the Athenians left almost to themselves, all the rest of the cities and nations, excepting the people of Thespia and of Platæa, having submitted to the heralds that Xerxes had sent to require earth and water of them. To demand earth and water was to demand submission. The Athenians now considered who should be their general. Epicydes, a man of more eloquence than courage, and capable withal of being bribed, solicited the generalship, and was likely to be chosen. But Themistocles, by pecuniary considerations prevailed upon him to drop his pretensions; and Themistocles was elected general in his stead. The Grecian fleet consisted of 200 ships of war. The command of the fleet was given to Eurybiades, a Lacedæmonian. Thus the Grecian land army was commanded by an Athenian general, while the fleet was under the direction of a Lacedæmonian admiral. The Greek army now proceeded to the strait of Thermopylæ, to dispute the entrance of the Persians into Greece. All their forces combined together, amounted only to 11,200 men, of which number 4,000 only were employed to defend the pass at Thermopylæ. But these, every man of them, were determined either to conquer or die. It was in the early part of the year 480 B.C., that Xerxes and his army advanced near the strait of Thermopylæ. He was greatly surprised to find that the Greeks were determined to dispute his passage. He had always flattered himself that, on the first hearing of his arrival, the Grecians would betake themselves to flight. He sent out a spy to view the enemy. The spy returned with the intelligence that he found the Lacedæmonians out of their intrenchments, diverting themselves with military exercises, and combing their hair. This was the Spartan manner of preparing themselves for battle. Xerxes waited four days in the hope that the Greeks would retreat. In the interval he endeavored to gain Leonidas, by making him magnificent promises, and assuring him that he would make him master over all Greece. But the noble Spartan rejected his proposal with scorn and indignation. Xerxes afterward wrote to him, demanding him to deliver up his arms. Leonidas answered him in two words, Αντέγραψε, Μόλωνλαβε (Come and take them). Xerxes now determined to attack the Lacedæmonians. He first commanded his Median forces to march against them, with orders to take them all alive, and bring them to him. But the Medes were not able to stand the charge of the Grecians, and were shamefully put to flight, showing, says Herodotus, that Xerxes had a great many men, but few soldiers. Xerxes next sent his Immortal Band, which consisted of 10,000 men, all Persians, against the Spartans. But they met with a like repulse. The Persian king was now much perplexed. He despaired of being able to force his way through an enemy who were determined to conquer or die. But he was relieved from his dilemma by an inhabitant of the country, who came to him and informed him of a secret path, which led to an eminence which overlooked and commanded the Spartan army. Xerxes quickly dispatched a detachment thither, which, marching all night, arrived there at daybreak, and possessed themselves of that advantageous post. The Greeks were soon apprised of this misfortune, and Leonidas, seeing that it was now impossible to withstand the enemy, obliged all the allies to retire, while he himself, remained with his 300 Lacedæmonians, all resolved to die with their leader. Leonidas had been informed by an oracle, that either Lacedæmon or her king must necessarily perish, and he resolved, without the least hesitation, to sacrifice himself for his country. The Spartans hoped neither to escape nor conquer, and considered Thermopylæ as their burying-place. The king exhorted his men to take nourishment, assuring them that they should sup together with Pluto. The noble band set up a shout of joy as if they had been invited to a banquet, and full of ardor they advanced with their king to battle. The shock was most violent and bloody. Leonidas was the first that fell. The Spartans gathering around the dead body of their beloved king, with incredible exertions endeavored to defend it. At length, not vanquished, but overwhelmed by numbers, they all fell, except one man, who turning, fled, and escaped to Sparta, where he was treated as a coward and a traitor; but soon afterward he made amends by deeds of most distinguished valor, at the battle of Platæa. The Persian army lost in this affair, 20,000 men, the most of whom were slain by the gallant 300. Xerxes was so much incensed against Leonidas, for daring to oppose him, that he caused the dead body of the noble Spartan to be hung on a gallows. Some time afterward a magnificent monument was erected at Thermopylæ by order of the Amphictions, in honor of these brave defenders of Greece. The monument bore two inscriptions, one of which was general, and relating to all those that died at Thermopylæ, stating that the Greeks of Peloponnesus, to the number of only 4,000 men, had made head against the Persian army which consisted of 3,000,000 men. The other related to the Spartans in particular. The last-mentioned inscription has been translated as follows: "Go, passenger, and tell at Lacedæmon, that we died here in obedience to her sacred laws."

In the year 1821, during the Greek revolution, a sanguinary battle took place at this place between the Turks and the Greeks. Odysseus, a brave Greek chief, after having worsted the Turks in several lesser encounters, fell back on the 6th of September to the straits of Thermopylæ, with 2,000 men, where he was attacked by three pachas, who advanced from Larissa, at the head of 5,000 Mussulmans chiefly Asiatics. The advantageous position of the Greeks, who were posted as tirailleurs among the works and thickets of that celebrated defile, compensated the inequality of numbers and want of artillery. The column of the Ottomans, encumbered like its predecessors in the days of Xerxes, with baggage, was slowly advancing through the bottom of the defile, when it was suddenly attacked by a tremendous fire of musketry from an unseen enemy. Pushed on, however, by the troops from behind, the column continued to advance, though sustaining a heavy loss, until they were attacked in flank by a body of 400 Greeks under Lapas. Issuing then from their thickets, the Greeks rushed down the steep declivity, sword in hand, with loud cries, shouting "Victory to the Cross!" The shock was irresistible; panic-stricken, the Turks fled on all sides, and were pursued several miles with immense slaughter. Twelve hundred were slain on the spot, seventeen standards and seven guns taken, and such was the consternation of the Ottomans that they broke down the bridge of Alamanne, in their flight to Zeitoun. Two days afterward they were again defeated by Odysseus, with the loss of 400 men and three guns. By these brilliant victories the Greeks regained possession of Athens, and the Turks were expelled from that country and made their way into Thessaly.

THEROUANNE, A.D. 1513.—Therouanne, a town of France, was besieged and taken by the English in 1380. In 1513, it was again besieged by the English under the Earls of Shrewsbury and Herbert. This siege was characterized by the Battle of the Spurs, between the army of Louis XII., who had advanced to raise the siege and the English. The French were defeated. During the battle the besieged made a sally; but they were repulsed, and Teligni, the governor of the city, on the 22d of August, after sustaining a siege of about twenty days, capitulated, and the defenses of the city were rased to the ground by the inhabitants of Aire and St. Omer, with the consent of the victors. In 1553 Therouanne was taken by the troops of the Emperor Charles V.

THORN, A.D. 1703.—In the year 1703, the troops of Charles XII., King of Sweden, laid siege to Thorn, a strongly fortified town of West Prussia. The garrison made a heroic resistance; but finally, after a siege of four months, the place was carried by assault on the 30th of October.

THRASYMENUS, B.C. 217.—Thrasymenus is the ancient name of a lake in central Italy, now called the Lake of Thrasymenus, or the Lake of Perigia. It is of a circular shape, about thirty miles in circumference; has several small islands, and is rather shallow, its greatest depth not exceeding 24 feet.

Immediately after the battle of Trebia, C. Servilius and C. Flaminius were appointed consuls of Rome, and Hannibal learning that the latter was on the march with a large army to meet him, resolved to go and engage him as soon as possible. Two roads were pointed out to him, and he chose the shortest. But although the shortest road, it was nearly impassable, for its entire length was almost one continuous marsh. For four days and three nights the Carthaginian army marched knee-deep in water, without having one moment's sleep. Hannibal himself, who rode upon the only elephant, suffered intensely. One of his eyes was entirely destroyed by the thick vapors that constantly exhaled from the marsh, and by his long want of sleep. At length the Carthaginian army encamped near Lake Thrasymenus, to await the approach of the Roman army. The Lake Thrasymenus and the mountains of Cortona, form a very narrow defile, which leads into a valley, lined on both sides with hills of a very considerable height, and closed at the outlet by a steep hill, of difficult access. Hannibal chose this hill for the camping-ground of the main body of his army; upon the hills to the right, he posted his light-armed infantry, in ambuscade, and behind those to the left he planted a part of his cavalry, as far almost as the entrance of the defile through which the Romans were obliged to pass.

When the Roman army arrived at the entrance of the defile, they halted because night was coming on. But early the next morning they entered the defile, and advanced toward Hannibal's camp. Hannibal allowed them to advance until they had proceeded more than half way through the valley, and then he gave the signal for battle, and commanded his troops to come out of their ambuscade, in order that he might attack the enemy from all quarters at the same time. The Romans were seized with the greatest consternation; they were not yet drawn up in order of battle; their arms were not in readiness, and they saw themselves attacked in front, in rear, and in flank. In a moment their ranks were thrown into disorder. Flaminius, of all the Romans, alone was undaunted. He rode furiously through the masses of his affrighted soldiers; he urged them to cut their way with their swords through the midst of their enemies. But at this moment a thick fog arose, and darkness added to the terrors of the Roman soldiers, while the shouts of their enemies resounded through the valley, from cliff to cliff, as though from the throats of a countless army.

CHARGE OF NUMIDIANS AT THE BATTLE OF THRASYMENUS.

But now the Romans saw themselves surrounded on all sides, without an opening for escape, and danger made them desperate. They rushed in an enraged and tumultuous mass against their enemies, who received them with equal animosity. When the fury of the fight was at its highest pitch, there happened an earthquake which overturned whole cities, changed the courses of rivers, and tore off the tops of mountains, in the immediate vicinity of the contending armies. The infuriated combatants heeded it not—

"And such the storm of battle on this day,
And such the frenzy whose convulsions blind
To all save carnage, that, beneath the fray,
An earthquake reel'd unheededly away!
None felt stern nature rocking at his feet,
And yawning forth a grave for those who lay
Upon their bucklers for a winding-sheet;
Such is the absorbing hate when nations meet!"

At length Flaminius was slain; the Romans began to give ground, and finally to fly. Many leaped into the lake, while others flying toward the mountains, fell into the hands of the enemy whom they sought to avoid. Six thousand only cut their way through the conquerors, and retreated to a place of immediate safety; but the next day they were taken prisoners. In this battle 15,000 Romans were killed, and about 10,000 escaped back to Rome by different routes. Of the Carthaginian army 1,500 only were killed, the most of whom were Gauls. See Battles of Ticinus, Trebia, and Cannæ.

THYMBRA, B.C. 548—BETWEEN CYRUS AND CRŒSUS.—In the year 560 B.C., Cyaxares, on the death of his father Astyages, ascended the throne of Media. No sooner had he received the reins of government than he was plunged into a terrible war. Neriglissor, the King of the Babylonians, having overthrown all the Syrians, who were no small nation, and having subjected the Hyrcanians and Arabs to his dominion, considered that if he could break the power of the Medes, he could easily obtain the dominion of all the territories around him. He therefore sent embassadors to the princes who were subject to him, among whom was Crœsus, King of Lydia, to load the Medes and Persians with calumny and contempt, and to represent how great and powerful these two nations were, and that, as they were already in close alliance by means of several intermarriages, they would unite, unless prevented, and subdue all the nations around them. By these arguments, and by money and presents, the several princes entered into a confederacy with him. Cyaxares, upon hearing of these united preparations against him, immediately sent to Cambyses, King of Persia, who was married to his sister, for aid. He also requested Cambyses to give the command of the forces, which the Persian council might see fit to send him, to Cyrus, the son of his sister, if he would consent. Cyrus, was greatly and justly beloved, and when it was known that he was to march at the head of the army, the joy was universal. The army consisted of 30,000 foot; the Persians had no cavalry at that time. It was formed of the bravest men of the nation, being raised in a particular manner. First, Cyrus was authorized to select 200 of the bravest officers from the nobility, who were equal in rank, station, and command. The officers thus chosen had the power to choose four of their own order. Thus the number of officers amounted to 1,000. Again, to each of these thousand, was given the power to select from among the common people of Persia, ten targeteers, ten slingers, and ten archers. Thus the army consisted of 10,000 targeteers, 10,000 slingers, and 10,000 archers, who were commanded by 1,000 officers, who in turn were under the supreme command of Cyrus. After having made supplications and sacrifices to the gods, Cyrus assembled his 200 officers and addressed them, assuring them that the enemy against whom they were to lead their soldiers, consisted of a race of effeminate men, enervated and already half conquered by a life of luxury and voluptuousness, and that victory was certain. They were to fight for the cause of friends and allies, and in such a noble cause that they could not but conquer. After invoking the gods a second time, and receiving the advice of his father Cambyses, who warned him especially not to neglect to make supplications and sacrifices to the gods, Cyrus at the head of his army, set forth for Media. Cambyses accompanied his son as far as the frontiers of Persia, and on the way gave excellent instructions concerning the duties of the general of an army.

As soon as Cyrus had arrived in Media, he went to Cyaxares, and, having interchanged the usual compliments, he immediately made inquiries concerning the quality and number of the forces on both sides. By computation it appeared that the enemy's army consisted of 60,000 horse, and 200,000 foot; and that the united armies of the Medes and Persians consisted in horse of less than a third of the enemy's force of that sort, and scarce half the number of their foot. This great inequality of numbers terrified and perplexed the King of Media. He could think of no other expedient than to send for another body of troops from Persia. This, however, would have caused a great loss of time, and besides appeared in itself impracticable, for even should they have received additional troops from Persia, their forces would still have been inferior in number to those of the enemy. Cyrus immediately proposed another more sure and speedy expedient, which was that the arms of the Persian soldiers should be changed from bows and javelins, which weapons were used fighting at a distance, thus easily giving a greater number the superiority over a lesser, to such arms as should compel them to come to blows with the enemy immediately, and thus render the superiority of their numbers useless. Accordingly he provided his troops with corselets for the breasts, shields for the left hand, and swords or cutlasses for the right. Cyrus now applied himself to the task of establishing order among the troops. He inspired them with emulation by promising great rewards, and by his engaging and obliging deportment toward all.

In the mean time the King of Babylon had not been idle, but was earnestly engaged in making preparations for the war.

At length finding his troops full of ardor, and ready for action, Cyrus proposed to lead them against the enemy.

As soon, therefore, as the customary sacrifice was made, they commenced their march. The Persians were commanded by Cyrus, the Medes by Cyaxares. Having arrived at the borders of the enemy's country, they entered and gave battle to the Babylonian army, who advanced to intercept them. The struggle was brief and bloody; the King of Babylon was slain, and his army put to flight. The Persians, with as many Medes as volunteered in the service, pursued the enemy so warmly that they were at length overtaken. A battle ensued, in which Cyrus was victorious. Cyrus marched through the country, making friends and allies of various princes, through whose territories he passed, until he arrived near Babylon. When he had approached that city, he sent the King of Assyria a challenge to terminate their quarrel by a single combat; but his challenge was not accepted. Cyrus, now, having viewed the country, and examined the situation of Babylon, marched away on his return to Media. Upon his return, preparations were made to prosecute the war with the Assyrians with renewed vigor. These preparations consumed several years, and when they were finished, Cyrus took leave of Cyaxares, who remained in Media with a third part of his troops, that the country might not be left entirely defenseless. Cyrus, now immediately entered the country of the Babylonians. After a long march he came up with the enemy at Thymbra, a city of Lydia, not far from Sardis, the capital of the country.

The battle of Thymbra is one of the most considerable events of antiquity, since it decided upon the empire of Asia, between the Assyrians of Babylon and the Persians. It is, moreover, the first pitched battle of which we have any full or particular account. Cyrus's army in the whole, consisted of 196,000 men, horse and foot. Of these, 70,000 were native Persians, viz.: 10,000 cuirassiers of horse, 20,000 cuirassiers of foot, 20,000 pikemen, and 20,000 light-armed soldiers. The rest of the army, to the number of 126,000 men, consisted of 26,000 Median, Armenian, and Arabian horse, and 100,000 foot of the same nations. Beside these troops, Cyrus had 300 chariots of war, their naves armed with scythes. Each chariot was drawn by four horses abreast, covered with trappings that were arrow proof. The horses of the Persian cuirassiers were also covered with arrow-proof mail. He had likewise caused to be constructed a great number of chariots of a larger size, upon each of which was erected a tower about eighteen or twenty feet high, in which twenty archers were lodged. Each of these chariots was drawn upon wheels by sixteen oxen yoked abreast. He had, moreover, a considerable number of camels, upon each of which were two Arabian archers, back to back; so that one looked toward the head, and the other toward the tail of the camel.

The army of Crœsus, King of Lydia, who now commanded the Assyrian forces, was more than twice as numerous as that of Cyrus. It amounted in all to 420,000 men, of whom 60,000 were cavalry. The troops consisted chiefly of Babylonians, Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, of the nations about the Hellespont, and of the Egyptians, to the number of 360,000 men. The Egyptians alone, made a body 120,000 men. The rest of the army was made up of Phœnicians, Cyprians, Cicilians, Lycaonians, Paphalagonians, Thracians, and Ionians.

Crœsus's army was ranged in order of battle in one line, the infantry in the center, and the cavalry on the two wings. All his troops, both horse and foot, were thirty men deep, but the Egyptians, who, being the principal strength of Crœsus's infantry, were posted in its center, and were divided into twelve large bodies or square battalions of 10,000 men each. Each square had 100 men in front, and as many in depth. There was an interval between every battalion, that they might act and fight independent of, and without interfering with one another. Crœsus would gladly have persuaded the Egyptians to range themselves in less depth, that they might have made a more imposing front. The armies were in an immense plain, which gave room for the extending of their wings to right and left; and Crœsus designed by so doing, to hem in and surround the enemy's army. Upon this movement alone he founded his hopes of victory. But the Egyptians would not change their usual order of battle.

His army, thus drawn up into one line, was nearly five miles in length.

Araspes, a young Median nobleman, who, under the pretense of discontent, had retired to Crœsus's army, and had received particular orders from Cyrus to observe well the manner in which the Lydian general should arrange his troops, returned to the Persian camp the day before the battle, and gave to Cyrus an exact account of the disposition of the enemy's army. By this description of the disposition of the enemy, Cyrus was governed when drawing up his own forces. The Persian troops had generally used to engage twenty-four men in depth, but Cyrus thought fit to change that disposition. It was absolutely necessary that his army should present as large a front as possible, without weakening his battalions, in order to prevent the enemy from hemming in and surrounding him. His infantry was excellent, and most judiciously armed with cuirasses, partisans, battle-axes, and swords; and provided the Persians could close with the enemy, there was but little reason to believe that the Lydian battalions that were armed only with light bucklers and javelins, could sustain the charge. Cyrus, therefore, thinned the files of his infantry one half, and ranged them only twelve men deep. The cavalry was drawn out on the two wings, the right commanded by Chrysantas, and the left by Hystaspes. The whole front of the army was four miles in extent. At a short distance behind the first line Cyrus placed the spearmen, and behind them the archers. Both the one and the other were covered by soldiers in their front, over whose heads they could fling their javelins, and shoot their arrows at the enemy. Behind all these, Cyrus formed another line, to serve for the rear, which consisted of the flower of his army. Their business was to have their eyes upon those who were placed before them, to encourage those who did their duty; to sustain and threaten those who gave way, and even to kill those who fled, as traitors. Behind the army were placed the moving towers, above described. They formed a line equal and parallel to that of the army, and served not only to annoy the enemy, by the perpetual discharges of the archers that were in them; but might also be considered a kind of movable forts or redoubts, under which the Persian troops might rally, in case they were broken and pushed by the enemy. Immediately behind these towers were two other lines, which were also parallel and equal to the front of the army; the one was formed of the baggage, and the other of the chariots which carried the women, and such other persons as were unfit for service. To close all these lines, and to secure them from the insults of the enemy, Cyrus placed in the rear of all 2,000 infantry, 2,000 horse, and a numerous troop of camels. The Persian chariots of war were divided into three bodies of 100 each. One of these bodies, commanded by Abradates, King of Lusiana, was placed in the front of the battle, and the other two upon the two flanks of the army.

Such was the order of battle in the two armies as they were drawn out, and disposed the day before the engagement.

The next day, early in the morning, Cyrus made a sacrifice, during which time, his army took a little refreshment. After having offered their libations to the gods, the soldiers put on their armor. They likewise armed the horses, with forehead-pieces, and breastplates, the single horses with thigh-pieces, and those in the chariots with plates on their sides. The army presented a most magnificent spectacle. The soldiers decked in glittering brass, and flaming scarlet, and the horses encased in the same metal, presented the appearance of a sea of crimson and gold, as their bright arms flashed in the rays of the morning sun.

The chariot of Abradates, which had four perches and eight horses, was completely adorned for him, and he was upon the point of putting on his quilted linen corselet when Panthea, his wife, brought him a golden helmet, and armpieces and broad bracelets of the same precious metal. She also presented him with a purple habit that reached down to his feet, and hung in folds at the bottom, and a plume of violet-colored feathers. All these she had caused to be made unknown to her husband, that her present might be more agreeable from surprise. In spite of all her endeavors to the contrary, when she dressed him in this armor she could not refrain from shedding tears. But, notwithstanding her tenderness for him, she exhorted him to die sword in hand rather than not signalize himself in the coming battle.

After Cyrus had made his sacrifice to the gods, he rode through his army, and gave his officers the necessary instructions and orders for the battle. While he was considering on which side he should direct his march, he heard a clap of thunder on the right, and cried out, "Great Jove, we follow thee." At that instant he set forward, having Chrysantas on his right, who commanded the right wing of the horse, and Arsamas, who commanded the foot, on his left. He warned them above all things to pay attention to the royal standard, and to advance equally in a line. The standard was a golden eagle with extended wings on the end of a pike. He made his troops halt three times before he arrived at the enemy's army. When the two armies were in sight of each other, and the enemies had observed how much their front exceeded that of the Persians, they made the center of their army halt, while the two wings advanced, projecting to the right and left, with the desire to inclose Cyrus's army, and to begin their attack on every side at the same time. But this movement did not cause Cyrus to slacken his pace, for he had expected it. Having given the rallying word: "Jove, our guide and protection," he rode through all the ranks to encourage his soldiers and to give his orders. He observed that many of his officers, and even Abradates himself, were uneasy at the movement made by the two wings of the Lydian army, in order to attack them on the two flanks. "Those troops alarm you," said he; "believe me, those very troops shall be the first routed, and to you, Abradates, I give their defeat as a signal of the time when you are to fall upon the enemy with your chariots. In fact, the event happened precisely as Cyrus had foretold. After Cyrus had given such orders as he thought necessary everywhere, he returned to the right wing of his army. When the two wings of the Lydian army were sufficiently extended, they turned and faced the Persian army, and then Crœsus gave the signal for his army to advance against the enemy. And thus these phalanxes marched against the Persian army; one in the front, one on the right, and the other on the left. Cyrus's army, therefore, was inclosed on three sides, as if it had three great armies to engage with, and looked like a small square drawn with a large one. In an instant, on the first signal given by Cyrus, his troops faced about on every side, and all were silent in anxious expectation of the event. Cyrus now began to sing the hymn of battle, and his whole army answered to it with loud shouts and invocations to the gods of war. Then Cyrus, at the head of some troops of horse, briskly followed by a body of foot, fell immediately upon the enemy's troops who were marching to attack the right wing of his army in flank. With his foot and horse he inclosed the enemy on each side, and then attacked them so fiercely that they were soon put into great disorder. The chariots, then, driving furiously upon the Lydians, completed their defeat. At the same moment the troops of the left flank, knowing by the noise that Cyrus had commenced the battle on the right, advanced to meet the enemy, making the camels advance as Cyrus had ordered. The enemy's cavalry did not expect this, and their horses, at a distance, as soon as they were sensible of the approach of these animals (for horses can not endure the smell of camels*), begun to snort and prance, and to run foul of one another, throwing their riders, and treading them under foot. While they were in this confusion a small body of Persian horse, commanded by Artagersas, charged them warmly, and the chariots both to the right and left, fell upon them at the same time. The Lydians, thus hotly attacked, were unable to rally, and finally turned and fled, leaving the ground strewn with their dead. This being the signal which Cyrus had given Abradates, for attacking the front of the Lydian army, that general drove like lightning upon the enemy with all his chariots. The charioteers of the enemy, unable to stand such a violent charge, immediately turned and fled. Abradates made his way directly against the Egyptian battalions. The Egyptians, covered with their heavy bucklers, and marching in such close order that the Persian chariots had not room to pierce among them, gave him much trouble, and would not have been broken but for the violence of the horses that trod upon them. It was a most fearful spectacle to behold the heaps of men and horses, overturned chariots, broken arms and legs, and all the direful effects of the sharp scythes which cut every thing in pieces that came in their way. In this inexpressible confusion, the wheels making their way by jolts over heaps of all kind, Abradates's chariot was overturned, and he and his men, after having signalized themselves by the most incredible deeds, were slain. The Egyptians then, marching forward in close order, and covered with their bucklers, compelled the Persian infantry to give way, and drove them beyond their fourth line, as far as their engines. There they met a fresh storm of arrows and javelins, that were poured upon their heads from the moving towers; and the Persians who formed the rear guard would not allow their archers and javelin men to retreat any further; but advancing upon them, sword in hand, compelled them to return to the charge of the enemy. And great havoc and destruction there was of men, great clashing of arms and weapons of all kinds, and great noise of people, some calling to each other, some making exhortations, and some calling on the gods. Cyrus, in the mean time, having put both the horse and foot on the left of the Egyptians to flight, did not lose time in pursuing the fugitives.

But pushing on directly to the center, he had the mortification to find his Persian troops had been forced to give way; and rightly judging, that the only means to prevent the Egyptians from gaining further ground, would be to attack them behind, he did so, and fell upon their rear: the cavalry came up at the same time, and the enemy was pushed with great fury. The Egyptians being attacked on all sides, faced about every way, and defended themselves with obstinate courage. And now foot and horse fought promiscuously, and a Lydian soldier, falling under Cyrus's horse and being trampled on, stabbed the horse in the belly. The horse, thus wounded, tossed and staggered, and threw Cyrus off, into the midst of the enemy. On this occasion one might see of what advantage it was for a ruler to have the love of those that are under his command; for his soldiers, officers and men, equally alarmed at the danger of their leader, cried out, fell on and fought; they pushed and were pushed; they struck and received blows, and one of his attendants, leaping from his horse, mounted Cyrus on the animal, and the battle became more fierce and bloody than before. At length Cyrus, admiring the valor of the Egyptians, and being anxious to preserve the lives of such brave men, offered them honorable conditions if they would surrender, letting them know at the same time, that their allies had deserted them. The Egyptians accepted the conditions, and as they prided themselves, no less upon their fidelity than upon their courage they stipulated, that they should not be obliged to carry arms against Crœsus, in whose service they had been engaged. Thenceforward they served in the Persian army with inviolable fidelity. The battle lasted till evening. Crœsus returned to Sardis with his troops. The other nations, as fast as possible directed their courses each to their own country, making as long marches as they could. The conquerors, having taken suitable refreshment, posted their guards, and went to rest. See Babylon.

* This natural antipathy of the horse for the camel is affirmed by the ancients; but it is disproved by daily experience, and derided by the best judges, the orientals.—Gibbon.

The horses of Crœsus, however, could never have seen a camel!—Belœ.

TICINUS, B.C. 217.—Ticinus is the ancient name of the river Tesino, a large stream which, flowing from the St. Gothard, waters the Levantine valley, and passing through the Lago Maggiore, runs S. E. and falls into the Po, on the left bank, below Pavia, in Austrian Italy.

When Hannibal crossed the Rhone his army consisted of 38,000 foot and over 8,000 horse; but his passage over the Alps destroyed nearly half this number; so that when he entered Italy he had remaining only 12,000 Africans, 8,000 Spanish foot, and 6,000 horse. The rapid progress which Hannibal made through Italy, caused the greatest consternation throughout the city of Rome. Sempronius was ordered to leave Sicily, and hasten to the relief of his country, and P. Scipio, the other consul, advanced toward the enemy, crossed the Po, and pitched his camp near the river Ticinus. The two armies were now within sight of each other. The generals on each side made a speech to their soldiers before the engagement. Scipio represented to his forces the glory of their country; the noble deeds of their ancestors, and assured them that victory was in their hands. Were they not about to combat only with Carthaginians? Had they not often defeated them before? Had they not compelled them to pay tribute for twenty years? And should the Romans now be defeated by the Carthaginians, a people who had long been accustomed to be their slaves? Hannibal, he said, in his march over the Alps had lost the flower of his army, and those that survived were exhausted by hunger, cold, and fatigue. The bare sight of the Romans was sufficient to put to flight a parcel of soldiers who resembled ghosts more than men. Finally it was necessary that their arms should be victorious, for not only was Italy invaded but their beloved city, Rome, was in danger. The present battle would decide its fate.

Hannibal also addressed his soldiers; but that his words might make a stronger impression on the rude minds of his men, he spoke to their eyes before he addressed their ears. He armed a number of barbarians, whom he had captured during his passage over the Alps, and commanded them to fight two and two, in sight of his army, promising at the same time to reward the conquerors with their liberty, and with rich presents. The barbarians eagerly obeyed him, and the zeal with which they fought each other gave Hannibal an opportunity to exhibit to his soldiers a lively picture of their present condition. He assured them that they were deprived of all means of turning back; and that therefore, they must go into the battle with the determination to conquer or die. What would be the reward if victorious? The conquest of all Italy; the plunder of the rich and magnificent city of Rome, and an illustrious victory, and immortal glory. He roused their indignation against the Romans; he bade them throw off the yoke of servitude, and to prove to the world that those imperious Romans could not tame Carthaginian blood. And now both armies prepared for the battle. The Romans threw a bridge across the Ticinus, and their troops marched over it. But two ill omens had filled the Romans with consternation and dread. A wolf had stolen into the camp and cruelly mangled some of the soldiers, without receiving the least harm from those who endeavored to kill it; and a swarm of bees had pitched upon a tree near the general's tent. The Carthaginians, however, were inspired with the boldest courage. Hannibal animated them with fresh promises, and clearing with a stone the skull of a lamb which he was sacrificing, he called upon Jupiter to dash to pieces his head in like manner in case he did not give his soldiers the rewards he had promised them. Scipio posted the troops armed with missive weapons, and the Gaulish horse, in the first line, and forming the second line of the flower of the confederate army, he slowly advanced. Hannibal advanced with his whole cavalry, in the center of which he had posted the troopers who rode with bridles, and the Numidian horsemen* on the wings in order to surround the enemy.

The officers and cavalry being eager to engage, a charge ensued. At the very first onset, Scipio's light-armed soldiers, frightened at the Carthaginian cavalry, which came pouring upon them, had scarcely discharged their darts ere they gave way, and fearing lest they should be trampled under foot, they retreated through the intervals of the squadrons. The battle raged a long time with equal success. Many horsemen on either side dismounted, so that the battle was carried on between infantry as well as cavalry. In the mean time the Numidians surrounded the enemy. They now charged on the rear of the light-armed troops, who had fled from the first charge of the cavalry, and rode them down. The center of the Roman army had fought bravely, and as their enemies were equally courageous, many were slain on both sides. But the attacks by the Numidian cavalry in the rear, put the Roman troops into disorder. At this moment Scipio was disabled from taking further part in the action by a severe wound received at the hands of a Carthaginian who nearly took him prisoner. However, the consul was rescued out of the enemy's hands by the bravery of his own son, then but seventeen years old, and who afterward was honored with the surname of Africanus, for having put a glorious period to this war. The consul, though dangerously wounded, retreated in good order. He was conveyed to his camp by a body of horse, who covered him with their arms and bodies. The balance of the army followed him thither. He hastened to the Po, which he crossed with his army, and then broke down the bridge to prevent Hannibal from overtaking him. See battles of Trebia, Thrasymenus, and Cannæ.

TICONDEROGA, A. D. 1758.—This village, in Essex co., New York, stands on the bank of Lake Champlain, 97 miles north of Albany.

While the British under Amherst and Wolfe were engaged with the French in the eastern part of the possessions of France, in North America, Abercrombie, and Lord Howe, with about 7,000 British soldiers, 9,000 provincials, and a heavy train of artillery, were marching against Ticonderoga, then in the occupation of Montcalm, with about 4,000 French troops. On the 6th of July, 1758, the British army, having passed down Lake George in flat-boats, landed at the northern extremity of that beautiful sheet of water. The English commanders were aware that Montcalm was in daily expectation of receiving a reinforcement of 3,000 men, under M. de Levi, and resolved to make a speedy attack on Ticonderoga.

The whole country between the landing-place and Ticonderoga was covered with a dense forest intersected with deep ravines and dangerous morasses. The British army was immediately put in motion. The provisions, artillery, and all heavy baggage were left behind, and the army, formed in four columns, the regulars in the center, and provincials on the flanks, advanced toward the enemy. Their progress, owing to the roughness of the country, was slow. Montcalm had watched the movements of the British with a wary eye; yet he was confident that he could repulse them. "These people," said he in a letter to Vandreuil, dated July 6th, "march cautiously; yet, if they give me time to gain the position I have chosen on the heights of Corillon,* I shall beat them." The British columns, led by ignorant guides, broke and jostled each other as they advanced; and they had proceeded but about two miles when the right center, under Lord Howe, suddenly came upon an advanced party of 300 French troops under De Trépézée, who was on his way to rejoin Montcalm at Ticonderoga, and having lost his way, had been wandering in the forest for 12 hours. The British immediately charged upon the French, who met the attack with firmness; but wearied with their long march, and overwhelmed by numbers, the French were soon put to rout, losing 141 in killed and wounded. The balance fell into the hands of the victors as prisoners. But the British sustained in this conflict an irreparable loss. At the very first onset, Lord Howe was slain. One other officer, and several privates were also killed. Lord Howe was the idol of his soldiers, and their grief at his loss was so great, that, in the words of Mante, "with him the soul of the army seemed to expire." The General Court of Massachusetts voted him a monument in Westminster Abbey; and his memory was long cherished in America with affection. The English columns were so much confused and broken, that Abercrombie, on the morning of the 7th, withdrew the whole army to the landing-place. An hour before noon Colonel Bradshaw, with a strong detachment, advanced and took possession of the saw-mills, near the present village of Ticonderoga, which the enemy had abandoned. Abercrombie, on this, put the army in motion again, and joined Bradshaw, and all encamped that night on the ground around the saw-mills, within a mile and a half of the French army. Early the next day, Abercrombie sent an engineer to reconnoiter, and on his return he reported the French works unfinished, and might easily be taken. But the engineer was deceived. Montcalm was prepared to receive the enemy. On the 6th of July he called in all his parties; and on the next day the whole French army labored incessantly in strengthening his position. Fort Ticonderoga, or Fort Corillon, as it was then called, was an exceedingly strong work, built of limestone. The peninsula on which the fort stood is elevated over 100 feet above the lake, and contains about 500 acres. The waters of the lake washed three sides, and a deep marsh extended nearly across the fourth. The right of the French line of defenses rested on a hillock, about a mile from the fort, the left extended to a scarp surmounted by an abatis. The whole defenses were completed by the erection of a breastwork nine feet high, upon the narrowest part of the neck, between the swamp and the outlet of Lake George, and for 100 yards in front of this breastwork, the approach was obstructed by felled trees, with their branches pointing outward, stumps, and all kinds of rubbish. As the English advanced toward the French, they were greeted by a heavy discharge of artillery, which swept through their ranks with the force of a hurricane; but in the face of the tempest they pressed steadily forward, determined to carry the works at the point of the bayonet. The English advanced in three columns, to attack the left, right, and center of the enemy's line simultaneously. But becoming entangled in the rubbish, and thrown into disorder by clambering over fallen logs and through thick-set bushes, they suffered terribly by the fire of the enemy. For four hours the English breasted that fearful storm, vainly endeavoring to surmount the obstacles which the French had thrown in their path. Hundreds fell at every discharge from the French lines, and Abercrombie perceiving the immense slaughter of his troops, sounded a retreat, and unpursued by the French, the English retired to the foot of Lake George. In this engagement the British lost nearly 2,000 men in killed and wounded. The French loss was trifling. This defeat filled the English with shame and confusion; the French, on the contrary, were filled with joy; they had met and defeated an army nearly four times larger than their own. So much disheartened was Abercrombie by this disaster, that he did not renew the attack, but fell back with the greater part of his army to Albany.

* The Numidian's used to ride without saddle or bridle.

* Ticonderoga was first called Fort Corillon by the French.

TICONDERAGA, A.D. 1775. — At the commencement of the revolutionary war, a strong fort, the ruins of which stand in the south-easterly part of the town of Ticonderoga, was occupied by a British garrison, and the Americans perceiving the importance of this work, determined to capture it. On the 9th of May Colonel Ethan Allen, and Colonel Eaton, with 270 men, reached the east shore of Lake Champlain. Having crossed the lake, the Americans, early on the following morning, took up a position in front of the fort. The garrison, wrapped in profound sleep, were unconscious of the approach of an enemy, and the American commanders prepared to enter the fort. As, the two officers advanced, a sentinel snapped his piece at them, and hastily retired to arouse his comrades. The garrison being alarmed rushed to arms and opened a brisk fire on the assailants. But the Americans pushed boldly forward, and a hot skirmish with the bayonet ensued. The British were driven back, and the commander of the garrison making his appearance, was summoned to surrender. "By what authority?" he inquired. "In the name of the great Jehovah and the Continental Congress!" was the memorable reply of Ethan Allen. The English threw down their arms, and surrendered every thing to the conquerors. One hundred and twenty pieces of brass cannon, several mortars and howitzers, and balls, bombs, and ammunition, of every description fell into the hands of the victors; and all this was accomplished without the loss of a single life on either side.

TIPPECANOE, A.D. 1811.—The Tippecanoe, a river in Indiana, is celebrated from a battle fought on its banks in 1811, between the Americans, under General William Henry Harrison, and the Indians, in which the latter were totally defeated.

TLASCALANS AND SPANIARDS, A.D. 1519.—Terrified and subdued by the total defeat at the battle of Ceutla, which they had experienced at the hands of the Tabascans determined to pacify the invaders. They humbly presented themselves before the conqueror, and gave him costly gifts of gold; a bountiful supply of provisions, and twenty female slaves. Among the latter was Donna Marina, who afterward played such an important part in the conquest of Mexico.

Learning from the Tabascans that the precious metal was not a native of their country, but that it was brought thither from Mexico, Cortez, whose sole object was to enrich his sovereigns, his companions, and himself, re-entered his ships, and sailed toward the north, and finally came to anchor off the island of San Juan d' Ulloa, opposite the spot where the city of Vera Cruz now stands.

Here his ship was visited by a number of natives who came from the shore in a canoe. They presented him with ornaments of gold; and freely bartered the precious metal with the Spanish soldiers for trinkets and toys. The language of the Aztecs, however, did not resemble that of the Tabascans, and Cortez was unable to communicate with them save by nature's general language—the language of signs. But Cortez was informed that Marina was acquainted with the Aztec language; and as she was also familiar with the Tabascan tongue, she could converse with Aguila, who, in turn, could interpret her words to the Spanish general. Afterward Marina acquired the Spanish language, and Cortez made her his interpreter.

Through the two interpreters the natives informed Cortez that they were the subjects of Montezuma, a great emperor who had conquered all the nations of Mexico, and whose wealth and power exceeded that of any earthly sovereign. Their own country had been recently conquered by Montezuma, and was governed by a Mexican noble named Teuhtlite, who lived several leagues from the coast. Montezuma, himself, they said, resided in the interior of the country, and lived in a degree of magnificence, the description of which excited the curiosity of the Spaniards to the highest pitch.

Cortez dismissed the natives with many presents, and intimated his desire to hold an interview with the governor. After the departure of his visitors, Cortez landed with his crew, and with the aid of the natives who were apparently sent to him by the governor, he erected a barrack and other buildings for the use of his men.

At length the governor, with a numerous body of attendants, arrived at the Spanish camp. In the interview which followed, Cortez informed him that he had been sent by his king to visit Montezuma, the fame of whose greatness had been wafted across the ocean to his ears. The Aztec noble assured Cortez that couriers should be sent immediately to Montezuma, to communicate the wishes of the strangers, and to learn his will, and that upon their return he would inform him of his royal master's intentions.

The governor then directed his slaves to bring forth the presents intended for the Spanish general. So magnificent were the presents that the desire of the Spaniards was increased fourfold to visit the country whose sovereign seemed to have such inexhaustible wealth at his command.

Cortez, in the name of his king, thanked the governor for the presents, and commanded his servants to bring forward those intended for Montezuma. Having received these, the governor shortly afterward quitted the Spanish camp in the same pomp with which he had entered it.

Seven days only elapsed before an embassy from Montezuma presented itself at the Spanish camp. They were loaded with costly presents, more magnificent than the Spaniards had ever seen before; but after delivering their gifts, they gave Montezuma's decided refusal to grant an interview to the strangers. On the contrary, after assuring them of his good will toward the King of Spain, he urged them to return to their own country.

This was far from the Spanish general's desires or intention. He told the embassy that the generosity and magnanimity of their emperor only made him the more anxious to visit him. The Aztec nobles assured him that their royal master would not give his consent, and in astonishment at the audacity of the invader they took their departure.

Ten days afterward they again returned bringing from their monarch additional presents, but Montezuma's answer was, if possible, still more decided than before. He not only requested but commanded the strangers to leave the country. Having given this reply, to the Spanish general, the Mexican nobles withdrew. That very day all the natives who, until now, had been on the most friendly terms with the Spaniards, deserted the camp, and refused to furnish any further supplies.

About this time Cortez received commands from the Governor of Cuba to return, and upon expressing his refusal to do so many of his officers and soldiers murmured, and were upon the point of an open mutiny. Cortez, however, determined upon a desperate action. By intrigue, management, and force, he quelled the mutiny; founded a colony, and caused himself to be elected governor. He received embassies from the provinces of Cempoalla and Chihuitztla, which had been conquered by Montezuma, and whose inhabitants were ready for a revolt at any moment, and by the promise to free them from the yoke of the tyrant, induced them to enter into alliance with him. To prevent a second mutiny, he caused all his fleets, except one small vessel, to be destroyed, thus leaving to his soldiers the choice of fidelity and success, or death.

Cortez having succeeded in forming this alliance, returned to Vera Cruz, and, having a small body of men at that place, on the 16th of August, he commenced his march toward the city of Mexico, with an army consisting of 400 Spanish foot soldiers fifteen cavalry, and 2,000 Indians, of whom 1,200 were warriors, the others serving in the capacity of baggage-carriers. His artillery consisted of seven pieces of cannon. With this small army he marched through the heart of the country without molestation until he arrived at the country of the Tlascalans. Upon arriving at the boundary of Tlascala the progress of the army was arrested by a remarkable fortification. Before them arose a stone wall, nine feet in height, and twenty in thickness. It was six miles in length, and rested at either extremity on a rugged ridge of mountains, and marked the limits of Tlascala. The Tlascalans were brave republicans, and had long struggled for liberty with the armies of the Mexican monarch, and for this reason the allies of the Spaniards strenuously advised Cortez to seek their friendship.

Cortez, accordingly, sent an embassy, consisting of four of the principal Cempoallans, to the Tlascalan chieftains, with a conciliatory letter, requesting permission to pass through their country, and with numerous presents. Before receiving an answer, however, Cortez passed through an opening in the center of the wall, and entered the country. Meanwhile, the Tlascalans, having listened to Cortez's embassy, held a fierce debate whether to receive him with peace or war. The latter was decided upon, and it was determined to detain the envoys, and to fall at once on the Spaniards with a powerful army which was at that time stationed near the eastern frontier.

After his whole army had passed the wall, Cortez with his cavalry rode on in advance to reconnoiter. Having proceeded several miles he discovered a small party of Indians armed with sword and buckler. At his approach they fled precipitately; but putting spurs to their horses the Spanish cavalry soon overtook them. Finding it impossible to escape, the Indians turned upon their pursuers and attacked them with the utmost fierceness; but their puny weapons were unequal to the task, and the Spaniards were about to cut them to pieces, when an immense body of Indians appeared, coming at full speed to the relief of their companions. The Spanish general immediately dispatched a man to hasten the movements of the main body of his army, and drew up his cavalry to receive the shock of the enemy. Like a whirlwind the tumultuous mass of the Indian army swept on toward the Spaniards, seeming as if by their very weight they would crush and overwhelm them. But the Spaniards received the charge like a firm rock, which divides the rushing current of a swift river. Surrounded on all sides by the unfortunate Indians, who, seizing the horsemen by their knees, endeavored to dislodge them from their seats, and strove vainly to tear their weapons from their hands. In this desperate struggle one Spaniard was torn from his saddle, trampled under foot, and wounded so sorely that that he died shortly after the battle, and two horses were slain; but the Indians suffered severely. The long keen lances of their enemies inflicted deadly thrusts on all sides. While the struggle was at its height, the main body of the Spanish army arrived at the scene of action. Hastily forming they opened a rapid fire of artillery, musketry, and cross-bows, upon the Indians. Startled by the report of the guns, the Indians suddenly ceased fighting. They gave one look toward the fire-vomiting engines, and then retired from the field. The road was now free from impediment, and Cortez joyfully resumed his march.—Prescott.

TOLEDO, A.D. 457.—Toledo, a celebrated city of Spain, was taken in the year 457 by the Goths from the Romans. The Goths made it their capital in Spain till 714, when it was taken by the Moors. The Moors were expelled from Toledo in 1085 by Alphonso VI. and Rodrigo Diaz, and notwithstanding three various sieges in the next century, it has remained in the hands of the Spaniards ever since.

TORRES VEDRAS, A.D. 1810.—Our accounts of battles and sieges would be incomplete without a description of the celebrated lines of defense established by the Duke of Wellington, in 1810, to resist the approach of the French. They are thus described by Sir Archibald Alison: "The lines of Torres Vedras, on which the English engineers were engaged for above a twelvemonth, and which have acquired immortal celebrity from being the position in which the torrent of French conquest was first permanently arrested, consisted of three distinct ranges of defenses, one within another, which formed so many intrenched positions, each of which must be successively forced before the invading force could reach Lisbon. The first, which was twenty-nine miles long, extended from Alhambra on the Tagus, to Zezambre on the sea-coast. The second in general about eight miles in rear of the first, stretched from Quintella on the Tagus, to the mouth of the St. Lorenza, in the sea. The third, intended to cover a port of embarkation, extended from Pass d'Arcos, on the Tagus, to the tower of Jonquera on the coast. Within this interior line was an intrenched camp, designed to cover the embarkation of the troops, if that extremity should become necessary, and it rested on Fort St. Julian, whose high ramparts, and deep ditches, rendered any attempt at escalade impracticable; so that, in the event of disaster, the most ample means were provided for bringing away the troops in safety. Of these lines, the second was incomparably the strongest, and it was there that Wellington had originally intended to make his stand, the first being rather to retard the advance of the enemy, and take off the first edge of his attack, than to be the permanent resting-place of the allied forces; but the long delay of Massena at the sieges of Ciudad Rodrigo, and Almeida, had given so much time to the English engineers that the first line was completed and deemed susceptible of defense when the French arrived before it. It consisted of thirty redoubts placed on a ridge of heights, on which were mounted, in all, 140 guns; the great redoubt of Sobral in the center, on which were mounted forty-five pieces of heavy cannon, was perched upon an eminence that overlooked the whole exterior lines, and from which signal-posts communicated over their whole extent; an admirable road, running along the front of the position, enabled one part of the army to communicate rapidly with the other; the highways, piercing through this terrible barrier, were all pallisadoed; the redoubts armed with chevaux-de-frise, and a glacis cut away to make room for their fire and the intervening spaces which were not fortified formed into encampments for the troops under shelter of the guns of one or other of the redoubts, where they might give battle to the enemy with every prospect of success. On the whole lines no less than 600 pieces of artillery were mounted on 150 redoubts.

TORONE, B.C. 422.—In the tenth year of the Peloponnesian war, Torone, in the Thracian dominions, was besieged and taken by the Athenian land and sea forces, under the command of Cleon. Many of the Peloponnesians and Toroneans were slain, and the commandant of the garrison, Pasitilidas, was taken prisoner. The victors doomed the wives and children of the Toroneans to slavery, and the male inhabitants, together with the Peloponnesians, and every Chalcidean found among them, amounting in all to 700, were sent away captives to Athens.

TORTOSA.—The city of Tortosa, in Spain, has been the witness of many bloody strifes. In 811 the army of Louis Debonnaire attacked the city, and wrested it from the Moors. Afterward, however, it was retaken by the Moors, who made piratical excursions from the city against Italian traders. Eugenius III., therefore, proclaimed a crusade against this nest of pirates, and in 1148 succeeded in taking the place. The Moors, in 1149, made a desperate effort to regain Tortosa, but were defeated with great loss. In this defense the women of Tortosa took a prominent part; they mounted the battlements, and with loud shouts hurled their missile weapons upon the besiegers, and thus annoyed the besiegers, while their fathers, husbands, brothers, and lovers made a sally, in which they defeated the Moors, and put them to utter rout. In 1798 Tortosa was taken by the French, under the Duke of Orleans. In 1811, this place, the bulwark of Valencia and Catalonia, was shamefully surrendered to the French by General Lilli, who was afterward tried for cowardice, and condemned to death, but was pardoned by Ferdinand VII.

TOULON, A.D. 1793.—This famous seaport town of France stands at the bottom of one of the finest harbors of the Mediterranean, one hundred and ninety miles south-east of Lyons. The town is of an oval shape, with the longest side fronting the water, and "rises gracefully and majestically toward the north, extending its ramparts to the foot of a range of high mountains, stretching from the east to the west. The naval arsenal of Toulon is one of the finest in Europe. This place is strongly fortified, being surrounded by a double rampart, and a large deep ditch, defended to the east and west by hills covered with redoubts." The siege of Lyons was quickly followed by the battle of Toulon. The republicans immediately after subjugating the former city, marched against Toulon, thinking it would fall an easy prey into their hands. But they were disappointed, for they found great difficulties to overcome. Toulon, on the land side, is backed by a ridge of lofty hills, which for more than a century had been strongly fortified, and the greater part of the city and harbor was protected by the cannon of the fortifications. On the possession of two principal points of this range of mountains depended the maintenance of the city. The defile of Ollioulles, a rocky pass of great strength, which forms the only means of communication between the promontory of Toulon and the mainland of France, had been occupied by an English detachment of 600 men, who had driven the republicans from that post. The defense was at this time, however, intrusted to a Spanish force, and in the first part of September, Cartaux, with more than 5,000 republicans, attacked them, and very easily regained the pass. Fearing to weaken the garrison of the town, which was already much scattered, no attempt was made to recover this lost ground, and the republican videttes were pushed up to the outer walls of Toulon. As a compensation for this important service, Cartaux was deprived of his command by the Convention, and Dugommier was invested with the direction of the republican force. During the respite afforded by the siege of Lyons, the allied troops and the inhabitants of Toulon made desperate efforts to strengthen the defenses of the town, but the regular force was too small, and composed of so many different nations, that they had no confidence in being able to resist. The English troops did not number 5,000, and no reliance could be placed on the 8,000 Spanish, Neapolitan, and Piedmontese troops that composed the remainder of the garrison. Powerful reinforcements were expected from England and Austria, but they came not. However, the inhabitants made great efforts to strengthen every means of defense, and particularly Fort Eguillette, which they hoped to render impregnable, as it was situated at the neck of the promontory which shut in the small harbor, and which, from its similarity of position, they called the Little Gibraltar. Lord Mulgrave assumed the command of the whole garrison in the beginning of September, and very active operations for strengthening the outworks on the heights were then commenced. The heights of Malbousquet, of Cape Brun, and of l'Eguillette, were soon covered with works, traced out by skillful French engineers. It was resolved to assemble the whole besieging army, under General Dugommier, and commence an attack on the forts on the heights, which commanded the harbor. In order to accomplish this design, a false attack was directed against Cape Brun, while the principal effort was to be made for the possession of the mountain of Faron, and the Fort Malbousquet. A young officer of artillery, then chief of battalion, named Napoleon Bonaparte, was given the command of the breaching batteries. Under his superintendance great damage was done to the forts, and to check the operations the garrison resolved to make a sally. This was accordingly done on the 30th of November, by 3,000 men from the town. Their chief object was to destroy the works on the heights of Arrennes, as the fire from this point was a source of great annoyance; while another division of nearly the same number, proceeded, in an opposite direction, to force the batteries at the gorge of Ollioulles, and destroy the great park placed there. Success at first crowned the efforts of both divisions, the batteries were carried, and the park on the point of being taken, when Dugommier, after haranguing his troops, led them back to the charge, and the assailants were repulsed. The attack on Arrennes was also fortunate; all the guns of the enemy were spiked, the works carried; but their impetuosity led them too far in pursuit of the enemy, and they were attacked by fresh troops under Napoleon, and drove back to the city with considerable loss.

In this sally, General O'Hara, who had just arrived from England, was wounded, and Dugommier was twice struck with spent balls, without any serious injury, however. The besiegers now directed their whole strength against the English redoubt, which was built in the center of their work on the neck of land called Eguillette, and upon the possession of which, the safety of the city depended. During the whole of the 16th of December, the besiegers kept up an incessant fire, and also commenced raising heavy batteries against this fort, and at two o'clock on the morning of the 17th, they advanced to the attack. A tremendous fire of grape and musketry saluted them from the works, and soon the ditch was filled with the dead and dying. The column was driven back, and Dugommier, who commanded it, gave all over for lost; but fresh troops arriving, he at length overpowered the Spanish soldiers, who had charge of part of the line, and surrounded the British detachment, nearly 300 of which were killed while fighting manfully for the defense of the intrenchments. The enemy having obtained possession of this important fort, further maintenance of the out-posts was deemed impracticable, and the whole of the allied troops accordingly withdrew from the promontory to the city of Toulon. This measure had been strongly recommended by Napoleon, as the possession of this fort which commanded the inner harbor, would render the situation of the fleet extremely perilous, and would, in all probability, lead to the evacuation of the city.

The republicans at the other extremity of the line were not less fortunate. At daybreak, a general attack was made by the enemy on the whole range of forts which crowned the mountain of Faron. They were driven back on the eastern side, but on the north, where the mountain was nearly 1,800 feet in height, very steep, and apparently inaccessible, they succeeded in ascending through paths deemed impracticable. The allies were beginning to rejoice at the defeat of the main attack on the eastern line, when suddenly they beheld the heights above them covered with glittering battalions, and the tri-color flag floating from the highest summit of the mountain. Napoleon was the instigator of these two conquests, and they decided the fate of the city. The garrison yet numbered more than 10,000 men, and the works of the town were still uninjured, but the harbor was not safe, as the fire from the heights ranged over the whole extent; and at length it was decided to evacuate the place. This determination was immediately carried into effect. The exterior forts were abandoned, and the principal inhabitants were informed that means of retreat would be afforded them on board the British squadron, while the fleet was moved beyond reach of the enemy's fire. The garrison being made up of such a heterogeneous company, much confusion would necessarily ensue, and the Neapolitans, in particular, fled from their posts in such haste, and took refuge on board the ships, that they subjected themselves to the derision of the whole garrison. The unfortunate inhabitants were filled with gloomy forebodings. To them, this hasty evacuation seemed the harbinger of confiscation, exile, and death, republican conquest, and the reign of the guillotine. On the morning of the 18th the British sick and wounded embarked in ships appointed for that purpose; and when the inhabitants found that they were to be abandoned, despair and anguish filled every heart. The greatest confusion ensued; the streets were filled with women and children, and while they were hurrying to the quays, these were actually fired upon by the Jacobins. The shore of the harbor was filled with a piteous crowd, imploring to be saved from their cruel enemies. As soon as possible they were taken on board ships lying in the harbor, a work of considerable difficulty, as they numbered over 14,000. It was now resolved to send out under a royalist, Admiral Trogroffe, such part of the fleet as could be prepared for sea, and the rest was to be destroyed. It was a work of great danger, as the cannon of the republicans already reached the harbor. However, Sir Sydney Smith volunteered his services, and at twelve o'clock at night commenced the work of destruction. His entrance to the dockyard he found disputed, by about 600 galley-slaves, who had become free from their fetters. By stationing a British sloop, so that her guns swept the quay, he intimidated them, and also a large force of Jacobins, who were assembling around the outer pallisades. At eight, a fire ship was towed into the harbor, and at ten, the torch was applied, and the flames burst forth from every quarter. The fire spread with tremendous rapidity, and in a short time, fifteen ships of the line, and eight frigates were burned to the water's edge. The volumes of smoke which filled the sky, the crackling flames, which seemed to burst, as if it were out of the sea, and ascend to the heavens, the red light, which illuminated the mountains, formed a magnificent, as well as terrific sight. About midnight, the frigate Iris, with several thousand barrels of powder blew up with a dreadful explosion, and shortly after, the fire-ship met with the same fate. The republicans who crowded to the harbor's edge were driven back by the burning cinders, while the loss of their vessels filled them with the most indignant fury. The scene which occurred upon the embarkation of the last columns of the allied troops, no pen can describe. It was of the utmost horror. Cries, lamentations, and screams, were heard in every direction, even on the opposite side of the harbor. A few who had favored the royal cause, and neglected to leave in the first embarkation, flew to the beach, and with tears and prayers implored aid from their British friends. Mothers, with their little ones pressed to their bosoms, helpless children, and still more helpless old men, were seen stretching their hands toward the harbor, and even rushing into the waves to escape the cruel death that awaited them. Some seized such boats as they could find, and, without oars, followed after the vessels. Sir Sydney Smith with great humanity, instantly suspended his retreat, until every individual was removed from the strand, and the whole number saved in this manner was nearly 15,000. The destruction of the vessels in the basin before the town was intrusted to the Spanish officers, but they lacking courage to perform their work, eleven frigates, and seven ships of the line were saved to the republic. These, with five ships of the line, were all that remained of thirty-one ships of the line, and twenty-five frigates, which were lying in the harbor of Toulon, at the time it fell into the hands of the allies. Three ships and three frigates were brought away uninjured, and were taken into the English service; the whole number taken and destroyed was eighteen ships of the line, nine frigates, and eleven corvettes.

The sufferings of the poor Toulonese were now truly horrible. They were left to the mercy of soldiers and the galley-slaves, who had been let loose upon the city, and their brutality was only checked by the citizens redeeming themselves by the payment of the enormous sum of £176,000. Dugommier did all in his power to check the brutality of the soldiers, and mitigate the severity of the Convention toward the inhabitants. Several thousand citizens, in a few weeks, perished by the sword or the guillotine; two hundred were beheaded daily, and twelve thousand men were employed to destroy the buildings of the city. The Convention was inexorable; nothing could put a stop to their cruelties. On the motion of Barere, one of its members, it was decreed that the name of Toulon should be changed to Port de la Montagne, that the houses should be demolished, and nothing left but the naval and military establishments. The inhumanities of Lyons were imitated in a fearful manner, and in a few weeks, of ten thousand persons, eight hundred had been cut off. This was the termination of one of the most remarkable campaigns in the history of France, perhaps in the history of the world. A revolt, apparently destined to sever the richer cities of the south from the dominion of the republic; a civil war, which consumed the vitals of the western provinces, an invasion which had broken through the iron barrier of the northern, and shaken the strength of the eastern frontier, were all defeated. The discomfited English had retired from Toulon, the Prussians in confusion had recrossed the Rhine, the conquerors in the north were silenced, and the valor of the Vendeans irretrievably quenched.

TOULOUSE, B.C. 106.—In the year of Rome 646, Cepio, a man so covetous of wealth as to think both peculation and sacrilege justifiable in the pursuit of it, was sent into Transalpine Gaul. This general commenced his operations by attacking Tolosa, now Toulouse. The Roman garrison had been placed in irons. Cepio was admitted by treachery into the city, which he delivered up to pillage. Nothing was spared, sacred or profane; all became the property of the soldiery. It is said that the consul's share of the booty amounted to nearly two millions sterling, principally taken from the temples.

SECOND SIEGE, A.D. 1217.—The next siege of Toulouse is connected with one of the blackest pages in human history, the horrid war, or crusade against the Albigeois. The licentiousness of the clergy and the barefaced venality and ambition of the hierarchy led people to look with jealousy at the doctrines by which these men supported their influence, and the consequence necessarily was, that many seceded from the Church, and formed sects, or shades of belief, according to their intelligence, or perhaps passions. This, in fact, was the commencement of the Reformation, which, though kept under by the power of the Church, silently but unceasingly worked its way, till the ostentatious extravagance of Leo X. and the exasperated genius of Luther, nearly three hundred years after, brought it to a head. The rich provinces of the south of France were the first melancholy scenes of the series of persecutions, under the name of a religion of peace, which have since, in wars, assassinations, and autos-da-fé, in dungeons and inquisitions, tortures and the stake, disgraced humanity.

Raymond, Count of Toulouse, was the richest prince in Europe when Innocent III. set on the dogs of rapine, by preaching a crusade against him and his beautiful country. In the crusades to the Holy Land many more had been attracted by the fabulous accounts of the riches of the East, than by any care about the redemption of the holy places, so, in this European crusade, the wealth of Toulouse was the principal incentive to the adventurers who flocked to the plunder. At that period, individual enterprise was perhaps stronger than at any other; a prince of Lorraine had become King of Jerusalem; a high-sounding title, though barren of every thing but care; a few Norman knights had made themselves masters of Sicily and of part of the south of Italy. William of Normandy and his wonderful success were not forgotten; so that, directly there was a chance of territorial plunder, particularly under the sanction of the Church, the unscrupulous, restless, needy spirits of the age were all roused to action, and eager to obtain the first prize. One of the worst of this class, Simon de Montfort, was the leader of this infamous league. A French author describing him, says, "he would have been the hero of his age if he had not been ambitious, barbarous, perfidious, and revengeful." Plutarch would never have introduced the word hero, as in any way compatible with such a character. And here we take leave to warn our young readers against the partiality they may conceive for Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, who figured in the reign of Henry III., from reading a pleasing tale by Mr. James. His De Montfort is a fiction, the real man was of the same character as his father; he was an adventurer, and his quarry was England, as Toulouse had been that of his predecessor.

In vain Count Raymond, the sovereign of the unfortunate Albigeois, endeavored to defend them; he was crushed beneath the same anathema, and was obliged to fly before De Montfort. Subdued, a wanderer, and a proscribed heretic, the count was reduced to the most deplorable condition, and abandoned Toulouse to the conqueror. The Toulousians gave up their city very unwillingly. Suffering under the odious yoke, they recalled their ancient master. Montfort informed of this revolution, hastened to the scene of action, came to the walls, and endeavored to enter by the Nalbonnais Castle. But he there found intrepid warriors and impregnable fortifications. Finding his first attack, from which he had expected much, fail, he commenced the siege in form; he fought several bloody battles, made many terrible assaults, and spared neither fatigue nor stratagem for more than four months. But he made himself master of the place by means of a horrible piece of treachery, devised and executed by Bishop Foulquet. The latter proposed to all the inhabitants, in the name of the God of peace, to go forth and meet De Montfort, for the purpose of coming to terms. That atrocious commander received them at the head of his knights, and made prisoners of most of them. The war, however, continued with various success, and Toulouse was again in the hands of the inhabitants. While besieging it this scourge was removed by a death he merited. An enormous stone, cast from a mangonel, and aimed by a woman, struck him senseless to the earth. He was borne to his tent, and expired almost immediately. Thus, like Pyrrhus, perished the ever infamous Simon de Montfort, by an ignoble missile, launched by a woman.

Count Raymond, who was very aged, shortly after died, and the priests refused his body sepulture; his coffin remained for many years outside the door of a church. His toleration was his principal crime in the eyes of his clerical persecutors; a great part of his misfortunes may be attributed to the weakness of his character, but far more to the attractions held out to unscrupulous adventurers by his wealth. We have omitted the siege of Bèzieres, having neither space nor inclination to dwell upon this horrible page of history.

On the 10th of April, 1814, a battle was fought near Toulouse between the French army under Marshal Soult, and the English under the Duke of Wellington. Our space forbids an extended description of this engagement. The battle was obstinate and bloody, and finally resulted in the defeat of the French.

TOURNAI, A.D. 438.—Toward the middle of the 5th century, Clodio, first of the race of Merovingian kings of the Franks in Gaul, entered Belgium, surprised the Roman troops, defeated them, and laid siege to Tournai, even then a powerful city. But it could not withstand the conqueror long; he took it and gave it up to pillage.

SECOND SIEGE, A.D. 1340.—After the naval victory gained by Edward III. of England, near Ecluce, that prince presented himself before Tournai. French authors say his army amounted to 120,000 men, which appears an immense number for that period; but Edward was assisted by so many Belgians, and other nations at feud with France, that his forces were great, though principally composed of foreigners. Proud of his strength, he feared no obstacles. But Godemar Dufay, the governor of the city, had prepared for a long defense, and Edward's plans being known, Dufay had a numerous and well-disciplined garrison. He was likewise assured of the good-will of the inhabitants, and was seconded by the élite of the chivalry of France. Philip VI. soon came himself to animate his brave subjects, and with several battalions, encamped between Lille and Douay. As soon as he began operations, Edward became aware of the rashness of his enterprise; and he sent a challenge to the French king to fight him in single combat, a hundred against a hundred, or in a general battle. This letter was addressed to Philip de Valois, without any other title. Philip replied, "A letter has been brought to our camp, addressed to Philip de Valois, in which letter were several requests which you make to the said Philip de Valois. As it is not for us, we do not reply to it; but we take advantage of the coming of your herald to remind you that you are our liegeman; that by attacking us, and raising the cities of Flanders against their count and against us, their sovereign and yours, you commit an act of rebellion, perjury, and felony, and for which, with the help of God, we hope to subdue you and to punish you. Besides, you propose a duel on very unequal terms; you offer to hazard your own person only against both the kingdom of France and the person of its king. If you will increase the stake, and put also the kingdom of England on the issue of that duel, we will, though the terms would be then very unequal, willingly accept of the challenge." All this was intended, no doubt, to stimulate the troops on both sides; we do not believe that either of these royal heroes was in earnest. Both sides were tired of the contest, after a siege of about twelve weeks. The inhabitants grew short of provisions, and Edward's forces decreased daily by death and desertion. In this situation they listened to the friendly intercession of Joan, Countess dowager of Hainault; a truce was concluded, and Tournai was saved.

Dazzled with the glories of Crecy and Poitiers, the English are accustomed to be proud of the reign of Edward III., that "mighty victor, mighty lord:" whereas few events in their history produced more or longer-endured misery to two great countries than Edward's unjust claim to the crown of France; unjust, because it was in opposition to the laws of that country, by which all such cases must be settled. This calamitous war lasted a hundred years, and, we have no doubt, by the enmity being thus carried down from father to son, created that singular antipathy between two neighboring nations, which is perhaps being removed by their present Alliance. The astonishing victories, which cast so much glory on one period of the reign of Edward III. appear to have dazzled the eyes both of his subjects and foreigners, but the disasters which clouded the evening of his life, proved that his ambition was greater than his judgment.

THIRD SIEGE, A.D. 1513.—Henry VIII., King of England, in his famous expedition into France, attacked Therouanne, a town situated on the frontiers of Picardy. This siege is chiefly remarkable for the manner in which Fontrailles, a French officer, contrived to bring in a supply of provisions and ammunition. Henry and his nobles, together with the Emperor Maximilian, who was with the English army, carried on the siege so languidly, that the town was more in danger from famine than from its foes. The above-named officer appeared at the head of 800 horsemen, each of whom carried a sack of gunpowder behind him and two quarters of bacon. With this small force he made a sudden irruption into the English camp, and advanced to the fosse of the town, where each horseman threw down his burden. They immediately returned at the gallop, and were so fortunate as again to break through the English, and to suffer little or no loss. But the English had soon their revenge. The famous battle of Guinegate shortly followed, in which the French made such good use of their spurs, and in which the pride of their chivalry, Bayard, Bussy d'Amboise, Clermont, Imbrecourt, and others were taken prisoners. After this defeat, Henry made the mistake of returning to the siege of so inconsiderable a town as Terouanne. The place capitulated, and he demolished the fortifications. The army then advanced against Tournai.

This city, by its ancient charters, was exempt from the burden of a garrison, and when Louis XII. sent to ask them if they needed troops to defend their city, they made this boastful and silly reply: "Tournai est tourné, et jamais n'a tourné, et encore ne tournera. Si les Anglais viennent, ils trouveront à qui parler"—(Tournay is turned, and never has turned, and, still further, never will turn. If the English come, they will find somebody to speak to). And so the burgesses undertook the defense themselves. But the fate of Terouanne alarmed them, and in a very short time the place was surrendered. Over its gates was engraved this proud motto: "Tu n'as jamais perdu ta verginité." Never having been taken, it was what is called a maiden city; which honor is now lost. One of our countrymen, who was always anxiously looking out for personal advantages, derived benefit from this capture. The bishop of Tournai was lately dead; and although a new bishop was elected, he was not installed; so the king bestowed the administration of the see upon his favorite, Wolsey, and put him in immediate possession of the revenues.

Fourth Siege, A.D. 1581.—At this date Tournai was besieged by Spanish forces under the command of the Prince of Parma. The Seigneur d'Etréel commanded in the city, but his garrison was weak. The citizens, for the most part Protestants, were obliged to perform the duties of soldiers. The Spanish general invested the place, and formed the attack on the side where the ditch is dry, opposite the longest of the curtains, between the gates of St. Martin, and of Valenciennes, which was defended by a salient ravelin and a large platform. As soon as the trenches were opened, three batteries were established against these three works. The besieged kept up a warm fire from the tops of the bulwarks, and signalized themselves by some vigorous sorties. The Princess d'Epinoi, the wife of the governor, who filled with distinction the place of her husband, inflamed their ardor, and acquitted herself with incredible energy of all the functions of a most vigilant commander. The Prince of Parma made all haste to terminate the approaches, in order to get at the body of the place. It required but few days to carry the trenches to a great length. His batteries played furiously. He debouched in the fosse; it being dry, he carried, without trouble, the mine up to the wall, which, by both sapping and mining, was speedily brought down. The defenders of Tournai, redoubling their ardor, opposed fresh barriers to the Spanish impetuosity, and presented themselves wherever the danger was most imminent. At the end of a few days, the breach was found large enough to give an assault. It was given. The resistance and the attack were equally murderous. In the midst of the combatants the Princess d'Epinoi was particularly conspicuous. Nothing could resist the power of her arm. Flying in the face of peril and death, she continued to cry to the soldiers: "It is I; it is the wife of your governor who marches at your head, and braves death for the service of her country. Follow my example. I would rather quit life than the breach!" She spoke, and rushed amid the carnage. She was wounded in the arm. The sight of her blood only animates her: she redoubles her efforts; all fly, all disperse before her. The besieged, zealous to imitate her, eagerly follow her, and fight with such ardor, that the Spaniards are repulsed and retreat, after having lost a vast number of men. The hopes of prompt succor alone supported the citizens of Tournai; but as soon as they found their expectations frustrated, they perceived it was impossible to defend themselves longer, and resolved to surrender. On the 29th of November, the garrison was permitted to march out, with its arms and its baggage. The city redeemed itself from pillage; and the intrepid Amazon who had so bravely defended it, left Tournai, with her arm still in a scarf, amid the enthusiastic acclamations of the royal army, and, in some sort, with all the appearance of a glorious triumph.

Fifth Siege, A.D. 1667.—No monarch ever went to war more wantonly and unnecessarily than Louis XIV. Inflated with vanity and self-love, intoxicated with flattery, he seemed to look upon military glory as the only thing wanting to his fame and happiness. But never did monarch receive a much stronger rebuke from an overruling Providence! He was taught that the prosperity of nations is not to be trifled with for the gratification of one man's pride; and the wars he undertook so rashly and wickedly proved to be the sources of misery to which his arrogant self-sufficiency would have led him to believe he could not be subjected.

In 1666, Louis XIV. lost his mother, Anne of Austria; Philip IV., her father, had died the preceding year. When Louis married Maria Theresa, that princess had formally renounced all right of succession to Spain or the Austrian dominions; but Louis, now heedless of this renunciation, immediately laid claim to Flanders, to the exclusion of Charles II., the minor son of Philip IV. The pretense he assigned was, that the queen's dowry not having been paid, her renunciation was null and void, and he invoked a custom of Brabant, by which the eldest daughters inherited in preference to younger sons. He supported these claims by a numerous army; won over the Emperor Leopold, by giving him hopes he might share the spoils of Charles II., and took the field at the head of his household. Turenne commanded under him; Vauban, and his minister Louvois, accompanied him. We have often, when contemplating this siege of Tournai, wondered what Louis could really think of himself—what he imagined his position actually was in the scale of humanity. He proceeded to the infliction of war upon an unoffending people—of war, the direst evil we know or can fancy—with all the "pride, pomp and circumstance" of a barbarous Eastern despot. Darius, when he met Alexander, was scarcely surrounded with so much splendor, and perhaps not so many indulgent comforts, and what is still more striking, did not in the eyes of his people so completely violate all that the civilized world deems moral or worthy of being an example. He was accompanied by his queen and his then adored mistress, the fascinating Montespan, with whom he lived in a state of double adultery.

His court was with him in all its splendor; he had his historian to record the exploits of his generals and his armies, and his poets to sing his praises and attribute every success to his divine presence. Here was a beleaguered town, suffering all the horrors of a siege, with almost the certainty of being taken; there was an army appearing to invade the rights of another nation in mere wantonness, indulging in voluptuous vice, and, in contrast with the town, passing its nights in festivity, song, music and dancing; vice and cruelty, pleasure and suffering, throwing each other into the strongest relief.

Louis's army consisted of 35,000 men. It was on this occasion that the minister Louvois introduced the improvement of supporting armies by magazines. Whatever siege the king undertook, to whichever side he directed his arms, supplies of all kinds were ready, the lodgings of the troops were provided, and the marches regulated. The king had only to present himself before the cities of Flanders to subdue them: he entered Charleroi as he would have entered Paris; Bergues-Saint-Veux, Ath, Furnes, Armentière, and Coutrai, opened their gates at the approach of the French battalions. Tournai showed signs of resistance. It was besieged in form, the artillery brought to bear upon it, and two days after the trenches had been opened, it capitulated. The citadel was then closely pressed, and that likewise surrendered on the morrow. The conqueror had both city and citadel fortified; and Mégrigni made the latter, of which he was governor, one of the best places in Europe.

Sixth Siege, A.D. 1745.—Louis XV. opened the campaign of 1745 by the siege of Tournai. The conquest of the place was of the greatest importance, and the allies prepared to defend it. Having been conquered on the plains of Fontenoi, they abandoned both this and several other fortresses bathed by the Dender and the Scheld. The garrison, composed of eleven battalions and a regiment of cavalry, retired into the citadel; but it was so warmly pressed, that in less than three weeks it capitulated.

Seventh Siege, A.D. 1792.—General Bourdonnaye entered Tournai in 1792, after the battle of Jemappes.

Eighth Siege, A.D. 1793.—Upon the defeat of Dumourier, in Belgium, the avant-garde of the Austrians, which followed the retrograde movement of the French army, re-entered Tournai on the 30th of April, 1793.

Ninth Siege, A.D. 1794.—At the commencement of the campaign of 1794, General Pichegru made every possible effort to approach Tournai and besiege it in regular form, but all in vain; he, on every occasion, had to contend with troops superior to his own, beneath its walls. When, however, he had gained several victories, and the imperialists had been conquered at Fleuris, the allies withdrew from Tournai, which fell into the hands of the French.—Robson.

TOURS, A.D. 732.—Between Tours and Poictiers, in France, lays a broad tract of champaign country, composed principally of a succession of rich pasture lands, which are traversed by several streams, tributaries of the river Loire. This region has been signalized by more than one memorable battle; but it is principally interesting by having been the scene of the great victory won by Charles Martel over the Saracens A.D. 732, which gave a decisive check to the career of Arab conquest in western Europe, rescued Christendom from Islam, preserved the relics of ancient, and the germs of modern civilization, and re-established the old superiority of the BATTLE OF TOURS. Page 640.

Indo-European over the Semitic family of mankind.*

The Saracens under their great leader, Abderame, had crossed the Pyrences; had passed the Rhone, and laid siege to Arles, and had defeated with great slaughter a Christian army which had marched to the relief of Arles. The army of the Saracen chief was no less successful on the side of the ocean. He had passed, without opposition, the Garonne and Dardogne, which unite their waters in the gulf of Bordeaux; but he had found beyond those waters the camp of the intrepid Endes, who had formed a second army, and sustained a second defeat, so fatal to the Christians, that, according to their sad confession, God alone knew how many had been slain. The victorious Saracen overrun the provinces of Aquitania, whose Gallic names are disguised rather than lost in the modern appellations of Perigord, Saintonge, and Poitou; his standards were planted on the walls, or at least before the gates of Tours and of Sens; and his detachments overspread the kingdom of Burgundy, as far as the well-known cities of Lyons and Besançon. The memory of these devastations, for Abderame did not spare the country or the people, was long preserved by tradition, and the invasion of France by the Moors or Mohammedans affords the groundwork of those fables which have been so wildly disfigured in the romances of chivalry, and so elegantly adorned by the Italian muse. In the decline of society and art, the deserted cities could supply a slender booty to the Saracens; their richest spoils were found in the churches and monasteries, which they stripped of their ornaments and delivered to the flames. A victorious line of march had been prolonged above a thousand miles from the rock of Gibraltar to the banks of the Loire; the repetition of an equal space would have carried the Saracens to the confines of Poland and the Highlands of Scotland; the Rhine is not more impassable than the Nile or Euphrates, and the Arabian fleet might have sailed without a naval combat into the mouth of the Thames. Perhaps the interpretation of the Koran would now be taught in the schools of Oxford, and her pupils might demonstrate to a circumcised people the sanctity of the truth of the revelation of Mohammed.†

From such calamities was Christendom delivered by the genius and fortune of one man. Charles, the illegitimate son of the elder Pepin, was content with the titles of Mayor or Duke of the Franks; but he deserved to become the father of a line of kings. In a laborious administration of twenty-four years he restored and supported the dignity of the throne, and the rebels of Germany and Gaul were successively crushed by the activity of a warrior who, in the same campaign, could display his banner on the Elbe, the Rhone, and the shores of the ocean. In the public danger he was summoned by the voice of his country, and his rival, the Duke of Aquitain, was reduced to appear among the fugitives and supplicants. "Alas!" exclaimed the Franks, "what a misfortune! what an indignity! We have long heard of the name and conquests of the Arabs; we were apprehensive of their attack from the East; they have now conquered Spain, and invade our country on the side of the west. Yet their numbers, and (since they have no bucklers) their arms are inferior to our own." "If you follow my advice," replied the prudent mayor of the palace, "you will not interrupt their march, nor precipitate your attack. They are like a torrent which it is dangerous to stem in its career. The thirst of riches, and the consciousness of success, redouble their valor, and valor is of more avail than arms or numbers. Be patient till they have loaded themselves with the encumbrance of wealth. The possession of wealth will divide their councils, and assure your victory." This subtle policy is, perhaps, a refinement of the Arabian writer's;* and

* Creasy.

† Gibbon's sneering remark, that if the Saracen conquest had not been checked, "perhaps the interpretation of the Koran would now be taught in the schools of Oxford, and her pulpits might demonstrate to a circumcised people the sanctity of the truth of the revelation of Mohammed," has almost an air of regret.—Creasy.

Gibbon himself, in a foot-note, disproves the truth of Mr. Creasy's surmise.

* "Prosperity," says an Arabian writer, "made the Arabians insatiable. * * * All the nations of the Franks trembled at the terrible army, and they betook them to their king, Caldus, and told him of the havoc made by the Moslem's horsemen; and how they rode at their will through all the land of Narbonne, Toulouse, and Bordeaux. Then the king bade them be of good cheer, and offered to aid them. And in the 114th year (of the Hegira), he mounted his horse, and he took with him a host that could not be numbered, and went against the Moslems. And he came upon them at the great city of Tours. And Abderrahman and other prudent cavaliers saw the disorder of the Moslem troops, who were loaded with spoil; but they did not venture to displease the soldiers by ordering them to abandon every thing except their arms and war-horses. And Abderrahman trusted in the valor of his soldiers, and in the good fortune which had ever attended him. But such defect of discipline always is fatal to armies. So Abderrahman and his host attacked Tours to gain still more spoils, and they fought against it so fiercely that they stormed the city almost before the very eyes of those that had come to save it; and the fury and the cruelty of the Moslems toward the city was like the fury and cruelty of raging tigers. It was manifest that God's chastisement was sure to follow such extremes; and Fortune thereupon turned her back upon the Moslems. Near the river Owar (probably the Loire), the two great hosts of the two languages, and the two creeds, were set in array against each other. The hearts of Abderrahman, his captains, and his men, were filled with pride and wrath, and they were the first to begin the fight. The Moslem horsemen dashed fierce and frequent forward against the battalions of the Franks, who resisted manfully, and many fell dead on either side, until the going down of the sun. Night parted the two armies; but in the gray of the morning the Moslems returned to the battle.

the situation of Charles will suggest a more narrow and selfish motive of procrastination—the secret desire of humbling the pride and wasting the provinces of the rebel Duke of Aquitain. It is yet more probable that the delays of Charles were inevitable and reluctant. A standing army was unknown under the first and second race; more than half the kingdom was now in the hands of the Saracens; according to their respective situation, the Franks of Neustria and Austria were too conscious or too careless of the impending danger; and the voluntary aids of the Gepidæ and Germans were separated by a long interval from the standard of the Christian general. No sooner had he collected his forces than he sought and found the enemy in the center of France, between Tours and Poitiers. His well-conducted march was covered by a range of hills, and Abderame appears to have been surprised by his unexpected presence. The nations of Asia, Africa, and Europe advanced with equal ardor to an encounter which would change the history of the world.

In the six first days of desultory combat, the horsemen and archers of the east maintained their advantage; but in the closer onset on the seventh day, the Orientals were oppressed by the strength and stature of the Germans, who with stout hearts and iron hands, asserted the civil and religious liberty of their posterity. The epithet of Martel, the Hammer, which has been added to the name of Charles, is expressive of his weighty and irresistible strokes;* the valor of Eudes was excited by resentment and emulation, and their companions in the eye of history are the true Peers and Palladins of French chivalry. After a bloody field, in which Abderame was slain, the Saracens in the close of the evening retired for the night. In the disorder and dispair of the night the various tribes of Yemen and Damascus, of Africa and Spain, were provoked to turn their arms against each other: the remains of their host were suddenly dissolved, and each emir consulted his safety by a hasty and separate retreat. At the dawn of the day, the stillness of the hostile camp was suspected by the victorious Christians: on the report of the spies, they ventured to explore the riches of the vacant tents; but, if we except some celebrated relics, a small portion of the spoil was returned to the innocent and lawful owners. The joyful tidings were soon diffused over the Catholic world, and the monks of Italy could affirm and believe that 350,000 or 375,000 of the Mohammedans perished by the hammer of Charles, while no more than 1,500 Christians were slain in the field of Tours. But this incredible tale is sufficiently disproved by the caution of the French general, who apprehended the snares and accidents of a pursuit, and dismissed his German allies to their native forests. The inactivity of a conqueror betrays the loss of strength and blood, and the most cruel execution is inflicted, not in the ranks of battle, but on the backs of a flying enemy. Yet the victory of the Franks was complete and final. Aquitain was recovered by the arms of Eudes; the Arabs never resumed the conquest of Gaul, and they were soon driven beyond the Pyrenees by Charles Martel, and his valiant race.—Gibbon.

Their cavaliers had soon hewn their way into the center of the Christian host. But many of the Moslems were fearful for the safety of the spoil which they had stored in their tents, and a false cry arose in their ranks that some of the enemy were plundering their camp; whereupon several squadrons of the Moslem horsemen rode off to protect their tents But it seemed as if they fled; and all the host was troubled. And while Abderrahman strove to check their tumult, and to lead them back to battle, the warriors of the Franks came around him, and he was pierced through with many spears, so that he died. Then all the host fled before the enemy, and many died in the flight. This deadly defeat of the Moslems, and the loss of the great leader and good cavalier Abderrahman, took place in the 115th year." Such is the Arabian account, according to Creasy, of the battle of Tours.—ED.

* The war-god of the creed of the forefathers of Charles, is also sometimes called Thor with the hammer The hammer was Thor's favorite weapon; and was possessed of magical powers; whencver its owner cast it from his hand, after inflicting the blow, it returned to his grasp again of its own accord. It is reported that Charles used a weapon of this description at the battle of Tours.—ED.

TOWTON, A.D. 1461.—On the 29th of March, 1461, a bloody battle was fought near Towton, in England, between the armies of the houses of York (Edward IV.) and Lancaster (Henry VI.) This great battle is supposed to be the most fierce and bloody that ever happened in any domestic war. The soldiers, animated with that hatred and animosity which only a civil war can engender, fought with a fury and obstinacy on both sides rarely equaled. At length the army of Henry VI. were defeated, after sustaining a loss of 37,000 men. Edward issued orders to give no quarter, and the most merciless slaughter took place. Henry was made prisoner, and confined in the Tower; and his queen Margaret fled to Flanders.

When Edward IV. assumed the title of King of England, he was not ignorant that he held it by a very precarious tenure. The losses and advantages of both parties, the houses of York and Lancaster were nearly balanced, and if he was acknowledged by the southern, his rival could depend on the support of the northern counties. The Earl of Warwick, anxious to bring the question to an issue, marched from London at the head of a body of veterans; Edward in a few days followed with the main army; and by the time of his arrival at Pontefract, 49,000 men had arrayed themselves under his banner. The preparations of the house of Lancaster were equally formidable. The Duke of Somerset with 60,000 infantry and cavalry lay in the neighborhood of York; and Queen Margaret, who with her husband (Henry VI.) and son, had consented to remain within the city, employed all her address to confirm their loyalty, and animate their courage. Both armies advanced toward Ferrybridge. The passage had been gained on the part of Edward, by Lord Fitzwalter; but that nobleman was slain by Lord Clifford, who, within a few hours, met on the same spot with a similar fate from Lord Falconberg. The next day, (the 29th of March, 1461), between the villages of Towton and Saxton was fought a battle which fixed the crown on the brow of Edward. The engagement began in the morning, amid a heavy fall of snow; the obstinacy of the combatants protracted it till three in the afternoon. At that hour the Lancasterians began to give way, at first, leisurely, and in good order; but finding their retreat interrupted by the river Cock, they abandoned themselves to despair, and while some plunged into the torrent, others offered themselves without resistance to the swords of the enemy. Edward had forbidden his followers to give quarter, and as the pursuit and slaughter continued all the night, and a great part of the following day, one half of the Lancasterians are said to have perished. The Earl of Northumberland, and six barons fell in the battle; the Earls of Devon and Wiltshire were taken in their flight, and beheaded. The Dukes of Somerset and Exeter had the good fortune to reach York, and conducted Henry and his family to the borders. The victory was decisive; but it cost the nation a deluge of blood. Beside those who perished in the waters, a cotemporary writer assures us that 37,000 men lay dead on the field of strife. Edward returned to London, where the ceremony of his coronation took place soon afterward.

TREBIA, B.C. 217.—Trebia is the modern as well as the ancient name of a stream in Italy, which rises in the Apennines, and is composed of a multitude of torrents, which, when swollen by the melted snows, accumulated during the winter among the ridges of the Apennines, form a stream of more than a mile broad, and of vast rapidity. During the summer months its channel is almost dry. It empties into the river Po, near Placenza.

The Roman army, under the command of Sempronius, who had been called into Italy from Sicily, when Hannibal entered the former country, was encamped on the banks of the river Trebia. Hannibal, after defeating Scipio at the battle of Ticinus, advanced toward the Roman camp, and encamped with his army on the opposite bank of the river. The armies lying so near one another gave occasion to frequent skirmishes, in one of which Sempronius, at the head of a body of horse, gained a slight advantage over a body of Carthaginians. This inconsiderable success seemed to him a complete victory. So elated was he that he boasted that he had revived the courage of the Romans, which they had lost in the battle of Ticinus, and he determined at once to attack the enemy, in defiance to Scipio's advice to the contrary. His army consisted of 16,000 Romans, and 20,000 allies, exclusive of his cavalry. The troops of the enemy amounted to nearly the same number. Upon learning that the Romans were about to attack him, Hannibal ordered Mago, one of his generals, to lie in ambush, with 2,000 men, consisting of horse and foot, on the steep banks of a small rivulet which ran between the two camps. He then caused a detachment of Numidian cavalry to cross the Trebia, with orders to advance as far as the very barriers of the enemy's camp, in order to provoke them to fight, and then to retreat in order to draw the Romans after them. What Hannibal had foreseen came directly to pass. Sempronius, prompted more by eager courage than by slow discretion, detached his whole cavalry against the Numidians, and then 6,000 light-armed troops, who were soon followed by all the rest of the army. The Numidians fled as they were directed by Hannibal. The Romans, certain of an easy victory, followed, and plunging into the river, which was swollen with the torrents that had fallen in the night from the neighboring mountains, they waded up to their very armpits in the rushing water across the stream. It was in the month of December; the day was bitter cold, and the snow fell incessantly. The Romans had left their camp fasting, whereas the Carthaginians had, by Hannibal's order, eaten and drunk plentifully in their tents; had rubbed themselves with oil, and had warmed their armor before fires in their tents before they put it on. No sooner had the Romans reached the opposite bank of the river than they were attacked by the enemy. The Romans defended themselves with desperate valor; but, half exhausted with cold, hunger, and the fatiguing passage over the river, their cavalry was soon broken by the Carthaginians, and put to flight. The infantry soon were in disorder also. At a proper time the soldiers in the ambuscade rushed forth, and suddenly fell upon the rear of the Roman army. Their overthrow was now complete. A body of 10,000 Romans resolutely fought their way through the Gauls and Africans, of whom they made a dreadful slaughter; but as they could neither assist their friends nor return to their camp, as the way to it was cut off by the Numidian horse, they retreated in good order to Placentia. The most of the rest were slain on the banks of the river, being trampled to death by the elephants and horses of the Carthaginians. Those who escaped joined those that had retired to Placentia. The Carthaginians gained a complete victory, and their loss was inconsiderable, except that a great number of their horses and elephants were destroyed by the cold, the rain, and the snow. Of the elephants they saved but one only. See Battles of Ticinus, Thrasymenus, and Cannæ.

A.D. 1799.—The battle of the Trebia, between the allied army of Russia and Austria and the republican forces of France, was of three days' duration. The French occupied a plain which was intersected by the rivers Nura, Trebia, and Tidone. The larger part of their forces were on the Nura, and were commanded by Macdonald; the divisions of Victor, Dombrowsky, and Rusca were in advance on the Trebbia, and their orders were to cross the stream, in order to overthrow the Austrian forces, with Suwarrow at their head, stationed behind the Tidone. Accordingly, early on the morning of the 17th of June, the republicans crossed both the Trebia and Tidone, and fell upon the imperialists with such force, that soon they were driven back in disorder; but Suwarrow, judging from the loud sound of the cannonading which was taking place, sent Chartellar with the advanced guard of the main army to their relief, and thus affairs were speedily changed. The Austrians rallied, and commenced a fierce attack on the division of Victor, while the Russian infantry, under Bagrathion, supported the left of the imperialists. Soon after, Dombrowsky, by a sudden movement, brought up his Polish division, captured eight pieces of cannon, and pushed forward to Caramel; but at this critical moment Suwarrow ordered a charge in flank by Prince Gortschakoff, with two regiments of Cossacks and four battalions, while Ott attacked them in front. This movement proved decisive; the Poles were routed, and fled in confusion over the Tidone. During this time the right of the republicans, composed of Victor's division, withstood all the efforts of Bagrathion, and was advancing along the Po to gain possession of the bridge St. Giovanni, when the rout of Dombrowsky's division caused them to retire. Their retreat was conducted in good order till the retiring columns were charged by the Cossacks, who had routed the Poles; in vain the French formed squares, and received their enemy with a heavy fire; they were broken, great part cut to pieces, and the remainder fled in disorder over the Trebia. The Russians, in the ardor of pursuit, plunged into the stream; but so destructive was the fire from the batteries of the French on the other side, that they were compelled to return with great loss; and the hostile armies encamped for the night on ground, which nineteen hundred years before was occupied by the troops of Hannibal and the Roman legions.

Suwarrow, during the night, brought up all his forces, and, encouraged by his success on the preceding day, formed his plans for a general action. He concluded that Macdonald's principal object would be to maintain his present position in the mountains, as it afforded him communication with Moreau, consequently, he directed toward his own right, by which that quarter was to be attacked, his best infantry, consisting of the divisions of Bagrathion and Schwickousky, under the orders of Prince Rosenberg. These troops were commanded to pass the Trebia, and advance by Lettimo to St. Georgia, on the Aura, in order to interpose between the French left and the mountains. The center was headed by Melas, supported by a powerful reserve under Fraelich, while Ott, with a small body formed the left, and was established on the high road to Placentia. Suwarrow's general instructions to the army were, to fight in large masses, and as much as possible with the bayonet. Macdonald, not supposing that the battle would occur until the day following, had only the divisions of Victor, Dombrowsky, and Rusca, with the brigade of Salin in position on the Trebia; those of Olivier and Montrichard could not arrive in town till noon. At six o'clock a furious action commenced between the troops of Bagrathion and Victor's division, which formed the extreme left of the French, and rested on the mountains. The French general, seeing an attack was certain, crossed the Trebia, and advanced against the enemy. A bloody battle took place on the ground intersected by the Torridella, till at length, toward the close of the day, the steady courage of the Russians prevailed, and the French were driven with great slaughter over the Trebia, followed by the allies, who advanced as far as Lettimo. Salin's division, which formed the right of the French, retreated with difficulty across the river. In the middle of the day the divisions Olivier and Montrichard arrived to support the center; but nothing was gained by them, and as night approached they retired over the river, which again formed the line of separation between the hostile armies. Both parties being worn out with fatigue, lay down around their watch-fires, on opposite shores of the gravelly bed of the Trebia. The corps of Rosenberg only had crossed the stream, and reached Lettimo, in the rear of the French lines; but, becoming uneasy at being separated from the remainder of the army, and ignorant of the great advantages of its position, passed an anxious night in square, with the cavalry bridled and the men sleeping on their guns, and before the break of day, withdrew to the side of the river occupied by the Russians. Toward midnight, three battalions of the French, being misled by false reports, entered, in disorder, into the bed of the Trebia, and opened a fire of musketry upon the Russian videttes, which caused both armies to start to arms; the horse on both sides rushed into the river; the artillery played without distinguishing, on friends and foes, and an uncommon spectacle was witnessed of a combat by moonlight, and both forces more than knee deep in water. After a time the officers succeeded in stopping this useless butchery, and the two armies, separated only by a stream, were soon asleep within a few yards of each other, and surrounded by the dead and dying.

For a third time the sun rose on this scene of destruction, yet neither party showed any disposition to end the battle. Suwarrow, reinforced by five battalions and six squadrons, which had come up from the other side of the Po, again strengthened his right and ordered Rosenberg to press vigorously on in his quarter, and directed Melas to stand ready to support him with the reserve. Time was of great value; even an hour's delay was not to be thought of, for the Russian general knew that Moreau had left his position on the Apennines, that the opposing force was not sufficient to oppose his progress, and he was in momentary expectation of hearing the distant sound of his cannon in the rear of the army. Every thing, therefore, depended on a vigorous prosecution of the advantages already gained, so as to render the co-operation of the two French armies impossible. On the side of the republicans, Macdonald had collected all his troops, and expecting the arrival of Moreau, on the next day, resolved to resume the offensive. His plan was to turn at once both flanks of the enemy, an operation always hazardous, unless conducted by a greatly superior army, by reason of the dispersion of force which is required, and doubly so in this case, from the great danger he ran of one of his wings being driven into the Po. Dombrowsky was to commence the action by moving in the direction of Nivian, to outflank the corps of Rosenberg, while Rusca and Victor attacked it in front. Olivier and Montrichard were to force the passages of the river in the center, while the extreme right, consisting of the brigade of Salin and the reserve of Watrin, were to drive back the left of the Russians by interposing between it and the river Po. Owing to the great fatigue of the men, the action was not resumed until ten o'clock. Suwarrow was just beginning to get his troops in motion when the French appeared in two lines on the opposite shore of the Trebia, with the intervals between the columns filled with cavalry, and the first column hurriedly crossed the stream, with the water nearly up to the necks of the soldiers, and fiercely advanced to the attack. The Russian right was soon outflanked by Dombrowsky; and Suwarrow, seeing the danger in that direction, ordered the division Bagrathion to throw back its right, so as to face the enemy, and after a fierce combat, succeeded in driving the Poles over the river. But by this measure he uncovered the flank of the division Schwickousky, and it was speedily enveloped by Victor and Rusca, driven back to Casaleggio, and only owed its safety to the invincible firmness of the Russian infantry, who formed square, faced about on all sides, and by a continued fire maintained their position till Bagrathion came up in their rear, and Chastelbac brought up four battalions to attack them in front. The Poles, discouraged by their defeat, remained inactive, and after a bloody strife the French were overthrown, and Victor and Rusca driven with a severe loss over the Trebia. In the center Olivier and Montrichard had crossed the river and attacked the Austrians under Melas, took a few pieces of artillery, and threw the line into confusion. Montrichard was advancing against the division Forster, in the middle of the Russian line, when the Prince of Lichtenstein, at the head of the reserve, comprising the flower of the allied army, suddenly fell upon their flank when already disordered by success, and threw them into confusion which soon increased into a defeat by the heavy fire of Forster on the other side. This decided the fate of the day. Forster was now able to come to the assistance of Suwarrow on the right: the reserve supported Melas, who had been ordered in the same direction. The Prince Lichtenstein charged the division of Olivier with such force, that he was compelled to retire across the river. Watrin advanced along the Po at the extreme left of the allied army, without meeting any resistance; but he was at last obliged to retreat to avoid being cut off and driven into the river by the victorious center. Being left master of the left bank of the river, Suwarrow made several attempts to cross it; but he was repulsed by the firmness of the French reserves, and night again fell upon this scene of carnage. The battle of Trebia was the most strongly contested, and the most bloody, of all that had been fought since the commencement of the war, since out of 36,000 men in the field, the French, in three days, had lost more than 12,000 in killed and wounded, and the allies about the same number. Although the losses were nearly equal on both sides, the relative situations of the parties were very different at the close of the strife. The allies were expecting large reinforcements, which would make good the number lost; while the French had exhausted their last reserves, were discouraged by defeat, and had no second army to fall back upon in their distress. These considerations determined Macdonald; and, accordingly, he decamped during the night over the Nura, and marched toward the Apennines by the valley of Taro.

TRENTON, A.D. 1776.—This city is the capital of the State of New Jersey, and is situated on the Delaware river, about thirty miles north-east from Philadelphia, and fifty-seven miles south-west of New York. The Assunpink creek separates the city proper from South Trenton; and the former villages of Bloomsbury, Lamberton, and Mill Hill, have been incorporated with the borough of South Trenton.

In the early part of the month of December, 1776, Trenton was occupied by 1,500 Hessians, under Colonel Rall, and a body of British light horse. Newark, New Brunswick, Princeton, Mount Holly, Burlington, Black Horse, and Bordentown, were also occupied by detachments of the British army. Indeed, nearly 4,000 German and English troops were placed in cantonments along the New Jersey shore of the Delaware river, from Trenton to Burlington, and Prineeton and New Brunswick were occupied by strong British detachments. The whole British army in New Jersey was under the command of Lord Cornwallis. Meanwhile Washington, with the American army, was at Newtown, a small village about two miles from the Delaware, north of Bristol. The American general was actively engaged in strengthening his army, and by the offer of liberal bounties, and under the influence of a stirring appeal put forth by Congress, recruits constantly flowed to Washington's standard. He was joined almost simultaneously by Lee's detachment under Sullivan, and another from Ticonderoga, and on the 24th of December, he found himself at the head of nearly 5,000 effective troops. Washington resolved to surprise the enemy at Trenton. The British posts at Mount Holly, Burlington, Black Horse, and Bordentown, were to be attacked at the same time by the Pennsylvania militia, under Generals Cadwallader and Ewing. The former was to cross the Delaware near Bristol the latter below Trenton Falls. Meanwhile, Washington, in person, was to take command of the main body of the army, assisted by Generals Greene and Sullivan, and Colonel Knox, and was to cross the Delaware at McConkey's Ferry, and advance against the enemy at Trenton. General Putnam, who had been informed of Washington's intention to attack Trenton, sent Colonel Griffin with 450 men, from Philadelphia into New Jersey, with orders to proceed to Mount Holly, for the purpose of attracting the attention of Colonel Donop at Bordentown. He was directed not to hazard a battle but to retreat down the river on the appearance of the enemy. This movement produced the desired effect. Donop, instead of remaining in Bordentown to support Rall at Trenton, allowed himself to be drawn in pursuit of the Americans, and he did not return until too late to be of any assistance. Washington chose the night of Christmas for the expedition against Trenton. He was well acquainted with the habit of the Germans of celebrating that day with feasting and drinking, and therefore thought that many of the Hessian soldiers would be almost helpless from the effects of intemperance. At dusk on the evening of the 25th of December, the Americans paraded at McConkey's Ferry (now Taylorsville), and, in three columns marched toward the river. Washington had hoped to be at Trenton by midnight; but the extreme cold weather of the preceding twenty-four hours had thrown serious obstacles in his path. The river was full of masses of floating ice; the night was dark, and a heavy storm of sleet and snow arising, the general was doubtful whether he could effect a crossing at all. The troops embarked early in the evening in boats and batteaux, and commenced the perilous voyage. Whole hours were consumed in the passage; they did not reach the western bank till nearly four o'clock in the morning. The troops were here separated into two divisions, one of which, under Sullivan, turning to the right, marched toward Trenton by the road which was along the river; the other, led by Washington in person, with Lord Stirling, Greene, Mercer, and Stevens, took the upper or Pennington road. The distance by both these routes was nearly equal, and the commander-in-chief ordered both divisions immediately on forcing the outguards, to push directly into the town, and charge the enemy before they had time to form. Both divisions marched so silently that they advanced to within a short distance of the picket guards on the outskirts of the city, before they were discovered by the enemy. The two parties encountered the British outposts at the same time, and a sharp skirmish ensued. The British pickets were soon driven into the town, closely pursued by the Americans. The drums of the Hessians sounded to arms, and in a few moments

Colonel Rall marshaled his troops into battle order. A portion of Washington's troops pushed down King (now Warren) street, and a part down Queen (now Greene) street, Sullivan's division passed through Second and Front-streets. The enemy were thus hemmed in by the Assumpink, a small stream running through the town on the south, and the American army. Captain Forest planted a six-gun battery at the head of King-street; and opened it upon the enemy. The Hessians advanced to form a battery in the same street; but Captain William Washington and Lieutenant James Monroe, perceiving their design, rushed forward with a small party, and fell furiously upon the artillerymen, driving them from their pieces and capturing two of the pieces just as the gunners were about to fire. Captain Washington was afterward highly distinguished as a colonel of dragoons in the campaigns of the South. Lieutenant Monroe was afterward President of the United States. They were both wounded while performing the gallant exploit.

Colonel Rall, having formed his men for action, advanced to drive back the enemy; but the Americans advancing steadily, poured close and well-directed fires in upon the Hessians, thinning their ranks and throwing them into disorder. At length Colonel Rall fell from his horse mortally wounded. He was borne to his quarters and Colonel Scheffer, his next in command, assumed the control of his troops. The Americans now charged the Hessians with the utmost fury; the latter fled in disorder, and attempted to escape by the road to Princeton. Their retreat was cut off, however, by a body of Pennsylvania riflemen under Captain Hand. The Germans, ignorant of the weakness of the force that opposod them, threw down their arms and cried quarter. The English light horse and some infantry fled to Bordentown at the first alarm. These troops would also have fallen into the hands of the Americans, had General Ewing succeeded in crossing the Delaware at Trenton, as previously arranged. The troops under Donop at Bordentown might also have been captured had not the ice prevented him from crossing the river at Bristol, with his whole force. When a portion of his infantry had reached the west bank, it was found impossible to advance with the artillery, he therefore ordered them back, and abandoned the enterprise. Washington's victory at Trenton was decisive. The Americans lost in the engagement only two men killed, and two frozen to death. The enemy lost thirty privates and six officers killed, and 23 officers and 886 men made prisoners. The number of prisoners swelled to over 1,000, when all those were collected who had concealed themselves in the houses of the town. Six brass field-pieces, 1,000 stand of arms, and four standards, fell into the hands of the victors as trophies. As the American force was not sufficient to cope with those which the English had in the vicinity, Washington thought it prudent to evacuate Trenton, and accordingly passed over the river into Pennsylvania with his prisoners and trophies. At midnight of the day of victory, the whole army was encamped in their old quarters at McConkey's Ferry. Upon receiving intelligence of the disaster at Trenton, all the British and Hessians at Bordentown retreated to Princeton, with the exception of a few that fled toward South Amboy and Brunswick. On the 27th of December Washington was vested by Congress with all the powers of a Dictator, and he received from Robert Morris, the great patriotic financier of the Revolution, a seasonable supply of money. Inspired by his victory at Trenton, and finding his army hopeful and much strengthened by new recruits and reinforcements, Washington resolved to resume the offensive. On the 30th of December he re-crossed the Delaware, and took possession of Trenton. On the 2d of January 1777, having received intelligence that Cornwallis with a strong force was approaching from Princeton, he encamped on the south side of the Assunpink, (now in South Trenton) upon some high ground extending toward the east from a small bridge that spanned the creek. On the same day Cornwallis marched with the van guard of the British army, toward Trenton where he arrived at about four o'clock in the afternoon. The rear guard of his army was posted at Maidenhead, about half way between Princeton and Trenton. Other British regiments were on their march from New Brunswick to reinforce the main body of the army. Washington had sent out strong parties under General Greene to harass the troops of Cornwallis on their march; but the enemy pressed steadily forward driving the Americans before them, until they reached Trenton, where the patriots with some difficulty succeeded in rejoining the main body of their army. The Americans numbered about 5,000 men, the British army was of about the same strength. Washington immediately set about intrenching himself, having first strongly guarded the bridge with artillery. Cornwallis formed his army in solid columns, and marching down Queen-street, attempted to force the bridge, but his troops were unable to breast the tempest which swept it from end to end, from the American artillery. A strong detachment also attempted to ford the stream; but they were driven back by a vigorous fire of small arms and cannon. Both parties maintained a vigorous cannonade until nightfall; the Americans stood firm; and the British although they made further and repeated efforts to effect a passage were invariably driven back. At each repulse a loud shout rang along the American lines, and at length Cornwallis, believing their force to be much greater than it really was, resolved to discontinue hostilities and await the arrival of reinforcements in the morning. The American army was now in a critical situation. Cornwallis evidently meditated a general engagement on the next day, and in such an event the Americans would undoubtedly suffer a defeat. A council of war was held. At first it was proposed either to retreat down the Delaware, and cross the river at Philadelphia or hazard a battle. Both of these expedients were deemed dangerous. Washington then advanced a proposal as bold as it was brilliant. He resolved to abandon the banks of the Delaware and carry the war into the very heart of New Jersey. He proposed to withdraw silently from the Assunpink, and by a circuitous route, to advance against Princeton, to capture the troops at that place, and if possible to seize upon the stores of the enemy at New Brunswick. This proposition was received favorably; but the ground owing to a recent thaw was too soft to admit of an easy transit of the artillery. This difficulty was soon overcome, for while the council was in session, the wind changed to the north-west, and a sharp frost set in; so that in the course of two hours the ground was as hard as stone. At one o'clock in the morning Washington stealthily withdrew with his army from Trenton, and advanced toward Princeton, ten miles distant, by a new road, in order to await the rear guard of the enemy at Maidenhead, which lay on the direct road to Princeton. The baggage was sent down to Burlington. Washington ordered his camp-fires to be kept burning, and the sentinels to make their accustomed rounds during the night. At daybreak, the patrols and those who fed the fires, were directed to retreat hastily to the main body. Cornwallis was certain of victory on the following day; but how great was his astonishment and dismay when he found the patriot camp-fires still burning, but the camp itself silent and deserted. None could tell in which direction the Americans had retreated, until suddenly the boom of cannon and the din of strife in the direction of Princeton fell upon their ears. Cornwallis thought it was the rumbling of distant thunder; but General Erskine, decided otherwise. "To arms, general!" he exclaimed, "Washington has out-generaled us. Let us fly to the rescue at Princeton!"

TRIPOLI, A.D. 1108.—Tripoli, or Tarablus, a seaport town of Syria, was taken by the Crusaders in 1108. Previous to this it had been one of the most flourishing seats of Oriental literature, and possessed a large collection of the works of Persian and Arabic writers. It is stated that 100 copyists were constantly kept employed copying manuscripts, and that the princes of Tripoli were in the habit of sending messengers into foreign countries to discover and purchase rare and valuable works. Unfortunately, however, this extensive and precious collection, amounting, it is said to 100,000 volumes, was destroyed by the Crusaders, who displayed the same fanatical zeal, of which they accused the Arabs in the destruction of the Alexandrine library. A priest in the suite of Count Bertrand de St. Giles, having visited an apartment of the library in which were a number of duplicate copies of the Koran, reported that it contained none but the impious works of Mohammed, and that, consequently, it should be destroyed. And as a matter of course, it was forthwith set on fire!

The operations of the American government against Tripoli, the capital of the country of Tripoli, in the northern part of Africa, do not come within the plan of our work. In a future volume which will contain descriptions of naval engagements, they will be found recorded under their proper head.

TRIPOLITZA, A.D. 1821. — Tripolitza, a town of Greece, during the Greek revolution was taken in 1821, by the Greeks, by storm. The conquerors sacked the place mercilessly. In 1828, it was taken by the army of Ibrahim Pasha, who razed it to the ground. It has recovered from the blow, and is now a flourishing place.

TROY, B.C. 1184.—The site of the ancient city of Troy is supposed to have been on an eminence, at the southern extremity of the plain of Troy, nine miles south-east of the entrance of the Hellespont from the Ægean sea, near the modern town of Boonarbashi, in Asia Minor.

This siege is the most celebrated in history or fiction, not so much on its own account, as from its good fortune in having the greatest poet the world has produced as its chronicler. If Homer had not placed this great siege in the regions of fable by his introductions of immortals into the action, it would still be a myth, as is all we know of Greece at the period at which it took place. Hypercritics have, indeed, endeavored to make over the whole of it to the muses who preside over fiction; but we can not accede to their decision. There is a vital reality in the characters of Homer, which proves that they did exist and act; a blind old bard might sing the deeds of heroes, and perhaps clothe those deeds with some of the splendor of his genius; but we have no faith in his having created the men, any more than he did the immortals who belonged to the mythology of his country long before he was born. We have as perfect faith in the history of the siege of Troy, as in most of the pages of what has been termed the "great lie." Independently of the work of genius forever associated with it, the siege of Troy is a memorable epoch in human annals.

Tyndarus, the ninth King of Lacedæmon, had, by Leda, Castor and Pollux, who were twins, beside Helena, and Clytemnestra, the wife of Agamemnon, King of Mycenæ. Having survived his two sons, the twins, he became anxious for a successor, and sought for a suitable husband for his daughter Helena. All the suitors bound themselves by oath, to abide by the decision of the lady, who chose Menelaus, King of Sparta. She had not, however, lived above three years with her husband, before she was carried off by Alexander or Paris, son of Priam, King of the Trojans. In consequence of this elopement, Menelaus called upon the rulers of the European states of Greece, and more particularly upon those who had been candidates for her hand, to avenge this Asiatic outrage. All answered to the summons, though some, like Ulysses, unwillingly. As every one knows, the siege lasted ten years; which only goes to prove the discordant parts of which the besieging army was composed: had there been union beneath a completely acknowledged head, the city could not have held out so long by many years. But Agamemnon was like Godfrey of Bouillon in the Crusades—he was only a nominal chief, without a particle of real power over the fiery and rude leaders of the troops of adventurers composing the army. This necessity for union is the principal lesson derived by posterity from the siege of Troy; but to the Asiatics of the period, it must have been a premonitory warning of what they had to dread from the growing power of the Greeks. Divested of fable, and as many of the contradictions removed as possible, we believe the above to be the most trustworthy account of this celebrated affair—no one would think of going into the details, after Homer. According to Bishop Ussher, the most safe chronological guide, the siege of Troy took place 1184 years before the birth of Christ, about the time that Jephtha ruled over the Jews.

TROYES, A.D. 1429.—The city of Troyes in France, is situated on the Seine, ninety miles east of Paris. In the year 889, it was taken and burned by the Normans; and in 1415, it was captured by the Duke of Burgundy. Fourteen years afterward, in 1429, it was the scene of one of the most daring exploits of the heroine Joan of Arc.

The Maid of Orleans had announced that her mission was confined to two objects—the deliverance of Orleans, and the consecration of the king at Rheims. After having gloriously fulfilled her first promise, she employed the ascendancy she had acquired to execute the second. Although the city of Rheims, and all the country from Chinon, where the king then resided, was in the power of the English, the French set forward on their march, with an army of 12,000 men. All the cities in their route opened their gates to them, with the exception of Troyes, which endeavored to arrest their progress. A council of war being called, Joan confidently assured them, that within three days, the king should be received in Troyes.

"Say seven days, Joan," cried the Archbishop of Rheims, "say seven, Joan; and we shall be right glad to see your prediction fulfilled."

"Before three days are over," exclaimed the maid, "I tell you the king will be master of Troyes."

They prepared for the attack. Joan appeared before the ramparts, advanced to the edge of the fosses, planted her banner, and called aloud for fascines to fill them up. Terror instantly seized the besieged; they believed their city taken, although there was yet no breach. They capitulated; and Charles entered triumphantly into that city, where, eight years before, his ruin had been comtemplated, by excluding him from the throne. After the reduction of Troyes, Rheims was eager to receive the monarch, who repaired thither on the 27th of July, 1429, and was consecrated the next day.—Robson.

TUDELA, A.D. 1808.—Near Tudela, in Spain, in the year 1808, a battle was fought between the armies of France and Spain, which resulted in the total defeat of the Spaniards.

TUNIS ,B.C. 334.—The mercenaries employed by Carthage for its defense not receiving their pay, revolted, to the number of 100,000, and took possession of Tunis, of which they made a place of arms. During three years they had great advantages over the Carthaginians, and several times appeared before the gates of Carthage, with a threat of besieging it. At length Amilcar Barca was placed at the head of the troops of the republic; and this general surprised the army of the rebels, and besieged them in their camp. The famine soon became so terrible that they were constrained to eat each other. After having suffered for a long time, they gave up their leaders, who were put to death. Amilcar afterward marched straight to Tunis, where the rest of the rebels were, under the command of a seditious chief named Mathos.

Tunis was carried, all the rebels were killed, and Mathos, their leader, terminated, by a shameful death, a life stained by barbarous cruelties.

Second Siege, A.D. 1159.—Abdoulmoumen had rendered himself redoutable by his victories, and the whole of northern Africa trembled before this terrible and fortunate leader. Tunis alone was free; it seemed to brave the conqueror, who threatened its ramparts. The Arab monarch was anxious to subdue this proud city. As, in order to approach it, it was necessary to cross vast deserts, he gathered together great masses of corn, which he caused to be buried in wells upon the route he was to take. He left Morocco at the head of 100,000 men, and summoned the governor to surrender. This nobleman, faithful to the King of Sicily, his master, replied by a vigorous sortie, in which the barbarians were repulsed. This first success announced a continuation of triumphs; but, in the night, 17 of the principal inhabitants escaped from the city, and offered to open the gates to Abdoulmoumen. This infamous treachery rendered that prince master of a place which might have defied all his efforts.

Third Siege, A.D. 1270.—The numberless disasters which accompanied the first expedition of Louis IX. against the infidels, had not at all abated the ardor of that monarch, and he never laid down the cross after his return from Palestine. The sad news which he daily received from thence only served to inflame his zeal the more; and at length, in 1270, he resolved to make fresh efforts to liberate the Holy City, and the unfortunate Christians it contained, from the yoke of the Mussulmans. Most of his nobles were eager to accompany their prince, the faithful Joinville being almost the only one who refused to share the perils of his good lord and master. He said, in full assembly, that the last crusade had ruined him; and that the king could not be advised to undertake this new expedition, without his counselors incurring mortal sin. The good seneschal was so weak and debilitated that he could not bear the weight of his harness, or get on horseback. The French army, consisting of 60,000 men, embarked at Aigues-Mortes, on the first of July. They steered toward the coast of Barbary, where they soon arrived.

On the western coast of Africa, opposite Sicily, is a peninsula, whose circumference is about 42 miles. This peninsula advances into the sea between two gulfs, of which the one on the west offers a commodious port. The other, between the east and the south, communicates, by a canal, with a lake which extends three leagues into the land, and which modern geographers call the Gouletta. It was there that stood the great rival of Rome, spreading itself to the two shores of the sea. The conquests of the Romans, the ravages even of the Vandals, had not utterly destroyed the once proud city of Carthage; but in the seventh century, after being invaded and desolated by the Saracens, it became little more than a heap of ruins; a hamlet upon the port, called Marsa, a tower on the point of the cape, a tolerably strong castle upon the hill of Byrsa—this was all that remained of that city whose power dominated so long over the Mediterranean and the coasts of Asia and Africa, and contended in three wars with Rome for empire and glory.

At five leagues' distance from this remarkable site, toward the south-east, a little beyond the Gouletta, stands Tunis, a place so ancient that Scipio made himself master of it before he attacked Carthage. At the time of Louis's invasion, Tunis was one of the most flourishing cities of Africa. It contained 10,000 houses, and three large faubourgs; the spoils of nations, the produce of an immense commerce had enriched it, and all that the art of fortification could invent, had been employed in defending the access to it.

At the sight of the Christian fleet, the inhabitants of the coast of Africa were seized with terror, and all who dwelt on the Carthage coast fled away either toward the mountains or Tunis, abandoning several vessels in the port. The officer sent by the king to reconnoiter, reported that there was no living being on the strand or in the port, and that no time was to be lost. But the king was made over-prudent by the remembrance of past disasters, and it was determined not to land till the morrow.

The next day, at dawn, the coast appeared covered with Saracens, most of them on horseback. This did not at all delay the landing of the Crusaders. At the approach of the Christians, instead of opposing them, the multitude of Saracens disappeared, which, for the former, was a most fortunate circumstance, for, according to an eye-witness, they were in such disorder that 100 men might have stopped the whole army.

When the army had landed, it was drawn up in order of battle, and, according to the laws of war, a herald read with a loud voice a proclamation by which the conquerors took possession of the territory. Louis himself had drawn up this proclamation, which began with these words: "Je vous dis le ban de notre Seigneur Jésus Christ, et de Louis, roi de France, son sergent."

The baggage, provisions, and munitions of war were landed. A vast inclosure was marked out, and the tents were pitched. While employed in the ditches and intrenchments, to defend the army from a surprise, a party was sent to take possession of the tower at the point of the cape. The next day 500 sailors planted the standard of the lilies upon the castle of Carthage. The hamlet of Marsa, which was close to the castle, falling at the same time into the hands of the Crusaders, they sent their women and children thither, and the army remained under canvas.

Louis IX. had formed a strange idea that he could convert the inhabitants of Tunis; but this pious illusion soon faded away. The Mussulman prince replied to his proposal, that he would come and meet him at the head of 100,000 men, and would ask baptism of him on the field of battle; the Moorish king added, that he had arrested all the Christians residing in his states, and that every one should be massacred if the Christian army dared to insult his capital.

These bravadoes had no effect upon Louis; the Moors inspired no terrors, and did not conceal their own fears at the sight of the Crusaders. Never venturing to face their enemy, their bands, sometimes scattered, hovered about the Christian army, seeking to surprise wanderers from the camp; and sometimes united, they fell upon the advanced posts, launched a few arrows, just exhibited their naked swords, and then relied upon the swiftness of their horses for safety. They often had recourse to treachery: three of them came to the Christian camp, and said they wished to embrace the Christian faith; and a hundred others followed them, expressing the same intention. They were received with open arms; but, watching their opportunity, they fell, sword in hand, upon some unguarded Frenchmen; but upon the alarm being given were surrounded, and most of them killed. The three first-comers threw themselves on their knees, and implored the compassion of the chiefs. The contempt such enemies were held in obtained their pardon, and they were kicked out of the camp.

Rendered bold by the inactivity of the Christian army, the Mussulmans at length presented themselves several times in the plains. Nothing would have been more easy than to attack and conquer them, but Louis had resolved to await the arrival of his brother, Charles of Anjou, before he began the war; a fatal resolution that ruined every thing. The Sicilian monarch, who had principally promoted this ill-starred expedition, was doomed to complete by his delay the evil he had commenced by his counsels.

So much time being afforded them, the Mussulmans flocked from all parts of Africa to defend the cause of Islamism. Thus the army of the Moors became formidable; but it was not this crowd of Saracens that the Crusaders had most to fear. Other dangers, other misfortunes threatened them: the army wanted water; they had none but salt provisions; the soldiers could not support the climate of Africa; winds prevailed which, coming from the torrid zone, appeared to be accompanied by a devouring flame. The Saracens, on the neighboring mountains, stirred up the sand with certain instruments, and the hot dust fell in clouds upon the plain where the Christians were encamped. At length dysentery, the malady of hot climates, attacked them, and the plague, which seemed to spring up of itself from the burning soil, spread its contagion among them.

The men were under arms night and day, not to defend themselves against an enemy who always ran away, but to avoid surprises. Most of the Crusaders sunk under the awful combination of fatigue, famine, and sickness. Some of the most renowned warriors of France fell a prey to the one or the other. They could not bury the dead; the ditches of the camp were filled with carcasses, thrown in pêle-mêle, which added to the corruption of the air and the spectacle of the general desolation.

Information was brought that the King of Sicily was about to embark with his army. This gave great joy, but did not mitigate the evils. The heats became insupportable; want of water, bad food, the diseases, and chagrin at being shut up in a camp without being allowed to fight, completed the discouragement of both soldiers and leaders. Louis endeavored to animate them by his words and his example, but he himself was seized with the dysentery. His sons, Prince Philip, the Duke de Nevers, and the King of Navarre, with the legate, all experienced the effects of the contagion. The Duke de Nevers, who was much beloved by the king, was so dangerously ill that he was transported on ship-board. Louis was constantly asking news of his son, but his attendants preserved a mournful silence. At length it was announced to the king that his son was dead, and, notwithstanding his piety and resignation, he was deeply affected. A short time after, the pope's legate died, much regretted by the clergy and the soldiers of the cross, who looked upon him as their spiritual father.

In spite of his sufferings, in spite of his griefs, Louis was constantly engaged in the care of his army. He issued his orders as long as he had strength, dividing his time between the duties of a Christian and those of a monarch. At length the fever increased; no longer able to attend to the wants of the army, or even to exercises of piety, he had a crucifix placed before him, and in silence implored the aid of Him who had suffered for mankind.

The whole army was in mourning; the commonest soldiers moved about in tears; the prayers of all were offered up for the preservation of so good a king. After giving most pious and salutary advice to his son Philip, both as a man and a king, and after taking an affectionate leave of his family, this good, religious, and exemplary man, but most mistaken monarch, expired at three o'clock in the evening of the 25th of August, 1270.

On the very day of the death of Louis IX., his brother, the Duke of Anjou, landed with his army near Carthage. The trumpets and instruments of war resounded on the beach, but a solemn silence prevailed in the camp, and no one went to meet the Sicilians, whom they had looked for with so much impatience. Sad presentiments took possession of Charles. He preceded his army, flew to the tent of his brother, and found his body stretched upon its bed of ashes. Charles prostrated himself at his feet, which he bathed with his tears, calling upon him sometimes as his brother, sometimes as his lord. He remained in this attitude a long while, without heeding any of the persons who surrounded him, constantly addressing Louis as if he was living, and reproaching himself in accents of despair for not having heard, for not having imbibed the last words of the most affectionate of brothers, of the best of kings.

The death of Louis restored the confidence of the Saracens; they took the mourning they observed in the camp for discouragement, and flattered themselves with an approaching triumph over their enemies. But their hopes were of very short existence. During the sickness of Philip, now king, Charles of Anjou took the command of the army, and renewed the war with spirit. The soldiers he had brought with him were eager for battle, the diseases became less violent, and the Crusaders, so long confined to their camp, revived at the idea of the perils of war. Several battles were fought round the lake of Gouletta, which it was necessary for them to possess before they could invest Tunis. The Moors, who, only a few days before, had threatened the Christians with extermination or slavery, could not stand for a moment the shock of the Christian chivalry; not unfrequently the arbalisters were sufficient to disperse innumerable multitudes. Horrible howlings, the noise of drums and other loud instruments, announced their approach; clouds of dust, pouring down from the neighboring heights, announced their retreat and concealed their flight. In two renconters, however, they were caught, and left a great number of dead on the field. Another time their camp was seized and plundered. The sovereign of Tunis could not depend upon his army for the defense of his states, and he himself gave no example of bravery or conduct to his soldiers. He remained constantly in subterranean grottoes, to escape at once from the burning rays of the sun and the perils of the fight. Pressed by his fears, he saw no safety but in peace, and resolved to purchase it, if at the expense of all his treasures. His embassadors came to the camp several times, charged with proposals, and were directed particularly to endeavor to seduce the King of Sicily. The Tunisian monarch was cunning and fortunate in this idea; venality was the weak side of Charles, and the other Crusaders were not immaculate in that respect. After much debating in the Christian council, a truce for ten years was signed, on the 31st of October, between the leaders of the crusade and the King of Tunis. All prisoners were to be restored on both sides, and all the Christians previously in chains were to be set at liberty. The sovereign of Tunis engaged not to require of the Franks any of the duties imposed in his kingdom upon foreign commerce. The treaty granted all Christians the faculty of residing in the states of Tunis, with permission to build churches, and even preach their faith. The Mussulman prince was to pay an annual tribute of 40,000 golden crowns to the King of Sicily, and 210,000 ounces of gold for the expenses of the war to the leaders of the Christian army.

This was all in favor of the King of Sicily, and loud murmurs soon arose in the army. But what must have been the feelings of a real hero when he came among them? By an agreement with Louis, Edward of England was to take part in this expedition, and arrived in the camp only a few days after the signing of the truce, with the Crusaders of England and Scotland. The French and Sicilians were prodigal in their demonstrations of welcome and respect, and received him with great honors; but when he learned they had made such a disgraceful peace, he retired to his tent, and refused to be present at any of the councils of the Christian leaders.

The Crusaders became impatient to leave this arid and unhealthy soil, and the army embarked for Sicily. But as if this expedition was doomed to be unfortunate, a violent tempest overtook the fleet when about to enter the port of Trapani. Eighteen large ships and 4,000 Crusaders were submerged, and perished in the waves. Most of the leaders lost their arms, their horses, and their equipments. But as the crowning misfortune, and as if to point out the will of Heaven in the case, the whole of the money paid by the King of Tunis went to the bottom.

Of all this vaunted expedition, Edward of England was the only leader who kept his word and followed up his purpose. He went to Palestine in the spring, and, as every reader of history knows, distinguished himself there greatly. Edward I., when prince, may be said to have been the last Crusader of royal rank who appeared in Palestine. Here let me remark an inadvertency I was about to commit; I wrote Edward, prince of Wales, whereas his son, Edward of Caernarvon, was the first eldest son of English kings who bore that title. This is a common error with us: Shakspeare calls Louis, the father of Louis IX., dauphin when prince, whereas that title did not belong to the sons of French monarchs till more than a hundred years after Louis's invasion of England.

Fourth Siege, A.D. 1535.—Muley-Hassan, King of Tunis, driven from his states by Barbarossa, the terror of the Mediterranean, came to implore aid of Charles V. That prince, touched by the prayers of the Barbary monarch, swore to replace him on his throne. He assembled a fleet of 300 ships, on board of which were 25,000 foot and 2,000 horse, set sail from Cagliari, and arrived at Porto-Farina, formerly Utica. As that port was not very secure, the fleet again weighed anchor, and brought to within cannon-shot of the Gouletta. The whole Christian army landed without the least opposition on the part of the Mussulmans. The generals pitched their tents between Carthage and the Water Tower, and surrounded it with wide deep lines, fortified with redoubts. This was the exact spot on which Louis IX. had formerly placed his camp. The trenches were opened, and three batteries were raised against the fortress. While the place was being cannonaded by land, the galleys advanced by turns and delivered their broadsides; the grand caique of Malta and Portuguese galleon destroyed a part of the fortifications and dismounted the batteries of the town. The place being open in several places, it was determined to carry it by the sword. The Christians mounted to the assault, forced the breaches, gained the bulwarks and the top of the tower, and took possession of them. Chasse-Diable, and Sinan the Jew, leaders of the defenders of the Gouletta, being unable to resist the imperial conquerors, retired into Tunis where their arrival spread terror and despair. The emperor entered this fortress, followed by Muley-Hassan, to whom he said, "This is the door by which you will re-enter your states."

Barbarossa was terrified at the successes of Charles V. With the Gouletta he lost eighty-seven galleys, and more than 300 pieces of bronze ordnance, inclosed in that citadel. He held a council with the Turks, and pointed out to them the dangers to which they were exposed. They had two enemies equally to fear—the inhabitants and the Arabs, who detested their domination; the 23,000 Christian slaves in Tunis must necessarily be expected to revolt, and open the gates to the Spaniards. With regard to these slaves, he declared he was resolved to put them all to death. Sinan the Jew represented to Barbarossa that he would render himself odious to all nations; that he would lose the ransom of the most considerable of the slaves, and that he must not have recourse to such a cruel measure till the last extremity. Barbarossa consented to suspend the horrible project he had formed; but he had the slaves loaded with fresh chains, shut them up in the castle, and placed under them a number of barrels of gunpowder. He passed the rest of the night in an agony of fear and hope, and in expectation of the day which was to decide his fate. He left Tunis the next morning, at the head of 80,000 men, and encamped in a plain a full league from the city.

The two armies were soon in face of each other. The Arabs at first attacked the Christians with great spirit; but scarcely had they sustained the first discharge of the artillery, then they broke their ranks, and drew with them the Moors, and even the Turks. Barbarossa did his utmost to rally them, but they were deaf to his voice, and only took counsel of the terror with which they were seized. Barbarossa, trembling with rage, sounded a retreat, rallied the fugitives, and passed the night under arms beneath the walls of the city. While he was deliberating if he should go and again offer battle to the Christians, or shut himself up in Tunis, some Turks came to inform him that the slaves had broken their chains, and had made themselves masters of the castle. Barbarossa hastened thither, and was met by musket-shots and a shower of stones. Transported with fury he cried out all was lost, as the slaves were masters of the castle and of his treasures. He immediately left Tunis at the head of a body of Turks, and contrived to place himself in safety.

The emperor was ignorant of this revolution; on approaching Tunis he was informed of it by some Moors. In an instant the imperialists dispersed themselves throughout the city, massacred all who came in their way, carried off all the women and children that were reserved for slavery, and abandoned themselves to all the excesses which accompany cruelty, avarice, and lubricity. The booty was so considerable that there was not a single soldier who did not make his fortune. It is said that more than 200,000 persons perished in the sack of this unfortunate city; some expired under the sword of the conqueror; others, thinking to avoid death by flight, met with it in the burning sands of the deserts, where they died consumed by heat and thirst.

The emperor, master of Tunis, re-established Muley-Hassan on his throne; but that unfortunate prince did not enjoy it long. Muly-Hameda, his eldest son, tore the diadem from his head; Hameda himself was deposed by his uncle Abdoumelek, afterward recalled by his subjects. After having gone through these various changes, he reigned peaceably till the year 1570, when Ulachali, Dey of Algiers, one of the successors of Barbarossa, took possession of the kingdom of Tunis, which became nothing but a nest of pirates.

TURIN.—Turin, in Sardinia, is a very antient city. It was made a military station by Julius Cæsar on his invasion of Gaul. In 312 Constantine, Emperor of Rome, defeated the army of Maxentius near Turin, and it was taken and sacked by the Goths under Alaric. In 1536 it was taken by the army of Francis I., and it was held by the French for twenty-six years. In 1640 it was also taken by the French. But the most famous of its sieges took place in 1706, when it was invested by a powerful French army. The besiegers made immense preparations; but the incapacity and disagreement of the French generals, and the skill of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Savoy, secured to the troops of the latter an easy and complete victory. All the vast stores accumulated by the French army during the siege fell into the hands of the conquerors, and the besieging army was totally dispersed.

A.D., 1706.—Louis XIV. having recalled the Duke of Vendôme from Italy, to place him at the head of the troops in Flanders, substituted for him the Duke de la Feuillade, the son of the famous marshal who erected a statue to his king in the Place des Victoires. Some few attacks had been already made upon Turin. La Feuillade continued them with an army of forty-six squadrons and a hundred battalions. He hoped to take this city, and, as his reward, looked for a marshal's baton. The minister Chamillard, his father-in-law, who was very partial to him, spared no means to secure him the victory. "The imagination," says Voltaire, "is terrified at the preparations for this siege. Readers not accustomed to enter into these matters, will perhaps be glad to find here of what these immense and useless preparations consisted.

"A hundred and forty pieces of cannon were brought up, and it is to be observed that each mounted cannon costs about two thousand crowns. There were a hundred and ten thousand cannon-balls, a hundred and six thousand cartridges of one fashion, and three hundred thousand of another, twenty-one thousand bombs, twenty-seven thousand seven hundred grenades, fifteen thousand sacks of earth, thirty thousand pioneering instruments, and twelve hundred thousand pounds of powder. Add to these munitions lead, iron, and tin, cordage, every thing required by miners, such as sulphur, saltpèter, and tools of all kinds. It is certain that the cost of all these preparations for destruction would suffice for the foundation and the prosperity of a numerous colony. Every siege of a great city requires equally enormous expenses, and yet when a ruined village at home stands in need of repair, it is neglected.

"The Duke de la Feuillade, full of ardor and activity, more capable than most persons of enterprises which only demand courage, but incapable of such as require skill, thought, and time, pressed on the siege against all rules. The Marshal de Vauban, the only general, perhaps, who loved the state better than himself, had proposed to the Duke de la Feuillade to come and direct the siege as an engineer, and to serve in his army as a volunteer; but the haughty De la Feuillade took the offers of Vauban for pride concealed under the mask of modesty. He was weak enough to be piqued because the best engineer in Europe offered to give him advice. He wrote, in a letter which I have seen: 'I hope to take Turin à la Cohorn.'

"This Cohorn was the Vauban of the allies—a good engineer, a good general, who had more than once taken places fortified by Vauban. After writing such a letter, Turin ought to have been taken. But, having attacked it by the citaded, which was the strongest side, and not having surrounded the whole city, succors and provisions had free entrance. The Duke of Savoy could come out when he pleased; and the more impetuosity the Duke de la Feuillade exhibited in his reiterated and fruitless attacks, the longer the siege seemed protracted. The Duke of Savoy left the city with some troops of cavalry, for the purpose of deceiving De la Feuillade. The latter abandoned the siege to run after the prince who, being better acquainted with the country, escaped the pursuit. La Feuillade missed the Duke of Savoy, and the siege stood still during his absence.

"In the mean time, after the departure of the Duke de Vendôme, the Duke of Orleans, nephew to the king, came to take command of the troops of observation. He could not prevent Prince Eugene from joining the Duke of Savoy near Asti. This junction compelled him to unite with the Duke de la Feuillade, and to enter the camp before Turin. There were but two parts to take; that of waiting for Prince Eugene in the lines of circumvallation, or that of going to meet him while he was still in the neighborhood of Vegliana.

The Duke of Orleans called a council of war, composed of Marsin, who lost the battle of Hochstet, La Feuillade, Albergotti, St. Frémont, and other lieutenant-generals. 'Gentlemen,' said the prince to them, 'if we remain in our lines, we shall lose the battle. Our circumvallation is five leagues in extent; we are not able to line all our intrenchments. You see here the regiment of the marine, which is not more than two men's height; there you may see places entirely unmanned. The Dora, which passes through our camp, will prevent our troops from rendering each other prompt assistance. When Frenchmen wait to be attacked, they lose the greatest of their advantages—that impetuosity and those first moments of ardor which so often decide the fate of battles. Take my word, we must march to meet the enemy.' The resolution was agreed to, when Marsin drew from his pocket an order of the king's by which it was commanded that, in the event of action being proposed, his opinion was to be deferred to; and his opinion was, that they should remain in the lines. The Duke of Orleans saw that he had been only sent to the army as a prince of the blood, and not as a general; and, forced to follow the counsel of the marshal, he made all necessary preparation for the battle, which was fought on the 7th of September.

"The enemy appeared to wish to form several attacks at once. Their movements threw the whole camp into a state of uncertainty. The Duke of Orleans desired one thing; Marsin and Feuillade another. They disputed and argued, but they decided upon nothing. At length they allowed the enemy to cross the Dora. They advanced with eight columns of twenty-five men deep; they must instantly be opposed by battalions equally deep. Albergotti, placed far from the army, upon the mountain of the Capuchins, had with him 20,000 men, and had in face nothing but some militia, who did not dare attack him. He was asked for 12,000 men; he replied that he could not spare them, and gave specious reasons for his refusal. He was listened to, and time was lost. Prince Eugene attacked the intrenchments, and at the end of two hours forced them. The Duke of Orleans, who exposed himself with all the bravery of the heroes of his blood, having received a dangerous wound in the arm had retired to have it dressed. He was scarcely in the hands of the surgeon when he was informed that all was lost, that the enemy were masters of the camp, and that the rout was general. Immediate flight was necessary. The lines, the trenches were abandoned, and the army dispersed. All the baggage, provisions, munitions, and the military chest fell into the hands of the conqueror. Marshal de Marsin, wounded in the thigh was made prisoner. A surgeon in the service of the Duke of Savoy amputated the limb, and he died a few minutes after the operation. The Chevalier Methuen, the English embassador to the Duke of Savoy, the most frank, generous, and brave man his country ever employed in an embassy, had upon all occasions fought at the side of that prince; he saw the Marshal de Marsin taken, and was a witness of his last moments. He told me that Marsin said these very words, 'At least believe, monsieur, that it was against my advice we remained in our lines.' These words appeared to contradict formally what had passed in the council of war; and they were nevertheless true; Marshal de Marsin, on taking leave at Versailles, had represented to the king that the enemy must be met, in case they appeared for the purpose of succoring Turin; but Chammilard, intimidated by preceding defeats, had caused it to be decided that they ought to wait and not offer battle; and this order, given at Versailles, was the cause of 60,000 men being defeated and dispersed."

This defeat, which cost nine or ten thousand men killed or made prisoners, was still more fatal to France by its consequences; for it brought on the loss of Modena, Mantua, Milan, Piedmont, and in the end, of the kingdom of Naples.

TUSCOING, A.D. 1794.—The battle of Tuscoing, in France, was fought on the 17th and 18th of May, between the republicans and the allied armies of Austria. The allies numbered some 90,000 men, including 130 squadrons, under the personal command of the emperor. The left wing of the French army occupying a position favorable for an attack, the design of the Austrians was to fall upon them, and force them back to the sea, and thus compel them to surrender. To effect this, their troops were divided into six columns, which were to move by concentric lines. This division of their army proved very detrimental to the Austrians, for, had they moved in concert, success would have been sure. Some of the columns were more than twenty leagues apart, and not arriving simultaneously at the point of attack, their design was not accomplished. When brought into action they fought valiantly, yet there was not sufficient unity in their operations to insure complete success. Some small actions besides, took place on the 17th, but not much to the advantage of either side. The republicans had concentrated their forces in a central position, and were preparing for a general attack. At three on the morning of the 18th General Souham, with 45,000 men, attacked the detached troops of General Ott, and the Duke of York, while at the same time another detachment of 15,000 advanced against them from the opposite side; the troops of Otto were defeated with great loss, those of the Duke of York, though scuccessful at first, on finding that they were separated from the main army, and their retreat cut off, disbanded and took to flight. The superior management of the French gave them the advantage in this battle, the allied army, being much superior in numbers. The loss of the French was small, while the Austrians lost 3,000 men and 60 pieces of cannon.

TYRE, B.C. 332.—BESIEGED BY THE MACEDONIANS.—The modern town of Tsour, with 1,500 inhabitants, situated on the south-east coast of the Mediterranean, occupies the site of Tyre, the "Queen of the Waters," whose "merchants were princes, and her traffickers the honorable of the earth."

Tyre, at the time it was besieged by the Macedonians, was seated in an island of the Mediterranean about four furlongs from the shore. It was surrounded by a strong wall 150 feet high, which was washed by the waves of the sea. When Alexander advanced toward Tyre, the citizens sent him an embassy, with presents for himself and refreshments for his army. They were willing to have him for their friend; but not for their master, and when he desired to enter the city in order to offer a sacrifice to Hercules, its tutelar god, the Tyrians refused him admission. But Alexander, the conqueror of so many cities, had too haughty a spirit to put up with such an affront, and was resolved to force them to admit him, by a siege, while the Tyrians, on the other hand determined to prevent his entrance if possible. They accordingly fixed machines on the ramparts and towers, armed their young men, and built work-houses for their artificers with whom the city was flooded. The whole city resounded with the noise of preparation as if it had been one vast workshop. Alexander again demanded a peaceable entry into the city; but the Tyrians killed his heralds and threw them from the top of the walls. Alexander was so exasperated at this cruel outrage, that he immediately commenced the siege with great vigor. From the ruins of old Tyre, which stood on the continent, he found material to make piers, and he took all the stones and rubbish from it. Mount Lebanon, famous in Scripture for its cedars, was not far distant, and furnished him with wood for piles and other timber work. His soldiers now commeneed building a pier or mole which was to extend from the main shore to Tyre. They at first advanced with great rapidity, the piles being easily driven into the slime, which served as mortar for the stones; and as their work was at a considerable distance from the enemy, they went on without interruption. But the further they advanced, the greater became their difficulties; the sea was deep and the workmen were continually harassed by the arrows discharged from the walls of the city.

The Tyrians, also, being masters of the sea, came in boats on each side of the dyke and prevented the Macedonians from carrying on the work with vigor; insulting and laughing at the proud conquerors who had now become beasts of burden. The Macedonians, however, steadily continued at their work, until they had made such great progress that the Tyrians became alarmed, and coming in boats full of armed men, they hurled such a quantity of arrows, stones, javelins and even fire upon the besiegers that the workmen were obliged to retire. Alexander after this ordered that sails should be spread over the workmen, and two wooden towers were erected at the head of the bank, and were filled with armed men to prevent the approach of the enemy. The Tyrians afterward made a descent upon the shore, and cut to pieces the Macedonians who were carrying stone, and also falling on a party of 60 Arabians, on Mount Lebanon, they killed 30, and took the others prisoners. The besieged also employed every means to ruin the enemy's walls. They filled a transportship with combustibles, and loading the after part with sand, in order to raise the prow, and taking advantage of a favorable wind they towed it to the extremity of the causeway. Then setting fire to it, they retired. Immediately the fire caught the towers and the rest of the works; the Tyrians perpetually hurling fiery darts and burning torches at the towers, the Macedonians were prevented from extinguishing the flames, and their works and machines were destroyed. Several of the workmen met a miserable death in the flames which consumed the towers. The Macedonians, however were not discouraged; they recommenced their work, built new machines, and with a greater number of workmen than before, carried the pier forward with a rapidity which surprised and terrified the Tyrians. The mole was nearly finished, and brought almost to the walls of the city, when suddenly a violent tempest arose, and as if by magic the entire pier was swept away. Alexander was aware that it would be impossible for him to complete his causeway, or take the city so long as the Tyrians remained masters of the sea. Accordingly he collected his few ships together, and having received other vessels from his allies, he came to anchor with his whole fleet along the shore near the mole, which his soldiers were rebuilding, where his galleys rode in safety. His fleet consisted of 221 galleys, the greater part of which were furnished by his allies. The Macedonians worked on the new pier with surprising energy, and at length, after many delays, notwithstanding the prodigious efforts of the Tyrians to destroy and retard their work, the mole was finished. It was much broader than the others, and was more firm and compact in its structure. The Macedonians planted military engines of all kinds on the causeway, in order to batter and shake the walls of the city, and to hurl on the besieged arrows, stones and burning torches. At the same time Alexander ordered the commanders to surround the city with their ships. The Tyrians, on their side, also made preparations for a vigorous defense. On the side of the city which lay toward the causeway, they erected stone towers of great height, and of a proportionate breadth. Access to any other part of the city was very near as difficult, the Tyrians having fenced the foot of the walls with great stones, to keep the enemy from approaching it. The besieged also advanced in covered galleys, and cut the cables which held the Macedonian vessels at anchor. On this Alexander stationed several vessels, also covered, to secure the anchors from the attacks of the Tyrians. But the besieged now employed divers, who came and cut the cables unperceived, until the Macedonians were forced to fix the anchors with iron chains. The besiegers afterward drew the stones with which the Tyrians fenced the foot of their walls, into the sea, with ropes, and thus cleared a passage to the walls. The Tyrians were now invested on all sides, and attacked both by sea and land. The Macedonians with their whole fleet advanced against the city in order to make a general assault. The Tyrians gave themselves up as lost, when suddenly a storm arose, which dispersed the fleet, which was with great difficulty preserved from annihilation; and even after they had succeeded in bringing the vessels near the shore, the greater part of them were severely shattered. But they were soon repaired, and again the city was surrounded. The Tyrians seeing their city exposed every moment to be taken by storm, resolved to fall on the part of the fleet commanded by Andromachus, which lay at anchor toward Sidon. They took an opportunity to do this when the seamen of Alexander's fleet, which lay at anchor on the other side of the city, were dispersed, and when he himself had withdrawn to his tent pitched on the sea-shore. The Tyrians set out with thirteen galleys, all armed with choice soldiers, who were accustomed to sea-fights; and rowing with all their might, they came thundering down upon the enemy's ships, sinking some and driving others against the shore, where they were dashed to pieces. Alexander hearing of this sally, immediately advanced with his fleet, against the enemy, upon which the Tyrians withdrew into their harbor, having lost but a few vessels during the engagement. The city was now warmly attacked on all sides, and was as vigorously defended. The stones, darts, arrows, and javelins of the besiegers were answered by the besieged with volleys of like missiles.

CONSTANTINE DEFEATING MAXENTIUS.

Page 654.

The Tyrians warded off the darts discharged against them by means of turning wheels, which either broke them in pieces, or carried them another way. To annoy the ships which advanced against their walls, they fixed cranes, grappling-hooks, and scythes, to joists or beams; then bending their catapultas, (enormous cross-bows), they laid these great pieces of timber upon them, instead of arrows, and suddenly shot them upon the enemy. By their great weight, these missiles crushed whole ranks, and their long hooks, and sharp scythes cut to pieces all whom they encountered. The enemy's ships were also greatly damaged by these weapons. They also heated brazen shields to redness; then drawing them out of the fire, they filled them with burning sand, and hurled them down upon the enemy. This last invention galled the Macedonians terribly; the burning sand forcing its way through the crevices of their armor, pierced to the very bone, and the soldiers maddened with pain, would die a horrible death. Alexander at length determined to make a desperate attempt, with a greater number of ships than before, manned with the flower of his army. Accordingly, a second naval engagement was fought, in which the Tyrians, after fighting bravely, were compelled to retreat toward the city. The king pursued them closely, but was not able to enter the harbor, being repulsed by the myriads of arrows, stones, and beams which were shot from the walls. However, he either took or sunk a great number of their ships. After allowing his forces to repose themselves two days, Alexander brought forward his fleet, and his engines to attempt a general assault. Both the attack and defense were more vigorous than ever. In spite of the stones, arrows, and red-hot sand which rained on them from all sides, the Macedonians applied their battering-rams with such effect, that breaches were made in several parts of the walls. The soldiers hastened to enter the breaches, and fought their way through the masses of the besieged, who fought with fury and madness. Admetus, one of the bravest Macedonian officers, was slain at the head of his men, while urging them forward through a breach. Alexander distinguished himself by deeds of almost superhuman bravery. He mounted into one of the high towers of the causeway and ascending to its summit, killed many of the enemy with his own hand, and became a conspicuous mark for the weapons of the enemy. The tower was very close to the wall, which he soon gained by means of floating bridges. The fleet forced the harbor, and the Macedonians driving their enemy from the breaches, gained the two towers, and the space between them on the wall of the city. The Tyrians seeing the Macedonians in possession of their ramparts, retired to an open space in the city, called the square of Agenon, and there stood their ground; but Alexander marching against them with his troop of body-guards, attacked them fiercely, killing great numbers of them, and compelled the rest to fly. At the same time the city being taken on that side which lay toward the harbor, the Macedonians, exasperated by the obstinate resistance of the enemy, ran up and down in every quarter, killing all that came in their way. The Tyrians seeing their city in the hands of the enemy, flew to the temples to implore the protection of their gods; others, shutting themselves up in their houses, escaped the sword of the conquerors, by voluntary death; others rushed upon the enemy, sword in hand, determined to sell their lives at the dearest rate. The king gave orders to kill all the inhabitants, except those who had sought refuge in the temples, and to set fire to every part of Tyre. Although this order was proclaimed by the sound of trumpet, yet not a person who carried arms, fled to the temples. These asylums were only filled with such women and children as were still in the city, the most of them having been sent to Carthage before the commencement of the siege. The Sidonians, although the allies of Alexander, saved 15,000 Tyrians from death, by conveying them privately on board their ships, which then sailed for Sidon. Six thousand soldiers, who were on the ramparts of the city, were cut to pieces by the infuriated Macedonians, and of all the men of Tyre, the 15,000 rescued by the Sidonians, alone escaped. Alexander in his rage, even after his soldiers were glutted with slaughter, and refused to kill any more, barbarously impaled 2,000 men alive, and caused them to be fixed upon crosses along the shore, where they died a lingering and agonizing death. This last act satisfied his thirst for blood, and having found himself in possession of 30,000 prisoners, both foreigners and citizens, he sold them all as slaves. As for the Macedonians, their loss was inconsiderable. Thus, Tyre, after a siege of eight months, was taken and destroyed, and the menaces which God had pronounced against the city, were fully accomplished.

Second Siege, B.C. 313.—It would be imagined that a city laid so waste as Tyre was by Alexander, could not easily or shortly recover strength to contend against any enemy, and yet we find Tyre, only nineteen years after, maintaining itself for fifteen months against Antigonus, one of Alexander's captains, who had been present at its great siege. But the fugitives from Sidon, and other parts, the women and children from Carthage, with, most likely, many enterprising strangers, thought the traditions of Tyre too great and tempting to allow it to be long abandoned; and if not so glorious as it had been, this queen of commercial cities soon became a highly respectable mart, though its trade was reduced within much narrower limits: it had embraced the world; it was now confined to the neighboring countries, and it had lost the empire of the sea. Seconded by the famous Demetrius Poliorcetes, his son, Antigonus presented himself before the place with a numerous fleet, which made him master of the sea, and cut the besieged off from supplies of provisions. As the siege was too protracted to accord with the other views of Antigonus, he left the operations under the command of Andronicus, one of his generals, who, by pressing the Tyrians very closely, and by making frequent assaults, obliged them at length to capitulate. This important conquest was made B.C. 313.

Third Siege, A.D. 638.—The curse that was said to be upon Tyre, was removed after a considerable time: it received the gospel at an early period, and was for ages a flourishing city. Before the discovery of the passage round the Cape of Good Hope, a place so situated as Tyre was, could not fail of being a mart of trade; and as soon as the back of a conqueror, attracted by its wealth, was turned, it was quickly partially re-peopled, and its industry revived.

But at length came the great Mussulman eruption; Mohammed and his generals led their triumphant armies through Asia, with that astonishing rapidity and success which have ever attended eastern conquests. In the West, a conquest may be compared to a shower, which, insidiously, and with time, permeates the soil; in the East, it is a flood or an avalanche, which overwhelms, devastates, and changes every thing in a moment.

While the intrepid Amrou was making Syria tremble with the fame of his victories, the perfidious Ioukinna accelerated the triumphs of Mohammedanism by his stratagems. The master of a fleet which had come to the succor of Tripoli, he hoisted the Roman standard, and presented himself before Tyre. His arrival caused much joy, for he was supposed to bring ammunition and troops to put the place in a state of defense. He landed with 900 men, and was admitted into the city, but being betrayed by one of his own people, the little band were surrounded, and taken prisoners. Their lives were only saved by a new subject of alarm. Jëzid, a Saracen captain, appeared off Tyre with a force of 2,000 men. The governor, with his garrison, went out to meet him, and, while the two parties were on the walls, Ioukinna and his soldiers were set at liberty by a Roman, who was looking for an opportunity to win the favor of the Saracens. Ioukinna conveyed the intelligence of his freedom to the soldiers he had left on board the fleet; they joined him, and he informed Jëzid of what was going on in Tyre. Jëzid not only defeated the governor and his party, but cut off his retreat. The gates were thrown open, and the Saracens, within and without, made a frightful slaughter of the inhabitants. Most of those who escaped embraced Islamism, to avoid death or slavery.

Fourth Siege, A.D. 1123.—The Venetians, who for several ages had enjoyed the commerce of the East, and dreaded breaking useful relations with the Mussulmans of Asia, had taken but very little part in the first crusade, or the events which followed it. They awaited the issue of this great enterprise, to associate themselves without peril with the victories of the Christians; but at length, jealous of the advantages which the Genoese and Pisans had obtained in Syria, they became desirous of likewise sharing the spoils of the Mussulmans, and equipped a formidable expedition against the infidels. Their fleet, while crossing the Mediterranean, fell in with that of the Genoese returning from the East, attacked it with fury, and put it to flight in great disorder. After having stained the sea with the blood of Christians, the Venetians pursued their route toward the coasts of Palestine, where they met the fleet of the Saracens, which had come out from the ports of Egypt. A furious engagement ensued, in which the Egyptian vessels were dispersed, and covered the waves with their wrecks.

While the Venetians were thus destroying the Mussulman fleet, an army, sent by the caliph from Cairo, was beaten by the Christians under the walls of Jaffa. The Doge of Venice, who commanded the fleet, entered the port of Ptolemaïs (Acre), and was conducted in triumph to Jerusalem. While celebrating the double victory gained over the infidels, it was determined to turn this important expedition to advantage. In a council held in presence of the regent of Jerusalem, and the Doge of Venice, it was proposed to besiege the city of Tyre, or that of Ascalon. As opinions were divided, it was determined to consult God, according to the superstitions of the time, and be guided by the expression of his will. Two strips of parchment, upon which were written the names of Tyre and Ascalon, were deposited upon the altar of the Holy Sepulchre. Amid an immense crowd of spectators, a young orphan advanced toward the altar, took one of the two strips, and it proved to be that of the city of Tyre.

The Venetians, more devoted to the interests of their commerce and their nation, than to those of the Christian kingdom, demanded, before they laid siege to Tyre, that they should have a church, a street, a free oven, and a national tribunal in all the cities of Palestine. They demanded still further advantages, among which was one third of the conquered city. The conquest of Tyre seemed so important that the regent, the chancellor of the kingdom, and the great vassals of the crown, accepted without hesitation the conditions of the Venetians; in an act which history has preserved, they engaged not to acknowledge as King of Jerusalem either Baldwin du Bourg, or any other prince who should refuse to subscribe to it.

When they had thus shared by treaty a city they had not yet conquered, they commenced their operations for the siege. The Christian army left Jerusalem, and the Venetian fleet the port of Ptolemaïs, toward the beginning of spring. The historian of the kingdom of Jerusalem, William of Tyre, was for a long time archbishop of this celebrated commercial city, and he pauses here to describe the ancient wonders of his metropolis. In his recital, at once religious and profane, he invokes by turns the evidence of Isaiah and Virgil; after speaking of King Hiram and the tomb of Origen, he does not disdain to celebrate the memory of Cadmus and the country of Dido. The good archbishop particularly vaunts the industry and the commerce of Tyre, the fertility of its territory, its dyes, so celebrated in all antiquity; its sand, which changes itself into transparent vases, and its sugar-canes, which began to be sought for by all regions of the universe. The city of Tyre, in the time of Baldwin, was no longer that sumptuous city, whose rich merchants, according to Isaiah, were princes; but it was still considered as the best-peopled and most commercial of the cities of Syria. It stood upon a delightful shore, screened by mountains from the blasts of the north; it had two large moles, which, like long arms, advanced into the sea, to inclose a port to which storm or tempest could find no access. The city of Tyre, which had stood out during more than seven months against the victorious Alexander, was defended on one side by a stormy sea and steep rocks, and on the other by a triple wall, surmounted by high towers.

The Doge of Venice at once penetrated into the port, and closed up all issue or access on the side of the sea. The Patriarch of Jerusalem, and Pontius, Count of Tripoli, regent of the kingdom, commanded the land army; the king, Baldwin de Bourg, being at that time a captive to the Saracens. In the early days of the siege, the Christians and the Mussulmans fought with obstinate ardor, but with equal success; this disunion of the infidels, however, soon powerfully assisted the efforts of the Franks. The Caliph of Egypt had yielded half of the place to the Sultan of Damascus, in order to engage him to defend it against the Christians. The Turks and the Egyptians were divided among themselves, and refused to fight together; the Franks took advantage of these divisions, and daily gained a superiority. After a siege of a few months the walls crumbled away before the machines of the Christians; provisions began to be short in the place; the Mussulmans were about to capitulate, when discord, in turn disunited the Christians, and was on the point of rendering useless the prodigies of valor and all the labors of a long siege.

The land army loudly complained that it had to support alone both battles and fatigues; the horse and foot threatened to remain as motionless under their tents as the Venetians in their ships. To remove the cause of their complaint, the Doge of Venice came into the Christian camp, with his sailors, armed with their oars, and declared himself ready to mount to the breach. From that time a generous emulation inflamed the zeal and the courage of both soldiers and seamen; and the Mussulmans, being without hope of succor, were obliged to succumb, after a siege of five months and a half. The standards of the King of Jerusalem and the Doge of Venice floated together over the walls of Tyre; the Christians made their triumphal entrance into the city; while the inhabitants, according to the terms of the capitulation, with their wives and children, departed from it. On whichever side our sympathies may be, the end of a great siege is a melancholy object of contemplation; nothing can convey a sadder idea to the mind than this compulsory exodus of a people.

The day on which the news of the conquest of Tyre was received at Jerusalem, was a festival for the inhabitants of the Holy City. Te Deum and hymns of thanks were chanted, amid the ringing of bells and the shouts of the people; flags were flying over the towers and ramparts of the city; branches of the olive and wreaths of flowers were hung about the streets and public places; rich stuffs ornamented the outsides of houses and the doors of churches. The old talked about the former splendor of the kingdom of Judah, and the young virgins repeated in chorus the psalms in which the prophets had celebrated the city of Tyre.

The Doge of Venice, on returning to the Holy City, was saluted by the acclamations of the people and the clergy. The barons and magnates did all in their power to detain him in Palestine; they even went so far as to offer him Baldwin's crown, some believing that that prince was dead, and others acknowledging no king but at the head of an army and on the field of battle. The doge declined the crown, and, satisfied with the title of Prince of Jerusalem, led back his victorious fleet to Italy.

Fifth Siege, A.D. 1188.—Tyre is most conspicuously associated with great names; next to having had the glory of checking the career of Alexander for seven months, it may reckon that of having successfully resisted the greatest Saracen general that, perhaps, ever lived.

While a new crusade was being earnestly preached in Europe, Saladin was following up the course of his victories in Palestine. The battle of Tiberias and the capture of Jerusalem had spread so great a terror, that the inhabitants of the Holy Land were persuaded the army of the Saracens could not be resisted. Amid general consternation, a single city, that of Tyre, defied all the united forces of the East. Saladin had twice gathered together his fleets and his armies to attack a place of which he so ardently desired the conquest. But all the inhabitants had sworn rather to die than surrender to the Mussulmans; which generous determination was the work of Conrad, who had just arrived in that place, and whom Heaven seemed to have sent to save it.

Conrad, son of the Marquis of Montferrat, bore a name celebrated in the West, and the fame of his exploits had preceded him to Asia. In his early youth he had distinguished himself in the war of the Holy See against the Emperor of Germany. A passion for glory and a thirst for adventures afterward led him to Constantinople, where he quelled a sedition which threatened the imperial throne, and, with his own hand, killed the leader of the rebels on the field of battle. The sister of Isaac Angelus and the title of Cæsar were the rewards of his courage and his services; but his restless character would not allow him to enjoy his good fortune in quiet. Amid peaceful grandeur, roused all at once by the fame of the holy war, he stole away from the tenderness of a bride and the gratitude of an emperor, to fly into Palestine. Conrad landed on the shores of Phœnicia a few days after the battle of Tiberias. Before his arrival, the city of Tyre had named deputies to demand a capitulation of Saladin; his presence revived the general courage, and changed the aspect of affairs. He caused himself to be appointed commander of the city, he widened the ditches, repaired the fortifications; and the inhabitants of Tyre, attacked by sea and land, become all at once invincible warriors, learned, under his orders, how to repel the fleets and armies of the Saracens.

The old Marquis of Montferrat, the father of Conrad, who, for the sake of visiting the Holy Land, had left his peaceful states, was at the battle of Tiberias. Made prisoner by the Mussulmans, he awaited, in the prisons of Damascus, the time when his children would deliver him or purchase his liberty.

Saladin sent for him to his army, and promised the brave Conrad to restore his father to him, and give him rich possessions in Syria, if he would open the gates of Tyre. He at the same time threatened to place the old Marquis de Montferrat in the front of the ranks of the Saracens, and expose him to the arrows of the besieged. Conrad replied with haughtiness, that he despised the presents of infidels, and that the life of his father was less dear to him than the cause of the Christians. He added that nothing should impede his endeavors, and that if the Saracens were barbarous enough to put to death an old man who had surrendered on his parole of honor, he should think it a glory to be descended from a martyr. After this reply the Saracens recommenced their assaults, and the Tyrians defended themselves with firmness and courage. The Hospitalers, the Templars, and most of the bravest warriors left in Palestine, hastened within the walls of Tyre, to share in the honor of so great a defense. Among the Franks who distinguished themselves by their valor, was a Spanish gentleman, known in history by the name of The Green Knight, from the color of his armor. He alone, say the old chroniclers, repulsed and dispersed whole battalions; he fought several single combats, overthrowing the most intrepid of the Mussulmans, and made the Saracens wonder at and admire his bravery and skill in arms.

There was not a citizen in the place who would not fight; the children, even, were so many soldiers; the women animated the men by their presence and by their words. Upon the waters, at the foot of the ramparts, fresh combats were continually taking place. In all parts the Saracens met with the same Christian heroes who had so often made them tremble.

Despairing of taking the city of Tyre, Saladin resolved to raise the siege, in order to attack Tripoli, and was not more fortunate in that expedition. William, King of Sicily, being informed of the misfortunes of Palestine, had sent succors to the Christians. The great Admiral Margarit, whose talents and victories had obtained for him the name of the King of the Sea and the New Neptune, arrived on the coast of Syria with 60 galleys, 300 horse, and 500 foot-soldiers. The Sicilian warriors flew to the defense of Tripoli, and, led on by the Green Knight, who had so distinguished himself at Tyre, forced Saladin to abandon his enterprise.

Thus was Saladin foiled; but the fate of Tyre was only deferred. Toward the end of the crusades, which European passions and interests had made abortive, the Sultan Chalil, after taking and destroying Ptolemais, sent one of his emirs with a body of troops to take possession of Tyre; and that city, seized with terror, opened its gates without resistance. The conquerors likewise possessed themselves of Berytus, Sidon, and all the other Christian cities along the coast. These cities, which had not afforded the least succor to Ptolemais in the last great struggle, and which believed themselves protected by a truce, beheld their population massacred, dispersed, or led into slavery; the fury of the Mussulmans extended even to the stones; they seemed to wish to destroy the very earth which the Christians had trod upon; their houses, their temples, the monuments of their piety, their valor, their industry,—every thing was condemned to perish with them by the sword or by fire.

TYROL.—We have not space in our work to give under their separate heads, descriptions of the various battles which occurred during the glorious struggle of the Tyrolese, in which they five times in the course of one year cleared the country, from one end to the other, of its invaders; and will therefore give the following dates, which may be useful for reference:

1805, Dec.—Tyrol yielded up by the Treaty of Presburg to the hated rule of Bavaria.

1808.—An insurrection organized toward the latter part of the year.

1809, April.—Austria declares war against France. Tyrolese rise in Pusterthal, and drive the Bavarians out of the valley: 2,000 French made prisoners at Botza.

April 10, Spechbacher drives the Bavarians out of Hull. April 11, Innspruck taken by the Tyrolese.

12, French and Bavarians under Wrede descend from the Brenner to Innspruck, are defeated, and surrender to General Chastelan.

22, Surrender of Trent, and expulsion of the French from every place in Tyrol, except Kuffstein.

May 13, Chastelar, the Austrian general, defeated at Wörgl.

May 19, Bavarians re-enter Innspruck; Austrians retire.
20–25, Second rising of the Tyrolese.
29, Victory of Berg Isel, gained by the Tyrolese, under Hofer, Spechbacker, Huspinger, and Teimer.
31, Second entry of the Tyrolese into Innspruck.
July, In consequence of the armistice of Znoym, the Austrian troops withdraw from Tyrol. Tyrolese left to themselves, appoint Hofer leader.
31, Duke of Danzig enters Innspruck at the head of a French army.
Aug. 4–11, Desperate contests along the Brenner. Battle of the Sterzingumons.
10, Duke of Danzig defeated in attempting to cross the Brenner.
13, Great battle of the Isel Berg; the Duke of Danzig, at the head of 25,000 men, defeated and driven out of Innspruck, by 18,000 Tyrolese; followed by the evacuation of Tyrol by the French.
15, Hofer's triumphal entry into Innspruck.
Sept. Money sent to the Tyrolese, and a golden chain to Hofer, by the emperor.
Oct. 16, Spechbacher worsted at the Malek.
25, French again in the possession of Innspruck.
Nov., Peace of Schönbrunn. Tyrolese ordered to lay down their arms; they disobey, believing the document to be a forgery. Hostilities continued to the end of December. Tyrolese finally put down, their leaders dispersed, and forced to conceal themselves.
1810, Jan. 20, Hofer made prisoner in a châlet on the mountains.
Feb. 10, Hofer shot at Mantua.

TZOMPACH, Battle of, A.D. 1519.—Although beaten in several battles by the troops of Cortez, the Tlascalans were not conquered. They still refused all the friendly overtures tendered by the Spanish commander. Cortez beheld in them an enemy to be feared, and would gladly have entered into an alliance with them; but they sent back his envoys with words of scorn, bidding him prepare for battle, for they were about to come forth to meet him.

Upon receiving this answer, Cortez determined to march against the enemy himself, rather than wait to receive their attack. On the morning of the 5th of September, the Spanish army was under arms at sunrise. Cortez rode through the ranks, and exhorted his men to fight manfully in the approaching struggle. Victory was their only hope; defeat would lead only to a shameful, cruel, and lingering death.

Enthusiastic shouts arose from the ranks as the general ceased, and when the word to march was given, each man stepped forward with the determination to conquer in the coming fight, or to die. They had marched but a short distance when they came within sight of the lines of the Tlascalan army. The Spaniards were startled by the magnitude of the concourse before them. Occupying a space of level ground, nearly six miles square, stood 60,000 warriors, clothed in fantastic guise, with banners fluttering in the air, and shouting aloud their terrible cry of defiance and war. The Indians were armed with spears and darts, which were tipped with a brightly-polished metal, and bows, and arrows. Their chieftains wore richly-ornamented helmets, whose tall, gayly-colored plumes, waved over their heads, rising and falling at each motion of their persons, and rendering them conspicuous marks for the aim of the Spanish arquebussers. The naked bodies of the common soldiers were painted in red, purple, yellow, and other gaudy colors. Barbaric splendor and magnificence were displayed in their strongest aspect. Banners and streamers floated in the air, in every quarter of the field, and everywhere gold, and silver, and precious stones, appeared, until the whole army glistened in the bright rays of the sun, like a burnished morning cloud.

The sounds of trumpets and of drums arose from every quarter of this dense and bright array, and shouts, and yells, and gestures wild; brandished spear and lance together, proved how eager were the warriors for the fray.

The army was divided into two companies, each company commanded by a chieftain whose armor of feathers corresponded in color with the painted bodies of his soldiers. The chieftains alone wore any defensive armor; they also carried shields of wood covered with leather, and of reeds quilted with cotton. Their shields were profusely ornamented, and were fringed with brightly-colored feathers. Music from shells and trumpets arose from various quarters of the Indian army, filling the air with wild sounds.

With steady step the Spaniards marched toward this great army. They arrived within bow-shot. Instantly the air was darkened by a cloud of arrows, spears, javelins, darts, and stones, which were hurled by the Indians upon their approaching foe. Amid this storm of missiles the gallant Spaniards held their way. Not a shot did they fire; and deep silence pervaded their ranks as they moved on toward the cloud of enemies before them. At length they halted; the artillery was placed in position, and at the command of their general the allied army opened a destructive fire along the whole line. The Spaniards plied their weapons with terrible effect. At point-blank range their cannon balls told with fearful accuracy upon the dense masses of the enemy. In vain did the Indians endeavor to bear off the dead and wounded from the field. They fell before that iron and leaden hail by scores. For a moment the Tlascalans stood motionless. Dismayed and astonished at the terrible slaughter inflicted by the mysterious weapons of their enemies, they apparently knew not what to do. At length, goaded to madness, with one universal shout of rage, they rushed in one mass upon the Spanish army.

Like a huge billow, on they came, with a force so irresistible, that the Spaniards, overwhelmed and engulfed, were there thrown back in the utmost confusion. And now ensued a terrible hand-to-hand conflict. The Spaniards fought with the desperate courage of despair—death on the field, or a lingering death on the sacrificial altar, stared them in the face—they fought like tigers—crushed to the earth by the weight of their enemies, the Spanish soldiers used their keen swords upon the naked bodies of their adversaries, with obstinate energy. The artillery was moved to a distance, planted in a favorable position, and opened on the Indian army, shaking it to the very center. The cavalry, headed by Cortez himself, plunged into the struggling mass, overthrowing and trampling down the enemy, and at length compelled them to retreat with the utmost precipitation. Again and again did the Indians renew these tremendous attacks, but they were as often driven back, with greater and increasing slaughter. Yet they were not defeated, and the result of the battle would have been doubtful had not dissensions broken out in their midst. One of the principal chieftains, who had been defeated in the battle of the defile, quarreled with Xicotoncatl, because the latter had accused him of cowardice, and withdrew from the field with his division, which consisted of 10,000 men. Another chieftain followed his example, and Xicotoncatl, whose force was now reduced to less than one half of its original number, was unable longer to contend against the arms of the Spaniards. But for four hours he maintained the conflict, until at length perceiving no hopes of victory, he ordered a general retreat, and left the severely-contested field to the Spaniards.

In this battle the Spaniards lost but few men killed; but their wounded included nearly the whole of their number. The loss of the Indians was great. The precise number is not stated; but the ground was literally piled with their dead.

The Spaniards were too much fatigued to pursue the flying enemy. Satisfied with their victory they returned triumphantly to the hill of Tzompach.

Although greatly discouraged by their repeated defeats, the Tlascalans, nevertheless, determined upon striking one more blow upon the invaders. They consulted their priests, who told them that the Spaniards were not gods, but were the children of the sun; and that it was only during the shining of the sun they were invincible. A night attack, therefore, was decided upon. Xicotoncatl, the Tlascalan general, conducted his operations with such care that the Spaniards, reposing within their works on the hill of Tzompach, little thought that an army of 10,000 men was stealing toward the camp. But unfortunately for the success of the Tlascalan general, he had selected a moonlight night for his expedition, and as he neared the camp of the enemy, a Spanish vidette discovered his army moving across the plain. He instantly gave the alarm. Soon the camp was in confusion. The horsemen, aroused from their slumbers, sprang to their horses, who stood ready saddled; the soldiers, half asleep, leaped from their hard couches, and flew to their arms; and all was hurry, bustle, and disorder. But soon the confusion ceased and the whole camp was under arms. They had scarcely formed in order of battle, when they beheld the black columns of the enemy moving through the fields of waving corn which covered the plain in patches. Onward came the Indians, creeping stealthily toward the Christian lines. They neared the foot of the hill. Deep silence pervaded their ranks. They commenced the ascent. Instantly—like a whirlwind—the Spaniards rushed down the slope, pouring repeated and deadly volleys of musketry and showers of arrows upon the ascending foe. At their head were the horsemen, who, plunging into the mass of affrighted Indians, cut them down to left and right. The Indians replied to the charge by a shower of arrows, and then, turning retreated with the utmost precipitation The Spanish horse pursued, and, easily overtaking the fugitives, slaughtered them mercilessly, until, sated with blood, they returned, leaving the plain covered with the carcasses of dead and dying men. The victory was decisive. Without the loss of a single man, the Spaniards put to rout and almost cut to pieces an army of 10,000 men.

After this disastrous defeat, the Tlascalans no longer rejected the proffered friendship of the Spaniards. No longer able to successfully resist, they made friends with the conquerors, and Xicotoncatl, the valorous chieftain of the Tlascalans, visited the camp of the Spaniards, and tendered Cortez the obedience of himself and his countrymen.

Massacre of Cholula.—The fame of Cortez's brilliant victories spread far and wide, and reached the ear of Montezuma himself. That prince heard with gloomy forebodings of the rapid approach of the invaders toward his capital, and determined once more to endeavor by smooth means to prevent him from advancing to the city. Accordingly he sent an embassy with munificent presents to the Spanish camp. Upon tendering the presents to Cortez, the Aztec nobles, in their emperor's name, expressed their regrets that he could not invite them to visit his capital, because he feared that they would receive some personal injury from the citizens, who were numerous and ungovernable. Cortez dismissed the embassy, assuring them that at a future day he would repay the emperor for all his kindness. Shortly after this interview the Spaniards finally accepted the pressing invitations of the Tlascalans, and left their camp, and proceeded to the city of Tlascala, where they were received by their former enemies, but now friends, with great rejoicings. Some time afterward Montezuma sent a third embassy to the Spanish commander. The friendly alliance which the invaders had entered into with the Tlascalans caused Montezuma the utmost uneasiness, and he was determined, if possible, to break that alliance. The present embassy, like the former ones, was loaded with costly presents of gold and silver; but the message which they now brought was so different from the others, that Cortez at once suspected treachery. Instead of forbidding the strangers to visit his capital, in plain words he invited them to come, assuring them that they would meet with a hearty welcome. He requested them to take the road which led through Cholula to the capital. The Cholulans, he said, were their friends, and had made arrangements, by his orders, to receive them in a suitable manner. At the same time, he warned them against the friendship of the Tlascalans, whom he styled base barbarians. Although Cortez could not but suspect the motive of the emperor in this sudden change of opinion, and although the Tlascalan chieftains endeavored to their utmost to dissuade him from accepting Montezuma's invitation, he, nevertheless, resolved to march toward the city of Mexico through Cholula. Accordingly, on an appointed morning he set forth with his whole army, accompanied by 6,000 Tlascalan warriors, whom he selected from nearly 100,000 who had volunteered. Arriving within sight of Cholula, he encamped, and the next morning he entered the city with his army and the Cempoallan Indians, leaving the Tlascalans at the camp in the rear. The Spaniards were received by the people of Cholula with every demonstration of welcome. For a few days they were treated with unswerving kindness; but soon Cortez discovered a marked change in the demeanor of the people, and at length, through the adroitness of Marina, he learned that a plot had been formed for the destruction of himself and army. Cortez saw that no time was to be lost. He informed the Caciques of his intention to leave the town early the next morning. They did not refuse their consent, but retired with the determination to fall upon the Spaniards, while they were entangled in the intricate streets of the city, and thus, they thought, destroy them with the greater ease.

Cortez then called together the Mexican embassadors, and bluntly charged them with the crime of plotting the ruin of his army, saying, that they had acted under Montezuma's directions; and that now, instead of marching to his capital as a friend, he would go thither an enemy. The embassadors denied all knowledge of the plot, and Cortez affecting to believe them, allowed them to depart, but ordered his men to watch them closely. Cortez spent an anxious and sleepless night. His soldiers who had been apprised of their danger, slept on their arms, and every horse was saddled and bridled, to be ready at a moment's warning. Cortez also dispatched orders to the Tlascalan chieftains to enter the city at a given signal. At early daybreak Cortez was in the saddle, giving his last directions to his soldiers. He drew up the main body of his men in a great square, which was partially inclosed with buildings and a high wall. At each of the three gates of this court, Cortez posted a troop of soldiers, armed with muskets. He then planted his cannon outside of the enclosure, so that they commanded the various streets; and behind the guns stood his main line.

Soon the Cholulan governors appeared at the head of a numerous body of men, whom they had agreed to furnish Cortez, to aid in the transportation of his baggage-wagons and artillery. They marched into the inclosed square. After all had entered, Cortez drew the caciques aside, and at once accused them of conspiring against him. Overpowered with astonishment and dismay at the suddenness of the accusation, they confessed at once, and declared that Montezuma was the author of the conspiracy. Cortez, however, would listen to no excuses; he gave the fatal signals, and instantly every musket, every cross-bow discharged its deadly missile into the mass of Cholulans who filled the courtyard. Words can not describe the terrible affright of the unfortunate creatures; they had heard nothing of the conversation between Cortez and their rulers, and for a moment they remained motionless. The musketry ceased, and amid the cloud of sulphurous smoke which filled the area, the Spanish soldiers rushed into the swaying crowd, and with their keen swords hewed them down without mercy. In vain did they strive to escape—none thought of resistance—those who strove to scale the wall, were shot down by the musketeers, and those who franticly rushed toward the gates were received on the points of Spanish lances. None escaped, save a fortunate few who concealed themselves beneath the heaps of the dead.

In the mean time, the citizens without, warned by the terrible sounds which issued from the interior of the court-yard, of the slaughter of their fellow-countrymen, rushed toward the spot from all quarters; but the dreadful artillery commanded every street, and as the crowds approached, they belched forth volleys of destruction upon them. Between each volley the Spanish horse rushed forward and kept the struggling mass back. Yet as fast as the foremost fell, their companions pushed forward to fill their places, while the balls from the cannon plowed through them, leaving bloody furrows in their tracks. At this moment the Tlascalans rushed into the city, and fiercely attacked the rear of the Cholulans. Thus attacked in front and rear, the brave citizens were forced to fly. Scattering in every direction, many of them sought shelter in the neighboring houses. These buildings their implacable enemies fired, and they perished miserably in the flames.

A numerous body of the Cholulans threw themselves into the great temple, and mounting into its wooden towers, hurled down stones, beams, and burning javelins upon the heads of the Spaniards. The Spaniards mounted the great stair-case, and by the aid of the burning javelins of their enemies, they set fire to the towers. Soon the wooden edifices were wrapped in flames; many of their despairing defenders cast themselves from the summits, and were crushed; and many died in the flames. At length the cruel butchery ceased. Moved by the prayers of the caciques, Cortez ordered his men to cease. Gradually the direful tumult ceased, and the blood-stained streets of Cholula were once more quiet.

On that dreadful day, 3,000 Cholulans were slain; and the fame of Cortez, from that time, spread throughout the plateau, filling the whole country with horror and fear.—Prescott.

UDEVALLA, A.D. 1678.—In the year 1678 a fierce battle was fought between the Danes and Swedes near Udevalla, a town of South Sweden. The Danes had crossed the mountains from Norway, when they were attacked by the Swedes, and an engagement ensued which was characterized by all that stubborn valor on both sides which distinguishes the hardy Scandinavians. At length after a protracted battle, the Swedes were defeated.

ULM, A.D. 1805.—The city of Ulm, in Germany, was the scene of several important military operations, in 1805. Austria having declared war against France, pushed forward a strong army into Bavaria, under General Mack, who established his head-quarters at Ulm. But Napoleon, having succeeded by a series of masterly movements in cutting off Mack's communication with Austria, the latter was cooped up in the city, with all that portion of his army, amounting to about 30,000 men, that had not already fallen into the hands of the French. Considering the strength of the place, and the numbers of the garrison, a vigorous resistance might have been anticipated; but instead of this, on the 17th of October 1805, Mack capitulated and delivered up the town, and his army as prisoners of war, without so much as firing a shot!

UTICA, B.C. 203.—Scipio Africanus having entered upon the country dominated over by the Carthaginians, turned all his attention toward Utica, with the purpose of making a place of arms of it advantageous to his ulterior plans; he attacked it at once, both by land and sea. Carthage exerted itself earnestly to save a city which might be said to protect the capital of its empire. Asdrubal raised a numerous body of troops, and Syphax, King of Numidia, fixed his camp within sight of that of the Roman general. The rival of Rome flattered itself with the hope of soon putting Scipio to flight; but that skillful captain soon dispersed these smiling expectations. He at once conceived the great project of burning both camps; and this was the happy manner in which he executed it. He amused Syphax with proposals for an accommodation. A crowd of Roman officers disguised as slaves went with the deputies into the enemy's camps, to observe the entrances and places of issue, and to ascertain what sort of watch was kept day and night. After having taken measures and precautions according to the information thus gained, he silently attacked the intrenchments of the King of Numidia, in the obscurity of the night, and the soldiers set fire to the barracks, covered with mats, reeds, and dry wood. The whole camp appeared to be in a blaze; and the Numidians and Carthaginians, thinking the fire the effect of accident, were more intent at first in extinguishing it than upon defending themselves. Scipio attacked the lines of Asdrubal, while the flames were consuming those of Syphax. The enemies who were occupied in suppressing the fire, were put to the sword; 40,000 men were left dead upon the spot, and 7,000 were reserved for slavery. The news of this defeat spread consternation among the Carthaginians. Asdrubal and Syphax raised fresh troops, while the Roman general pressed the siege of Utica. This second army obliged him to suspend his attacks; but another victory, more glorious than the first, maintained the reputation of the Roman general. Carthage, in despair, recalled Hannibal—its only and last resource. The arrival of this great man entirely suspended the siege of Utica; but his defeat by Scipio terminated the war.

Second Siege, B.C. 46.—Cæsar, conqueror of Thapsus, pursued Scipio into Utica, and invested it. This city would not have fallen an easy conquest, if Cato, who had shut himself up in it, together with most of the senators opposed to tyranny, had found in all hearts a courage and a patriotism equal to his own. In vain this noble Roman endeavored to awaken in those around him the sublime sentiments which had animated the early citizens of Rome; in vain he went through the streets to calm the alarm of the people—the dread of the conqueror closed all ears against his exhortations: love of country had given place to love of life. Despairing then of defending Rome by defending Utica, he gave his whole care to the preservation of the senators, the companions of his misfortunes, whom the inhabitants wished to give up to Cæsar. When he had taken all the necessary precautions, he prepared to terminate his days in a manner worthy of himself. Some of his friends exhorted him to have recourse to the clemency of the dictator. "He who is conquered," said he, "may servilely flatter the hand which has subdued him. Cato is invincible; he acknowledges neither master nor conqueror." He then assembled his friends, and, after a long conversation upon the state of affairs, he strictly forbade his son ever to take any part in the government. "You can not do so," said he, "in a manner worthy of the name you bear; and to do it in any other way, would be to cover yourself with eternal ignominy." He then took a bath, and while in it, remembered Statilius, his friend, who had refused to escape with the other senators. He had charged the philosopher Apollonius to persuade him to save himself. "Have you succeeded with Statilius," said he—"can he have gone without bidding me farewell?" "He! no," replied the philosopher; "he is intractable: he declares he will positively remain here, and imitate you in every thing." "It will soon," replied Cato, with a smile, "be seen how that will be." After his bath, he gave a magnificent banquet to all his friends and the magistrates of Utica. They sat long at table, and the conversation was animated, lively, and learned, chiefly turning upon points of moral philosophy. Demetrius, a Peripatetic philosopher, undertook to refute, after the principles of his sect, the two Stoic paradoxes: "The wise alone are free; all the vicious are slaves." But Cato replied to him with a fire, a vehemence, and in a tone of voice which betrayed his intentions, and changed the suspicions his friends had entertained into certainty. All at once, a dismal silence prevailed; sadness was painted in every countenance, and no one durst venture his tear-dewed eyes toward Cato. This tender friend perceived the effect his rigid philosophy had produced; he changed the subject, and to drive away melancholy ideas, he spoke of those who had just left them, showing the anxious inquietude he experienced respecting them. After the repast, he walked about for some time, according to his usual custom, and then retired to his apartment. There he spoke more affectionately than he had before done, to his son and his friends, which revived and strengthened the idea they had conceived of his determination.

When he went into his inner chamber, he threw himself upon the bed, and meditated for a long time upon Plato's dialogue on the immortality of the soul. He had already read a considerable part of it, when, turning his eyes upon his bolster, he perceived that his sword was not in its customary place; his son had had it removed while they were at supper. Cato called to a slave, and asked him what had become of his sword. The slave made no answer, and his master resumed his reading. A few minutes after, he made the same question, without any eagerness or warmth, but like a man who has no particular desire. At last, when he had finished his reading, seeing that nobody seemed disposed to obey him, he called all his slaves, one after the other, and in the tone of a master, said that he insisted upon having his sword; he even went so far as to give one of them so violent a blow, that he made his hand bloody. "What!" cried he, indignantly, "what! are my son and my people conspiring to deliver me up to my enemy, without arms, and without defense?" At this moment, his son, coming into the apartment with his friends, burst into tears. He threw himself at his feet, he embraced his knees, and conjured him to depart from his purpose.

Cato, angry at seeing his son in such an attitude of supplication, and darting at him glances denoting displeasure—"Since when," cried he, "am I fallen into imbecility, to make it necessary for my son to be my curator? I am treated like an insane man; I am not allowed to dispose of my own person; I am to be disarmed too! Brave and generous son, why do you not chain up your father till Cæsar arrives, so that that enemy of his country may find him destitute of defense? Do I stand in need of a sword, if I wished to deprive myself of life? Could I not hold my breath? could I not dash my head against the wall? If a man really wish for death, there are a thousand ways of obtaining it." A young slave then brought him back his sword. Cato drew it, examined it, and finding that the point was quite straight and sharp, he exclaimed—"Now, then, I am my own master." He laid down his sword, took up his book, and read it through again from beginning to end; he then fell into so profound a sleep, that the anxious friends who listened at the door heard him snore; but the fatal moment approached. Cato called for his freed-man, and asked him if all was quiet; and when he was assured that it was, he threw himself upon the bed, as if to take his repose for the night; but the moment he was left alone, he plunged his sword into his body, a little below the breast. The blow did not kill him at once; he struggled a little, and fell off the bed on to the ground. At the noise of his fall, his people rushed in, and, as he still breathed, his surgeon bound up the wound. But the instant he recovered his senses, he tore away the bandages, and with them dragged out his bowels, and expired. "Oh, Cato!" cried Cæsar, when he heard of his noble end, "I envy thee the glory of thy death, since thou hast envied me that of sparing thy life." And he entered triumphantly into Utica.—Robson.

VACHTENDONCK, A.D. 1588.—This little city, at a small distance from Venloo, but whose advantages of situation, in a country that could be flooded, and the fortifications which the Dutch had added to its natural defenses, rendered its capture difficult, was besieged by the Spanniards, under the command of Pierre Ernest de Mansfeld. Its weak garrison made a noble resistance. Nevertheless, the works of the Spaniards advanced so rapidly, the fire of the batteries, and the sapping and mining were so effective, that on the 3d of December, the besieged capitulated. The reason for our noticing this siege, is the circumstanee that it was the first time bombs were used; they had been invented a short time before, by a man of Venloo, a maker of artificial fireworks. The garrison and the citizens, terrified at these globes of fire, which crushed their houses, and set fire to every thing around them, made but a feeble resistance after they had seen their effects. This destructive arm has been perfected with time, and gave birth to grenades, pot-grenades, and many other murderous machines.

VALENCIENNES, A.D. 1557.—Philip II., King of Spain, son and successor to the Emperor Charles V., who, from the depths of his cabinet, like another Tiberius, shook all Europe with his often cruel policy, wishing to stop the rapid progress of Lutheranism in the provinces of Flanders, put weapons into the hands of executioners, and endeavored to establish the Inquisition in those happy and tranquil countries. This barbarous tribunal, conforming so little with scriptural precepts and mildness, disgusted the Flemings, and gave birth to that famous confederation, at the head of which, was William of Nassau, surnamed the Taciturn, Prince of Orange. All the confederates were clothed in gray, wore upon their caps little wooden porringers, and round their necks a medal, upon one side of which was the portrait of the king, and on the reverse a wallet suspended from two hands, crossed and pressed together in sign of faith, with this inscription: "Faithful to the king, and to the wallet." This was in allusion to the name of beggars, which the Count of Barlemont had given them. They exhibited themselves in this guise before Marguerite of Austria, Duchess of Parma, and gouvernante of the Netherlands. They presented, in a manner sufficiently humble, a petition to this princess, in which they asked for liberty of conscience, and the revocation of the edict which established the Holy Office. An answer to these prayers was eluded, and the yoke of the Protestants, and even of the Catholics, was made so intolerably heavy, that the people in all parts prepared for revolt. The inhabitants of Valenciennes were the first to raise the standard; they were almost all Huguenots, and had intimate connections with what are called the heretics of France. The gouvernante charged the Seigneur de Noircarmes, commanding in Hainault, to establish a sufficient garrison in Valenciennes to restrain the audacity of the burgesses. Noircarmes preferred employing mildness; before he approached the walls of the city, he agreed to undertake nothing, if the public exercise of heresy were proscribed. The people consented to this, but retracted the moment after. Noircarmes presenting himself at the gates, for the purpose of entering the city, and completing the agreement, some of the populace had the temerity to shut the gates in his face, and to drive him from them by a discharge of arquebuses. Valenciennes was then declared to be in a state of rebellion, and its siege was commanded. The news soon spread. Some French Huguenots immediately flew to the aid of the proscribed city, and these were soon followed by 3,000 foot, and a few horse, got together in the nearest cantons of Flanders. These troops, provided with several pieces of cannon, advanced under the orders of John Soreas, who had assembled them. Noircarmes immediately got together a few companies of infantry, with some horse, and set forward to combat this rash and inexperienced body of soldiers. Their defeat was the work of a moment: Soreas perished in the action, and his followers were massacred. Some, in vain, attempted to find refuge in Tournay; the peasants of the neighborhood pursued and dispersed them. Noircarmes, animated by this success, after having subdued Tournay, advanced toward Valenciennes. The rebels, still obstinate, rejected all his propositions with disdain, and he was therefore forced to think seriously of besieging the city. He quickly established a formidable battery, which destroyed the ramparts, and spread terror and despair among the besieged. They had expected powerful assistance, but, frustrated in their hopes, their courage was changed into consternation, and after several rude attacks, they surrendered at discretion. Noircarmes imposed such laws as the gouvernante dictated. The submission of Valenciennes for a time depressed the spirits of the confederates, and the vigorous government of Marguerite seemed to prognosticate obedience; but the glorious results of these beginnings are the best and most instructive in the pages of history.

Second Siege, A.D. 1667.—One of the greatest military exploits of Louis XIV. was the conquest of Valenciennes. Since the wars which had procured liberty for Holland, the possessors of that city had neglected nothing to render it impregnable. The project of the French monarch was considered as the height of temerity. In the first place, it was necessary to gain possession of two half-moons on the right and on the left. Behind these half-moons was a grand crown-work, pallisaded, frased (strengthened with pointed stakes), and surrounded by a fosse intersected by many traverses. In this crown-work there was yet a second, well covered, and surrounded with another fosse. After these had been mastered, there was an arm of the Scheld to be crossed; this being done, a fresh work was encountered, called a pâté; behind this pâté flowed the great stream of the Scheld, deep and rapid, which served as a fosse between the pâté and the wall; and this wall was supported by large ramparts. All these works were covered with cannon. A garrison of nearly four thousand men, a great quantity of munitions of war and provisions, the hatred of the citizens for the French and their affection for their Spanish governor, seemed to promise a long and firm resistance. At the head of a formidable army, Louis XIV. advanced, seconded by his brother and the Marshals, Humiéres, Schomberg, Feuillade, Luxembourg, and Lorges. The celebrated Vauban directed all the operations. On the 9th of March, 1677, they opened the trenches. A few days after, the king called a council upon the best means of attacking the outworks with greatest regard to the lives of the soldiers. Vauban proposed to attack them in open day; but all the marshals exclaimed strongly against such a plan; Louvois condemned it, and yet Vauban held firm to his opinion with the confidence of a man perfectly understanding all he advanced. "You wish," said he, "to spare the blood of your soldiers, and this will be best effected by fighting in the daylight, without confusion and without tumult, without the fear of one part of our men firing upon another, as too frequently happens. Our object is to surprise the enemy; and they are always in expectation of an attack by night; we shall indeed surprise them when they will be fatigued by watching all night, and they will not be in a condition to resist our fresh troops. Add to this, there may be men among our soldiers who have but little courage, and night will favor their timidity; whereas, during the day the eye of the master inspires valor, and elevates men, particularly the French, above themselves." The king yielded to the reasoning of Vauban in opposition to his minister Louvois and five marshals of France.

On the evening of the 16th, the two companies of musketeers, a hundred grenadiers of the king's household, a battalion of the guards, and one of the regiments of Picardy, were commanded to be in readiness, and on the 17th, at nine o'clock in the morning, these warriors marched to the attack of the crown-work, after having overcome the two advanced half-moons. Nothing seemed able to resist them; they mounted the intrenchments in all directions; they seized them; they effected a lodgment. This was all that had been required or hoped for in this attack; but the valor of the musketeers was warmed, and could not be checked. There was across the small arm of the Scheld, a bridge, which communicated with the pâté. The passage over this bridge was closed by a barrier of immense pieces of pointed timber, with a wicket in the middle, through which only one man could pass at a time. While one party of the musketeers was endeavoring to force the wicket, the rest climbed over the barrier, and in spite of pikes and musketry, leaped down on the other side sword in hand. The enemy, surprised by this extraordinary feat, abandoned the defense of the wicket. The musketeers pursued them, and on reaching the pâté, attacked it with great fury, and carried it in spite of its defenders; but the cannon of the ramparts now threatened destruction to the conquerors. The gray musketeers perceived a little door; they broke it in, and discovered a private staircase constructed in the thickness of the wall; they rushed up this narrow passage and arrived at the top of the pâté. They there remarked another door, which gave entrance to a gallery built over the grand canal of the Scheld. They broke that in; they gained the ramparts, and intrenched themselves. They then turned against the city the cannon they found there, and, sheltered from their thunders, descended into the place with the fugitives. They pursued them from intrenchment to intrenchment, from street to street; and they triumphed before the king could have imagined the first work they attacked was taken. But this was not the most astonishing part of this marvelous affair.

It was probable that young musketeers, carried away by the ardor of success, should rush blindly upon the troops and the citizens —that they would perish, or that the city would be plundered; but these warriors, scarcely adolescent, led by a cornet named Moissac, and a quarter-master named Labarre, formed behind some wagons, and while the troops which came in crowds, were forming leisurely, other musketeers got possession of some neighboring houses, in order to protect by their fire those who defended the bridge with incredible bravery. They were three times charged by the cavalry of the garrison; but notwithstanding the smallness of their numbers, they maintained all they had won. The infantry endeavored to take them in rear, but they there encountered the greater part of the black musketeers and the grenadiers of the king's household, who repulsed them vigorously. The citizens were astonished; the city council assembled. They entered into a parley with Moissac, who received and gave hostages. Deputies were sent to the king; and all this was done without confusion, without tumult, and without the commission of a fault of any kind. The city was obliged to submit without capitulation. The king made the garrison prisoners of war, and entered Valenciennes, to his own great surprise, as master. The conquest only cost him 40 men. "I do not know," says Larrey, "if history furnishes many examples of an action so sharp and prompt, and at the same time so fortunate, and of the capture, in so short a time, and with so little loss for the conquerors, of a great and strong city which wanted nothing for its defense. The whole looks like a miracle; and all was attributed to the fortunate rashness of the musketeers." "It was fortunate," adds M. de St. Foix, "because coolness and prudence completed that which impetuous courage had begun. Every thing in this affair is characteristic of true valor, that valor which elevates man above himself, and which often makes him triumph against all probability, and in spite of the evident danger into which he seems to precipitate himself."

Third Siege, A.D. 1793.—In this siege the English have an interest, the Duke of York, second son of George III., having had the command of the besiegers.

The allies, having taken Condé in the month of April, directed their forces against Valenciennes. General Ferrand commanded in the place, with a garrison of 9,000 men. To favor the siege, the allies posted an army of observation in the plains of Hérin, in front of the city, a strong force on the other side of Valenciennes, and a third between Lille and Tournay. At the moment that city was invested, these faubourgs were attacked; that named Marli was set fire to on the 24th of May, and taken the day following. The allies opened the attack very close to the place. The Duke of York summoned the city on the 14th of June. The governor replied: "The garrison and myself will sooner bury ourselves beneath the ruins than surrender the city." The bombardment instantly commenced. When the Tournay side was in ashes, the allies transported their bombs to the south-west, and then the conflagration became general; there seemed to be no wish entertained to preserve either the walls or fortifications. An opinion was general in the city, that destruction, rather than conquest, was the object of the allies, and despair became more tenacious than courage. During the conflagration, the fire caught the arsenal, which blew up. Treachery was suspected, and the sub-director of the artillery, Monestier, destroyed himself. The object of this was to raise the inhabitants, which it succeeded in doing; but order was quickly restored by the two representative commissioners. The works of the besiegers came up to the walls by the 21st of July. A breach was made in the bastion called the Huguenots, and a first assault upon the covered way was repulsed. There was a second on the 26th, while the allies, with another body of 10,000 men, assaulted in a different point, in which they gained possession of an advanced work, which was blown up by three mines. The fire drove them from the ramparts, and the work was retaken; but a panic seized upon the garrison, they became deaf to the voices of their officers, rushed pêle mêle into the city, and nothing could bring them back to the advanced work, which had been retaken and abandoned by both parties. At this time, the Duke of York addressed a proclamation to the inhabitants and the soldiers, while he sent a second to the municipality and the general. From that moment the disorder was irreparable; the assembled inhabitants, supported by the soldiers, compelled the council of war to enter into a capitulation: it was signed on the 28th of July. The companies of the cannoneers of Douai and Valenciennes alone took no part in this riot: they had served with distinction. The allies lost a great many men in the sieges of Condé, Cateau, Cambresis, and Valenciennes.—Robson.

VALLS, A.D. 1809.—Near Valls, in Spain, in 1809, the French troops, under General St. Cyr, gained a decisive victory over the Spaniards; but the French were in their turn defeated in 1811, near the same place.

VALMY, A.D. 1792.—At the village of Valmy a battle was fought in 1792, between the allies under the Duke of Brunswick and the French under General Kellerman, father of the officer of that name who distinguished himself by his gallant cavalry charge at Marengo. The battle resulted in the total defeat of the Prussians; and from "the cannonade of Valmy may be dated the commencement of that career which carried the French armies to Vienna and the Kremlin."

Serving under Kellerman on that day was one who experienced, perhaps, the most deeply of all men the changes for good and for evil which the French Revolution has produced. It was the Duc de Chartres (the title he then bore), afterward Louis Philippe, King of the French. He commanded on the right. General Valence was on the left, and Kellerman himself was in the center.

The lines of the allies, also, contained one man who claims our special attention. This was the German poet Göthe, then in early youth, and who had, out of curiosity, accompanied the allied army on its march into France, as a mere spectator. The King of Prussia and the Duke of Brunswick were also in the allied lines; but Göthe's name is greater than that of king, duke, or general. Göthe has given us a curious record of the sensations which he experienced during the cannonade, which we insert in place of a description of the battle:

"I had heard so much of the cannon fever that I wanted to know what kind of a thing it was. Ennui, and a spirit which every kind of danger excites to daring, nay, even to rashness, induced me to ride up quite coolly to the outwork of La Lune. This was again occupied by our people; but it presented the wildest aspect. The roofs were shot to pieces, the corn-shocks scattered about, the bodies of men mortally wounded stretched upon them here and there, and occasionally a spent cannon-ball fell and rattled among the ruins of the tile roofs.

"Quite alone, and left to myself, I rode away on the heights to the left, and could plainly survey the favorable position of the French. They were standing in the form of a semicircle, in the greatest quiet and security, Kellerman, then, on the left wing, being the easiest to reach.

"I fell in with good company on the way, officers of my acquaintance, belonging to the general staff and the regiment, greatly surprised to find me here. They wanted to take me back again with them; but I spoke to them of particular objects I had in view, and they left me without further dissuasion, to my well-known singular caprice.

"I had now arrived quite in the region where the balls were playing across me; the sound of them is curious enough, as if it were composed of the humming of tops, the gurgling of water, and the whistling of birds. They were less dangerous by reason of the wetness of the ground; wherever one fell it stuck fast. And thus my foolish experimental ride was secured against the danger at least of the balls rebounding.

"In the midst of these circumstances, I was soon able to remark that something unusual was taking place within me. I paid close attention to it, and still the sensation can be described only by similitude. It appeared as if you were in some extremely hot place, and, at the same time quite penetrated by the heat of it, so that you feel yourself, as it were, quite one with the element in which you are. The eyes lose nothing of their strength or clearness; but it is as if the world had a kind of brown-red tint, which makes the situation, as well as the surrounding objects more impressive. I was unable to perceive any agitation of the blood; but every thing seemed rather to be swallowed up in the glow of which I speak. From this, then, it is clear in what sense this condition can be called a fever. It is remarkable, however, that the horrible uneasy feeling arising from it is produced in us solely through the ears. For the cannon thunder, the howling and crashing of the balls through the air, is the real cause of these sensations.

"After I had ridden back and was in perfect security, I marked, with surprise, that the glow was completely extinguished, and not the slightest feverish agitation was left behind. On the whole, this condition is one of the least desirable; as, indeed, among my dear and noble comrades, I found scarcely one who expressed a really passionate desire to try it."*

VARNA, A.D. 1444.—On the 10th of November 1444, a battle was fought at Varna, on the south-west shore of the Black Sea, in European Turkey, between the Hungarian army, under Ladislaus and John Huniades, and the Turks, under Amurath II., in which the former were defeated with terrible slaughter. In 1828, Varna was taken by the Russians.

VEII, B.C 271.—The Veientes were the most powerful of the twelve nations who inhabited Etruria. Their capital, Veii, situated on a steep rock, was only twelve miles from Rome; and the inhabitants were, for more than three hundred and fifty years, the most persevering enemies of the growing republic.

The Romans, tired of seeing their projects constantly thwarted by the Veientes, declared war against them, after a truce of twenty years; and in order the better to carry out that great design, resolved to lay siege to their capital. Situated upon a steep rock, abundantly provided with every thing, famine alone could reduce it. The task was a long one, but it did not terrify the Romans. It became necessary to defend the soldiers from the rigors of winter, and tents made of skins were erected, which proved as good as houses to them. This being an innovation, the tribunes of the people opposed it strongly; but a check soon silenced their vain clamors. The Veientes, in a sortie, took the besiegers by surprise, burned their machines, and destroyed most of their works. All orders of the Romans swore not to leave the camp till the city was taken. The horsemen, whom the republic was bound to supply with horses, offered to find them at their own expense. The senate, only anxious for the glory and interest of the state, charmed with this unanimous zeal, assigned for the first time a pay to the horsemen, and to all the volunteers who would repair to the siege. The works were quickly re-established, with the addition of much more considerable new ones. Rome was beginning to look for the most favorable results, when the hatred of the military tribunes, L. Virginius and M. Sergius, who commanded the army, almost annihilated their hopes. The Capenates and the Falerii, neighbors of the Veientes, armed secretly, and surprised and attacked the camp of the Romans. The two tribunes carried their quarrel so far as to separate and divide the army into two parts. While in this state the enemy fell upon Sergius. The besieged in concert with them, made a sortie, and attacked him on their side. The astonished Romans fought feebly, and soon sought safety in flight. All were in disorder, and the rout became general. Virginius might have saved his colleague, but he preferred enjoying the spectacle of his defeat. The exasperated senate obliged them both to abdicate their commands; they were brought to trial, and very heavily fined for so great a crime. The Falerii returned to the charge, but they were repulsed with great loss. In the mean time, the siege did not advance, and the efforts of the Roman armies terminated in ravaging the lands of their enemies. The following year, the war was still more unsuccessful. Under vain pretenses of religion, the military tribunes, with whom the Romans were dissatisfied, were deposed, and a dictator was chosen, as was the custom on all the pressing emergencies of the republic. M. Furius Camillus, whose rare valor and high capacity had been displayed more than once in command, was raised to this supreme dignity. The presence of this great man soon restored the military discipline which had been weakened by the disunion of the leaders, and brought good fortune back to the standards of Rome. The city was pressed more closely, and the forts which the besieged had destroyed were reconstructed. Camillus defeated the Falerii and the Capenates, and after that victory, he pushed on the attack with additional ardor. At length, despairing of succeeding by force, he had recourse to sapping and mining. His soldiers, by dint of hard labor, opened for themselves a subterraneous passage into the castle; thence, dispersing themselves about the city, while the general amused the besieged by an assault, some charged those who defended the walls, while others broke down the gates, and let the army into the place in crowds. The terrified citizens knew not which way to fly; all issues were occupied by their enemies. Some were crushed beneath the ruins of the houses, others were consumed by the flames; the image of death was everywhere. The furious soldiery immolated all that came in their way; nothing was heard but cries and lamentations. The dictator put an end to the carnage, and disarmed the prisoners; but in accordance with his promise, gave the city up to the pillage of his victorious troops. The republic received the news of this victory with transports of the liveliest joy, and all orders of the state vied with each other in doing honor to the triumph of Camillus.—And yet, they afterward banished him.—Robson.

* Göthe's "Campaign in France in 1792," Farie's translation, p. 77.

VERA CRUZ, A.D. 1847.—On the 1st of January, 1847, General Winfield Scott arrived at the river Brazos, in Texas, and, with a view of invading the territories of Mexico, began to collect his forces. He had been ordered by his government to withdraw 4,000 men from Generel Taylor's army, and ten new regiments were to be sent forward to him from the United States, without delay. Having made all his arrangements he directed his transports to rendezvous at the small island of Lobos, about 120 miles northwest of Vera Cruz, and the sloop of war St. Mary's under commander Saunders, was dispatched by Commodore Conner, to show the various transports the way to a safe anchorage, as they should arrive. After the transports were all assembled Saunders was to conduct them all to Anton Lizardo. The ships began to arrive, and in a short time Anton Lizardo was crowded with a magnificent fleet of American steamers and sail vessels. On the 6th of March General Scott arrived at Anton Lizardo in the steamer Massachusetts. On the 7th, Scott and Commodore Conner made a reconnoisance of the city of Vera Cruz, the castle, and the coast adjacent, in the steamer Petrita. The Mexicans greeted the steamer with a shot or two in token of defiance. The Americans now prepared to land. All the preliminaries having been made, the greater part of the troops were removed from the transports to the larger vessels of war, and on the morning of the 9th, the fleet—the flag-ship Raritan, under Captain Forest, leading, and General Scott following at a short distance in the steamer Massachusetts—weighed anchor, and soon in gallant style were plowing their way through the water from Anton Lizardo toward Sacrificios. In two hours the fleet arrived at Sacrificios, and the landing of the troops was immediately commenced. Sixty-seven surf-boats, manned by experienced seamen, were hauled alongside the ships; the soldiers, fully armed, were passed into them; as each boat was filled with them, she was moored a short distance from the ship, the seamen laid on their oars and waited till the others should be ready. The command of the vanguard was given to Brevet Brigadier-General Worth. After all was ready General Worth entered his boat, and placing himself at the head of his troops (the first division of regulars), the boats moved in a semicircle toward the shore, under cover of the guns of two steamers, the Spitfire and the Vixen. The disembarkation of the troops on this occasion presented a spectacle of almost unparalleled beauty and magnificence. The sun was fast sinking in the west, the sea was as smooth as glass, and the walls of the town and castle, the domes of the churches, and the rigging and mast-heads of the foreign men-of-war at anchor in the harbor of Sacrificios, were black with crowds of eager and excited spectators. The landing was made without difficulty. A few days afterward Commodore Conner was relieved of his command by Commodore Perry, and returned to the United States. Perry hoisted his flag on board the steamer Mississippi.

On the night of the landing, the Americans, having thrown forward their advanced guards, bivouacked on the beach without tents. The next day they drove in the Mexican pickets, and began to invest the city of Vera Cruz in due form, and on the evening of the third day the besiegers had drawn their line around the city, the line being five miles in extent. During these operations several skirmishes had taken place with cavalry parties of the Mexicans. General Scott had his head-quarters in the American line immediately southeast of the city, near the point where the troops first landed. General Worth with his division occupied this part of the line, and General Twiggs, with the second division of regulars, took up his position at Vegara on the north side of the city, while General Patterson, with the division of volunteers, was stationed on that portion of the line west of the city. Brigadier-Generals Quitman, Pillow, and Shields acted under the direction of General Patterson. A terrible gale of wind arose while these preparations were being made, and for a time all communication with the shipping was suspended, preventing the landing of stores and provisions. On the 13th the storm abated, and the officers and seamen of the navy labored with the utmost zeal and activity in taking on shore the necessary articles, and commenced landing the artillery and mortars. By the 17th the necessary intrenching tools, carts, etc., and a number of mortars, with a quantity of shells were landed. The Mexicans, meanwhile, had kept up a desultory fire from the batteries of Vera Cruz, and the guns of the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa; but upon the American lines their efforts were of little effect. The Americans lost only three men killed and four or five wounded. Among the slain was Captain Alburtis. Lieutenant-Colonel Dickinson, who afterward was killed in the valley of Mexico, was wounded. By the night of the 18th every thing was ready, the trenches were opened and taken possession of by the troops. On the 22d seven mortars were placed in battery, and General Scott formally summoned the city to surrender. General Morales, however, the governor of both city and castle, declined in a polite note to surrender, and announced his intention to defend himself to the last extremity. Commodore Perry now prohibited all communication with the town by neutral vessels (which thus far had been unrestricted), and General Scott ordered the batteries to open upon the town. The batteries were number twelve and three. After a short practice the artillerists got the exact range of their shells, and threw them into those portions of the town which they selected as their targets with surprising accuracy. The Mexicans feebly replied to the fire of the Americans. Captain Vinton, who was in the command of battery No. 3, was killed.

The efforts of General Scott on the land were ably seconded by Commodore Perry on the water. He directed Commander Tattnall, of the Vixen, and Commander Sands, of the Vixen, with the gun-schooners, Bonita, Reefer, Petrel, Falcon, and Tampico, to take up a position within a proper distance of the city, and open their guns upon the enemy. This order was promptly obeyed, and the fleet anchoring in a line about a mile from the city walls, opened a destructive fire upon the besieged. The Mexicans now opened their fire in earnest, and the battle raged with fury. The castle of San Juan d'Ulloa, was provided with some very heavy mortars, which threw with terrible force, shells of an immense size. The spectacle presented by the contending parties was awful; yet it was grand and beautiful. The terrible shells of the Mexicans, rose in rapid succession from the castle walls, and making a fiery arch in the air, descended into the American lines, where, burying themselves in the ground, they burst with a detonation, which shook the very earth. The mortars of the Americans on land, and the heavy thirty-two pounders of the "Mosquito fleet," filled the air with their deadly missiles, and seemed to shake the earth and water with their thunders. At nightfall both parties ceased the fire of their cannon; and the fleet withdrew; but the mortars on either side continued their work, and the work of death, still went on.

Early in the morning of the 23d, the "Mosquito fleet," under Tattnall, was ordered to take up a position within 800 yards of the castle, and to open its guns upon that fortress. Commander Tattnall, with his vessels, advanced boldly to his assigned position, and maintained his dangerous post, to the admiration and astonishment of all beholders on sea and land, for nearly an hour, when he was recalled by a signal. In spite of the terrible fire to which his fleet was exposed, the gallant commander retired without having sustained any material loss. A gale arose in the forenoon, and continued through the day, preventing any intercourse between the land and sea forces. The progress of the siege, therefore, was materially retarded. The fire of the besiegers gradually slackened; three mortars, however, which had been landed previously, were placed in the battery, and two batteries for sieging pieces were constructed. The heavy siege-pieces did not arrive in time, and General Scott was obliged to ask for assistance from Commodore Perry. Scott discovered that the shells were producing but little effect, in quarters where it was desirable. Houses were shattered, and women and children killed, and a shell fell through the dome of the church of Saint Domingo, killing a number of wounded, who had been sent thither to have their wounds dressed, and the inhabitants suffered greatly; but the fortifications, and the troops were scarcely injured. Scott, therefore, saw the necessity of carrying the place by assault. He accordingly applied to Commodore Perry for some of his guns. The commodore tendered him the proper pieces, and sent a detachment of seamen to man them.

These pieces were placed in the battery on the night of the 23d. The battery was located south of the center of the city in General Patterson's portion of the line of investment, and was placed under his direction. The battery consisted of three sixty-eight pounder shell guns, and three thirty-two pounder solid shot guns, each weighing sixty-three cwt. At the same time, Colonel Bankhead, chief of artillery, had caused three twenty-four pounders to be placed in the battery, to which subsequently were added a fourth twenty-four pounder, and two eight-inch howitzers.

As before stated, the mortar batteries were number 1, 2, and 3; the twenty-four pounder battery was marked number 4, and the navy battery, 5. The following were all the batteries erected during the siege of Vera Cruz: Numbers 1, 2, 3, and 4, erected by the army, were comprised of ten mortars, two howitzers, and four twenty-four pounders. Number 5, erected by the navy, consisted of three sixty-eight pounder shell-guns, and three thirty-two pounder solid shot guns. The gale having abated toward evening, Perry made arrangements for opening his battery on the next day. The besiegers, meanwhile, had continued to throw shells into the city, but had not damaged its defenses. At daybreak on the 24th, Captain Aulick, the second in command of the squadron, with a party of officers and seamen, took possession of the navy battery, and opened a rapid and destructive fire upon the besieged. The effect of this fire was apparent at once. The walls crumbled beneath the heavy shot, and the Mexicans, in the hope of silencing that fearful battery, concentrated upon it the fire of three forts. The navy battery, however, maintained its fire until four o'clock in the afternoon, when his ammunition being exhausted, Captain Aulick ceased for the night. The mortars, however, continued to throw their shells. The battery number 4 was not completed, and had as yet taken no part in the siege. The next day Captain Aulick was relieved by Captain Mayo, of the flag-ship Mississippi, with a fresh body of officers and seamen.

On the same day (the 25th) an engagement took place between the troops of Colonel P. F. Smith, who were stationed at Vergara, and a body of 300 or 400 Mexicans, near a bridge which crosses a small stream that empties into the river Antigua. The Mexicans were defeated after a brief conflict.

In the afternoon, the consuls of Great Britain, France, Prussia, and Spain, sent a memorial to General Scott, requesting him to grant a truce, to enable the neutral residents, and the women and children of the Mexicans to withdraw from the city. General Scott replied: 1st, that he had given the consuls early and sufficient warning of the dangers that were impending; 2dly, that a free communication between the place and the foreign ships of war, had been left open until the 22d; and 3dly, that in his summons to General Morales to surrender the city, "he had fully considered the impending hardships and distresses of the place, including those of the women and children." The memorialists were obliged to be satisfied with this reply, and the besiegers pushed their work of destruction with vigor. The Americans maintained their fire from all their batteries till five o'clock in the afternoon, when the batteries of the besieged were nearly silenced. Shortly afterward, a white flag was passed from the city into General Scott's camp. The garrison of the city at the prospect of an assault, became disheartened, and began to make preparations to surrender. During the night of the 25th, General Morales, with the commandant of the Mexican militia, made his escape from the city in a small boat; and the command of the garrison devolved upon General Landero. As the garrison had not formally surrendered, Colonel Bankhead maintained a moderate fire on the place during the night; but at eight o'clock on the morning of the 26th, another flag appeared with definite propositions; and General Scott ordered the fire to be discontinued at all points.

The Americans threw during the siege 2,500 shot and shells. The besiegers lost in killed only 19 men, while nearly 1,000 persons were slain in the city.

The following is General Scott's dispatch, announcing the result:

"HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Vera Cruz, March 29, 1847.

"SIR: The flag of the United States of America floats triumphantly over the walls of this city and the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa.

"Our troops have garrisoned both since ten o'clock. It is now noon. Brigadier-General Worth is in command of both places.

"Articles of capitulation were signed and exchanged, at a late hour night before the last. I inclose a copy of the document.

"I have heretofore reported the principal incidents of the siege up to the 25th instant. Nothing of striking interest occurred until early in the morning of the next day, when I received overtures from General Landero, on whom General Morales had devolved the principal command. A terrible storm of wind and sand made it difficult to communicate with the city, and impossible to refer to Commodore Perry. I was obliged to entertain the proposition alone, or to continue the fire upon a place that had shown a disposition to surrender; for the loss of a day, or perhaps several, could not be permitted. The accompanying papers will show the proceedings and results.

"Yesterday, after the norther had abated, and the commissioners appointed by me early in the morning before, had again met those appointed by General Landero, Commodore Perry sent ashore his second in command, Captain Aulick, as a commissioner on the part of the navy. Although not included in my specific arrangement with the Mexican commander, I did not hesitate, with proper courtesy, to desire that Captain Aulick might be duly introduced and allowed to participate in the discussions and acts of the commissioners who had been reciprocally accredited. Hence the preamble to his signature. The original American commissioners were Brevet Brigadier-General Worth, Brigadier-General Pillow, and Colonel Totten. Four more able or judicious officers could not have been desired.

"I have time to add but little more. The remaining details of the siege; the able co-operation of the United States squadron, successively under the command of Commodores Conner and Perry; the admirable conduct of the whole army—regulars and volunteers—I should be happy to dwell upon as they deserve; but the steamer Princeton, with Commodore Conner on board, is under way, and I have commenced organizing an advance into the interior. This may be delayed a few days, waiting the arrival of additional means of transportation. In the mean time, a joint operation, by land and water, will be made upon Alvarado. No lateral expedition, however, shall interfere with the grand movement toward the capital.

"In consideration of the great services of Colonel Totten, in the siege that has just terminated most successfully, and the importance of his presence at Washington, as the head of the Engineer Bureau, I intrust this dispatch to his personal care, and beg to commend him to the very favorable consideration of the Department."

VIENNA, from its geographical position and its political importance, has been subjected to several sieges, and has occasionally, like Rome, sometimes escaped those fearful visitations when it might have expected them.

First Siege, A.D. 1529.—After having subdued Asia, Soliman II. determined to make Europe tremble by the terrors of his constantly victorious arms. In 1529 this redoubtable conqueror entered Hungary with fire and sword; he pillaged, ravaged, and destroyed every thing in his passage, and marched over these melancholy ruins to lay siege to Vienna, the capital of Austria and of the whole western empire, since the house of Austria was said to occupy the throne of Charlemagne. The Ottoman army was immense, and was composed of the brave janizaries who had just subdued Persia. But Vienna contained within its walls both warlike citizens and intrepid soldiers. The sultan commenced his operations by mining the walls. This immense labor was frequently interrupted by the counter-mines of the besieged; but at length some of these concealed volcanoes burst forth all at once, and threw down a great part of the walls. In an instant, the Viennese, men, women, and children, flew to construct a new rampart; and when the infidels came to the assault, they were surprised to find themselves stopped, at a few paces from the breach, by this barrier, which twenty pieces of cannon and tens of thousands of defenders rendered impregnable. They then turned their attention to another side, where there had been only time to intrench with pallisades. At this point the bodies of the inhabitants served as bulwarks. The combat here was terrible; rivers of blood and heaps of slain rolled beneath the steps of the warriors. Twice the Turks were repulsed with loss; twice the sultan and his officers rallied them, and led them back against the enemy, and twice were they on the point of carrying the city. During four hours they fought and immolated each other without being able to imagine to which side victory would be favorable. At length the thunders which were incessantly launched from all quarters of the place, crushed whole ranks of the infidels, and the invincible courage of the inhabitants drove off an enemy who had more than once shouted clamorous cries of victory. The first check only seemed to inflame the valor of the Turks. On the 12th of October, Soliman harangued them, and gave orders for a general assault. They were preparing for it during a great part of the night; and on the 13th, at break of day, all the bodies of the Turkish army advanced in good order, armed, some with blazing torches, others with muskets, arrows, and axes, and a great number with ladders, and all sorts of machines to force or to get over the walls. But they were expected: the Austrians had placed on the walls all their artillery, all their mortars, and all their soldiers. The city was attacked on more than twenty points at once, and from every one the infidels were obliged to retreat with great loss and disgrace. The fight lasted for twelve hours, without either side thinking of food or rest, and night alone put an end to the fearful slaughter. Soliman, in despair, sounded a retreat: he had vainly consumed forty days before Vienna, and had lost more than 40,000 men in his different assaults upon that city. As a crowning misfortune, snows, frosts, and tempests made still greater havoc with his army than the enemy had done. Even Soliman the Great, the invincible Soliman, could not overcome these obstacles; he raised the siege, and Vienna was saved.

Second Siege, A.D. 1683.—The grand vizier, Kara Mustapha, charged with the humiliation of the empire, and Leopold its master, advanced toward the capital of the states of that prince with terrible preparations. Very unlike what we have seen in the former siege, at the approach of the enemy's legions the emperor quitted Vienna, with two empresses, his mother-in-law, and his wife, with the archdukes and archduchesses, and 60,000 inhabitants. The country round exhibited nothing but fugitives, equipages, carts laden with goods, the laggard of all which became the prey of the Tartars, who pillaged, ravaged, burned, slaughtered, and led them away into slavery. On the 7th of July, 1683, the city wis invested, and all Europe tremblingly watched the issue of this famous enterprise.

Vienna, bathed by the Danube on the north, was fortified by twelve great bastions in the remainder of its inclosure. The curtains were covered by good half-moons, without any other outworks; the ditch was partly filled with water, and partly dry, and the counterscarp was much neglected. The side of the city which was bathed by the river had no defense but strong walls, flanked by large towers, the whole well terraced. In a plain of three leagues, environed by a circle of mountains, the vizier fixed his camp, which he had the audacity to leave undefended except with lines of circumvallation and countervallation. Every thing was in abundance in the camp—money, munitions of war, and provisions of all sorts. The different quarters boasted pachas as magnificent as kings, and this magnificence was effaced by that of the vizier; to use the phrase of a historian, "he swam in luxury." The court of a grand vizier generally consists of 2,000 officers and domestics; Mustapha had double that number. His park, that is to say, the inclosure of his tents, was as large as the besieged city. The richest stuffs, gold and precious stones, were there contrasted with the polished steel of arms. There were baths, gardens, fountains, and rare animals, as well for the convenience as the amusement of the general, whose effeminacy and frivolity did not in the least relax the operations of the siege. His artillery, composed of 300 pieces of cannon, was not the less formidable; and the bravery of the janizaries was not at all enervated by the example of their leader.

The Count de Staremberg, a man perfect in the art of war, the governor of Vienna, had set fire to the faubourgs, and to save the citizens, he had destroyed their buildings. He had a garrison estimated at 16,000 men, but which in reality consisted of about 11,000 at most. The citizens and the university were armed; the students mounted guard, and had a physician for their major. Staremberg's second in command was the Count de Capliers, the emperor's commissary-general, one of those men whom knowledge vigilance, and activity point out as fit for the highest posts.

The approaches to Vienna were easy. The trenches were opened on the 14th of July, in the faubourg of St. Ulric, at fifty paces from the counterscarp; the attack was directed against the bastion of the court, and that of Lebb. Two days only advanced the work as far as the counterscarp, where the ditch was dry. The Duke of Lorraine, who had posted himself in the isle of Leopoldstadt, using every exertion to preserve there a communication with the city, then found himself obliged to retreat by the bridges he had thrown over the Danube, and which he broke down behind him. The country houses, of which the island was full, then lodged the Turks. This proceeding has been considered a great mistake; but if it was one, the duke thoroughly repaired it by his behavior during the whole siege. With an army which never amounted to 30,000 men, he covered Hungary, Moravia, Silesia, and Bohemia; he protected Vienna; he checked Tekeli; and he stopped the progress of more than 40,000 Turks and Tartars, who scoured and devastated the country.

But he could not prevent the infidels from carrying on the siege with vigor. With the Turks, there were daily mounds raised, works advanced, new batteries, and a fire which augmented every instant; with the Austrians, it was, in an equal degree, a display of the most intrepid valor and firm resistance. Staremberg, who at the first approaches had been wounded by a fragment of stone struck off from the curtain by a ball, though only half-cured, animated the whole defense by his looks, his actions, and his humanity. He treated all his soldiers like brothers; he praised and recompensed all distinguished actions; and, not content with being with them during the day, he passed the night upon a matrass in the corps de garde of the emperor's palace, which adjoined a bastion of the court comprised in the attack. By the 22d of July, the besiegers were at the pallisade, which was only defended by the sword. They were so near, that they grappled each other across the pikes in death-stuggles. The Count de Daun, a general officer of distinguished merit, had scythes fastened to long poles, which destroyed a vast number of the infidels, but which could not diminish the presumptuous confidence which animated them. So certain were they of victory, that they came forward to make bravadoes similar to those of which we read in ancient wars. A champion of extraordinary stature advanced with a threatening air, insulting with both voice and saber. A Christian soldier, unable to endure this affront, sprang out to encounter him: he at first was wounded, but quickly wounded and disarmed his enemy, cut off his head with his own cimeter, and found fifty gold pieces stitched up in his vest. One would suppose that this brave fellow would be rewarded; not so: he remained a private soldier, and his name, which the Romans would have consecrated in the fasti of history, is not even known to us. The besieged, who beheld the action from the top of the ramparts, drew a good augury from it; it redoubled their constancy and courage.

The enemy did not obtain possession of the counterscarp before the 7th of August, after 23 days' fighting, with a great effusion of blood on both sides. The Count de Serini, nephew of the famous Serini whom Leopold had brought to the scaffold, had retarded the taking of this work by a thousand actions of bravery. There was no sortie in which he was not conspicuous. His ardor on one occasion prevented his feeling that he had received an arrow in his shoulder. The Turks had come to the descent of the ditch; no people equal them in turning up the ground. The depth of their work was astonishing: the earth they threw out was carried to the height of nine feet, surmounted by planks and posts in the form of floors, beneath which they worked in safety. Their trenches differ from those of Europeans in shape: they are cuttings in the form of a crescent, which cover one another, preserving a communication like the scales of fish, which conceal a labyrinth from whence they fire without inconveniencing those who are in front, and whence it is almost impossible to dislodge them. When the janizaries had once entered them, they scarcely ever left them. Their fire became progressively more active, while that of the besieged relaxed: the latter began to husband their powder, and grenades were short. The Baron de Kielmansegge invented a powder-mill and clay grenades, which proved of great service. Industry employed all its resources; but the hope of holding out much longer began to diminish. The enemy's mines, the continual attacks, the diminishing garrison, the nearly exhausted munitions and provisions, every thing conspired to create the greatest anxiety; and not content with so many real evils, they invented imaginary ones. A report was spread that traitors were working subterranean passages by which to introduce the infidels. Every one was commanded to keep watch in his cellar; and this increase of fatigue completed the weakness of the defenders of Vienna, by robbing them of their necessary rest. Others spoke confidently of incendiaries hired to second the Turks. A young man found in a church which had just been set fire to, although most likely innocent, was torn to pieces by the people. But the Turkish artillery was more to be dreaded than all these phantoms. The inhabitants were incessantly employed in extinguishing the fires which the bombs and red-hot balls kindled in the city, while the outworks were falling in one continued crash. The half-moon had already suffered greatly; the ramparts presented in all parts vast breaches; and, but for the invincible courage of the inhabitants and the soldiers, Vienna must have been taken.

In this extremity, Leopold turned his eyes toward Poland. John Sobieski, the terror of the Ottomans, and perhaps the only sovereign of his age who was a great captain, was supplicated to come to the assistance of the empire and the whole Christian world. This monarch instantly responded to the summons by marching thither at the head of 25,000 men. He traversed two hundred leagues of country, and on the 5th of September he crossed the bridge of Tuln with his army, five leagues above Vienna. The Polish cavalry was remarkable for its horses, uniform, and noble bearing. It might be said that they were equipped at the expense of the infantry: among the latter, there was one battalion extremely ill-clothed. Prince Lubomirski advised the king, for the honor of the country, to order them to pass in the night. Sobieski judged otherwise; and when that troop was on the bridge, he said to the spectators—"Look well at them; that is an invincible troop of men, who have taken an oath never to wear any clothes but those of the enemy. In the last war they were all clothed in the Turkish fashion." "If these words did not clothe them, they cuirassed them," pleasantly observes the Abbé Cayer, whose account we follow.

The Poles, after crossing the bridge, extended themselves to the right, exposed during twenty-four hours to being cut to pieces, if Kara Mustapha had taken due advantage of their position. On the 7th, all the German troops joined their allies, and the army was then found to amount to about 74,000 men. There were four sovereign princes among them—John Sobieski of Poland, Maximilian Emanuel, Elector of Bavaria; John George III., Elector of Saxony, and Charles V., Duke of Lorraine; and twenty-six princes of sovereign houses.

Vienna was driven to bay. The Turks and diseases carried off, as if in concert, both officers and soldiers. Almost all the leaders had disappeared; the warrior exhausted by fatigue, and want of good food, dragged himself to the breach; and he, whom the fire of the enemy spared, expired with languor and debility. The people, who had at first undertaken the labors of the siege with such eagerness, now dreamed of no other defense but prayer. They filled the churches, into which bombs and cannon-balls constantly brought terror and death. On the 22d of August, it appeared certain that they could not hold out more than three days, if the Turks gave a general assault. From that melancholy period, one mine seemed to precipitate itself upon another. The half-moon was taken; breaches of from eighteen to twenty toises laid open the two bastions and the curtain; soldiers served instead of walls. A mine was advancing under the emperor's palace, already beaten to pieces with bombs, and close to the bastion of the court. Other mines, like snakes, were winding about in all directions; several were discovered; but the Austrian miners were timid, and could not be persuaded to go under ground, when once they had heard the enemy at work there. The artillery was no longer able to respond, most of the cannons being either broken or dismounted. Staremberg scarcely preserved a ray of hope, or rather, he did not longer dare to hope; and the general, who at the commencement of the siege, had said, "I will only surrender the place with the last drop of my blood," wrote to the Duke of Lorraine in this critical moment: "No more time to be lost, monseigneur—no more time to be lost." Even the most rapid activity would have been of no avail, but for the stupid inaction of the grand vizer, who, for the sake of the riches with which he thought Vienna filled, waited in the expectation of its surrendering by capitulation. Such was his blindness, that he was ignorant of the preparations of the Christians, when they were upon the point of overwhelming him.

When about to march, Sobieski gave out the following order of battle, written with his own hand: "The corps de bataille shall be composed of the imperial troops, to whom we will join the regiment of cavalry of the Marshal De la Cour, the Chevalier Lubomirski, and four or five squadrons of our gendarmes, in the place of whom, some dragoons, or other German troops, shall be given. This corps shall be commanded by M. the Duke of Lorraine.

"The Polish army will occupy the right wing, which will be commanded by the Grand-general Jublonowski, and the other generals of that nation.

"The troops of MM. the Electors of Bavaria and Saxony shall form the left wing, to whom we will give also some squadrons of our gend'armes, and of our other Polish cavalry, in the place of whom, they will give us some dragoons, or some infantry.

"The cannons shall be divided; and in case MM. the electors have not enough, M. the Duke of Lorraine will furnish them with some.

"The troops of the circles of the empire will extend along the Danube, with the left wing falling back a little on their right; and that for two reasons: the first, to alarm the enemy with the fear of being charged in flank; and the second, to be within reach of throwing succors into the city, in case we should not be able to drive the enemy as soon as we could wish. M. the Prince of Waldeck, will command this corps.

"The first line will consist entirely of infantry, with cannons, followed closely by a line of cavalry. If these two lines were mixed, they would doubtless embarrass each other in the passages of the defiles, woods, and mountains. But as soon as they shall be on the plain, the cavalry will take its posts in the intervals of the battalions, which will be arranged with this view, particularly our gend'armes, who will charge first.

"If we were to put all our armies in three lines only, it would require more than a German league and a half, which would not be to our advantage; and we should be obliged to cross the little river Vien, which must be our right wing: it is for this reason we must make four lines; and this fourth shall serve as a body of reserve.

"For the greater security of the infantry against the first charge of the Turkish cavalry, which is always impetuous, it will be desirable to employ spanchéraistres, or chevaux de frise, but very light, for convenience of carriage, and at every halt, place them in front of the battalions.

"I beg all the messieurs the generals, that as fast as the armies shall descend from the last mountain, as they shall enter the plain, every one will take its post as it is set down in this present order."

There were but five leagues between them and the Turks, from whom they were separated by that chain of mountains which surrounded the vast plain on which they were encamped. Two routes presented themselves: one by the more elevated part; the other, by the side where the summit, sinking, became more practicable. The first was fixed upon: it was true it was the more difficult, but it was the shorter. On the 9th of September, all the troops moved forward. The Germans, after many attempts to bring up their cannons, gave the matter up in despair, and left them in the plain. The Poles had more spirit and perseverance. By manual strength and address they contrived to get over twenty-eight pieces, and these alone were used on the day of battle. This march, bristling with difficulties, lasted three days. At length they approached the last mountain, called Calemberg. There was yet plenty of time for the vizier to repair his faults: he had only to take possession of this height, and mark the defiles, and he would have stopped the Christian army. But he did not do so; and it was at this moment, that the janizaries, indignant at so many blunders, exclaimed: "Come on, come on, ye infidels! The sight of your hats alone will put us to flight."

This summit of Calemberg, still left free, discovered to the Christians, an hour before nightfall, both the innumerable hosts of the Turks and Tartars and the smoking ruins of Vienna. Signals incontinently informed the besieged of the succor at hand. We must have suffered all the dangers and miseries of a long siege, and have felt ourselves, our wives, and our children doomed to the sword of a victor, or slavery in a barbarous country, to have an idea of the joy the city experienced. Sobieski, after having examined all the positions of the vizier, said to the German generals, "That man is very badly encamped; he is an ignorant fellow: we shall beat him." The cannon, on both sides, played the prelude to the grand scene of the morrow. It was the 12th of September. Two hours before dawn, the king, the Duke of Lorraine, and several other generals, performed a religious duty, very little practiced in our time—they received the communion; while the Mussulmans were crying to the only and solitary God of Abraham, Allah! Allah!

At sunrise, the Christian army descended with slow and measured steps, closing their ranks, rolling their cannon before them, and halting at every thirty or forty paces to fire and reload. This front widened, and took more depth as the space became greater. The Turks were in the greatest astonishment. The Khan of the Tartars drew the vizier's attention to the lances ornamented with banderoles of the Polish gendarmerie, and said, "The king is at their head!"—and terror seized upon the heart of Kara Mustapha. Immediately, after having commanded the Tartars to put all their captives to death, to the amount of 30,000, he ordered half of his army to march toward the mountain, while the other half approached the walls of the city, to give a general assault. But the besieged had resumed their courage. The hope, and even certainty of victory, had rendered them invincible.

The Christians continued to descend, and the Turks moved upward. The action commenced. The first line of the imperialists, all infantry, charged with so much impetuosity, that it gave place for a line of cavalry, which took part in the intervals of the battalions. The king, the princes, and the generals gained the head, and fought, sometimes with the cavalry, and sometimes with the infantry. The two other lines urged the first on warmly, protected by the fire of the artillery, which was incessant, and very near. The field of the first shock, between the plain and the mountain, was intersected with vineyards, heights, and small valleys. The enemy having left their cannon at the beginning of the vineyards, suffered greatly from those of the Christians. The combatants, spread over this unequal ground, fought with inveteracy up to mid day. At length, the infidels, taken in flank, and driven from hill to hill, retired into the plain, lining their camp.

During the heat of the mêlée, all the bodies of the Christian army having fought sometimes on the heights, and sometimes in the valleys, they had necessarily doubled over each other, and deranged the order of battle. A short time was given to re-establish it; and the plain became the theater of a triumph which posterity will always feel difficulty in believing. Seventy thousand men boldly attacked more than two hundred thousand! In the Turkish army, the Pacha of Diarbecker commanded the right wing, the Pacha of Buda the left. The vizier was in the center, having by his side the Aga of the janizaries and the general of the Spahis. The two armies remained motionless for some time, the Christians in silence, while the Turks and Tartars emulated the clarions with their cries.

At length Sobieski gave the signal, and, saber in hand, the Polish cavalry charged straight upon the vizier in the center. They broke through the front ranks, they even pierced through the numerous squadrons which surrounded Mustapha. The Spahis disputed the victory; but all the others—the Wallachians, the Moldavians, the Transylvanians, the Tartars, and even the janizaries, fought without spirit. In vain the Ottoman general endeavored to revive confidence: they despised him and disregarded his words. He addressed himself to the Pacha of Buda, and to other chiefs, but their only reply was desponding silence. "And thou!" cried he then to the Tartar prince, "wilt thou not assist me?" The khan saw no safety but in flight. The Spahis were making their last efforts: the Polish cavalry opened and dispersed them. The vizier then turned his back, and spread consternation by his flight. The discouragement extended to the wings, which all the bodies of the Christian army pressed at once. Terror deprived of both reflection and strength this immense multitude of men, who ought, in an open plain like that they fought on, to have completely enveloped and crushed their enemy. But all dispersed, and all disappeared, as if by magic; that vast camp, which the eye could not measure, resembled a frightful desert. Night stopped the victorious progress of the Christians, who remained upon the field of battle till daybreak. At six o'clock in the morning, the enemy's camp was given up to the soldiery, whose cupidity was at first suspended by a horrible spectacle: mothers lay stretched about in all directions, with their throats cut, many of them with their infants still clinging to their breasts. These women were not like those who follow Christian armies—courtesans, as fatal to health as to morals; these were wives, whom the Turks preferred sacrificing thus to exposing them to becoming the victims of unbridled conquerors. They had spared a great part of the children. Five or six hundred of these little innocent victims of war were collected by the bishop of Neustadt, and were fed and brought up in the Christian religion. The Germans and the Poles were greatly enriched by the spoils of the Mussulmans. It was upon this occasion the king wrote to the queen, his wife: "The grand vizier has made me his heir, and I have found in his tents to the value of many millions of ducats. So you will not have to say of me as the Tartar wives say when they see their husbands return empty-handed: 'You are not men, you come home without booty.'" Thus, without much bloodshed, the valor and skill of John Sobieski saved Vienna, the empire, and religion. In fact, if Vienna had been taken, as at Constantinople, churches would have been changed into mosques, and nobody can say where Mohammedanism, which already was spread over so much of the globe, might have ended. Staremberg came, immediately after the victory, to salute the preserver and liberator of Vienna, into which city the hero entered over ruins, but amid the acclamations of the people. His horse could scarcely pierce through the crowd who prostrated themselves before him, who would kiss his feet, calling him their father, their avenger, the greatest of monarchs. Leopold seemed to be forgotten—they only saw Sobieski.—Robson.

VILLAVIOSA, A.D. 1710.—At Villaviosa, a town in Spain, was fought, in the year 1710, a battle between the French army and the Spaniards, under Vendome, which resulted in the defeat of the former. This battle put an end to the War of Succession, and seated Philip V. on the Spanish throne.

VILLIMPENTA, A.D. 1796.—Near Villimpenta, a town of Austrian Italy, an engagement took place in 1796, between a body of French troops and an Austrian detachment. After a severe contest the French troops were almost cut to pieces by the enemy.

VILMANSTRAND, A.D. 1741.—In the year 1741 a battle took place near Vilmanstrand, in Finland, between the Swedes and Russians. The battle was obstinately contested, but finally resulted in the defeat of the Swedes.

VIMEIRA, A.D. 1808.—On the 21st of August, 1808, a battle was fought near Vimeira, in Portugal, between the English army under Sir Arther Wellesley, afterward Duke of Wellington, and the French and Spanish forces under Marshal Junot, Duke of Abrantes. After a severe struggle the latter were defeated, and for this victory Wellesley and the officers and soldiers under his command were voted the thanks of the British Parliament, the first of the many similar honors which afterward were showered so bountifully on the head of the "Iron Duke."

VITTORIA, A.D. 1813.—On the 21st of June 1813 was fought the famous battle of Vittoria, in Spain, between the Anglo-Spanish army, under the Duke of Wellington, and the French under Joseph Bonaparte and Marshal Jourdan. The battle was obstinately contested; but resulted finally in the defeat of the French. The loss of men in the battle was about equal; but the French were totally defeated, with the loss of all their baggage, artillery, ammunition, and treasure, and obliged to make a rapid retreat across the Pyrenees. Napier devotes nearly thirty pages in his History of the Peninsular War to this battle; but our limited space compels us to simply mention it. See Pyrenees.

WAGRAM, A.D. 1809.—The battle of Wagram was one of Napoleon Bonaparte's greatest victories. It was fought in the vicinity of Wagram, a village of the archduchy of Austria, on the 6th of July, 1809, between the grand army of France and the army of Charles, Archduke of Austria. The battle was one of the most bloody and obstinate of the war. The Austrians were totally defeated, losing over 20,000 men taken prisoners, beside a vast number killed and wounded. This victory led to an armistice which was soon followed by the treaty of Schönbrun.

WAKEFIELD, A.D. 1460.—This town is situated on the Colder, in York county, England. The battle of Wakefield was fought on the 24th of December, 1460, between the Lancastrians and the Yorkists. The Lancastrians were commanded by Queen Margaret, the Yorkists by the Duke of York. After an obstinate conflict the Yorkists were defeated with a loss of 2,000 men, killed. The Duke of York was slain, and his son, the Earl of Rutland, was assassinated immediately after the battle. During the night the Earl of Salisbury fell into the hands of the Lancastrians, and was decapitated the next day at Pontefract. But no one was more lamented than the Earl of Rutland, who had only reached his eighteenth year. Accompanied by one to whose care he had been intrusted, he fled from the conflict, but was stopped on the bridge of Wakefield, when he was asked his name. Unable to speak through terror he fell on his knees, and his attendant thinking to save him said he was the son of the duke. "Then," exclaimed Clifford, "as thy father slew mine, so will I slay thee and all of thy kin," and plunging his dagger into the breast of the young prince, bade the tutor go and bear the news to the boy's mother. The queen, on her arrival, was presented with the head of the Duke of York, and ordered it to be encircled with a crown of paper, and placed on the walls of York.

WARSAW.—Warsaw, the metropolis of Poland has been the scene of many bloody conflicts. In 1703, Warsaw surrendered to Charless XII. In 1793 the Emperor of Russia put a garrison into this city in order to compel the Poles to acquiesce in the usurpations she had in view; but the citizens, on the 17th of April, 1793, expelled this garrison with a loss of 2,000 killed and 500 wounded, and 36 pieces of cannon. The King of Prussia besieged Warsaw in July 1794; but was compelled to raise the siege by the heroic resistance of Kosciusko and his gallant comrades. But on the 10–12th of October 1794 the Poles suffered a great defeat in a battle with the Russians, and Suwarrow, on the 8th of November, took and sacked the suburb of Praga, and cruelly butchered 30,000 Poles of all ages and conditions, in cold blood. Warsaw after this submitted to the conquerors. We have thought fit to give an account of the Polish revolution of 1831, in which Warsaw played such an important part, and feel obliged from want of space to limit ourselves to a mere mention of the battles which took place near and in Warsaw prior to that time.

Ever since the year 1825, a secret society had existed in Poland, having for its principal object to restore the national independence. The disgust occasioned by the brutality of the Grand Duke Constantine, commander-in-chief of the Russian forces, in the kingdom of Poland, and the belief that England and France were ready to assail Russia, in the year 1830 precipitated the Poles into an insurrection. The insurrection broke forth on the 29th of November, 1831, in Warsaw; the Russian troops, with the grand duke were expelled from the city, and a provisional government was appointed. The Emperor Nicholas of Russia made immediate preparations to crush the rebellion; he warned the Poles that "the first cannon-shot fired would be the signal of the ruin of Poland." At the same time he declared that he knew how to distinguish the guilty from the innocent, and offered unconditional amnesty to all except the leaders of the revolt. The Poles refused these terms, and all classes prepared with resolution for a decisive conflict with the Emperor of Russia. The situation of Poland was most critical; Austria and Prussia, virtually took the side of Russia, and the little kingdom was surrounded on all sides by a hedge of bayonets, leaving it no chance of foreign succor in maintaining the contest with its gigantic enemy. On the 5th of February, the Russians under General Diebitch, advanced in three columns from Lithuania toward Warsaw. The army consisted of 100,000 men, with 320 guns. The right wing under Generals Szachoffskoi and Manderstein entered the Polish territory by Kowno and Grodno; the left under General Geismar, debouched by Wlodawa, and moved upon Lukow and Lublin; and the center, 80,000 strong, with 280 guns, under Diebitch in person, and divided into four corps under the orders of Generals Pachlen, Rosen, the Grand Duke Constantine, and General Dewitt, advanced by Tykoczyn on the direct road to Warsaw. To oppose this immense army the Poles could calculate on an army of only about 50,000 men ready for immediate service; but they expected an addition to their force of 40,000 men who were yet unequipped. The Russians had also a great superiority in artillery; the Poles having only 126 pieces. The Poles endeavored to check the advance of the Russians toward their capital; the battles of Grochow and Praga ensued, and the insurgents were driven into Warsaw. The Polish general, Kadziwil, had not displayed military talents in the battle of Grochow and Praga, equal to the emergency, and the command of the armies was taken from him and bestowed upon Skrzynecki, whose exploits and military talents ere long justified the choice. Skrzynecki's first care, on being elevated to the supreme command, was to endeavor to open a negotiation with Marshal Diebitch for the restoration of peace; but his efforts were fruitless. The Russian commander had no power to treat except on the terms of unconditional surrender, and to these conditions the Poles would not listen. Both parties, therefore, made preparations to renew the conflict. Diebitch spread his army out in extended cantonments, reaching over a breadth of eighty English miles, for the sake of provisions and lodgings for his numerous followers; and Skrzynecki made the utmost efforts to raise the spirits and increase the number and efficiency of his troops. Hostilities were soon resumed. The troops of the Polish general now amounted to 55,000 men of whom 16,000 were cavalry, with 125 guns. His plan was to take advantage of his central position, protected by the fortifications of Warsaw, and fall with his concentrated forces upon Diebitch's men while still dispersed in their cantonments. At midnight on the 30th, he set out from Warsaw, with the divisions of Rybinski, Malachowski, and Gielgud, consisting in all of about 25,000 men, and advancing in the utmost silence across the bridge of the Vistula, favored by a thick fog, fell by surprise on the Russians under Geisman and routed them with great loss. The victorious pursued the fugitives who fell back on the corps of Rosen which was in battle array at Dembewielkie sixteen miles from Warsaw. The position of the Russians was strong; but the gallant Poles attacked them with great fury. The Russians made an obstinate resistance, and the battle continued with various success until the evening of the 31st, when the Poles by a vigorous charge of cavalry broke the enemy's center, and put the whole of Rosen's corps to flight. The Poles were too much exhausted by the two battles and their long march, to pursue; but as it was, they took six thousand prisoners, and inflicted an equal loss in killed and wounded on the enemy, who dispersed in all directions, no longer preserving even the appearance of an army. Such of the fugitives as could be reached by the Polish horse surrendered without resistance; the peasants brought in great numbers who were straggling in the woods; and so great was the consternation of the Russians that the next morning presented the extraordinary spectacle of two persons, unarmed, hurrying to the Polish head-quarters twelve Russian soldiers, whom they allowed to carry their muskets, to avoid the trouble of carrying the burden themselves. Rosen, after this terrible disaster, retired to Siedlece with the shattered remnant of his army, and Skrzynecki advanced his head-quarters to Kalackzyn, where he was joined on the 30th of April by General Milberg with 7,000 men, which more than repaired the losses of the preceding action. On the 10th of April the Polish general, with 25,000 of his best troops, advanced against Rosen who was in a position with an equal force on the Kostrzyn, covering the approach to Siedlece. A battle ensued at the bridge of Igaine; the Russians were again defeated, and put to flight, abandoning twelve guns and 1,500 prisoners to the victorious Poles.

Meanwhile, the right wing of the Polish army under Sierawiki and Pac, 15,000 strong, advanced from Warsaw across the Vistula against the Russians under General Kreutz at Lublin.

Kreutz's force consisted of 12,000 men, and he was observing the movements of Dwernecki, who, with the left wing of the Polish army, was at Zamose, ready to throw himself into Volhynia, to stir up an insurrection in that province. The Polish generals, in two divisions, 9,000 being under Sierawiki, and 6,000 under Pac, crossed the Vistula, and advanced cautiously against Kreutz, who lay at Belzyec, in a strong position, at the entrance of a forest, with twenty-four guns. Unfortunately, Sierawiki, when alone, and with his cavalry in part detached, on the 18th of April, came upon Kreutz; and the brave Poles, undaunted by the superior numbers of the enemy, rushed to the conflict. The Poles numbered only 6,000, with six guns: the Russians 12,000, yet the former maintained the strife with the utmost gallantry, and finally, when compelled to retreat, withdrew in good order, without the loss of a single gun or prisoner. In killed and wounded, they lost 1,500 men. The Russian loss was nearly as great, and they were unable to follow up their advantage. This disaster was followed by another still greater. Dwernecki, who was to have been supported by Sierawiki, advanced early in April, into Volhynia, with only 4,000 men, of whom, 2,700 were horse, with twelve field pieces. He crossed the Bug at Krilow, on the 10th of April, and marched against 13,000 Russians, under General Rudiger, who was to be supported by Roth, with 12,000 more. Dwernecki relied on the insurrection, which was ready to break out in Volhynia, for aid against the immense forces of the enemy. He defeated a Russian detachment which tried to oppose a passage, and addressed an animated proclamation to the Volhynians, calling on them "now or never" to combat for their ancient liberties. Few, however, at first, answered the appeal. Ignorant of the number of his opponents, whom he estimated at 12,000 men, the Russian general retired before the Poles, and in several skirmishes the Russians were defeated; but at length, learning the real number of the Poles, Rudiger stood firm, and a general action ensued. Despite their inferior numbers, Dwernecki's hussars made several successful charges, and took eight pieces of cannon, and 800 prisoners, and finally drove the Russians, four times their number, from the field of battle. Next day the Polish general advanced to Podolia, and on the 23d of April, reached Kolodon; but there he was assailed by Rudiger on one side, and Krasucki with a part of Roth's corps on the other; and thus pressed by forces nine times as great as his own, the Polish general was compelled to cross the Austrian frontier, and enter Gallicia, where his men were immediately disarmed, and conducted into the interior. But they were so negligently guarded by the Austrian government, that almost all, though without arms, regained the standards of independence. The irruption of Dwernecki, and his early success, roused a formidable insurrection in Podolia, the southern parts of Volhynia, and the Ukraine; but the insurrectionists were soon overpowered by the host of Russians, which were spread through the country.

The two grand armies in the center, meanwhile, were inactive. Diebitch was awaiting reinforcements; and Skrzynecki did not deem it expedient to resume the offensive. At length yielding to the solicitations of the patriots in Lithuania, the Polish general sent two detachments under Lowuiski, and Sankowski, to endeavor to penetrate into Russian Poland, and enable the people of Lithuania to commence their insurrection; but the Poles were met by superior bodies of Russians, and compelled to retreat. The insurrection, however, headed by some brave partisans, broke out in that province, and gave the Russians great uneasiness, as it lay directly on their line of operations. At length on the 26th of April, Diebitch having been largely reinforced, resumed the offensive, and advanced with 40,000 men to Jerusalem, while 15,000 marched on Kaluckzyn. Skrzynecki, instead of attacking him, retreated on his approach. On the 28th of April, the Russians were again in Minsk, where they remained a few days, and then retired to their old position behind Siedlece, while the Poles again resumed the ground on their front. Skrzynecki, having been informed of the first success of Dwernecki in Volhynia, and not yet being apprised of his ultimate disasters, detached Chrzanowski with 6,300 men, with orders to march upon Lublin, attack Kreutz, and march by Zamose into Volhynia. The Polish general, in the first instance, gained several advantages in detached combats, in one of which, near Lubarton, on the 9th of May, he made 800 prisoners; but Kreutz having collected his forces, attacked him with greatly superior numbers on the following day, and, although the Poles displayed the most heroic valor, they were obliged to retire with considerable loss; the insurrection in Volhynia was effectually quelled: the defeat of Dwernecki having extinguished all the hopes of the patriots in that quarter.

On the 12th of May, Skrzynecki, with 46,000 men, and 100 guns advanced from his position in front of Kostrzyn, against the Russian guards, who formed the right wing of the Russian army, and were cantoned in and around Ostrolenka, hoping to overwhelm them before the remainder of Diebitch's corps could come up to their relief. Umrinski with 6,000 men, was left to make head against Diebitch, who, little suspecting what was going on on his right, advanced with 24,000 men against him, expecting to encounter the bulk of Skrzynecki's army. The Russian guards did not venture to await the attack of the Poles even in the intrenchments they had raised around Ostrolenka, and retired toward Bialystok, closely followed by Skrzynecki, who, on the 21st of May, attacked and defeated the rear guard with great slaughter at Jykoczyn. By this advance, the Russian right was driven so far back, that the road to Lithuania, was thrown open, and a division of 4,000 Poles, under Chlapowski was immediately pushed forward into that province. The Polish general had thus succeeded in opening a communication with, and throwing succors into Lithuania; but the difficulty was, for him to get back and regain his communications with Warsaw, after having gained this advantage. Diebitch resolved to concentrate his forces, and attack the Polish army.

Fearful of being assailed in rear, the Polish general rapidly retired, crossed the Narew, and occupied Ostrolenka, with part of his forces. But the advance of Diebitch had been so swift that it had in a manner cut the Polish army in two. The divisions of Gielgod and Lubienski were separated from the remainder of the army in Ostrolenka. On the night of the 25th, Diebitch advanced close up to the two last Polish divisions, and early in the morning of the 26th commenced an attack on Lubienski's division with greatly superior forces. If the attack of Diebitch had been as vigorous as his night march had been rapid, Lubienski's division would have been totally destroyed; but the assault was so feeble that Pac had time to issue from Ostrolenka, recross the Narew, and advance to the support of Lubienski.

Battle of Ostrolenka.—This brought on a general battle. Lubienski, seeing his communications so seriously threatened, and that certain destruction awaited him if his retreat were turned into a rout, made the most vigorous efforts to maintain his ground; but his troops at length were overwhelmed by numbers and driven back in disorder to the bridges of the Narew, over which the Russians passed pell-mell with the last of the fugitives. The bulk of Lubienski's men got safely over, and drew up in two lines in good order on the left bank of the river. The Russians, however, passed rapidly over, and supported the passage by two powerful batteries, one of 34 and another of 36 guns, on the right bank, which thundered with terrible effect on the Polish lines on the opposite side. The moment was in the last degree critical; for if the Russians succeeded in establishing themselves in Ostrolenka, the Polish army was cut in two, and Gielgod's division, which was still on the opposite bank, would in all probability be destroyed. Skrzynecki did all that skill and courage could effect to repair the check which he had sustained. Both parties brought up fresh forces every minute to the field of battle, which was extremely narrow, and was speedily crowded with combatants; the Poles straining every nerve to drive back the Russians to the left bank; the Russians to make good the footing they had got on the right. In despair Langerman made a gallant charge with the bayonet, which checked the Russians, and two battalions laid down their arms; but the Poles were unable to collect the prisoners for want of cavalry, and they all escaped. Skrzynecki, who arrived on the field of battle at eleven o'clock, made the most incessant efforts to prevent the enemy from extending themselves on the right. Wherever danger was greatest, he was to be seen animating the troops by his voice and example; his clothes were pierced with balls, and nearly all his aid-de-camps were killed or wounded. The Polish artillery of Colonel Bem, which was at last brought up, replied with effect to the enemy's batteries, and made deep chasms in their ranks. Toward evening the fire slackened on both sides, owing to the want of ammunition and the fatigue of the combatants; and at nightfall, the Russians withdrew all their forces to the left bank of the river, leaving only detachments to guard the têtes-du-pont on the right. In this terrible battle the Poles lost 7,000 men killed and wounded, including Generals Kichi and Kaminsky, who fell gloriously on the field. The Russian loss was not less than 10,000 men, owing to the dense masses in which they fought, and to the unerring precision of the Polish gunners. But to the Poles 7,000 men was a much greater loss than 10,000 to the Russians, and in a council of war held the next day, all the generals, with the exception of Skrzynecki, who resolutely maintained that they should keep their ground, counseled a retreat. This opinion prevailed, and the army retired leisurely and unmolested by Pultusk to Praga, opposite Warsaw; but they were permanently severed from the division of Gielgod. Diebitch, the Russian general, died of the cholera, which epidemic was raging in his army, on the 10th of June; and on the 27th of the same month, this event was followed by the death of the Grand Duke Constantine, who also fell a victim to the epidemic.

After the battle of Ostrolenka, the two principal armies remained nearly a month in a state of inactivity. Skrzynecki lay under cover of the guns of Praga, recruiting his shattered ranks; while the Russian army, which, after the death of Diebitch, was intrusted to the skillful hands of Paskiewitch, was engaged in reorganizing its divisions and receiving reinforcements from the interior. Chlapowski and Gielgod, having been by the retreat of the Russians from Ostrolenka entirely cut off from the main body of the Polish army, had no alternative but to throw themselves into Lithuania, and endeavor to find support in the insurrection in that province. The two generals formed a junction at Minsk, and with their united forces, 12,000 strong, with 24 guns, advanced into the heart of Lithuania, where a powerful and enthusiastic party only awaited their arrival to join the insurrection. The contest had begun there some time before; when Chlapowski had entered the country some thousand insurgents had joined the Polish standard; but they were poorly armed, and destitute of artillery or magazines, and were repeatedly defeated by the Russians in detached bodies; yet so great was their spirit and patriotism, that they rose above their defeats, and continued the contest under every disadvantage. At the time of the battle of Ostrolenka, Chlapowski was at the head of an army of 7,000 men, in which a heroine, Mademoiselle Plater, held a command; and the arrival of Gielgod's corps, which nearly doubled his forces, encouraged the Poles to make an advance on Wilna, the capital of the province, which was occupied by the Russians. General Sacken, with 4,000 Russians, advanced to stop their progress, and was defeated with the loss of 2,000 men. The Poles crossed the Niemen and advanced with 11,000 men to the neighborhood of Wilna. This movement roused the whole country. The Lithuanians, to the number of 11,000, flocked to the Polish standards, but there was no time to organize or arm them before the contest was decided under the walls of Wilna.

Battle of Wilna.—The city of Wilna was occupied by 21,000 Russians, 18,000 of whom were posted in an intrenched camp, under General Sacken, in front of the town, while 3,000 were kept in reserve within its walls, to overawe the discontented citizens, who on the first reverse were ready to break out into insurrection. The Polish generals had only 14,000, of whom not more than one half were old troops fit to engage in a regular combat, and what was even worse, they had little confidence in Gielgod, who had the chief command. Dembinski, with 4,000 more, was at a distance, but took no part in the conflict. The battle took place on the 18th of June; the Polish right, under Zalewski, defeated the Russian left; but Gielgod was repulsed in the center, and his guns dismounted by the superior fire of the Russian artillery; and in the end the Poles were obliged to retreat with a loss of 1,000 men. This check proved fatal to the Polish cause in Lithuania. Zalewski, who remained last on the field of battle, was cut off from Gielgod, and driven to Merecz, where he passed the Niemen, and sought refuge in the forests of the palatinate of Augustow. Gielgod, himself, whose forces were weakened at every step by the desertion of the Lithuanian levies, who despaired of the cause, retreated with the troops which still remained with him, toward the Polish frontier, leaving Dembinski and Zalewski to their fate. He was vigorously pursued by Sacken, and nothing but disaster attended his retreat. Repulsed in an assault on Szawle on the Niemen, on the 7th of July, the Polish division rapidly melted away, and, at length, tracked by different corps of Russians, compelled to take refuge in Prussian territories, on the 12th, where the men were immediately disarmed.

Such was the indignation of the Polish officers at this catastrophe, that one of them, named Skalski, dashed out of the ranks mounted on a fiery steed, and galloping up to Gielgod, discharged a pistol at his breast.

The unfortunate general instantly fell, and died a few moments after, protesting with his last breath his fidelity to his country. The event proved that he had been the victim of unmerited vengeance; for Roland's corps, to which the assassin belonged, was on the 16th of July obliged to follow his example and take refuge in Prussian territory, where it was also disarmed. Dembinski, more fortunate than either, passing between the divisions of the grand Russian army stationed to intercept him, made his entry on the 3d of August, into Warsaw, amid the enthusiastic cheers of the inhabitants. Sixty thousand persons went out to meet him; the crowd pressed round his horse, embraced and kissed his feet, imploring on him the blessings of heaven. They might well be proud of their hero. He had marched five hundred and fifty miles in twenty-five days, crossed ten rivers, and brought his corps intact through a host of enemies to Warsaw. The annals of war do not record a more memorable exploit.

The disastrous issue of these attempts to spread the insurrection in Volhynia and Lithuania, and the irreparable loss of nearly 20,000 men to the grand army, with which they were attended, were fatal to all the hopes of Polish independence. Nothing remained to its supporters, but, like Cæsar, to meet their fate with resolution and fall with honor. Prussia now openly and in an efficient manner espoused the cause of Russia, and Skrzynecki in vain endeavored to bring back that government to a system of neutrality. Paskiewitch, in view of this state of affairs, resolved to adopt an entirely different plan of operations than that which had proved so unfortunate under Diebitch. He resolved to cross the Vistula, and carry the war into the hitherto unprotected country on the left bank between that river and the Polish frontier. It is true, by doing this he lost all his communications with Lithuania and Russia; but the conduct of Prussia had secured him a base even superior in utility and convenience to that of his predecessor. In the end of June the Russian general assembled the bulk of his forces, 60,000 strong, with 300 pieces of cannon, at Pultusk on the Narew, while Golowin and Rudiger, with 23,000 men were in reserve behind the Bug and the Wieprz. Russian vessels of war, laden with provisions, stores, and munitions of war, landed at Dantzic, Prussia, whence their cargoes were forwarded to the Russian head-quarters; and the country everywhere was crossed by convoys of all kinds, from the Prussian territory. "Time will show," says Alison, "whether that country has not put the seal to her own ultimate subjugation" by her conduct in this struggle.

Finding themselves assailed by such immense forces, to which Skrzynecki had not 25,000 men to oppose, the Polish government called upon the people to rally for the cause of liberty, and the whole inhabitants worked day and night with incredible diligence at the fortifications of the capital. An energetic proclamation was issued by the government, which began with these words, "In the name of God; in the name of the liberty of the nation now placed between life and death; in the name of its kings and heroes, who have combated in former days for its religion and independence; in the name of justice and the deliverance of Europe, we call on all classes to come forward to defend their country." All nobly met the appeal. The nobles and senators who were absent, all flocked to Warsaw to share the danger, and, if necessary to die in the cause of liberty. The Russian army broke up from Pultusk on the 4th of July, and advanced toward Plock, making a circuit around Modlin where Skrzynecki had established himself with 21,000 men, who, with the garrison of that fortress, brought up his forces to 30,000 combatants. The Polish troops were too much depressed by their recent defeats to hazard a battle, and the Russian general advanced by Plock to Osick, on the Vistula, where the material of three bridges had been prepared by the Prussian government. The bridges were quickly thrown across, and the army passed over. The Polish army, upon this, quitted Modlin and marched rapidly to Warsaw, while Paskiewitch drew the corps of Rudiger from Volhynia, which, crossing the Vistula above Warsaw, advanced down the left bank of that river in order to enter into communication with the main army, and join the assault of the capital.

The approach of these vast armies, numbering between them 70,000 combatants, to whom the Poles could not at the utmost oppose more than 30,000, excited the utmost sensation at Warsaw, and roused to the very highest degree both the patriotic spirit and the savage passions of the people. Several councils were appointed to inquire into the conduct of the military operations, and the causes of the disasters which had recently been experienced. Skrzynecki, finding the current in the capital too strong to be resisted, resigned the command, and was succeeded by Dembinski. Krukowieckski was soon after appointed President of the Council of Government. On the day following the dismissal of Skrzynecki a grand review of all the troops, was held around Warsaw, at which the displaced general rode beside his successor. The troops beheld their beloved chief in his misfortune with the most poignant sorrow. Tears ran down their cheeks; but soon their sorrow was turned into enthusiasm, when Skrzynecki exhorted them to exhibit the same submission to their new general that they had shown to him; and Dembinski promised to follow in the footsteps of his predecessor. But different scenes were transpiring in the city. On the 15th and 16th of August the mobs excited by the approach of the Russians, and the declamation of the clubs, assembled in the streets, and with loud shouts of "Treason! treason!" first invaded the palace, and overturned the government, and then breaking into the prisons they murdered all the state prisoners, including Jankowski and Bukowski, who had been tried to please the clubs for their want of success in Volhynia, but had been acquitted. The government resigned the next day, and was succeeded by a new set of rulers at the head of which was Krukowieckski. But the doom of Warsaw was sealed. The last hour was rapidly approaching. The different factions of the city were united by common danger and resolved to defend the city to the last extremity. On the 18th of August the Polish army was posted in the intrenched camp, upon which the inhabitants had long been laboring, before the town. Skrzynecki gave proof of his greatness of soul and true patriotism, by taking the command which was offered him of one of the columns. The whole Polish army consisted of 57,500 men in the intrenched camp at Warsaw, with 136 guns harnessed, besides 20,000 other troops with 10 guns at Modlin and Zarnosc. At the close of August the Russian general having concentrated his forces, appeared before the city with 77,000 men. Rudiger with 12,000 Russians approached Praga on the opposite side of the river, and thus Warsaw was threatened by an army of nearly 90,000 men, with no less than 386 pieces of cannon. Paskiewitch gave the government of Warsaw till the 5th of September to surrender at discretion. The Polish government, instead of despairing at this crisis, resolved on the offensive, and sent 20,400 men under Ramorino to the right bank of the Vistula into the palatinate of Podlachia; while Lubienski, with 2,800 horse was dispatched into that of Plock to threaten the Polish communications. The remainder of the Polish army, 34,000 strong, guarded the intrenched camp of Warsaw, with 216 pieces of cannon. The intrenchments consisted of two lines, the first of which was mounted with 47 pieces of position; the second with 78; while the remainder, consisting of 84 pieces harnessed, were ready to carry assistance to any point which might require it. Ramorino defeated the united forces of Rosen and Golowin which were opposed to him with the loss of a thousand killed and wounded, besides 1,500 prisoners, and drove them back in confusion to Biala. But this success, great as it was, and important as it might have been at an earlier period, was attended with no material results. The contest was to be decided under the walls of Warsaw, and bitterly was the want of Ramorino's 20,000 veterans felt in the decisive conflict which then ensued.

The 6th of September, 1831, was an eventful day. The struggle of liberty against tyranny was about to be brought to a close; and, unlike the conflict of right against might in the western continent forty years before, it was to be decided in favor of tyranny. Those noble men who had struggled with such energy for the blessed privilege of enjoying those rights which belong to every man, high or low, were about to be crushed by the immense horde of minions which the tyrant of Russia had sent against them. At daybreak on the 6th, the Russian artillery opened on the Polish lines. The Poles replied with equal spirit, and the thunder of the cannon shook the ground while the air was torn by contending storms of iron. The Russians made their chief attack on the village of Wola, in the first Polish line, which was garrisoned by only three battalions and ten guns, and in the end the assailants brought up no less than 100 pieces of cannon to concentrate their fire upon it. The Poles, unable to withstand the fearful tempest, were compelled to evacuate the village at ten o'clock, and the Russians immediately occupied it in strength, and armed it with several additional batteries of their own, of heavier caliber than any the Poles could oppose to it. The Poles under Malchaowski made several desperate attempts to recover this important point, but all in vain. Wola was occupied by four strong battalions, which were fed by sixteen more placed in its rear; and the efforts of the Poles to retake it, only led to a terrific slaughter, which ended in their troops being forced back in that quarter with the second line. There the Poles made a most obstinate resistance. The troops fought like tigers; the gunners worked their pieces with the most admirable precision and rapidity; the officers animated their soldiers to desperate deeds by voice and example, and above all several heroines clothed in men's attire, fought for their country with the valor of the other sex, and by their brilliant deeds aroused the courage of the troops to enthusiasm. While this bloody conflict was going on around Wola, the Russian general directed strong columns of attack against the village of Kruli Karnia, and soon the fire was general as far as the barrier of Jerusalem close to Warsaw. The Polish commanders upon this ordered a general advance. The troops obeyed with alacrity; and a fight of the utmost obstinacy ensued. The Russians were slowly driven back; and the slaughter during this conflict was terrible. But it was too late.

The capture of Wola had decided the fate of Warsaw, and Krukowieckski, who had never been beyond the second line, returned at three o'clock to the seat of government, declaring that all was lost and that nothing remained but to surrender. He demanded, and had, during the night, a secret conference with the Russian general; but, after a considerable delay, it led to no result, as Paskiewitch insisted on an unconditional surrender. At one o'clock on the next day the battle was renewed, the Poles having retired at all points to their second line, while the Russians, with 190 guns in front, advanced in dense columns to the attack. The weight of the attack was directed against the faubourg of Wola, and the bridge of Czysto, defended by two strong redoubts on one side and three on the other. A tremendous fire was opened on the works by the Russian guns which preceded their columns; but notwithstanding this, the fire of the redoubts was so vigorous that the Russian columns of assault were shaken, and Uminski by a flank charge completed their defeat near the first of these points. The 20,000 men absent under Ramorino might then have saved Poland, and as it was, the result was for some time doubtful. But toward four o'clock the Russian fire had established a superiority over that of the redoubts which defended the bridge of Czysto, and the corps of Pahlen and Kreutz, the élite of the Russian army, was formed in columns of assault. At a signal given these veterans rushed forward, with drums beating, colors flying, and amid warlike cries, toward the intrenchments. The Poles awaited the approach of the enemy with iron firmness. A terrible shower of cannister and grape was hurled through the ranks of the Russians as they came within range; but the assailants pushed resolutely on, and, reaching the intrenchments, their attack was received by the Poles with desperate courage. But the superiority of the Russian artillery prevailed, and several of the redoubts fell into the hands of the Russians. Upon learning of this disaster Krukowieckski, finding the resistance could no longer be prolonged, agreed to surrender at discretion, on condition that the Polish army was permitted to retire to Plock. Next day the Russians entered Warsaw in triumph at the northern gates, while the Polish troops, in the deepest dejection, wended their way through the southern. Five thousand of their number had fallen; 4,000 prisoners and 130 guns remained in the hands of the conquerors, whose loss in these two bloody days was nearly 20,000. The whole Polish army finally retreated, the troops of Ramorino into Austria, and the principal army under Rybinski, who was elected commander-in-chief after the capitulation of Warsaw, into Prussia, where they were disarmed. Thus terminated the war, after it had continued, with scarce any intermission, for eight months. Short as this campaign had been, it cost the Russians dear. They had lost 180,000 men, more than twice the number that the Poles had at any time brought into the field. The Emperor Nicholas avenged himself on the unfortunate Poles with implacable resolution and cruelty. The noblest families of Warsaw were dragged into exile in Siberia; the oath of allegiance forced from the soldiers by the terror of the knout and threats of death, and the sons of the patriotic families torn from their mothers' arms, and sent off to distant military colonies to serve as common soldiers, where numbers of them perished of fatigue and misery. Liberty was crushed beneath the iron hand of Despotism.

WASHINGTON, A.D. 1814.—After the battle of Bladensburg, in which the Americans were shamefully defeated, the British army, under General Ross, advanced against Washington, the capital of the United States. The invaders entered the city on the 25th of August, 1814, without opposition, and immediately set fire to the public buildings; the capitol, the President's house, and the public offices, with the exception of the patent office, were consumed to ashes, together with the valuable library of Congress. We will not dwell on this subject so painful to all Americans. Whether the British acted on this occasion as becomes an enlightened and civilized nation or not, we leave in the hands of their own historian. "Yet it is to be regretted," writes Alison, "that the luster of the victory has been much tarnished to the British arms by the unusual, and, in the circumstances, unwarrantable extension which they made of the ravages of war to the pacific or ornamental edifices of the capital. The usages of war, alike in ancient and modern times, have usually saved from destruction, even in towns taken by storm, edifices which are dedicated to the purposes of religion or embellishment."

The capture of their capital city aroused the Americans to the highest pitch of indignation and excitement. They no longer remained divided on the subject of the war; but with the utmost enthusiasm prepared to drive the invaders from their territory, and at the battles of Plattsburg, Baltimore, and New Orleans, amply avenged the insults of the enemy at Washington, and proved that Americans united are invincible when defending their own soil.

WATERLOO, A.D. 1815.—Waterloo, ever memorable in military history for the great battle fought in its vicinity, on the 18th of June, 1815, is situated at the verge of the forest of Soignies, on the road from Brussels to Charleroi, nine miles south of the former place, in the province of Brabant in Belgium.

Wellington had resolved to invade France, direct from Flanders, between the Mars and the Oise; but in order to conceal this design from the enemy, he suggested that the Austrians and Russians should invade in the first instance, by Brefort and Huningen, in order to attract Napoleon's forces to that quarter; and as soon as this was done, the British and Prussians united were to march direct upon Paris from Mons and Namur. The armies of Blucher and Wellington united, amounted to 250,000 men, and to oppose this mighty host, Napoleon could only bring into the field 120,000 men.

Napoleon, in order to make his army as strong as possible against the superior numbers of his enemies, resolved to collect all his forces into one mass, and boldly throw them between the British and Prussian armies, separate them from each other, and strike with the utmost vigor, first on the right hand, and then on the left. On the 2d of June, Soult was appointed major-general of the army; and at daybreak on the 15th, the French army crossed the frontier, and moved against Charleroi. The Prussian army, which occupied that town, evacuated it on the approach of the enemy, and retired to Fleurus. The French army crossed the Sambre at Marchiennes, Charleroi, and Chatelet. The French had evidently taken the enemy by surprise, and Napoleon's project of separating the Prussian and British army, seemed about to be carried into effect. With this view, the French emperor dispatched Ney, with the left wing, 46,000 strong, to Quatre-Bras; an important position situated at the point of intersection of the roads of Brussels, Nivelles, Charleroi, and Namur. By the possession of this important post, the French would have entirely cut off the communication between the Prussian and British armies. Meanwhile, Napoleon with 72,000 men, marched toward Fleurus, directly against the Prussian army, which was falling back toward Ligny.

THE BATTLE OF LIGNY.—The Prussian army under Blucher, consisted of 80,000 men, (without the fourth corps, which had not yet come up) of whom 12,000 were cavalry, with 280 pieces of cannon. On the 16th of June, the Prussian army was concentrated on the heights of Brie and Sombref, with the villages of St. Arnaud and Ligny strongly occupied in its front. This position was good, and well chosen, for the villages in front afforded an admirable shelter to the troops, and the artillery placed on the semicircular convex ridge between them, commanded the whole field of battle, and the slope behind, surmounted by the windmill of Bussy, formed a strong point d'appui in case of disaster. Napoleon's force was less numerous than that of the enemy; it consisted of 72,000 men, of whom 8,000 were cavalry, with 240 guns. The emperor's orders to Ney had been to move early in the morning, and occupy Quatre-Bras, before the English army were assembled, and having left a strong detachment there, move with half his forces on Brie, so as to fall on the rear of the Prussians and complete their destruction. The attack in front was not to commence until Ney's guns in the rear showed that he had reached his destined point; and Napoleon, with his army ready drawn up, waited impatiently till three o'clock in the afternoon, expecting the much wished-for signal; but not a sound was heard in that direction, while the loud and increasing cannonade on the side of Quatre-Bras, which was only three miles and a half distant, told clearly that a desperate conflict was going on there. There was now not a moment to lose, if the Prussians were to be attacked before the fourth corps which was stationed between Liege and Hannut, under Burlow, should come up, and at four o'clock, Napoleon gave the signal for attack. In order to conceal his real designs, Napoleon made great demonstrations against St. Arnaud, on the Prussian right, but meanwhile he collected his principal force, concealed from the enemy, opposite the Prussian center at Ligny, which was to be the actual point of attack. The French, under Vandamme, assailed St. Arnaud with great vigor, and after an obstinate struggle, carried that village. Blucher immediately sent reinforcements to this quarter, and Napoleon's center, 30,000 strong, under Gerard, issued from its concealment, crossed the streamlet of Ligny, and pushing up the opposite bank, furiously assaulted the village of Ligny. But if the attack was vehement, the resistance was not less obstinate. Each army had behind its own side of the village immense masses of men, with which the combat was constantly fed; and at length the conflict became so desperate, that neither party could completely, by bringing up fresh columns, expel the enemy, but they fought hand-to-hand in the streets and houses with unconquerable resolution; while the fire of 200 pieces of cannon, directed on the two sides against the village, spread death equally among friend and foe. At seven o'clock, after three hours of furious but indecisive conflict, D'Erlon's corps, part of Ney's force, which had been stationed by that marshal in reserve, two leagues from Quatre-Bras, was withdrawn from there by the positive orders of the emperor, made its appearance on the extreme right of the Prussians beyond St. Arnaud. On their arrival, Napoleon brought forward his Guards and reserves for a furious attack on the enemy's center. Milhaud's terrible cuirassiers advanced at the gallop, shaking their sabers in the air; the artillery of the Guard under Drouot, moved up, pouring forth with extraordinary rapidity its dreadful fire; and in the rear of all, the dense columns of the Old Guard were seen moving forward with a swift pace and unbroken array. This attack, supported by D'Erlon's infantry, and a charge of twenty squadrons of his cuirassiers on the Prussian right flank, proved decisive; the Prussian infantry behind Ligny began to retire, the blood-stained streets of the village fell into the hands of the French; and the Prussians fled in the utmost disorder. The cannon got entangled in the narrow lanes behind Ligny, and the French captured twenty-one pieces. Blucher himself, had his horse shot under him while leading a body of cavalry to a charge to retard the enemy's pursuit, and the Prussian horse were driven back, and the victorious French rode straight over the prostrate general, as he lay entangled beneath his dying steed.

NAPOLEON AT WATERLOO.

The Prussians returning in great force, drove back the French horse, rescued their general, and resumed their flight in great confusion toward Wavres. In this battle the French lost 6,800 men, in killed and wounded; the Prussians were weakened by 25,000 men, 4 standards, and 21 pieces of cannon.

Battle of Quatre-Bras.—While this desperate conflict was raging at Ligny, an engagement on a less extended scale, but equally bloody, took place between the armies of Ney and Wellington at Quatre-Bras. The forces of the allies amounted to 36,000 men; the French army consisted of 23,000 men. The fight was most obstinate, and was continued until nightfall without success to either party. At length, at dusk, Ney retired to Frasnes, a mile from the field of battle; and Wellington's men, wearied alike with marching and fighting, lay on the ground on which they had fought at Quatre-Bras, surrounded by the dead and dying. In this bloody combat the allies lost 5,200 men, killed, wounded and prisoners. The French lost 4,000 men. Among the killed on the English side was the gallant Duke of Brunswick, who nobly fell while heading a charge of his hussars, in the latter part of the day.

The Battle of Waterloo.—During the night of the 16th, Wellington received intelligence of the defeat of the Prussians at Ligny, and perceiving that he could not maintain his position at Brussels, since his left flank was exposed, he, on the morning of the 17th, retreated through Genappe to Waterloo. Napoleon, on the 17th, proceeded to Quatre-Bras, and followed with the great bulk of his army, arranging them nearly opposite the English, on both sides of the high road leading from Charleroi to Brussels. His headquarters were established at La Belle Alliance. Napoleon had detached Grouchy, with 35,000 men, to observe the Prussians who were retiring toward Wavres; his army was therefore, with the losses at Ligny and Quatre-Bras, reduced to about 70,000 men. Wellington's army consisted of about 75,000 men, of whom only about 60,000, composed of British, Hanoverians, and Brunswickers, could be depended upon. The remainder was composed of Belgians, or recently raised Hanoverians. "The field of Waterloo," says Alison, "rendered immortal by the battle which was fought on the preceding day, extends about two miles in length from the old château, walled garden, and inclosures of Hougoumont on the right to the extremity of the hedge of La Haye Sainte on the left. The great road from Brussels to Charleroi runs through the center of the position which is situated somewhat less than three quarters of a mile to the south of Waterloo, and 300 yards in front of the farm-house of Mount St. Jean. This road, after passing through the center of the British line, goes through La Belle Alliance and the hamlet of Rossomme, where Napoleon spent the night. The position occupied by the British army followed very nearly the crest of a range of gentle eminences cutting the high-road at right angles, 200 yards behind the farm-house of La Haye Sainte, which adjoins the highway, and formed the center of the position. An unpaved country road ran along this great summit, forming nearly the line occupied by the British troops, and which proved of great use in the course of the battle. Their position had this great advantage, that the infantry could rest on the reverse of the crest of the ridge, in a situation in great measure secured from the fire of the French artillery; while their own guns on the crest swept the whole slope, or natural glacis, which descended to the valley in their front. The French army occupied a corresponding line of ridges nearly parallel, on the opposite side of the valley, stretching on either side of the hamlet of La Belle Alliance. The summit of these ridges afforded a splendid position for the French artillery to fire upon the English guns; but their attacking columns, in descending the one hill and mounting the other, would of necessity be exposed to a very severe cannonade from the opposite batteries. The French army had an open country to retreat over in case of disaster; while the British, if defeated, would in all probability lose their whole artillery in the defiles of the forest of Soignies, although the intricacies of that wood afforded an admirable defensive position for a broken array of foot soldiers. The French right rested on the village of Planchenois, which is of considerable extent, and afforded a very strong defensive position to resist the Prussians, in case they should so far recover from the disaster of the preceding day as to be able to assume offensive operations, and menace the extreme French right. At ten o'clock in the night of the 17th, Napoleon sent a dispatch to Grouchy, announcing that the allies had taken a position in front of the forest of Soignes, and directing Grouchy to detach from his corps, at about four o'clock in the morning, a division of 7,000 men, with 16 pieces of cannon, with orders to proceed to St. Lambert, and after putting themselves in communication with the right of the main army, to operate against the British left flank. Wellington, on his side, communicated with Blucher during the night, who promised to support him with his whole army. He assured the British general that he would be on the ground by one o'clock. His line of march was to be in three columns, by St. Lambert and Ohain upon Planchenois, so as to fall perpendicularly on the French flank after the combat was fully engaged."

The morning of the 18th of June, opened with a drizzling rain; but by five o'clock the weather cleared, and the sun in occasional glimpses broke through the hazy atmosphere. Both armies were soon in motion. The plains of Waterloo now presented a most magnificent spectacle. On the French side, eleven columns deployed simultaneously to take up their ground; like huge serpents clad in glittering scales, they wound slowly over the hills, amid an incessant clang of trumpets, and rolling of drums from 100 bands of musicians, playing the Marseillaise, the Chante du Depart, the Veillons au Salut de l'Empire, and other popular French airs. The British army, concealed by the swell of the ridge on which they stood, did not present so imposing a spectacle to either army. No clang of trumpets or rolling of drums was heard from their ranks; silently the men took up their ground, and hardly any sound was heard from the vast array, but the rolling of guns, and an occasional word of command from the officers. The French army was soon standing in order of battle. Their artillery was arrayed along the crest of the hill in front. The first line was composed of infantry flanked by dense masses of cavalry; the second line also of infantry was likewise flanked by squadrons of horse; the third line was composed of the grenadiers and lancers of the Guard, and in the rear of all the battalions of the Old Guard occupied each side of the road near La Belle Alliance. D'Erlon with his corps was on the right of the road of La Belle Alliance; Reille and Foy in the center; Jerome on the left, and Ney with the Old Guard in the rear. The allied army was drawn up in the following order: the chateau, garden, and wood of Hougoumont were strongly occupied by General Byng's brigade of guards, as was the farm of La Haye Sainte by a battalion of the king's German legion; Picton's division and Clinton's stood on the left of La Haye Sainte along the line of a rugged hedge; Coll's, the Brunswickers, Hanoverians and Belgians were in the center. The cavalry was all in the rear behind the second line. The left was uncovered, except by a deep ditch impassable for artillery. The artillery was arrayed along the whole front of the positions, and swept the gentle slope which descended from it to the low ground which separated the two armies, wholly unbroken by inclosures or impediments of any kind.

The village clock of Nivelles was striking eleven, when the first gun was fired from the French center. The report of this solitary piece awakened the echoes of 1,000 muskets from the left, as the weighty column, commanded by Jerome, approached the inclosures of Hougoumont. They were received by the English with a stout resistance; but the French pressing forward with the utmost vigor, drove the enemy from the wood around the chateau. The castle and garden, however, defended by a high brick wall, in which a double set of loop-holes had been struck out, presented a strong resistance, and the fight raged here in this quarter more or less during the whole day, until at length, Napoleon caused a battery of howitzers to play upon the building, which soon set it on fire, and the English found it necessary to abandon it. Marshal Ney, with D'Erlon's corps, full 20,000 strong, arrayed in four massy columns, was now ordered to attack the right center of the British army. The troops were already in motion, when Napoleon perceived on his extreme right, in the direction of St. Lambert, a dark mass of troops in the openings of the wood. The emperor was in doubt whether the advancing troops were those of Grouchy or Blucher, and pointing out the moving cloud to Soult, he asked his opinion. "I think," replied Soult, "that it is 5,000 or 6,000 men, probably a part of Grouchy's army." The French emperor, thereupon, sent Generals Damont and Lubervie with 3,000 cavalry, with orders to clear the road in case it should be Grouchy, and if Blucher, to keep him in check; and an order was also dispatched to Grouchy, wherever he might be, to hasten to the field of action. Ney received orders to direct his attack on the farmhouse of La Haye Sainte; it was now noon, and Ney, pushing forward his batteries on his own side of the valley, advanced to the attack in four weighty columns. Wellington no sooner perceived the formidable attack preparing against his left center, than he drew up the noble brigade of horse under Sir William Ponsonby, close in the rear of Picton's division, and stationed Vandeleur's light brigade of the cavalry on the extreme left.

The French advanced steadily driving before them the Belgians, which formed the first line of the enemy, and pushing forward through a tempest of cannon-balls from the British batteries, halted within twenty yards of the British line, and opened a murderous fire which told with fearful effect, and the British under Kempt began to yield. Picton now advanced with his troops and poured in a fire so close and well-directed that for an instant the French columns wavered; but they soon rallied and returned the fire with the utmost vigor, and the gallant Picton, as he was waving his troops on with his sword, fell to the ground pierced through the brain with a musket-ball.*

Kempt immediately took the command; and the British cavalry, rushed from its concealment behind the hedge, and dashing through the openings of the infantry, charged the French columns so furiously, that they faltered; but Napoleon ordered up Milhaud's cuirassiers from the second line, and the French horse, rushing like the wind to the charge, overthrew the English horsemen, and drove them back in disorder. Ponsonby was killed in the hurried retreat; but in the moment of victory the English troops had seized the eighty guns of Ney, or rendered them useless for the remainder of the day. Yet Ney continued to advance upon La Haye Sainte, and the conflict raged around the hill with the greatest fury. The battle soon extended along the whole British front, and the combatants fought with a sternness and obstinacy unparalleled in modern warfare. The air was rent asunder by the terrible and incessant explosion of the mighty artillery of both parties, the sharp rattle of musketry; the heavy tramp of immense masses of horse, moving rapidly one against the other; the crash of the opposing bodies; the shouts, the screams, the groans of the dying and the curses of the combatants, were all mingled in dire confusion, while over the scene of carnage hung the black pall of battle, hiding the face of the sun from the bloody scene below. Never was a battle more furiously contested; never were soldiers animated by such a spirit of deadly animosity, and never were performed greater deeds of personal valor than during the three mortal hours of this terrible strife. The wearisome day of bloody conflict was wearing away, and the battle was not yet decided. Evening was approaching, and Wellington, as well as Napoleon, looked anxiously for the appearance, the one of Blucher, the other of Grouchy.

The English squares had resisted every attempt of the French cavalry to penetrate their ranks; in vain did the dragoons charge and charge again upon the solid squares; the writhing fire of the British troops hurled them back, with fearful loss; the gallant Frenchmen re-forming, hurried again and again into the fiery tempest which thinned their ranks, and burdened the earth with their slain, and after sustaining frightful carnage the cuirassiers were compelled to retire. At length the French heard a firing on their right, and supposing it to come from Grouchy's troops, a cheer arose from their ranks which rung over the field of battle; but, alas! Grouchy had not come. Blucher with his army was at hand, and the French emperor saw that unless a decisive blow was struck immediately the victory was lost. He resolved to make a grand effort with his Young and Old Guards, supported by all the remaining cuirassiers, against the British center, in hopes of piercing it through and destroying Wellington before the bulk of the Prussian forces came up. The Imperial Guard was divided into two columns, which advanced from different parts of the field, to the decisive point on the British right center, about midway between La Haye Sainte and the nearest inclosures of Hougoumont. Reille commanded the first column, which was supported by all the infantry and cavalry which remained of his corps on either flank, and advanced up the hill in an oblique direction beside the orchard of Hougoumont. The second was led by Ney, in person, and moving down the road of Charleroi, to the bottom of the slope, also in a slanting direction, converging toward the same point whither the other column was directing its steps. Wellington, meanwhile, had not been idle. Sir Frederic Adams's brigade, and General Maillaud's brigade of gards, which had been drawn from Hougoumont with Chasse's Dutch troops, yet fresh, were ordered to bring up their right shoulder and wheel inward, with their guns in front, toward the edge of the ridge, and the whole battalion in that quarter inclined to the left, so as to expose the advancing columns coming up to a concentric fire on either flank; the central point where the attack seemed likely to fall, was strengthened by nine heavy guns; the troops at that point were drawn up four deep in the form of an interior angle; the guards forming one side, and the 73d and 30th the other; while the light cavalry of Vivian and Vandeleur was brought up behind the line at the back of La Haye Sainte, and stationed close in the rear, so as to be ready to make the most of any advantage which might occur.

* Picton had been severely wounded at Quatre-Bras, and had two of his ribs broken; but his ardent spirit led him to conceal an injury which had already, as was afterward discovered, left a mortal wound.—Robinson.

It was quarter past seven when the first column of the Old Guard under Reille advanced to the attack. The British guns opened a destructive fire on the flank of the advancing column; but it steadily advanced through the storm, melting under it like hoar-frost beneath the rising sun. Ney's column approached with an intrepid step, and pushed forward through the blinding tempest which sweeping through its ranks committed frightful havoc. General Friant was killed by Ney's side; the marshal's horse was shot under him; but the gallant general, on foot, with drawn sword led on his troops, who, fired by his example, charged furiously upon the enemy, forced back the English guns, and came within forty paces of the English foot guards, and the 73d and 30th regiments who were lying four deep in a small ditch behind the rough road which there goes along the summit of the ridge; but their ranks were fearfully thinned by the terrible storm through which they had passed while crossing the valley and ascending the slope; a skeleton of the noble column only remained, and they were unable to resist the powerful charge of the British guards and infantry, whom Wellington now, in a brief and energetic sentence* ordered to advance. The feeble ranks of the French column were overwhelmed before the furious charge of the English guards, and hurled back in the utmost disorder down the slope. Yet they fought with the utmost valor, refusing to accept quarter, and, it is said, that not one man of the Old Guard escaped alive. With the defeat of the Old Guard the whole French army was put to flight. Blucher, meanwhile, had arrived on the field of battle, and driving the few French troops from La Haye Sainte, opened up a communication with the British left. Wellington now assumed the offensive at all points; the French army was flying in great disorder from the field; the defeat of the Old Guard, heretofore unconquered, had spread a panic through their ranks which no efforts of Napoleon could remove; and the cavalry and artillery of the English and Prussians spread terror and death on every side. The Prussians gave no quarter; but pursued the fugitives with relentless cruelty. Napoleon, at length, finding every thing lost, was moved by the entreaties of his officers and consented to be led from the field. He arrived at Genappe at about ten o'clock at night. The Prussians pursued the French during the whole night. Nine times the wearied French, ready to drop down with fatigue, tried to form bivouacs; nine times they were startled by the dreadful sound of the Prussian trumpet, and obliged to continue their flight. Napoleon's star had sunk forever. We will not dwell upon the recital of his misfortunes. Shorn of his honors, he was soon a captive in the hands of his enemies; a prisoner in the lonely island of St. Helena; and his throne and country were at the mercy of his conquerors.

In this battle the French lost on the field and in the flight upward of 30,000 men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The allies lost 17,000 men in killed and wounded.

WATTIGNIES, A.D. 1793.—The town of Wattignies is in France, three miles southwest of Lille. The battle of Wattignies was fought by the Austrians and the French republicans, on the 15th of October, 1793. The Austrians having, on the 29th of September, laid siege to the city of Mauberge, and having pushed forward their works with a vigor which promised early success, the French army, about 100,000 strong, advanced to raise the siege. The Austrians, with their allies, upon this, concentrated their entire forces between Mauberge and Avennes, and awaited the arrival of the army destined to raise the siege. They numbered 20,000 men, and were possessed of a numerons and efficient body of cavalry, and in all respects were far superior in strength to the army of the republicans. The Duke of York, also, upon hearing of the concentration of the Austrians, was rapidly approaching with an army of 25,000 English soldiers. The French army had been intrusted to the command of Jourdan, whom the republican Convention ordered to clear the French territory of the enemy. Rapidly did the Austrians progress with the siege of Mauberge; their batteries erected near the city, spread terror throughout all the inhabitants. With the utmost speed Jourdan approached the Austrian position, the key of which was the village of Wattignies. On the night of the 15th, Jourdan accumulated his forces in order to make a decisive movement against the village, which, once occupied, would secure the victory. Early on the morning of the 16th, the French army, in three columns, advanced against Wattignies, while from a semicircular battery their artillery poured forth destructive volleys upon the defenders of the village. With the thrilling music of republican airs, which sounded above the roar of the cannon and musketry, the French soldiers dashed into the village, and drove out the

* This order has always been quoted, "Up, guards, and at them!" The English prints, however, since the death of Wellington have denied that he used such language.

Austrians at all quarters. The village won, the victory was gained. After sustaining a loss of 6,000 men, the Austrian commander ordered a general retreat, and the siege of Mauberge was abandoned.

WAVRES, A.D. 1815.—The battle of Wavres was fought on the same day on which the battle of Waterloo took place, between the French troops, under Marshal Grouchy, and the Prussians under General Theilman. The Prussians were defeated; but the time spent by Grouchy in this engagement, prevented him from taking part in the more important battle which was raging at the same time; and to his absence on this occasion has been attributed the decisive defeat of the Emperor Napoleon at Waterloo.

WAXHAW, A.D. 1780.—About nine miles north of the present Lancaster Court-House, and between twenty and twenty-three miles above Hanging-Rock, upon the Waxhaw creek, in South Carolina, an American regiment under Colonel Abraham Buford was massacred by the British, under Tarleton, on the 29th of May, 1780. On the 12th of May Sir Henry Clinton took possession of Charleston, and immediately set about subjugating the whole State. For this pupose he sent out three strong detachments. Cornwallis, with the first, was directed to advance toward the frontier of North Carolina; Colonel Cruger, with the second, was ordered to cross the Saluda, and march against Ninety-six; and Lieutenant-Colonel Brown, with the third, was ordered to advance against Augusta. Shortly after passing the Santee, Cornwallis received intelligence that parties of Americans, who had entered South Carolina to assist Lincoln at Charleston, were retreating toward the north. Among these were the troops of Colonel Buford. This force consisted of about 400 continental infantry, and a small detachment of Colonel William Washington's dragoon corps, with two pieces of cannon. Buford had recently evacuated Camden, and in fancied security was leisurely retreating toward Charlotte, in North Carolina. Cornwallis resolved to cut off Buford, and accordingly detached Tarelton with 700 cavalry. Tarleton marched 105 miles in 54 hours, and overtook the Americans on the Waxhaw; and before Buford was aware of his danger, succeeded almost in surrounding him. The British officer demanded an immediate surrender upon humiliating terms. Buford refused compliance. While the negotiations were pending, Tarleton, in defiance of military rules, was making preparations for an attack, and at the very instant he received Buford's reply, his cavalry charged furiously upon the Americans. The patriots, taken by surprise, were thrown into confusion; some endeavored to defend themselves, others threw down their arms and entreated for quarter. But the British troops were merciless. The unarmed patriots were hewn down in scores: 113 were thus slain; 150 were cruelly maimed, and 53 were made prisoners by the brutal murderers. Only 5 of the British were killed, and 15 wounded. Tarleton, with his blood-stained soldiers, all of Buford's artillery, ammunition, and baggage, and his prisoners, entered Camden in triumph.

The name of Tarleton has become synonymous with that of cruelty, and his memory is branded with deserved infamy. With the defeat of Buford, the continental army in South Carolina was swept away. The inhabitants of that region were filled with consternation and dismay; and whole families abandoned their homes, and fled to more distant settlements to seek refuge from the cruelties of the British. Among the fugitives was the mother of Andrew Jackson, and the massacre of Buford's regiment kindled the first spark of hatred to tyranny in young Jackson's bosom. That spark was fanned into a blaze, which forty years afterward burned as vigorously at the battle of New Orleans, as it did when the youthful hero saw the murder of his countrymen on the banks of the Waxhaw.

WESTROOSEBEKE, A.D. 1382.—In the year 1382, a great battle was fought near Westroosebeke, a village of Belgium, between the united Flemings and French, under Count Louis de Maele, and the revolted men of Ghent, under Philip Van Artevelde. The fight was maintained for many hours, and was one of the most obstinate and bloody actions of the age. The men of Ghent were finally totally defeated, with great loss. Their leader was slain, with over 20,000 men, in the fight.

WHITE PLAINS, A.D. 1776.—This village is situated in White Plains township, Westchester county, New York, twenty-six miles north-east from the city of New York.

The defeat of the Americans in the battle of Brooklyn, cast a cloud over the hopes of the patriots; the timid were disheartened, and a general spirit of insubordination reigned throughout the army. Hundreds deserted the cause, and returned to their homes. The British general was preparing to make an immediate attack upon New York, with troops flushed with a recent victory, and greatly superior in numbers to those of the Americans; and Washington himself was filled with gloomy misgivings. He called a council of war, and the evacuation of the city was decided upon. The military stores were to be removed to Dobbs's Ferry, on the Hudson for security, and the army was to retreat to and fortify Harlem heights, near the head of Manhattan island. This was speedily accomplished; and on the 16th of September, Washington established his head-quarters on the heights of Harlem river, about ten miles from New York. A rear guard of 4,000 men, under Putnam, was left in the city, with orders to join the main body if necessary. The Americans exerted themselves to their utmost to strengthen their postion, and before the British took possession of the city, they were strongly fortified. Howe now prepared to enter New York. Strong detachments of the British army were sent in boats from Hallet's Point, Long Island, to take possession of Buchanan's and Montressor's (now Ward's and Randall's) islands in the East river, at the mouth of the Harlem, and on the morning of the 15th of September, Sir Henry Clinton with 4,000 men, crossed the East river, and landed at Kip's bay, under the cover of the guns of ten ships of war. A division of Hessians were also landed at the same place. The American brigades of Parsons and Fellows, who had been left to guard this point, terror-stricken by the cannonade, fled in confusion on the approach of the vanguard of the British. Washington, at Harlem, had heard the fire of the guns of the fleet, and leaping into his saddle, spurred forward toward Kip's bay. He arrived in time to meet the fugitives. Their officers were vainly endeavoring to rally them. Dashing into their midst, Washington entreated them to follow him against the enemy; but they heeded him not; and almost frantic with mortification and despair at their cowardice, Washington, throwing his hat to the ground, turned his horse toward the enemy, and with drawn sword, was about to charge singly upon the enemy; but his bridle-rein was seized by an officer, and he suffered himself to be conducted from the scene of danger. The British finally effected a landing, and encamped upon an eminence nearly in the center of the island. The Americans retreated to Bloomingdale, and Washington sent a messenger to Putnam, with orders to evacuate the city immediately. Putnam succeeded in gaining the heights of Harlem, with the loss of a few men only. At sunset the British troops were encamped in a line extending from Hook's Point across the island to Bloomingdale. The hostile armies were divided by Harlem plains. Early on the morning of the 16th of September, a British force under Brigadier Leslie, advanced toward the American position on Harlem heights, by M'Gowan's pass. The Americans at Mount Morris and Harlem Cove, met Leslie at the mouth of a very deep rocky ravine, and kept them in check. Washington at his quarters heard the firing, and hastened to his outpost, where he was met by Colonel Knowlton, who had been engaged with the advancing enemy; and had now come for orders. The British force in Harlem plains consisted of about 300 men; and they had a strong reserve corps posted in the woods. Washington ordered Knowlton with his rangers, and Major Leitch with three companies of a Virginian regiment, to gain the rear of the advance of the enemy, while a feigned attack should be made in front. Knowlton moved forward to carry the plan into execution; but Leslie, anticipating the intention of the enemy, ordered his troops to advance rapidly to gain an advantageous position on the plains. Knowlton and Leitch upon this, attacked the British immediately on the flank. The Americans were reinforced from the heights, and the British changed their front, and charged the enemy briskly. A severe skirmish ensued. Leitch fell, pierced with three bullets; and a few moments afterward Knowlton was struck in the head by a bullet, and was moved, mortally wounded, from the plains. The Americans maintained their ground, fighting fiercely with their obstinate foes; the British pushed forward gallantly, and for a season, victory seemed hung in a balance. At length, Washington sent a part of a Maryland regiment to reinforce the Americans, and the British were driven back across the plain.

Washington fearing an ambush, now ordered a retreat. In this affair the British lost eighteen killed and about ninety wounded. The American loss was trifling in numbers; but they deeply regretted the death of their gallant commanders, Knowlton and Leitch. Knowlton died on the evening of the day of battle; Leitch lingered until the 1st of October, when he expired. On the 20th of September a conflagration broke out in the city of New York, and in spite of the efforts of the British, it was not extinguished until nearly 500 houses were consumed. Lord Howe saw that the Americans were too strongly intrenched upon Harlem heights, to warrant the hope of a successful attack; and therefore resolved to get in their rear and cut off their communication with the east and north, and hem them in on the narrow head of the island. Having left a force of British and Hessians sufficient to guard the city, under Lord Percy, and other troops to maintain his lines toward Harlem, he embarked the balance of his army in ninety flat boats, and proceeding up the East river, landed on the 12th of October upon Throck's Neck. When Washington observed this movement on the part of the enemy, he sent strong detachments under General Heath to oppose their landing, and occupy Westchester. The Americans had constructed a redoubt on the hills near Williams's Bridge; a detachment was at White Plains, busily engaged in throwing up intrenchments; and all the passes to King's Bridge were strongly guarded. The causeway to Throck's Point, was also well defended, and Colonel Hand with his riflemen was stationed on the causeway to Pell's Neck. On the night of Howe's landing on Throck's Point, the bridge was removed, and the British formed themselves on an island. Howe advanced along the causeway, when he was met by Hand's riflemen, and after a brief struggle was driven back. The next day he crossed in boats from Throck's to Pell's Point a little above. Having landed he marched over Pelham Manor, toward New Rochelle. On his march he encountered Glover's brigade of Sullivan's regiment, and after a hot skirmish in which the Americans were repulsed, the British encamped upon some high grounds between Hutchinson's river and New Rochelle village. On the 21st of October he removed his encampment to the heights of New Rochelle, on the road to White Plains.

On the 17th of October, troops from Montressor's island* and Flushing, landed on Throck's Point. Knyphausen with the second division of German mercenaries, arrived at New York on the 18th of October, and on the 22d landed upon Myer's Point, near New Rochelle; and immediately joined the main body of the British army under Howe. The position of the Americans on Harlem heights was highly critical. Washington saw the danger of his army, and on the 16th of October called a council of war; and it was decided that Manhattan island should be speedily evacuated. The entire American army numbered nominally about 19,000 men; but the troops were in a wretched condition, half clothed and poorly armed. The army in four divisions, under Generals Lee, Heath, Sullivan, and Lincoln, slowly moved up the western side of the river Bronx, and formed a series of intrenched camps from the heights of Fordham to White Plains. The American lines therefore extended a distance of about thirteen miles. The Bronx separated the hostile armies. Frequent skirmishes occurred between the two parties, resulting generally in favor of the Americans. These events caused Howe to be slow and cautious in his movements. Fort Lee, situated on the Pallisades on the right bank of the Hudson, nearly opposite Fort Washington, was garrisoned by General Greene with a small force; and Fort Washington was also occupied by an adequate garrison. On the 21st of October, Washington established his head-quarters at White Plains, where the Americans plied spade and pick with the utmost energy, in casting up breast-works. These works were intended as a defense for an intrenched camp, which the Americans were preparing upon the heights of Newcastle, two miles north of White Plains. Upon the approach of the English to White Plains, Washington called in all his detachments, and abandoning the positions he had occupied along the Bronx, assembled his troops in the vicinity of White Plains. On the morning of the 28th of October, both armies were within sight of each other. The Americans were posted behind their breast-works near White Plains; and the British occupied the hills to the south, on the east bank of the Bronx. On the evening of the 27th, Colonel Haslett, with about 1,600 American troops, had taken possession of Chatterton's Hill, a commanding eminence on the west bank of the stream; and on the next morning, McDougall was ordered to reinforce Haslett, with a small body of men, and two pieces of cannon under Captain Alexander Hamilton. McDougall accordingly proceeded thither and assuming general command, fortified his position as well as time would allow. At ten o'clock in the morning of the 28th, the British advanced in two columns, the right commanded by General Clinton, the left by De Heister, and Sir William Erskine. Both columns numbered 13,000 men. Howe was with the second division. When the British army had arrived within a short distance of the village, Howe, having observed the importance of the position taken by General McDougall, and feeling assured that the right of the enemy, which was the only assailable point of the American army, could not be forced so long as it should be protected by a post of such strength, held a council of war with his officers on horseback, in which it was decided to wrest Chatterton Hill from the Americans. A battery of twenty pieces of cannon was erected upon the slope of a hill to the left of the British army, and under cover of its fire, a strong detachment under General Leslie constructed a rude bridge over the Bronx, and then attempted to pass over the stream and ascend the hill occupied by McDougall, to attack him in front. A Hessian regiment, under Colonel Rall, was ordered, meanwhile, to cross the Bronx, a quarter of a mile below, and taking a circuitous route, to fall upon the flank of the enemy. The Americans had planted their artillery on a rocky ledge; and as the British attempted to ascend the hill, whole platoons were swept down before the murderous fire of the enemy. The British recoiled. Colonel Rall, having joined the force of General Leslie, the whole body advanced against the Americans. The patriots made a gallant resistance. Twice were Leslie's troops repulsed and hurled back down the acclivity in confusion; they rallied and pushed forward, and aided by the troops of Rall, who fiercely attacked the Americans in flank, succeeded in forcing the enemy from their position. McDougall retreated in good order to the American intrenchments at White Plains, carrying off his wounded and artillery, and leaving the British in the possession of the hill. The British troops rested on their arms the night after the battle.

* On the 24th of September, 240 Americans, under Colonel Jackson and Major Henley, made a descent on the British at Montressor's island, in flat boats. The British repulsed them with a loss of twenty-two men. Major Henley was among the slain.

The next day a skirmish took place between Glover's brigade and a British detachment. The Americans were driven in, and the British encamped within cannon-shot of the front of the American lines. Howe, having reconnoitered the American intrenchments, found them apparently too strong to attack them, and resolved to await the arrival of Lord Percy, with four battalions from New York, and some troops from Mamaroneck. The loss of the Americans from the 26th to the 28th, was about 300 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The British loss was about the same. Lord Percy joined Howe on the evening of the 30th, and preparations were made to attack the American lines the following morning. A violent storm of wind and rain arose during the night, and continued for twenty hours. All operations were delayed, and the Americans taking advantage of this circumstance, withdrew on the night of the 31st, and encamped on the heights of Newcastle, where they had constructed strong breast-works. The British were afraid to attack the Americans at this place; and on the 4th of November Howe withdrew his army to the juncture of the Hudson and Harlem rivers, and encamped upon Fordham heights, with his left wing extending nearly to King's Bridge. Washington called a council of war, and it was unanimously decided to retreat into New Jersey with the greater part of the army. By the 12th of November the main body of the American army was in New Jersey, and Washington established his head-quarters at Hackensack, in the rear of Fort Lee. All the New England troops under General Heath were left on the east side of the Hudson to defend the Highlands. General Lee, with a rapidly-dwindling force of about 8,000 men,* remained at North Castle, with orders to join Washington if the British should manifest an intention of assailing that quarter. Meanwhile Howe was making preparations to attack Fort Washington. See Fort Washington.

WILNA.—Wilna, or Vilna, is a city of Poland, situated at the confluence of the Vilieka and Vilia, ninety miles north-east of Grodno. A battle occurred at this place, on the 18th of June, 1831, between the Poles, 14,000 strong, and a Russian army of 21,000 men. The Poles were defeated after an obstinate conflict, with a loss of 1,000 men killed and wounded. See Warsaw.

WINDMILL POINT, A.D. 1837.—A battle occurred at this point during the late Canadian rebellion. Windmill Point is on the Canada side of the river St. Lawrence, nearly opposite Ogdensburg. The patriots were about 200 strong, while the British force consisted of nearly six hundred regular troops. The insurgents were defeated with a loss of thirty-six killed and ninety made prisoners. The British lost a hundred and fifty men and twenty officers killed. Among the slain was Captain Drummond. Eleven of the prisoners were hung and the remainder banished to Van Diemen's Land.

WINNEFELD, A.D. 9.—The precise locality of the great battle between the Roman legions under Varus, and the Germans under Arminius, is unknown; but it is supposed that it took place in the eastern part of the woody and hilly region which intervenes between the Lippe and the Ems, round Detmold, the modern capital of the principality of Lippe. This locality is described by Dr. Plate, a modern German scholar, as being "a table-land intersected by numerous deep and narrow valleys, which, in some places, form small plains, surrounded by steep mountains and rocks, and accessible only by narrow defiles. All the valleys are traversed by rapid streams, shallow in the dry season; but subject to sudden swellings in autumn and winter. The vast forests which cover the summits and slopes of the hills consist chiefly of oak; there is little underwood, and both men and horse would move with ease in the forests if the ground were not broken by gulleys, or rendered impracticable by fallen trees." This is the district to which Varus is supposed to have marched, and Dr. Plate adds, that the names of several localities on and near the spot seem to indicate that a great battle has once been fought there. We find the names, "das Winnefeld"* (the field of Victory), "die Knochenbahn" (the bone lane), "die Knochenbach" (the bone-brook), "der Mordkessel" (the kettle of slaughter), and others.

Dark and disheartening even to heroic spirits must have seemed the prospects of Germany when Arminius planned the general rising of his countrymen against Rome. Half the land was occupied by Roman garrisons; and, what was worse, many of the Germans

* The time of the greater portion of these men was to expire during the latter part of November.

* We have selected this name, it will be observed, for the heading of the present article.

seemed patiently acquiescent in the state of bondage. The resources of Rome seemed boundless; her tenacity of purpose was believed to be invincible. Vast, however, and admirably organized as the fabric of Roman power appeared outwardly, yet there was rottenness in the core. The foulest profligacy was general in all ranks. In universal weariness of revolution and civil war, and in consciousness of being too debased for self government the nation had submitted itself to the absolute authority of Augustus. Adulation was now the chief function of the senate, and the gifts of genius and accomplishment of arts were devoted to the elaboration of eloquently false panegyrics upon the prince and his favorite courtiers. With bitter indignation must Arminius have beheld all this, and contrasted it with the rough worth of his own countrymen, their bravery, their fidelity to their word, and their manly independence of spirit. His soul must have burned within him at the contemplation of such a race yielding to these debased Italians.

Still, to persuade the Germans to combine, in spite of their frequent feuds among themselves, in one sudden outbreak against Rome; to keep the scheme concealed from the Romans until the hour for action arrived; and then, without possessing a single walled town, without military stores, without training, to teach his insurgent countrymen to defeat veteran armies and storm fortifications, seemed so perilous an enterprise, that probably Arminius would have receded from it had not a stronger feeling even than patriotism urged him on. Among the Germans of high rank who had most readily submitted to the invaders, and become zealous partisans of Roman authority, was a chieftain named Segestes. His daughter, Thusnelda, was pre-eminent among the noble maidens of Germany. Arminius had sought her hand in marriage; but Segestes, who probably discerned the young chief's disaffection to Rome, forbade his suit, and strove to preclude all communication between him and his daughter. Thusnelda, however, sympathized far more with the heroic spirit of her lover, than with the time-serving policy of her father. An elopement baffled the precautions of Segestes, who, disappointed in his hope of preventing the marriage, accused Arminius before the Roman governor of having carried off his daughter, and of planning treason against Rome. Thus assailed, and dreading to see his bride torn from him by the officials of the foreign oppressor, Arminius delayed no longer, but bent all his energies to organize and execute a general insurrection of the great mass of his countrymen, who hitherto had submitted in sullen hatred to the Roman dominion.

A change of governors had recently taken place, which, while it materially favored the ultimate success of the insurgents, served by the immediate aggravation of the Roman oppressions which it produced, to make the native population more universally eager to take arms. Tiberius, who was afterward emperor, had recently been recalled from the command in Germany, and sent into Pannonia to put down a dangerous revolt which had broken out against the Romans in that province. In the room of Tiberius, Augustus sent into Germany Quintilius Varus, who had lately returned from the proconsulate of Syria.

Varus was a true representative of the higher classes of the Romans. Accustomed to govern the depraved and debased natives of Syria, a country where courage in man and virtue in woman had for centuries been unknown, Varus thought that he might gratify his licentious and rapacious passions with equal impunity among the high-minded sons and pure-spirited daughters of Germany. When the general of an army sets the example of outrages of this description, he is soon faithfully imitated by his officers, and surpassed by his still more brutal soldiery. The Romans now habitually indulged in those violations of the sanctity of the domestic shrine, and those insults upon honor and modesty, by which far less gallant spirits than those of our Teutonic ancestors have often been maddened into insurrection.

Arminius found among the other German chiefs many who sympathized with him in his indignation at his country's abasement, and many whom private wrongs had stung yet more deeply. There was little difficulty in collecting bold leaders for an attack on the oppressors, and little fear of the population not rising readily at those leaders' call. But to declare open war against Rome, and to encounter Varus's army in a pitched battle, would have been merely rushing upon certain destruction. Varus had three legions under him, a force which, after allowing for detachments, can not be estimated at less than 14,000 Roman infantry. He had also 800 or 900 Roman cavalry, and at least an equal number of horse and foot sent from the allied states, or raised among those provincials who had not received the Roman franchise.

It was not merely the number, but the quality of this force that made them formidable; and, however contemptible Varus might be as a general, Arminius well knew how admirably the Roman armies were organized and officered, and how perfectly the legionaries understood every maneuver and every duty which the varying emergences of a stricken field might require. Stratagem was, therefore, indispensable; and it was necessary to blind Varus to their schemes until a favorable opportunity should arrive for striking a decisive blow.

For this purpose, the German confederates frequented the head-quarters of Varus, which seem to have been near the center of the modern country of Westphalia, where the Roman general conducted himself with all the arrogant security of the governor of a perfectly submissive province. There Varus gratified at once his vanity, his rhetorical tastes, and his avarice, by holding courts, to which he summoned the Germans for the settlement of all their disputes, while a bar of Roman advocates attended to argue the cases before the tribunal of Varus, who did not omit the opportunity of exacting court-fees and accepting bribes. Varus trusted implicitly to the respect which the Germans pretended to pay to his abilities as a judge, and to the interest which they affected to take in the forensic eloquence of their conquerors. Meanwhile, a succession of heavy rains rendered the country more difficult for the operations of regular troops; and Arminius, seeing that the infatuation of Varus was complete, secretly directed the tribes near the Weser and the Ems to take up arms in open revolt against the Romans. This was represented to Varus as an occasion which required his prompt attendance at the spot; but he was kept in studied ignoranae of its being part of a concerted national rising; and he still looked on Arminius as his submissive vassal, whose aid he might rely on in facilitating the march of his troops against the rebels, and in extinguishing the local disturbance. He therefore set his army in motion, and marched eastward in a line parallel to the course of the Lippe. For some distance his route lay along a level plain; but on arriving at the tract between the curve of the upper part of that stream and the sources of the Ems, the country assumes a very different character; and here, in the territory of the modern little principality of Lippe, it was that Arminius had fixed the scene of his enterprise.

Contrary to the usual strict principles of Roman discipline, Varus had suffered his army to be accompanied and impeded by an immense train of baggage-wagons and by a rabble of camp-followers, as if his troops had been merely changing their quarters in a friendly country. When the long array quitted the firm level ground, and began to wind its way among the woods, the marshes, and the ravines, the difficulties of the march, even without the intervention of an armed foe, became fearfully apparent. In many places, the soil, sodden with rain, was impracticable for cavalry, and even for infantry, until trees had been felled, and a rude causeway formed through the morass.

The duties of the engineer were familiar to all who served in the Roman armies. But the crowd and confusion of the columns embarrassed the working parties of the soldiery, and in the midst of their toil and disorder the word was suddenly passed through their ranks that the rear guard was attacked by the barbarians. Varus resolved on pressing forward; but a heavy discharge of missiles from the woods on either flank taught him how serious was the peril, and he saw his best men falling round him without the opportunity of retaliation; for his light-armed auxiliaries, who were principally of Germanic race, now rapidly deserted, and it was impossible to deploy the legionaries on such broken ground, for a charge against the enemy. Choosing one of the most open and firm spots which they could force their way to, the Romans halted for the night; and faithful to their national discipline and tactics, formed their camp amid the harassing attacks of the rapidly thronging foes, with that elaborate toil and systematic skill, the traces of which are impressed permanently on the soil of so many European countries, attesting the presence in the olden time of the imperial eagles.

On the morrow the Romans renewed their march, the veteran officers who served under Varus now probably directing the operations, and hoping to find the Germans drawn up to meet them, in which case they relied on their own superior discipline and tactics for such a victory as should reassure the supremacy of Rome. But Arminius was far too sage a commander to lead on his followers with their unwieldy broadswords and inefficient defensive armor, against the Roman legionaries, fully armed with helmet, cuirass, grieves, and shield, who were skilled to commence the conflict with a murderous volley of heavy javelins, hurled upon the foe when a few yards distant, and then, with their short cut-and-thrust swords, to hew their way through all opposition, preserving the utmost steadiness and coolness, and obeying each word of command in the midst of strife and slaughter with the same precision and alertness as if upon parade. Arminius suffered the Romans to march out from their camp, to form first in line for action, and then in column for marching, without the show of opposition. For some distance Varus was allowed to move on, only harassed by slight skirmishes, but struggling with difficulty through the broken ground, the toil and distress of his men being aggravated by heavy torrents of rain, which burst upon the devoted legions, as if the angry gods of Germany were pouring out the vials of their wrath upon the invaders. After some little time their van approached a ridge of high woody ground, which is one of the offshoots of the great Hercynian forest, and is situate between the modern villages of Driburg and Bielefeld. Arminius had caused barricades of hewn trees to be formed here, so as to add to the natural difficulties of the passage. Fatigue and discouragement now began to betray themselves in the Roman ranks. Their line became less steady; baggage-wagons were abandoned from the impossibility of forcing them along; and, as this happened, many soldiers left their ranks and crowded round the wagons to secure the most valuable portions of their property; each was busy about his own affairs, and purposely slow in hearing the word of command from his officers. Arminius now gave the signal for a general attack.

The fierce shouts of the Germans pealed through the gloom of the forests, and in thronging multitudes they assailed the flanks of the invaders, pouring in clouds of darts on the encumbered legionaries, as they struggled up the glens, or floundered in the morasses, and watching every opportunity of charging through the intervals of the disjointed column, and so cutting off the communication between its several brigades. Arminius, with a chosen band of personal retainers round him, cheered on his countrymen by voice and example. He and his men aimed their weapons particularly at the horses of the Roman cavalry. The wounded animals, slipping about in the mire, and their own blood, threw their riders, and plunged among the ranks of the legions, disordering all round them. Varus now ordered the troops to be countermarched, in the hope of reaching the nearest Roman garrison on the Lippe. But retreat now was as impracticable as advance; and the falling back of the Romans only augmented the courage of their assailants, and caused fiercer and more frequent charges on the flanks of the disheartened army. The Roman officer who commanded the cavalry, Numonius Vala, rode off with his squadrons, in the vain hope of escaping by thus abandoning his comrades. Unable to keep together, or force their way across the woods and swamps, the horsemen were overpowered in detail, and slaughtered to the last man. The Roman infantry still held together and resisted, but more through the instinct of discipline and bravery than from any hope of success or escape. Varus, after being severely wounded in a charge of the Germans against his part of the column, committed suicide to avoid falling into the hands of those whom he had exasperated by his oppressions. One of the lieutenant-generals of the army fell fighting; the other surrendered to the enemy. But mercy to a fallen foe had never been a Roman virtue, and those among her legions who now laid down their arms in hope of quarter, drank deep of the cup of suffering, which Rome had held to the lips of many a brave, but unfortunate enemy. The infuriated Germans slaughtered their oppressors with deliberate ferocity, and those prisoners who were not hewn to pieces on the spot, were only preserved to perish by a more cruel death in cold blood.

The bulk of the Roman army fought steadily and stubbornly, frequently repelling the masses of assailants, but gradually losing the compactness of their array, and becoming weaker and weaker beneath the incessant shower of darts, and the reiterated assaults of the vigorous and unincumbered Germans. At last, in a series of desperate attacks, the column was pierced through and through, two of the eagles captured, and the Roman host, which on the yester morning had marched forth in such pride and might, now broken up into confused fragments, either fell fighting beneath the overpowering numbers of the enemy, or perished in the swamps and woods in unavailing efforts at flight. Few, very few, ever saw again the left bank of the Rhine. One body of brave veterans, arraying themselves in a ring on a little mound, beat off every charge of the Germans, and prolonged their honorable resistance to the close of that dreadful day. The traces of a feeble attempt at forming a ditch and mound attested in after years the spot where the last of the Romans passed their night of suffering and despair. But on the morrow, this remnant also, worn out with hunger, wounds, and toil, was charged by the victorious Germans, and either massacred on the spot, or offered up in fearful rites at the altars of the deities of the old mythology of the North.

A gorge in the mountain ridge, through which runs the modern road between Paderborn and Pyrmont, leads from the spot where the heat of the battle raged to the Extersteine, a cluster of bold and grotesque rocks of sandstone, near which is a small sheet of water, overshadowed by a grove of aged trees. According to local tradition, this was one of the sacred groves of the ancient Germans, and it was here that the Roman captives were slain in sacrifice by the victorious warriors of Arminius.

Never was victory more decisive, never was the liberation of an oppressed people more instantaneous and complete. Throughout Germany the Roman garrisons were assailed and cut off; and, within a few weeks after Varus had fallen, the German soil was freed from the foot of an invader.—Creasy.

WORCESTER, A.D. 1651.—This city is situated on the east bank of the river Severn, in Worcester county, England, twenty-five miles south-west of Birmingham. There, on the 3d of September, 1641, was fought a battle between the army of Charles II., and the forces of Parliament under Oliver Cromwell. A large body of Scots had marched into England, with a view to reinstate Charles II.; and that monarch expected that all his friends, and all those who were discontented with the existing government, would flock to his standard. He summoned, by proclamation, all his male subjects between the age of sixteen and sixty to join his standard at the general muster of his forces, on the 26th of August, in the Pitchcroft, the meadows between the city of Worcester and the river. A few of the neighboring gentlemen, with their tenants, not 200 in number, obeyed the call, and it was found that the whole amount of his force did not exceed 12,000 men, of whom 2,000 only were Englishmen. Cromwell, meanwhile, made preparations to attack the royal army. With an army of about 30,000 men, Cromwell advanced against Worcester. The royalists had broken down an arch of the bridge over the Severn at Upton; but a few soldiers passed on a beam in the night, the breach was repaired, and Lambert with 10,000 men crossed to the right bank. A succession of partial but obstinate actions alternately raised and depressed the hopes of the two parties; but Cromwell reserved the grand attempt for his auspicious day, the 3d of September, on which, twelve months before, he had defeated the Scots at Dunbar. On the morning of that day, Fleetwood, who had advanced from Upton to Powich, was ordered to force the passage of the Zeam, while Cromwell, to preserve the communication, threw a bridge of boats across the Severn, at Bunshill, near the confluence of the two rivers. About one in the afternoon, while Charles with his staff observed from the tower of the cathedral of the city, the positions of the enemy, his attention was drawn by a discharge of musketry near Powich. He descended instantly, rode to the scene of action, and ordered Montgomery with a brigade of horse and foot to defend the line of the Zeam, and oppose the formation of the bridge. After a long and desperate struggle, Fleetwood effected a passage just at the moment when Cromwell, having completed the work, moved four regiments to his assistance.

The Scots, though assailed by superior numbers, maintained the most obstinate resistance; they disputed every field and hedge, repeatedly charged with the pike to check the advance of the enemy, and animated by the shouts of the combatants on the opposite bank, sought to protract the contest with the vain hope that, by occupying the forces of Fleetwood, they might insure the victory to their friends, who were engaged with Cromwell. That general, as soon as he had secured the communication across the river, ordered a battery of heavy guns to play upon Fort Royal, a work lately raised to cover the Sidbury gate of the city, and led his troops in two divisions to Perrywood and Red-Hill. To Charles this seemed a favorable opportunity of defeating one half of the hostile force, while the other half was separated from it by the Severn. Leading out the whole of his disposable infantry, with the Duke of Hamilton's troop of horse, and the English volunteers, he marched to attack the enemy in their position. The fight which ensued was terrible. With all the animosity which private feuds and partizan hatred could arouse, the combatants grappled fiercely with each other. Fortune favored the first efforts of the king. The militia regiments shrunk from the shock, and the guns of the enemy became the prize of the royalists. But Cromwell had some veteran battalions in reserve. He called them into action, and the line of battle wavered; the Scots, borne back by superior numbers, slowly retreated contesting every inch of soil with stubborn valor. They still remained unbroken, availing themselves of every advantage of ground to check the enemy, and anxiously expecting the aid of their cavalry under Leslie, which had remained in the city. From what cause it happened, is unknown; but that officer did not appear on the field, till the battle was lost, and the infantry, unable to resist the superior pressure of the enemy, was flying in confusion to the gate under the shelter of the fort. The fugitives rallied in the city in Friar-street, and Charles riding among them, endeavored by his words and gestures to reanimate their courage; but instead of replying, they hung down their heads and threw away their arms. "Then shoot me dead," exclaimed the unhappy prince, "rather than let me live to see the sad results of this fatal day." But his despair was as unavailing as had been his entreaties; and his friends admonished him to provide for his safety, for the enemy had already penetrated within the walls. Meanwhile Fleetwood, on the right bank of the Severn, was slowly pushing the Scots before him. At length they abandoned the hope of resistance; their flight opened to him the way to St. John's, and its timid commander yielded at the first summons. On the other hand Cromwell stormed the fort, put its defenders, 1,500 men to the sword, and turned the guns on the city. Within the walls dire confusion reigned, and the troops of Cormwell began to pour into the city, by the quay, the castle hill, and Sidbury gate. Charles had not a moment to spare. Placing himself in the midst of the Scottish cavalry he took the northern road by the gate of St. Martin's, while a few devoted spirits, with such troopers as dared to follow them, charged down Sidbury-street in a contrary direction. They accomplished their purpose. The royal party cleared the walls, while they arrested the advance, and distracted the attention of the enemy. It was past the hour of sunset; and before dark all resistance ceased. Colonel Drummond surrendered Castle hill on conditions; the infantry in the street were killed or led prisoners to the cathedral, and the city was abandoned during the obscurity of the night to the licentious passions of the victors. In this disastrous battle, the army of the king was nearly annihilated. Three thousand men were slain, and eight thousand made prisoners. Charles, after undergoing many distresses, and passing through adventures the narrative of which affords striking instances of hair-breadth escapes on the part of the king, and of unshaken fidelity on the part of his adherents, finally arrived in safety, on the 7th of October, forty-four days after the battle, at Fecamp, on the coast of Normandy.

WURTZBURG, A.D. 1796.—An engagement took place at Wurtzburg, in Bavaria, on the 3d of September, between the imperial troops of Austria and the republicans. Wurtzburg was occupied by the Austrians under the command of Hotze, while the archduke had also a large force on the right bank of the river. The French army commanded by Jourdan was drawn up on the Maine, from Wurtzburg to Schweinfurt, partly on a series of heights which formed the northern barrier of the valley, and partly on the plain which reached to the river. Jourdan was not aware that the archduke had returned to the head of his troops, but supposing he had only a part of the Austrian forces to contend with, was overwhelmed with surprise to find the numbers so greatly superior. A thick fog which concealed the armies from each other, greatly favored the operations of the imperialists, and when at eleven o'clock the sun shone through the clouds, it glittered on the large forces of the Austrians, drawn up in double lines, in the meadow adjoining the river. They commenced the battle by an attack on the left flank of the French, while Lichtenstein occupied the plain, and Wartensleben, at the head of the troop of horse, threw himself into the river and followed close after the infantry, who had defiled along the bridge. Grenier, the French general, being stationed at the point of attack, made a vigorous resistance with the republican light infantry and cavalry; but the Austrians having brought up the cuirassiers they had in reserve, Jourdan was compelled to come to their support with his troop of horse; a desperate attack now took place, the Austrians were at first repulsed, but the cuirassiers, taking advantage of the disorder of the French cavalry, at this moment, broke through their lines, and drove them back in great confusion. At the same time the French center had been entirely routed, and Kray had driven the divisions under Grenier off the field into the woods. The Austrians were victorious at every point, although Jourdan was fortunate enough to reach the forests, without being broken by the imperial squadron.

The battle of Wurtsburg, delivered Germany and determined the fate of the campaign. The trophies of the victorious party were not large, consisting of only seven pieces of cannon and a few prisoners. But the effect produced upon the spirit of the two armies was important. The Austrians were elevated by the victory, as it gave them the possession of the direct line of communication from the Maine to the Rhine. The republicans were very much depressed by their defeat, notwithstanding the battle was highly honorable to them, for they had to contend with 31,000 infantry, and 13,000 cavalry, while their whole number amounted to only 30,000.

WYOMING.—Wilkesbarre, near which the first settlement in the valley of Wyoming was located, is the capital of Luzerne co., Pennsylvania. It is situated on the left bank of the north branch of the Susquehanna, 110 miles north-east from Harrisburg.

Poets have sung, and historians have written, of the beautiful valley of Wyoming. From the earliest time, that land of hills and dales, of pure mountain-streams, and lovely plains, where the grape, the wild plum, the butter-nut and the hazel-nut, grow spontaneously, has floated in a mist of romance.

In 1743, the peace of the valley was destroyed by the war between the Shawnees, and Delawares. The war originated in the following manner: The Shawnees were a secluded clan, living by permission of the Delawares, upon the western bank of the Susquehanna. One day, when the warriors of both tribes were engaged in the chase upon the mountains, a party of women and children of the Shawnees, crossed to the Delaware side to gather fruit. While thus engaged a quarrel arose between two of the children about the possession of a grass-hopper. The mothers respectively took the part with their children, and the quarrel extended to all the Shawnee and Delaware women. The Delaware women were the more numerous, and drove the Shawnee squaws home, killing several on the way. The Shawnee hunters on their return, espoused the cause of their wives and children, and arming themselves, crossed the river and attacked the Delawares. A bloody battle followed; which resulted in the defeat of the Shawnees, who retired to the banks of the Ohio.

In 1762, about 200 whites from Connecticut founded a settlement near the mouth of Mill Creek, a little above the present site of Wilkesbarre, in the valley of Wyoming. The inhabitants of Pennsylvania, were irritated at what they termed an encroachment of the Connecticut people upon the lands which they claimed were included in the charter granted to William Penn. The Indians, however, and among them Teedyuscung, their great chief, were on friendly terms with the new comers, and in spite of the threats of the Pennsylvanians the Yankee colony continued to increase and prosper. But the colony soon received a fatal blow. A feud arose between the Delawares and the Six Nations; and in the autumn of 1763, a party of warriors descended the Susquehanna, and entered the valley on a visit of pretended friendship. As previously planned, on an appointed night they set fire to Teedyuscung's house, and the chief perished in the flames. To shield themselves from the vengeance of the Delawares, the perpetrators of this act charged the whites with this outrage. Their story was believed, and the Delawares resolved upon revenge. At noon on the 14th of October, 1763, they attacked and butchered thirty of the settlers in the fields. Alarm reigned throughout the whole colony, and the settlers, with their wives and children, fled in terror, and passing through the wilderness returned to their homes in Connecticut, a distance of 250 miles. On the night of the massacre the Indians applied the torch, and the once flourishing village was reduced to ashes.

In 1768, the Susquehanna company of Connecticut made a direct purchase of the Wyoming valley, from the Six Nations, and took a deed from some of the chiefs. A lease of the valley was given to three Pennsylvanians, who established a trading house there which they fortified. In 1769, the garrison of this post, consisting of ten men, was invested by forty pioneers of the Connecticut company. Governor Penn was informed of the state of affairs; but the people from Connecticut arrived in such numbers, that Jennings the commander of the garrison finally reported to the governor of Pennsylvania that the whole power of the country was inadequate to dislodge the Yankees. The Connecticut settlers had erected a strong fort, which they called Fort Durkee, in honor of the officer elected to its command, near the Shawnee flats, about half a mile below the site of the old settlement. They had also erected thirty log houses, furnished with loop-holes for musketry, around it. Their whole force consisted of 300 able-bodied men. Hostilities ceased for a short time, and the Connecticut company sent commissioners to Philadelphia, to negotiate a compromise. Governor Penn refused to treat with them, and sent an armed force under Colonel Francis to the valley. He summoned the garrison of Fort Durkee to surrender. They refused, and Francis finding the fort too strong to be assailed, returned to Philadelphia, leaving Ogden, one of the lessees of the valley, with a small force, in the vicinity. The Pennsylvanians now assembled a larger force under Jennings; and Captain Ogden hearing of Jennings's approach, suddenly assailed the Connecticut settlement, with forty men, and succeeded in capturing several of the inhabitants, among whom was Colonel Durkee. Jennings, with 200 men, and a six pounder, appeared before the fort; and the garrison, alarmed, proposed to capitulate on certain conditions. The conditions were accepted and the articles of capitulation drawn up in due form and signed. Ogden, however, acted in bad faith, and the seventeen settlers who, by the articles were allowed to remain in the valley until their crops were harvested, were plundered of every thing and driven from the valley.

In the month of February, 1770, Lazarus Stewart led a body of armed men from Lancaster. They were joined by another armed party from Connecticut, and the whole entered Wyoming valley. He took possession of Fort Durkee, and entered Captain Ogden's house. The owner was absent, and the Yankees seized upon the cannon. Captain Ogden, receiving intelligence of these transactions, marched to Wyoming at the head of fifty men, with whom he garrisoned his own house. Stewart sent a body of fifty men to attack the house. The Yankees assailed the Pennsylvanians with spirit, and a sharp conflict ensued. The assailants were repulsed with a loss of one man killed and several wounded. Colonel Durkee, who had been recently released, now returned from Philadelphia; and under his direction the Connecticut settlers commenced a regular siege upon the fort of the Pennsylvanians. The four pound cannon was mounted on the opposite side of the river, and for nearly a week Ogden's house was cannonaded. Ogden finally surrendered on the same conditions which he had allowed the enemy the previous year; he was to withdraw with all his men from the valley, with the exception of six, who were to remain behind to guard his property.

But the people of Connecticut, remembering Ogden's former behavior, treated him in like manner; his property was seized, and his house was burned as soon as he was gone.

In the fall, Ogden, having collected a force of about 150 men, returned toward the valley and advanced toward Fort Durkee. The settlers were taken by surprise, and the fort again fell into the hands of the Pennsylvanians. The Yankees were driven from the settlement. On the night of the 18th of December, about thirty men under Lazarus Stewart stealthily advanced to the fort, and captured it. The Pennsylvanians were now in turn driven from the valley. The Connecticut people held possession of Fort Durkee until the middle of January, 1771, when it was beleaguered by the sheriff of Northampton county with a strong force. He was accompanied by Captain Ogden and his brother Nathan. A sharp skirmish ensued before the fort, and Nathan Ogden was killed. The garrison, finally perceiving that they could not hold out long, withdrew from the valley on the 20th, leaving twelve men in the fort, who were made prisoners by the Pennsylvanians, and sent to Easton. The victors remained in undisturbed possession of the valley for six months. Ogden's force now numbered about eighty men. On the 6th of July seventy armed men from Connecticut, under Captain Zebulon Butler, and a party under Lazarus Stewart, entered the valley. Ogden had built a second fort and called it Fort Wyoming. This fort was stronger than the other, and stood upon the spot now occupied by the court-house of Wilkesbarre. The invaders commenced a regular siege. The besieged were well supplied with provisions; their defenses were strong, and they defied the assailants. During the progress of the siege Ogden escaped from the fortress by stratagem, and hastened to Philadelphia for reinforcements. The governor granted him a detachment of one hundred men, and he proceeded to Wyoming. Their efforts to compel Butler to raise the siege were unavailing. Butler, after prosecuting the siege until the 11th of August, summoned the garrison to surrender. The besieged refused to comply. The assailants had no artillery; but one of the colonists, named Carey, constructed a cannon of a pepperidge log. This novel piece burst on the second discharge. The garrison, however, surrendered shortly afterward, and the Connecticut settlers were left in undisturbed possession of the valley. Several persons were killed on both sides during the continuance of the siege. Four years Wyoming enjoyed uninterrupted peace, the colony increased, and the whole valley presented a scene of busy activity and rural felicity. But on the 28th of September, 1775, the unsuspecting inhabitants were rudely aroused from their dreams of peace. On that day a branch of the colony located about sixty miles below Wilkesbarre, were suddenly attacked by a body of Northumberland militia, who had grown jealous of the rapidly-increasing prosperity of the settlers. Several of the colonists were slain, and the rest were sent to Sunbury and imprisoned. The Continental Congress was in session at that time in Philadelphia, and to that body the people of Connecticut appealed. Congress heard their prayer, and passed a resolution urging the governments of Pennsylvania and Connecticut to take speedy and effective steps to put an end to the hostilities, and to adjust the differences. But the Pennsylvanians did not heed the voice of Congress. Fearing that the people of Connecticut would retaliate, they resolved to raise a large force, and march against Wyoming to conquer it before the inhabitants could organize a military government. Richard Penn, who was then governor of Pennsylvania, favored the design, and Colonel Plunkett was appointed to the command of the expedition. Congress again called upon the people to cease further hostilities; but its mandate was unheeded, and Plunkett commenced his march toward Wyoming. The invading force made but slow progress, the river being much obstructed with ice. The inhabitants of Wyoming had made ample preparations to receive the invaders. The army, consisting of about 300 men, was under the command of Colonel Zebulon Butler. When Plunkett reached the Nanticoke Rapids, at the southern extremity of the valley, he was obliged to abandon his boats and advance along the shore of the river. Some of Butler's troops occupied a bold rock on the western bank of the river which overhung the road along which Plunkett was marching. As the Pennsylvanians approached they were greeted by a volley of musketry which checked their progress. Plunkett now caused one of his boats to be brought up from the rapids, and by its means succeeded in crossing the river. He was about to march against Fort Wyoming on the eastern side, when he fell into an ambuscade. Unable to cope with the enemy, the Pennsylvanians retreated to their boats, and in a council of war decided to abandon the expedition. Thus ended the Pennymite war. The war of the American Revolution was soon fairly commenced, and common danger united the parties in a peace which common interests had continually broken.

When it was seen that a war with the mother country was inevitable, the inhabitants of Wyoming valley, being especially exposed to the incursions of the Indians, who, despite their repeated assurances of friendship, were objects of suspicion, erected suitable forts as defenses against the enemy, who were momentarily expected. Almost every one of the original settlers had espoused the cause of Congress; but emigrants from the Hudson and Mohawk valleys had come to the Wyoming valley, and were openly opposed to the patriots. Among the most active of these were the Wintermoots, Van Gordans, Van Alstynes, and other families. The Wintermoots had erected a strong fortification upon the old banks of the Susquehanna, which was called Wintermoot's Fort. The patriots, suspicious of the designs of the Wintermoots, constructed a fort about eight miles above Wilkesbarre, within two miles of Wintermoot's. This work was erected under the supervision of the Jenkins and Hardeys families, and was called Fort Jenkins. Forty Fort was strengthened and enlarged, and sites for other forts selected at Pittstown, Wilkesbarre, and Hanover. The people of Wyoming valley, however, were not disturbed until early in the summer of 1778, when the movements of Brant and his warriors, and the Butlers and Johnsons, with their Tory legions, upon the upper waters of the Susquehanna, and the actions of the Tories in the valley of Wyoming caused the people great alarm. Some of the Tories had been harshly treated by the Whigs, and several had left and joined the force of Colonel John Butler, and the settlers had sufficient grounds to apprehend their return with a power strong enough to appease their thirst for revenge. The people of Wyoming were in a poor condition to repulse the enemy should they appear, and the whole country was in a state of constant alarm and excitement. "Nearly all their able-bodied men," says Mr. Miner, in his able history of Wyoming, "were away in the service. The remaining population in dread of the savages, were building six forts or stockades, requiring great labor, 'without fee or reward.' All of the aged men out of the train-bands, exempt by law from duty, were formed into companies to garrison the forts, one of the captains being also chief physician to the people and surgeon to the military. Of the militia, the whole was in constant requisition to go on the scout and guard against surprise. The small-pox pestilence was in every district." In June, 1778, the Tories and Indians made preparations to fall upon the inhabitants of this defenseless country. The patriots in Wyoming appealed to Congress for aid; yet they were left uncared for, and were obliged to confide in their own meager resources. On the 2d of July, 1778, a force, consisting of Tory Rangers, a detachment of Johnson's Royal Greens, and about 700 Indians, in all numbering 1,100 men, entered the valley through a notch from the west, near the junction of the Lackawana and Susquehanna rivers. The whole army was under the command of Colonel John Butler. The republicans, who had been informed of the approach of the enemy, had made all preparations in their power to receive them. Their whole force consisted of a company of about fifty regulars and a small body of militia under the command of Captain Hewett.

Every man in the valley entered the service. The old men, with trembling hands, grasped their muskets, the middle-aged, the youth, and even women seized such weapons as they could find, and all were resolved to drive the invaders back, or perish. Colonel Zebulon Butler, an officer in the continental service, chanced to be at home, and by unanimous consent was elected commander-in-chief. Having entered the valley, the invaders attacked the people near Jenkins Fort, and killed three of them. Colonel John Butler then established his head-quarters at Fort Wintermoot, whence he sent out occasional parties to scour the country. The patriots made Fort Forty the place of rendezvous, and thither the women and children of the valley fled for safaty. The smaller forts were garrisoned by old men. The patriots had no alternative but to fight, or to submit; both appeared equally fatal. Retirement or flight was alike impossible, and there was no security but in victory. Unequal as was the conflict, therefore, and hopeless as it seemed in the eye of prudence, the young and athletic men fit to bear arms, were enlisted for their special defense, being absent with the main army, the inhabitants, looking to their dependant wives, mothers, sisters, and little ones, took counsel of their courage, and resolved to give the enemy battle. A counsel of war was held in Fort Forty, on the 3d of July; some were in favor of going out to meet the enemy, others were inclined to remain inactive, in the hopes of receiving succor from General Washington, who was then in New Jersey. While they were debating, five commissioned officers, who had obtained leave of absence that they might return home to protect their families, arrived. They were admitted to the council. Colonel John Butler had demanded the surrender of Fort Forty. Fort Jenkins had already fallen into his hands, and the savages were waiting his order to slay such of the inhabitants as had not reached Fort Forty. The invaders must be driven from the country at once was the voice of the majority; and it was resolved to march out and attack them. The whole army consisted of only about 300 men, and was composed of the old, and the infirm, the athletic, and the young. They marched out of the fort at one o'clock in the afternoon, and separating into six companies, marched up the river toward Fort Wintermoot. The women and children were left in the fort.

SURRENDER OF FLAGS AT YORKTOWN.

Who can imagine the anxiety of that group within Fort Forty? What tongue can tell of the prayers which ascended that day for the safety of those gallant men, who went forth to battle for the lives of beloved and loving wives and children? The quivering lips and tearful eyes of wives and mothers pressing their babes to their breasts, and sending forth entreaties to the Most High, that their husbands and sons might be returned in safety to them; all, all, fills the mind, even now, with sorrow, and sends a throb of the deepest sympathy for those unfortunate ones to the breasts of all who have listened to the tale of their sufferings. Colonel Zebulon Butler had hoped to take the enemy by surprise; but the Tories were on the alert, and when the news of the approach of the enemy reached Fort Wintermoot, they were ready to meet them. The left wing of the Tory army was composed of the Rangers under the command of Colonel John Butler, and rested upon the bank of the river near Wintermoot. The right extending into a marsh at the foot of the mountains on the western verge of the plain, consisted principally of Tories and Indians, and was commanded by a celebrated Indian chief, named Gi-en-gwatak. (He-who-goes-in-the-smoke.) On Butler's right were stationed the Royal Greens, under Captain Coldwell, and at intervals along the line, Indian marksmen were posted. The patriots were commanded on the right by Colonel Zebulon Butler, assisted by Major Garratt; on the left, by Colonels Dennison, and Dorrance. The field of action was a level plain, cultivated in patches, and partly covered with yellow pines, and scrub oaks. The Tories set fire to Wintermoot's Fort, to prevent its falling into the hands of the patriots. The Wyoming companies, separately, advanced toward the enemy, and as they were wheeled into line, Colonel Zebulon Butler thus addressed them: "Men, yonder is the enemy. The fate of the Hardings tells us what we have to expect if defeated. We come out to fight not only for liberty, but for life itself, and, what is dearer, to preserve our homes from conflagration, and women and children from the tomahawk. Stand firm the first shock, and the Indians will give way. Every man to his duty." The Americans rushed to the attack, and soon the battle became general. It was about four o'clock, the sky was unclouded, and the sun beat down with intense heat. The British left, where appears Colonel John Butler, stripped of his feathers, and other savage trappings, with a handkerchief tied around his head, encouraging his men with voice and example, begins to give ground. The Americans with shouts of joy rush on; but are checked by a volley of musketry from a band of Indians concealed behind some bushes on the left flank of the enemy. Captain Durkee falls, and for a moment the little band is thrown into confusion. The yells and whoops of the savages rise above the din of battle, and fall upon the ears of the women and children in the fort like a death-knell. The strife continues. The Tories with their savage allies press forward on that devoted band. The Indians gain their rear, and they are furiously assailed by a cross fire. Colonel Zebulon Butler now commands his men to fall back; but his words are misunderstood. "Retreat! retreat!" sounds along the line, and the patriots rush frantically toward the river. "Oh, my children, do not leave me," entreats their gallant commander. "Stay, and the victory is ours." But like famished wolves, the savages, and their still more savage allies, sprung forward; every American captain is slain, and the terror-stricken patriots fly in every direction, followed by a horde of enemies. Some endeavor to gain Fort Forty; others, rush into the river; but only a few escape. Many are killed on the spot, and others are hunted like deer through the woods. Some are lured from their hiding-places by a promise of quarter; but come forth only to be tomahawked, or to be reserved for a more fearful death at the burning fort. The Tories and Indians are everywhere victorious.

Colonel Zebulon Butler escaped to Wilkesbarre Fort, and Colonel Dennison to Fort Forty. Dennison mustered the few soldiers that came in, and resolved to defend the place to the last extremity. The victors continued their pursuit until dusk; the savages then congregated upon the blood-stained field, and a scene of horror followed, at which the soul sickens, and the heart stands appalled. Scores of the wretched prisoners were put to such tortures, as only a savage mind could invent; and white men stood by and saw the agonies of their neighbors, unmoved! Captain Bidtack was thrown alive upon the burning timbers of Fort Wintermoot, and held down upon the glowing coals with pitchforks until death released him from his sufferings. Many of the prisoners were arranged in circles around large stones, and while firmly clasped in the arms of strong Indians, were killed with the tomahawk. A half-breed Indian woman, named Queen Esther, deliberately slaughtered sixteen of the prisoners while thus arranged. Two of the captains broke from the embrace of their tormentors, and, amid a shower of bullets and flying tomahawks, effected their escape.

The whole battle-field was a carnival of blood; and lighted up with immense fires, it appeared to the eyes of some unfortunate beholders on the opposite shore, like the very impersonation of hell on earth. But we will dwell no longer on this revolting theme. On the evening of the 3d, the garrison at Fort Forty was strengthened by the arrival of thirty-five men under Captain John Franklin. The next day Colonel John Butler summoned the garrison to surrender; and finding that there was no hopes of a successful defense, Colonel Dennison surrendered on the following conditions: That the inhabitants of the settlement lay down their arms, and the garrisons be demolished; that the inhabitants occupy their farms peaceably, and their lives be preserved entire and unhurt; that the continental stores be given up; that the property taken from the Tories should be replaced; and that the inhabitants for whom Dennison capitulated should not take up arms during the war.

The victors, however, did not respect the terms of capitulation. Before night the Indians spread through the valley, plundering the few inhabitants remaining, and burning the houses of those who had taken their departure. The village of Wilkesbarre, which consisted of twenty-three houses, was set on fire, and the people fled in terror to the mountains where many of their friends had sought refuge during the night. Only one life was taken by the victors after the capitulation of Fort Forty; but in their flight a number of women and children perished in the great swamp on the Pocono mountains, and along the paths in the wilderness. The swamp is now known as the Shades of Death. The terrors of that flight of one hundred women and children are thus depicted by Mr. Charles Miner, in his Hazelton Travelers: "Let the mind picture to itself a single group," says he, "flying from the valley to the mountains on the east, and climbing the steep ascent; hurrying onward, filled with terror, despair and sorrow; the affrighted mother, whose husband has fallen, with an infant on her bosom, a child by the hand, an aged parent slowly climbing the rugged steep behind them; hunger presses them severely; in the rustling of every leaf they hear the approaching savage; a deep and dreary wilderness before them, the valley all in flames behind; their dwellings and harvests all swept away in this spring-flood of ruin, and the star of hope quenched in this blood-shower of savage vengeance."

The fugitives by various roads made their way to Connecticut; and the tale of their sufferings was spread far and near. On the 8th of July Butler and his troops, after laying waste the whole valley, withdrew. After his departure the Indians that remained committed fearful outrages upon such of the settlers as had not fled; and all who remained at Fort Forty fled in terror from the place. The whole population, with the exception of a few gathered about the fort at Wilkesbarre, abandoned the settlement. On the day of the battle Captain Spalding with a single company was between the Blue and Pocono mountains, about fifty miles from Wilkesbarre. The flying settlers informed him of the event, and he pushed forward until he had arrived within twelve miles of the valley, when he sent scouts forward to reconnoiter. They found the valley in the possession of the invaders, and Captain Spalding returned to Stroudsbury to await the orders of Colonel Zebulon Butler. Butler soon returned to Wyoming, and when the Tories had left the valley Spalding marched thither, and on the 3d of August established his head quarters at Wilkesbarre Fort. Colonel Zebulon Butler assisted by Colonel Hartly of the Pennsylvania line, now arranged an expedition to expel the Indians from the valley. With about one hundred men, they marched in the month of September to Shesequin, Queen Esther's plantation, and attacked the Indians. Several of the savages were slain; and their settlement was broken up. Colonel Hartly returned to Wyoming, and garrisoned Wilkesbarre Fort with one hundred men. He was then called from the valley. Defended by the garrison, the few settlers remaining worked in the fields with their weapons near at hand. Parties of Indians constantly hovered on the outskirts of the settlement, and several whites were murdered in the fields. Until peace was proclaimed the settlers were constantly harassed. "Revenge upon Wyoming," says Stone, "seemed a cherished luxury to the infuriated savages, hovering upon the outskirts on every side. It was a scene of war, blood, and suffering. In the course of this harassing warfare there were many severe skirmishes, several heroic risings of prisoners on their Indian capturers, and many hair-breadth escapes." But we have already exceeded our limits; and must refer the reader for fuller details, to Lossing's admirable work, the "Field-book of the Revolution," and to the works of Miner, Chapman, and Stone.

YORK, A.D. 1813.—Toronto, formerly York, is the capital of Canada West, and is the most flourishing city in British America. It is situated on a nearly circulay bay, on the north-west shore of Lake Ontario.

During the winter of 1812–13, the Americans busied themselves at Sackett's Harbor on the south side of Lake Ontario, in constructing a fleet for the purpose of operating against Kingston, York, and Fort George, that they might cut off all communication between Montreal and Upper Canada. By spring they had completed a fleet composed of thirteen vessels. This fleet was under the command of Captain Isaac Chauncey, and was capable of transporting about 1,700 men. Having learned that the British were preparing three vessels for sea at York, Chauncey recommended that this place should be first attacked in order to destroy the vessels. The American fleet was at length got ready for sea, and Chauncey, with 1,700 men under the command of General Pike, set sail. The fleet anchored off York on the 25th of April, and the landing of the troops was commenced immediately, in the midst of a severe gale of wind. The boats were carried by the force of the tempest west of the designated landing place, which was an open field, to a point on the shore thickly covered with woods, in which a large party of Indians and British marksmen was stationed. Major Forsythe, with a rifle-corps, in two boats, first approached the beach; as he neared the shore he was assailed by a shower of bullets, and ordering the rowers to rest on their oars, he bade his men return the fire. Upon seeing this pause, General Pike with his staff leaped from the deck of his vessel into a boat, and ordering the infantry to follow, was rowed toward the shore. The boat passed safely through the enemy's balls, and Pike landed a little distance from Forsythe. The advanced boats of the infantry having gained the shore at the same time, Pike put himself at their head and led them up the bank to the charge. The Americans advanced with the utmost impetuosity, and put the enemy to rout by a single charge. The arrival of Forsythe with his riflemen, completed the panic, and the affrighted Indians fled on all sides filling the forest with their hideous yells of disappointed rage. The American troops being all landed, they were formed into companies, and advanced through the woods toward Fort York. As they approached the British works their progress was checked by a battery of twenty-four pounders, which kept up an incessant fire on the head of the columns. Captain Walworth of the 16th was ordered to storm the battery. The Americans advanced rapidly to the charge, and in spite of the terrific fire with which the enemy greeted their approach, carried the battery at the point of the bayonet, and the garrison fled. The Americans continued to advance up a slight acclivity, and soon captured the second battery and entered the fort. But the moment they had taken possession of the enemy's works, magazines containing 500 barrels of gunpowder exploded, with a terrific shock; and the air was filled with blackened corpses, huge stones, and fragments of timber, which fell back on the victorious columns, scattering death and destruction on all sides.

Over two hundred Americans and forty of the British were killed or wounded by the explosion. General Pike was crushed beneath the murderous shower, and was mortally injured. At this moment the British flag was struck, and the American standard floated triumphantly in its place. Like Wolfe at Quebec, Pike at York received his mortal wound at the moment of victory. Colonel Pearce assumed the command of the troops after the fall of Pike, and having taken possession of the barracks, advanced on the town. On his way thither he was met by the officers of the Canadian militia, bearing terms of capitulation. While negotiations were pending General Sheaffe and the British regulars made good their retreat toward Kingston, and a magazine of naval and military stores, together with two of the vessels in the harbor, were burned. The third had sailed for Kingston a few days before the attack. The Americans lost in this engagement about three hundred in killed, wounded, and missing. The British lost three hundred and fifty killed and wounded, and three hundred prisoners.

YORKTOWN, A.D. 1781.—Yorktown is situated on the right (south) bank of the York river, directly opposite Gloucester Point, eleven miles from its mouth, in York county, Virginia, seventy miles east of Richmond. The village was established by law in 1705, and was once a flourishing place; but now it contains only about forty houses. In 1781 it contained about sixty houses.

Immediately after the battle of Jamestown Cornwallis, with his army, proceeded by land to Portsmouth, and thence to Yorktown. He immediately commenced fortifying that place. He extended a line of intrenchments completely around the town. On the land side he formed a chain of six redoubts, curtained one to another by a parapet and pallisade. The redoubts were fraized and pallisaded, and covered beside by abatis and breast-works. On the bank of the river he also erected a line of batteries; one was planted near the church, and consisted of eleven pieces of cannon. On the margin of a ravine to the south-west of the village, three redoubts were erected; one, a little eastward of the road to Hampton, two on the extreme right, near the river, and the fusileers' redoubt on the extreme left, near the margin of the river. Cornwallis also extended a line of intrenchments across the peninsula of Gloucester, in the rear of that village.

Meanwhile, the American and French armies had met in Winchester county, on the Hudson river, for the purpose of attacking the British troops under Sir Henry Clinton, in New York. The American army was commanded by General Washington in person; that of the French was under the command of the Count de Rochambeau. Lafayette was at this time in Virginia, within a few miles of the British army; but the marquis did not feel sufficiently strong to attack Cornwallis, and the British general did not deem it prudent to abandon his position at Yorktown, and impede the progress in fortifying that place, by engaging his troops against the French. The allied armies were about to strike the city of New York, when Sir Henry Clinton was reinforced by the arrival, on the 11th of August, of 3,000 troops from Europe; and Washington, having received a letter from Count de Grasse, stating that he intended to remain in the West Indies, and that the French fleet, therefore, could not co-operate in the attack on New York, the allies were obliged to abandon their designs against that city. Nearly at the same time Washington received a letter from Lafayette, dated at Williamsburg, Virginia, informing him of the movements of Lord Cornwallis; and the American general determined to proceed toward the south to co-operate with Lafayette in Virginia. This resolution was strengthened by receiving intelligence from Count de Barras, the successor of Admiral de Ternay, at Newport, that the Count de Grasse was to sail from the West Indies for the Chesapeake on the 13th of August, with a fleet of about thirty ships of the line, bearing 3,200 land troops under the command of the Marquis St. Simon. The allied generals speedily arranged a plan of the southern campaign; and the whole army crossed the Hudson at Verplanck's point, and marched by different routes to Trenton, New Jersey. Previous to the passage of the Hudson, Washington, in order to conceal his real intentions from Clinton, wrote deceptive letters to General Greene, in New Jersey, and sent them in such a manner as to be intercepted by the enemy. Some of these letters, containing a plan for an attack on the city, fell into the hands of Clinton, and caused him to abandon every other purpose than to make preparations for the reception of the besiegers. The grand object of the Americans was achieved, and the allied armies had crossed the Delaware, and were far on their way toward Elk Head before Clinton was fully aware of their destination. Clinton saw it was too late for a successful pursuit, and sent General Benedict Arnold to devastate the coast of New England. New London was burned by the traitor and his troops; and a terrible massacre was perpetrated by the marauders at Fort Griswold; but these events did not check the march of the allies. On the 31st of August the French fleet, under Count de Grasse, arrived in the Chesapeake Bay. An officer from Lafayette gave De Grasse full information respecting the relative position of the two armies in Virginia. The French admiral immediately sent four ships of the line and several frigates to blockade the mouth of the York river. These vessels also conveyed the land troops, under St. Simon, who was ordered to join Lafayette on the James river. To relieve Cornwallis, Clinton dispatched Admiral Graves with a fleet of nineteen ships of the line, with orders to attack the French squadron which guarded the entrance to the Chesapeake. De Grasse went out to fight the English fleet; but after a partial action both fleets withdrew, and on the 10th of September, the French cast anchor within the capes at Lynn Haven bay. The hostile fleets remained within sight of each other for five days, but neither party wished to renew the conflict.

On the 25th of September the last division of the allied army arrived at Williamsburg, between the James and York rivers, and preparations were made to besiege the British at Yorktown. The main division of the British army occupied the town under the immediate command of Cornwallis. The open grounds in the rear of the place were occupied by the main body of his troops, and at the commencement of the siege, Tarleton's legion and about 700 troops under Lieutenant-Colonel Dundas, were posted at Gloucester. The Duke de Lauzun with his legion, a body of Virginia militia under General Weiden, and some French marines were sent under the command of General de Choisé, to attack the British at Gloucester point.

The allied army, on the morning of the 28th of September, marched from Williamsburg, and approached Yorktown by different routes. Both forces united, consisted of about 12,000 men. On the approach of the besiegers the British abandoned their outposts, and withdrew to their works near the town. A large body of French troops, and some American light infantry, took possession of the deserted works, and acted as a covering party for the troops while engaged in throwing up intrenchments. The British opened a cannonade upon the besiegers, and during the day made one or two sorties. On the 30th of September Yorktown was completely invested by the besiegers, their line extending in a semicircle, each wing resting on the York river. The French fleet remained at Lynn Haven bay, to contest the entrance of the British fleet should it attempt to advance to the aid of the besieged. The left wing of the besieging army was composed of the West India regiments under St. Simon, and the French light infantry regiments under the Baron and Viscount Viomenil. The right wing consisted of the American light infantry under Lafayette, the New York, New Jersey, and Rhode Island troops under General James Clinton; the Virginia militia under Governor Nelson; the Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania troops under Steuben, and the American artillery under General Knox, assisted by Colonel Lamb, Lieutenant-Colonels Stevens and Currington, and Major Bauman. From the 1st to the 6th of October the besiegers were assiduously employed in making fascines and gabions, and in transporting their heavy cannon, mortars, and stores from Trebell's Landing, on James river.

The trenches were opened on the evening of the 6th, and the besiegers established their first parallel within 600 yards of the enemy's works, amid a continual fire from the town. The 7th and 8th were employed in completing the first parallel, and in erecting batteries somewhat in advance of it. The American battery on the right, having six eighteen and twenty-four pounders, two mortars, and two howitzers, was opened on the enemy at five o'clock in the afternoon of the 9th; and early on the morning of the 10th, the French batteries on the left were opened, and for eight hours the besiegers maintained an incessant fire upon the enemy's works. Other American batteries were opened, and the fire became so very heavy that the besieged withdrew their cannon from their embrasures, and placed them behind the mulins, scarcely firing a shot during the day. In the evening the British frigate the Charon was set on fire by a hot shot from the French battery on the left, and was burned to the water's edge. During the whole night the besiegers maintained their fire upon the place. The night was mild, and the whole landscape was bathed in a starlight which softened every distant object into indistinctness; Yorktown presented an awful contrast to the soft beauties of the night. From the American lines streams of fire arose, and falling into the place, carried death and destruction on all sides, "From the bank of the river," says Dr. Thatcher, in his journal, "I had a fine view of this splendid conflagration. The ships were enwrapped in a torrent of fire, which spreading with vivid brightness among the combustible rigging, and running with amazing rapidity to the top of the several masts, while all around was thunder and lightning from our numerous cannons and mortars, and in the darkness of the night, presented one of the most sublime and magnificent spectacles which can be imagined. Some of our shells overreaching the town, are seen to fall into the river, and bursting, throw up columns of water like the spouting of the monsters of the deep." On the morning of the 11th, two of the British transports were fired by hot shells, and consumed. On this the besieged warped their shipping as far over to the Gloucester shore as possible. In the evening the besiegers advanced their second parallel, with little or no annoyance from the enemy, to within 300 yards of the British works. The 13th and 14th were spent in completing the second parallel; and the engineers pronouncing the two redoubts on the enemy's left sufficiently damaged to make them practicable, an assault on the evening of the 14th was determined upon. These redoubts were about 300 yards in advance of the British line; and flanking the right of the second parallel of the besiegers, the men in the trenches were greatly annoyed by their guns. General Lafayette, with the American light infantry, was directed to assail the redoubt on the extreme left, while Major General, the Baron de Viomenil, with a detachment of French grenadiers and chasseurs, should assail the other. The two detachments advanced to the assault at dusk. The advanced corps of the American detachment was under the command of Colonel Alexander Hamilton, assisted by Colonel Gimat. Colonel Laurens, meanwhile, turned the redoubt in order to cut off the retreat of the garrison. The signal was given; and the troops with unloaded guns and fixed bayonets moved to the assault. The British poured forth volley after volley of musketry upon the assailants; but through the storm of bullets the Americans pushed their way, regardless of the abatis and other obstructions in their path, and entered the redoubt at a bound. So rapid had been their movements that their loss was trifling. Eight of the defenders of the redoubt were slain during the assault; but none were injured after the surrender. The other redoubt was garrisoned by 120 men, a greater force than that stormed by the Americans. The French rushed furiously to the attack, but their progress was checked by the garrison, who hurled tempests of balls upon them, and fought with the utmost determination for nearly a half hour. At length the French troops effected a lodgment in the work, and the garrison surrendered. The French lost about 100 men in killed and wounded; of the British, 18 were slain, and 42 made prisoners. In this assault the Adjutant-General Count Charles de Lameth was severely wounded. Count Mathieu Dumas behaved with the utmost gallantry. He was in the advanced corps, and was among the first who entered the redoubt. Count de Deuxponts, who led the French grenadiers, was slightly wounded. Washington was highly gratified at the result of these engagements. "Nothing could exceed the firmness and bravery of the troops," said he in his official report; "they advanced under the fire of the enemy without returning a shot, and effected the business by the bayonet only." The captured works were of vast importance. From them the besiegers could enfilade the enemy's whole line, and during the night of the 14th they were included in a second parallel. By five o'clock on the next morning, several howitzers were mounted on the redoubts, and were opened upon the British works. The position of the British army was now highly critical. Cornwallis had received no intelligence of succor from Clinton, and knowing that the town would be untenable should the besiegers complete the second parallel, he resolved to make a desperate effort to retard their progress. Accordingly, early on the morning of the 16th, a detachment under Lieutenant-Colonel Abercrombie was ordered to make a sortie on one of the French and one of the American batteries on the second parallel, which were unfinished. The British advanced gallantly to the assault, and entered the works. They had only time, however, to thrust the points of their bayonets into the touch-holes of four of the French and two of the American cannon, and break them off, when they were driven back by the guards from the trenches. The spikes were easily extracted from the guns. In this sortie the besieged lost 8 killed and 6 prisoners. The French lost 16 killed; the Americans one. Up to this time the allies had lost, during the siege, 75 killed, and 94 wounded. Cornwallis now resolved to make a desperate effort to escape by flight. His plan was to pass the river suddenly with his army, and endeavor to cut his way through the enemy's troops near Gloucester, and pushing forward through Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, to form a junction with the army in New York. The boats were prepared, and the troops embarked on the night of the 16th. The sick and wounded were left behind, with a letter from Cornwallis recommending them to the mercy of the conquerors. Some of the boats passed the river, and the troops landed on Gloucester point; the others were about to follow, when a violent storm of wind and rain arose. The tempest raged till daybreak, and Cornwallis was obliged to abandon his design. At daybreak, the several new batteries in the second parallel being completed, the besiegers opened a tremendous fire from their whole line upon the town. The air was filled with the flying missiles, and not a place of safety could be found in the town. A splendid stone mansion, the property of Governor Nelson, who was at the head of the Virginia militia, was a prominent object within the British lines. "Never," says Mr. Lossing, in his magnificent work, "The Field-book of the Revolution," "did a man display more lofty patriotism than Governor Nelson on this occasion. He commanded the first battery that opened upon the British works that morning. He knew that his house was occupied by Cornwallis with his staff, and was probably in it when he began the cannonade. Regardless of the personal loss that must ensue, he pointed one of his heaviest guns directly toward his house, and ordered the gunner, and also a bombardier, to play upon it with the greatest vigor. "The desired effect was accomplished. Upon the heights of Saratoga, Burgoyne found no place secure from the cannon-balls of the besiegers; in Yorktown, there was a like insecurity." Cornwallis, finally perceiving that his position was now past all remedy, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, sent a flag to Washington, with the proposals that hostilities should cease for twenty-four hours, and that commissioners should be appointed to arrange the terms of surrender. Washington answered that he could grant a truce of two hours only. He was unwilling to waste time in negotiations, for the British fleet with reinforcements for Cornwallis might, meanwhile, arrive, and give the enemy an opportunity to escape.

The British general was forced to submit; and the terms of capitulation were finally adjusted on the 19th of October. The following is an abstract of the articles of capitulation: I. The garrisons at York and Gloucester to surrender themselves prisoners of war; the land troops to remain prisoners to the United States; the naval forces to the naval army of the King of France. II. The artillery, munitions, stores, etc., to be delivered to proper officers to receive them. III. The two redoubts captured on the 16th of October, to be surrendered, the one to the American, the other to the French troops. The garrison at York to march out at two o'clock with shouldered arms, colors cased, and drums beating; there to lay down their arms, and return to their encampment. The work on the Gloucester side to be delivered to the Americans and French; the garrison to lay down their arms at three o'clock. IV. The officers to retain their side-arms, papers, and private property. Also, the property of loyalists found in the garrison to be retained. V. The soldiers to be kept in Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, and to be subsisted by the Americans. British, Anspach, and Hessian officers allowed to be quartered near them, and supply them with clothing and necessities. VI. The officers allowed to go on parole to Europe, or to any part of the American confederacy; proper vessels to be granted by Count de Grasse, to convey them under flags of truce to New York, within ten days, if they choose. Passports to be granted to those who go by land. VII. Officers allowed to keep soldiers as servants, and servants, not soldiers, not to be considered prisoners. VIII. The Bonetta to be under the entire control of Cornwallis, to go to New York with dispatches, and then to be delivered to Count de Grasse. IX. Traders not to be considered as prisoners of war, but to be granted three days to dispose of their property or remove it. X. Loyalists not to be punished on account of having joined the British army. (Washington considered this matter to be of a civil character, and would not assent to the article.) XI. Proper hospitals to be furnished for the sick and wounded; they to be attended by the British surgeons. XII. Wagons to be furnished, if possible, for the conveyance of the baggage of the officers, attending the soldiers, and of the hospital surgeons when travelling on account of the sick. XIII. The shipping and boats in the harbor, with all their appendages, arms, and clothing, to be delivered up, unimpaired, after the private property was unloaded. XIV. No article of the capitulation to be infringed on pretext of reprisal, and if there be any doubtful expressions in it, these are to be interpreted according to the common meaning and acceptation of the words.

At two o'clock in the afternoon of the 19th of October, 1781, the British army marched out of Yorktown, and delivered up their colors, and laid down their arms, according to the terms of surrender, and with this ceremony, the siege of Yorktown was brought to a final close. The allies lost during this siege, which lasted thirteen days, about 300 men in killed and wounded. The British lost 156 men killed, 326 wounded, and seventy missing. The whole number of prisoners was little over 7,000. Seventy-five brass, and 160 iron cannons; 7,794 muskets; twenty-eight regimental standards; a large quantity of cannon, and musket-balls, bombs, carriages, etc., etc., fell into the hands of the victors, together with the military chest which contained $11,000 in specie.

With the fall of Yorktown, the British power in the American States was crushed forever. Joy went up from the hearthstone of every family in the land; and shortly afterward, the mother country acknowledged the independence of the United States. Peace again rested on the land; Washington had fulfilled his mission. His country was free.

ZAMA.—The battle of Zama was fought in the year 202, B.C. Scipio, after conquering all Spain, returned to Rome, and was appointed consul. Not content with the laurels he had already won, he determined upon an enterprise, which, if successful, should eclipse all his former victories. This was the conquest of Africa. Accordingly, he crossed over thither, and made it the seat of the war. The devastation of the country, the siege of Utica, one of the strongest cities of Africa; the total defeat of the two armies under Sphyax and Asdrubal, whose camp was burned by Scipio, and afterward the taking of Sphyax himself prisoner, who was the most powerful resource the Carthaginians had left; all these things forced them at last to turn their thoughts to peace. They therefore sent a deputation of thirty of their principal senators to Scipio. When the senators were introduced into the Roman general's tent, they all prostrated themselves before him, and humbly sued for peace. But the conditions on which Scipio offered them peace were extremely severe, yet the senators feigned a compliance with them, that they might gain time to send for Hannibal and his army to return to their assistance. Scipio granted a truce to the Carthaginians, who immediately sent an express to Hannibal to order his return into Africa. Hannibal obeyed, and returned into Africa with all his forces, and encamped within a short distance of the Roman army, at Zama, which lies at the distance of five days' journey from Carthage. The Carthaginians, in the mean time, had broken their truce with the Romans; first, by seizing a Roman fleet of 200 vessels of burden, richly laden, when it was dispersed near Carthage by a violent storm, while on its way from Sicily into Africa; and secondly, by ill-treating the deputies whom Scipio sent to the Carthaginian senate to complain of the outrage on the fleet. The courage of the Carthaginians was increased by the presence of Hannibal, and they continually exhorted him to give battle at once to the Romans. But Hannibal, on the contrary, meditated peace. He flattered himself that he could make a peace with Scipio on more honorable terms than had been offered to the deputation from the senate. He, therefore, sent to desire an interview with the Roman general, which was agreed to, and the time and place appointed. They met in an open space between the two armies; in sight of each other, these two generals, who were not only the most illustrious of their own age, but of all who have been recorded in any former time, both stood for some time silent, struck dumb as it were by mutual admiration. Hannibal spoke first, and after representing the mutual advantages which would be derived from a peace between the Romans and Carthaginians, he concluded by declaring that the Carthaginians would willingly relinquish all those places on account of which the war was begun: Sicily, Sardinia, Spain, and all the islands that lie in any part of the sea, between Africa and Italy. That they would confine themselves wholly to Africa, while they beheld the Romans, extending their sovereignty by land and sea over the most remote regions. Scipio replied, that if the Carthaginians were willing to accept the terms which he had formerly offered them, and also to make full restitution for the ships and stores which they had seized during the subsistence of the truce, and for the insult they had offered his embassadors, he would lay the matter before his council. But if they also deemed these conditions severe, Hannibal might return to his camp, and prepare for battle. The two generals now separated without coming to any accommodations. Hannibal could not prevail with himself to accept Scipio's conditions, and returned to his army with the resolution to decide the fate of Carthage by a general battle. Both generals now prepared their armies for the approaching engagement, and both incited their soldiers to valorous deeds. Hannibal recounted the exploits of sixteen years in the heart of Italy; he enumerated the Roman generals he had slain, and the victories he had won. And, as he passed through the lines of his army, whenever he came to a soldier who had distinguished himself in any former battle, he reminded him of the honors he had already received, and promised him tenfold more, if he would behave as valiantly during the coming strife.

Scipio reminded his men of Spain; of his late victories in Africa, and of the fear manifested by the enemy in suing for peace. "The close of the war is nigh at hand," said he, proudly erecting himself, while animation and joy flashed from his eye. "Carthage, with all its wealth is within your reach, and after you have grasped it you shall return to your homes, to your parents, your children, your wives, and your household gods." Scipio then placed his army in battle array; he drew up the spearmen in the van. Behind them he placed the first rankmen, and closed the rear with the veterans. He did not, as usual, place the cohorts in close order, each before their own colors, but posted the companies at some distance from each other, that there might be room to admit the elephants of the enemy, without disturbing the ranks. He planted Lælius with the Italian cavalry on the left wing, and Massinissa and the Numidians on the right. The intervals between the cohorts he filled up with light-armed troops, and gave them directions, on the attack of the elephants, either to retire to the rear of the files, or opening to left and right; to form along with the cohorts. Thus a passage would be left for the elephants, through which they might advance exposed on both sides to the weapons of his soldiers. Hannibal, in order to terrify the enemy, placed his elephants in the front. Of these animals there were eighty, a greater number than he had ever before brought into the field. Next to them he posted the auxiliary Ligurians and Gauls, with the Balcarians and Moors intermixed. In the second line he placed the Carthaginians, Africans, and the Macedonians; and then leaving a moderate opening he formed the line of reserve, consisting of Italian soldiers mostly Bruttians, the chief number of whom had followed him on his departure from Italy by compulsion, and through necessity, rather than from inclination. He covered the flanks with cavalry, the Carthaginians being posted on the right, and the Numidians on the left. Hannibal and his generals now went through the lines, exhorting and encouraging the soldiers. While they were thus engaged, Scipio gave the signal for battle. The trumpets and cornets were sounded, and the Romans raised such a shout, that the elephants, particularly in the left wing, were frightened at the sound, and turned back upon their own men, the Moors and Numidians, throwing them into complete disorder. At this moment Massinissa charged them, and driving them back, divested their line of that flank of the cover of the cavalry. A few of the elephants, however, unaffrighted, were urged on against the Romans. The huge beasts dashed upon the light troops, trampling them under foot, and beating them down with their trunks. At length after committing fearful havoc, they were driven away from the Roman lines by the weapons showered upon them, from all sides; wild with rage and pain they rushed upon the Carthaginian cavalry in their own right wing, and threw it into disorder. Now Lælius, seeing the enemy in this confusion, charged their disabled troops, who after a feeble resistance, took to flight. The Carthaginian line was therefore exposed on both flanks, not having the cavalry to cover them, when the infantry began to engage. With a shout that struck terror to the hearts of their enemies, the Roman soldiers dashed upon the enemy. At the very first onset the Carthaginian line gave way. The Romans thrust them back with their elbows and the bosses of their shields, and stepping forward into the places from which they had dislodged them, they gained ground rapidly. The rear rank also, on perceiving the enemy's line shrink, pushed forward those who were before them, and in this manner, the enemy were gradually driven back toward the second line. But the Africans and Carthaginians, fearing that the Romans, in case they cut through the first line, might close with them, drew back, instead of advancing to the aid of their auxiliaries. Upon this the auxiliaries fairly turned their backs, and facing about to their own party, some of them retreated into the second line, while others who were not received there, enraged at not being supported before, and being now excluded, fiercely attacked them. Thus the Carthaginians were obliged in a manner to fight two battles; one against their mercenary troops, and the other against the Romans. They vigorously repelled the attack of these craven soldiers, and with great slaughter drove them off, to the wings, and to the open plains around the field of battle. The space formerly occupied by the auxiliaries was piled up with such numbers of the slain, that the Romans found it impossible to force a passage through the great heaps of carcases and weapons.

The ground, deluged with blood, was so slippery that men stumbled at every step, and soon both their battalions and ranks were in disorder. The second line seeing the confusion of the line before them, began to waver, and Scipio, observing this, instantly caused a retreat to be sounded for the spearmen. Carrying the wounded to the rear, he brought up the first rankmen and veterans, to the wings, in order that the line of spearmen in the center might be the more firm and secure. Thus a new battle was begun. The Romans had now to deal with the Africans and Carthaginians, men who were on an equal footing with them, both in respect to the kind of arms they used, the fame of their exploits, and the greatness of their hopes and dangers. But the Romans were superior to the enemy in numbers. They charged upon the first line of the Carthaginian army, with such fury that the enemy was fairly crushed before them. At this critical juncture the cavalry under Lælius and Massinissa who had pursued the flying horse of the Carthaginians to some distance, returned, and charging the rear of the enemy, effectually routed them. Many were surrounded in the field and slain; while many who escaped into the open country adjoining, were pursued and slain by the Roman cavalry. Hannibal, after vainly endeavoring to rally his troops, escaped during the confusion, with a few horsemen, and fled to Hadrumetum. Of the Carthaginians and their allies there were slain in this battle, more than 20,000, about the same number were taken prisoners, with 133 military standards and eleven elephants. The conquerors lost only 2,000 men. This battle closed the Punic war. The Carthaginians accepted the conditions dictated by Scipio, and peace was declared. See Battle of Cannæ.

ZAMORA, A.D. 939.—Zamora, in Spain, in early history, was a frontier town of great importance, as a barrier to Moorish invasion. In the month of July, 939, the Moors, under Abdu-er-Rahman, besieged Zamora, with the stern determination of taking it at all hazards. But the Christian army, under Ramiro II., advanced to the relief of the town, and a fierce battle was fought before its walls. Zamora was then surrounded by seven lines of walls; the space between which was defended by moats; and, it is stated, 40,000 Moslems were killed in these trenches during the siege and battle. In 985, Zamora was taken and destroyed by the Moors under the great Al-Mansoor. Zamora was rebuilt by Ferdinand I.

ZELA, B.C. 47.—The battle of Zela was fought between the forces of Cæsar and the army of Pharnaces, king of Pontus. Pharnaces, with his army, occupied a hill in the neighborhood of Zela, which he had fixed upon because it had been the scene of a victory which his father, Mithridates, had obtained over a Roman army under Triarius; and, in order to secure himself, had repaired his father's lines, and seemed determined to maintain this post. Cæsar's army consisted of only about 1,000 men. Having lain for some days within five miles of Pharnaces, he advanced to an eminence separated from the camp of the enemy only by a narrow valley sunk between steep banks. He came upon this ground in the night, and began to intrench himself as usual, having a party under arms to cover the workmen. As at break of day, the greater part of his army appeared to be at work, Pharnaces deemed this a favorable opportunity to attack the Romans, and began to make his dispositions for the battle. Cæsar, imagining that he only meant to give an alarm, and to interrupt his workmen, even after he was in motion, did not order the Roman legions to desist from their work, nor to arm; but seeing him descend into the valley, and attempt to pass it in the face of his advanced guard, he sounded to arms, and was scarcely formed when the enemy had passed both banks of the valley to attack him. The troops of Pharnaces began the action with an ardor that was suited to the boldness with which they had advanced; and Cæsar's contempt of their designs nearly exposed him to a defeat. But the action, which was doubtful everywhere else, was decided by the veterans of the sixth legion, before whom the enemy began to give way, fled with precipitation down the declivity, and fell into general rout. Pharnaces fled with a few attendants, and narrowly escaped being taken. "How cheap is fame," said Cæsar, as he surveyed the flying enemy, "when obtained by fighting against such an enemy!" Cæsar, in announcing this victory, sent his famous dispatch to the Roman senate, in three words: "Veni, vidi, vici,"—"I came, I saw, I conquered." This battle concluded the war. Pharnaces escaped into Bosphorus, where he was slain by his lieutenant Asander; and Pontus was made a province of Rome, while Bosphorus was given to Mithridates of Pergamus.

ZURICH, A.D. 1799.—Near Zurich, a city of Switzerland, a battle took place on the 22d of July, 1443, between the Swiss and the Austrians, in which the latter were defeated. A battle was also fought at Zurich between the French republicans and the Russians and Austrians, on the 26th of August, 1799.

Zurich was occupied by the republican forces, under Massena. Their line extended from the intrenched heights of Zurich, through those of Regensburgh, and to the Rhine, in a direction nearly parallel to the course of the river Aar. The camp around Zurich was strengthened by formidable redoubts, at which, for more than a month, the army had been engaged upon, and the surrounding country being filled with wooded heights and precipitous ravines, rendered the approach to Zurich very difficult. The greater part of the imperial army, commanded by the Archduke Charles and Hotza, were concentrated in the environs of the town. On the 5th of June, the archduke attacked Massena along the whole line. The principal attack was against their center and right. Hotza gained at first, at the latter point, what seemed an important success; his advanced posts even penetrated into the suburbs of Zurich, and carried the whole intrenchments, by which the right of the army was covered; but, before night, Soult coming up with the reserve, the lost ground was retaken, and the Austrians forced back to their former position. At the same time the battle raged in the center with uncertain success, and the archduke seeing the repulse of Hotza, and deeming the heights of Zurichberg the decisive point, detached General Wallis, with a part of the reserve, to renew the attack, while the Prince of Lorraine made a simultaneous attack on the side of the Atlisberg. Wallis was at first successful, carried the farm of Zurichberg, and, after a violent struggle, arrived at the pallisades of the intrenchments; but Massena, discovering the danger, hurried to the spot at the head of a column of grenadiers, and attacked the Austrians in flank, while a terrific fire of grape and musketry from the summit of the works, cut down the foremost of their ranks. With all their desperate efforts, the imperialists were unable to force the intrenchments; Hotza was severely wounded, and, after a bloody conflict, they retired over the Glatt, leaving 3,000 killed and wounded on the battle-field. The archduke was not disheartened by this loss, and, after a day of rest, made arrangements for a renewal of the battle. Before the break of day, on the morning of the 6th, two columns, of 8,000 men each, were destined to attack the heights of Zurich and Wipchengen, while the left, the reserve, and part of the center were to support them. But Massena, fearful of the result, retreated during the night, and took post between Lucerne and Zurich, on Mount Albis, a rocky ridge reaching from the lake of Zurich to the river Aar, a much stronger position than his former one. The retreat was effected without loss, the darkness being in his favor; but the great arsenal, containing 150 pieces of cannon, and a great amount of warlike stores, on the next day fell into the hands of the imperial army.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

OF THE

BATTLES AND SIEGES RECORDED IN THIS VOLUME.

PAGE		B. C.
74	Bactra, besieged by Ninus, king of Assyria	2184
314	Kings, battle of the, defeat of the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah	1918
513	Red Sea, destruction of the Egyptians	1491
295	Jericho, besieged by Israelites under Joshua	1451
14	Ai, besieged by Israelites	1451
236	Esdraelon, battle of, between Canaanites and Israelites	1316
621	Thebes, in Boetia, siege of	1252
622	Thebes, in Palestine, besieged by Abimelech	1214
648	Troy, siege of	1184
49	Arcadia, the Arcadian women defeat the Spartans	1169
295	Jerusalem, besieged by the Jebusites	1048
295	Jerusalem, besieged by the Egyptians	976
558	Samaria, besieged by the Syrians	907
559	Samaria, besieged by the Syrians	906
559	Samaria, besieged by Joram, king of Syria	891
533	Rome, besieged by the Sabines	747
416	Nineveh, besieged by Medes and Babylonians	747
52	Argives and Spartans, the battle of the 600	735
559	Samaria besieged by Assyrians	721
295	Jerusalem, besieged by Syrians and Israelites	715
70	Azoth, besieged by Egyptians	670
279	Horath and Curatii, Romans and Albans	669
259	Gaza, besieged by Alexander	633
508	Bagan, Medes and Assyrians	625
295	Jerusalem, besieged by Nebuchadnezzar	587
269	Halys (eclipse of the sun), Medes and Lydians	585
625	Thymbra, Crœsus defeated by Cyrus	548
562	Sardis, besieged by Cyrus	548
70	Babylon, besieged by Cyrus	538
73	Babylon, revolt and reduction of	516
602	Sybaris, Crotonians and Sybarites	508
533	Rome, besieged by Porsenna	507
562	Sardis, besieged by Athenians	503
197	Coriolli, besieged by Romans	492
358	Marathon, defeat of the Persians	490
534	Rome, besieged by Coriolanus	488
282	Hymera, Greeks and Carthaginians	480
623	Thermopylæ, Greeks and Persians	480
62	Athens, besieged by Persians	480
55	Artemisium, Greeks and Persians	480
400	Mycale, Greeks and Persians	479
479	Platæa, Greeks and Persians	479
238	Eurymedon, Greeks and Persians	470
139	Byblos, Greeks and Persians	454
167	Chæona, besieged by Athenians	447
283	Ipsus, defeat of Antigonus	431
481	Platæa, besieged by Lacedæmonians	428
427	Olpæ, Eurydochus slain	424
588	Solygia, Corinthians and Athenians	423
634	Torone, besieged by Athenians	422
603	Syracuse, besieged by Athenians	415
569	Selinuntum, besieged by Carthaginians	412
13	Agrigentum, besieged by Carthaginians	409
220	Cyzicum, Athenians and Lacedæmonians	408
139	Byzantium, besieged by Athenians	408
399	Motya, besieged by Dionysius	404
62	Athens, besieged by the Spartans	404
613	Syracuse, besieged by Carthaginians	403
211	Cunaxa, battle of, followed by the retreat of the 10,000 Greeks	400
243	Falerii, Romans and Falerii	394
534	Rome, besieged by Brennus	387
325	Leuctra, Epaminondas and Cleombrotus	371
363	Mantinea, Epaminondas slain	363
515	Rhodes, besieged by Queen Artemisia	352
209	Crimesus, Greeks and Carthaginians	343
140	Byzantium, besieged by Philip of Macedon	341

PAGE		B. C.
167	Chæronea, Macedonians and Athenians	338
621	Thebes, in Boetia, besieged by Alexander the Great	334
649	Tunis, besieged by Carthaginians	334
265	Granicus, Greeks and Persians	334
287	Issus, defeat of Darius by Alexander	333
656	Tyre, besieged by Alexander	332
259	Gaza besieged by Alexander	332
47	Arbela, Darius defeated by Alexander	331
473	Persepolis, besieged by Alexander	330
280	Hydaspes, Porus and Alexander	326
203	Crannon, confederate Greeks and Macedonians	322
658	Tyre, besieged by Antigonus	313
259	Gaza, Ptolemy and Demetrius	312
517	Rhodes, besieged by Demetrius	303
435	Palmyra, besieged by the Romans	273
52	Lacedæmon, besieged by Pyrrhus	272
319	Argos, death of Pyrrhus	272
67	Veii, besieged by the Romans	271
364	Messina, first Punic war commenced	264
400	Mylæ, Carthaginians and Romans	259
149	Carthage, besieged by Romans	252
435	Palermo, captured by Romans	250
195	Corinth, besieged by Aratus	242
568	Salasia, Cleomenes and Antigonus	223
11	Adda, Romans defeated by Insubrians	223
435	Palmyra, besieged by the Romans	219
479	Placencia, Hannibal and the Romans	219
629	Ticinus, Hannibal and Scipio	217
510	Raphia, Ptolemy and Antiochus	217
643	Trebia, Hannibal and Sempronius	217
624	Thrasymenus, Hannibal and Flaminus	217
154	Carthagena, besieged by Romans	216
148	Cannæ, defeat of Romans by Hannibal	216
613	Syracuse, besieged by Romans; Archimedes slain	214
617	Tarentum, besieged by Romans	212
536	Rome, besieged by Hannibal	211
409	Metaurus, Asdrubal defeated by Nero	208
665	Utica, besieged by the Romans	203
711	Zama, Hannibal the Great defeated by Scipio Africanus	202
6	Abydos, besieged by Philip of Macedon	201
207	Cremona, besieged by Gauls	200
221	Octopolophos, Romans and Macedonians	199
25	Ambracia, Romans and Greeks	198
221	Cynocephalæ, Greeks and Romans	197
7	Abydos, besieged by Romans	190
150	Carthage, besieged by Romans	148
197	Corinth, besieged by Romans	146
559	Samaria, besieged by Hyrcanus	120
637	Toulouse, besieged by Cepio	106
536	Rome, besieged by Sylla	87
63	Athens, besieged by Sylla	87
167	Chærona defeat of Archelaus	86
143	Callahorra, besieged by Pompey the Great	72
26	Amisus, besieged by Romans	71
207	Cremona, besieged by Romans	69
296	Jerusalem, besieged by Romans	63
362	Marseilles, besieged by Cæsar	49
523	Rimini, besieged by Cæsar	49
479	Pharsalia, Pompey and Cæsar	48
666	Utica, besieged by Cæsar	46
713	Zela, veni, vidi, vici	47
15	Alexandria, Ptolemy and Cæsar	46
400	Munda, Cæsar and Pompey	45
475	Philippi, Brutus and Cassius, and Octavius and Antony	42
47	Aradus, Romans	38
296	Jerusalem, besieged by Herod	37

PAGE		A. D.
696	Winnefeld, Varus defeated by Arminius	9
584	Shropshire, Caractacus taken prisoner	51
440	Paris, besieged by the Romans	52
106	Boadicea, Queen of England, defeated	61
297	Jerusalem, besieged by Titus	66
264	Grampian Hills, Scots and Picts	79
140	Byzantium, besieged by the Emperor Severus	196
347	Lyons, Albinus and the Emperor Severus	197
16	Alexandria, sacked by Caracalla	213
16	Alexandria, civil war in	260
404	Naisus, Goths and Romans	269
435	Palmyra, besieged by Romans	273
16	Alexandria, besieged by Diocletian	296
362	Marseilles, besieged by Constantine	310
654	Turin, Constantine and Maxentius	312
12	Adrianople, Licinus defeated by Constantine.	323
140	Byzantium, besieged by Constantine	323
383	Milan, besieged by the Goths	338
52	Argentaria, Germans and Romans	378
45	Aquella, Eugenius defeated	388
537	Rome, besieged by Alaric, the Goth	408
537	Rome, taken and sacked by Alaric	410
638	Tournai, besieged by the Franks	438
401	Nantes, besieged by the Huns	445
429	Orleans, besieged by the Huns	451
169	Chalons, defeat of the Huns	451
633	Toledo, besieged by the Goths	457
208	Crayford, Saxons and Britons	457
470	Pavia, besieged by the Goths	476
511	Ravenna, besieged by the Romans	488
233	Edessa, besieged by the Persians	503
401	Naples, besieged by the Romans	537
523	Rimini, besieged by the Goths	538
537	Rome, besieged by the Goths	538
26	Antioch, besieged by Persians	540
402	Naples, besieged by the Goths	543
539	Rome, besieged by the Goths	544
233	Edessa, besieged by the Persians	544
233	Edessa, besieged by the Persians	549
540	Rome, besieged by the Goths	549
511	Ravenna, besieged by Belisarius	550
562	Sarnus, Telas, the Gothic king, slain	553
616	Tagina, Totila killed	552
186	Constantinople, besieged by the Huns	559
470	Pavia, besieged by the Lombards	572
16	Alexandria, taken by Chosroes, King of Persia	611
300	Jerusalem, besieged by the Persians	613
300	Jerusalem, besieged by the Saracens	635
26	Antioch, besieged by Saracens	638
658	Tyre, besieged by the Turks	638
409	Nehawund, Arabs and Persians	638
16	Alexandria, besieged by Amrou	640
223	Damascus, besieged by Saracens	642
223	Ainadin, defeat of Heraclius	642
16	Alexandria, besieged by Amrou	645
187	Constantinople, besieged the Khan of Abares	670
187	Constantinople, besieged by Tezid	672
312	Kairae, Mohammed poisoned	682
562	Saragossa, taken by the Saracens	712
633	Toledo, captured by the Moors	714
365	Merida, taken by the Moors	715
641	Tours, Charles Martel and the Saracens	732
470	Pavia, besieged by the Lombards	774
440	Pampeluna, taken by Charlemagne	778
543	Roncesvalles, Roland slain	778
84	Barcelona, taken by Charlemagne and his allies	801
634	Tortosa, besieged by Louis Debonnaire	811
402	Naples, besieged by the Prince of Beneventum	818
245	Fontenay, the sons of Louis le Debonnaire	841
568	Seefin, Alec and Mowiyah	850
401	Nantes, taken by the Normans	850
120	Boulougne, besieged by the Northmen	882
441	Paris, besieged by the Normans	885
342	Luncarty, Danes and Scots	900
713	Zamora, besieged by the Moors	939
418	Battles of the Northmen in the Western Continent	1004–11
25	Alney, single-handed combat between Edmund Ironsides and Canute	1016
365	Meerut, taken by Mahmoud	1018
187	Clontarf, Danes and Irish	1039
271	Hastings, Saxons and Normans	Sept. 29, 1066
434	Palermo, taken by the Normans	1072
540	Rome, besieged by Henry III. of Germany	1084
633	Toleda, taken by the Spaniards	1085
25	Alnwick, defeat of Malcolm of Scotland	1092
416	Nice, besieged by Crusaders	1097
27	Antioch, besieged by Crusaders	Oct., 1097
234	Edessa, besieged by Crusaders	1097
35	Antioch, besieged by Crusaders	June, 1098
55	Ascalon, Crusaders and Saracens	1099
301	Jerusalem, besieged by the Crusaders	1099
562	Saragossa, taken by Alphonso of Arragon	1106
648	Tripoli, taken by the Crusaders	1108
659	Tyre, besieged by the Venetians	1123
336	Lisieux, taken by the Saxons	1130
359	Marcinago, Ghibellines of Pavia defeated	1132
123	Brompton, Battle of the Standard	1138
333	Lincoln, Stephen defeated	Feb. 2, 1141
510	Ransbeck	1143
335	Lisbon, besieged by Alphonso	1147
634	Tortosa, captured by Eugenius III.	1148
223	Damascus, besieged by the Crusaders	1148
634	Tortosa, besieged by the Moors	1149
383	Milan, besieged by Frederick Barbarossa	1159
650	Turin, besieged by the Arabs	1159
155	Cassano, Germans and Milanese	1160
16	Alexandria, taken by sultan of Damascus	1171
309	Jerusalem, besieged by Saladin	1187
662	Tyre, besieged by Saladin	1188
333	Limoges, besieged by Matilda, queen of Richard the Lion-hearted	1189
8	St. Jean d'Acre, besieged by Crusaders	1191
256	Fretevat, defeat of Philip Augustus	1194
336	Lisieux, taken by Philip Augustus	1203
188	Constantinople, besieged by the Crusaders	1203
544	Rouen, besieged by Philip Augustus	1204
408	Navas de Tolosa, Moors and Spaniards	1212
390	Montenacke, Brabançons and Liegeois	1213
120	Bouvines, French and Germans	July 27, 1214
226	Dover, besieged by the French	1216
334	Lincoln, Count de Perche killed	May 14, 1217
637	Toulouse, death of Simon de Montfort	1217
474	Perth, captured by Edward I.	1228
365	Merida, taken by Spaniards	1229
402	Naples, besieged by the Emperor Conrad	1253
328	Lewes, Henry III. defeated by De Montfort	May 14, 1264
240	Evesham, De Montfort slain	Aug. 4, 1265
99	Benevento, defeat of Manfred	1266
616	Tigliacozzo, Conrad IV. defeated	1268
650	Tunis, death of Louis IX.	Aug. 25, 1270
171	Chalons, English and French knights	May 1, 1274
435	Palmerno, (Sicilian Vespers)	1282
366	Messina, besieged by Charles of Anjou	1282
9	St. Jean d'Acre, besieged by Saracens	1291
395	Montgomery, Welsh and English	1294
104	Berwick, besieged by the English	1296
229	Dunbar, English and Scots	1296
243	Falkirk, Sir William Wallace defeated	1298
588	Spurs, first battle of, French and Flemings	July 11, 1302
341	Loudon Hill, Robert Bruce defeated	1307
83	Bannockburn, defeat of English by Robert Bruce	June 24, 1314
397	Morgarten, Swiss and Austrians	Nov. 15, 1315
230	Dundalk, English and Irish	Oct. 14, 1318
26	Amfing, Austrians defeated by Bavarians	Sept. 28, 1322
269	Hallidon Hill, English and Scots	1333
638	Tournai, besieged by Edward III.	1340
14	Aiguillon, English and French	1345
208	Cressy, Cannons first introduced	Aug. 26, 1346
231	Durham, David, King of Scotland, made prisoner	1346
141	Caen, English and French	1346
143	Calais, besieged by the English	1346
144	Calais, besieged by the French	1349
84	Battle of the Thirty, English and Bretons	March 27, 1351
486	Poictiers, English and French	Sept. 19, 1356
543	Romorantin, besieged by the Black Prince	1356
513	Rennes, besieged by the English	1357
515	Rheims, besieged by Edward III.	1359
408	Naxera, Peter the Cruel, and Don Henry	April 2, 1367
333	Limoges, taken by Nothilda	1370
530	La Rochelle, retaken from the English	1372
487	Portsmouth, French and English	1377
402	Naples, besieged by Charles Duras	1381
397	Moscow, taken by Tamerlane	1382
693	Westroosebeeke, defeat of the men of Ghent	1382
570	Sempach, Arnold von Winkelreid slain, July 9,	1386
286	Ispahan, besieged by Timour	1387
244	Falköping, Swedes and Danes	1388

PAGE		A. D.
434	Otterburn (Chevy Chase), Douglas slain.... Aug. 15,	1388
156	Cassova, death of Amurath I.....June 15,	1389
416	Nicopolis, Hungarians and Turks.....	1396
365	Meerut, taken by Timour.....	1399
584	Shrewsbury, Hotspur slain.....July 21,	1403
126	Brechin, besieged by English.....	1403
441	Paris, besieged by the Armanacs.....	1411
318	Laon, taken by the Burgundians.....	1411
69	Azincour, French and English.....Oct. 25,	1415
336	Lisieux, taken by the English.....	1415
544	Rouen, taken by the English.....	1417
142	Caen, taken by the English.....	1417
318	Laon, besieged by the English.....	1419
26	Anjou, English defeated by French....April 3,	1421
389	Mons, taken by Jean IV.....	1425
429	Orleans, besieged by the English.....	1428
470	Patay, Joan of Arc and the English...July 10,	1429
442	Paris, besieged by Charles VII.....	1429
365	Mayence, besieged by the English.....	1429
318	Laon, taken by the French.....	1429
649	Troyes, besieged by Joan of Arc.....	1429
197	Compiegne, Joan of Arc made prisoner ..May,	1430
402	Naples, besieged by Alphonso of Arragon....	1442
714	Zurich, Swiss and Austrians.....July 22,	1443
548	Saint Jacob, Swiss and French.....Aug. 16,	1444
670	Varna, Hungarians and Turks.....Nov. 10,	1444
336	Lisieux, taken by Charles VII.....	1448
544	Rouen, taken by the French.....	1449
246	Formigny French and English.....	1450
157	Castillon, General Talbot slain.....July 23,	1452
193	Constantinople, besieged by the Turks.....	1453
547	St. Albans, Yorkists and Lancasterians, May 22,	1455
105	Bloreheath, Yorkists and Lancasterians.... Sept. 23,	1459
680	Wakefield, Yorkists and Lancasterians..... Dec. 24,	1460
547	St. Albans, Yorkists and Lancasterians..... Feb. 17,	1461
642	Towton, Yorkists and Lancasterians, March 29,	1461
275	Hexham, Lancasterians and Yorkists.....	1464
443	Paris, besieged by "The League for the Public Good".....	1465
226	Dinant, besieged by Philip the Good.....	1466
318	Laval, taken by the French.....	1466
332	Liege, besieged by Philip the Good....Oct. 30,	1468
588	Stamford, Sir Robert Welles defeated, Mar. 13,	1470
84	Barnet, Edward IV. and Earl of Warwick.... April 14,	1471
619	Tewkesbury, final defeat of Lancasterians.... May 4,	1471
94	Beauvais, besieged by Charles the Bold.... July 10,	1472
474	Perpignan, taken by Louis XI.....	1474
401	Nancy, besieged by Charles the Bold.....	1475
325	Lepanto, besieged by the Turks.....	1475
336	Morat, Charles the Bold and the Swiss, June 22,	1476
401	Nancy, taken by Duke of Lorraine.....Oct. 6,	1476
401	Nancy, Charles the Bold slain.....June 5,	1477
434	Otranto, taken by the Turks.....	1480
118	Bosworth Field, Richard III. slain...Aug. 22,	1485
543	Ronda, besieged by the Spaniards.....	1485
562	Sauchie Burn, death of James III. of Scotland	1488
400	Malacas, Spaniards and Moors.....	1488
94	Baza, besieged by the Spaniards.....	1489
264	Granada, besieged by Ferdinand V.....	1491
246	Fornova, Charles VIII. and the Milanese.....	1495
104	Blackheath, defeat of the Cornish rebels..... June 22,	1497
384	Milan, besieged by the Chevalier Bayard.....	1499
275	Hemmingstedt, Ditmarshers and Danes.....	1500
598	Stockholm, besieged by the Swedes.....	1501
402	Naples, besieged by Ferdinand V.....	1503
365	Mendavia, Cæsar Borgia slain.....	1507
638 / 624	Therouanne, besieged by the English, Aug. 22,	1513
638	Tournai, besieged by Henry VIII.....	1513
588	Second Battle of the Spurs, French and English.....Aug. 16,	1513
245	Flodden, James IV. of Scotland slain, Sept. 19,	1513
361	Marignan, Swiss and French.....	1515
223	Daritz, Egyptians and Turks.....Aug. 7,	1516
523	Rio Tobasco, Cortez and Indians.....Feb.,	1519
165	Cuetla, Cortez and the Indians..... March,	1519
223	Battle of the Defile, Spaniards and the Indians.....	1519
631	Tlascalans and Spaniards.....	1519
161	Cempoalla, Spaniards and Mexicans.....	1520
366	Mexico, Spaniards and Mexicans.....	1520
373	The Melancholy Night, Spaniards and Mexicans.....	1520
427	Otumba, Spaniards and Mexicans.....July 7,	1520
598	Stockholm, besieged by Christian II.....	1520
375	Mexico, besieged by Spaniards.....May 10,	1521
520	Rhodes, besieged by Solyman II.....	1521
95	Belgrade, besieged by the Turks.....	1521
617	Temeswar, besieged by Solyman II.....	1522
90	Bayonne, bayonets first used.....	1523
471	Pavia, besieged by the French.....	1525
385	Mohacz, Solyman the Magnificent and Hungarians.....Aug. 29,	1526
541	Rome, besieged by the Duke of Bourbon.....	1527
155	Cassel, besieged by the French.....	1528
675	Vienna, besieged by Soliman II.....Oct. 12,	1529
496	Puna, Spaniards and Peruvians.....	1531
159	Caxamalca, Spaniards and Peruvians, Nov. 16,	1532
624	Therouanne, besieged by Charles V.....	1533
653	Tunis, besieged by Charles V.....	1535
216	Cuzco, Pizarro and the Peruvians.....Feb.,	1536
654	Turin, captured by the French.....	1536
5	Abancay, Alvarado defeated by Almagro.... July 12,	1537
142	Caen, taken by the French.....	1540
19	Algiers, defeat of Charles V.....	1541
588	Solway Moss, English and Scots.....Nov. 25,	1542
548	St. Dizier, besieged by the French.....	1544
163	Ceresole, Austrians and French.....April 14,	1544
120	Boulogne, besieged by Henry VIII ..July 25,	1544
362	Marseilles, besieged by the Constable de Bourbon.....	1544
95	Bedlis, defeat of Solyman.....	1544
26	Ancram, English defeated by Scots.....	1545
478	Pinkey, English and Scots.....Sept. 10,	1547
312	Ket and Warwick.....	1549
95	Bedlis, defeat of Solyman the Magnificent....	1554
359	Marcians, Tuscans and French.....	1555
143	Calais, besieged by the English.....	1557
403	Naples, besieged by the French.....	1557
558	St. Quentin, French and Allies.....Aug. 10,	1557
667	Valenciennes, defeat of Huguenots.....	1557
294	Jerba, Spaniards and Turks.....	1558
145	Calais, besieged by the French.....	1558
81	Bagdad, taken and sacked by Holakoo.....	1559
229	Dreux, Condé and Montmorency.....	1562
432	Orleans, besieged by Duke of Guise.....	1563
356	Malta, besieged by the Turks.....June,	1565
247	Fort Caroline, Spaniards and Huguenots.... Sept. 21,	1565
318	Langside, defeat of Mary, Queen of Scots... May 15,	1568
291	Jarnac, death of Prince of Condé....March 14,	1569
325	Lepanto, Cervantes wounded.....Oct. 7,	1571
397	Moscow, captured by the Tartars.....	1571
336	Lisieux, taken by the Leaguers.....	1571
268	Haarlem, besieged by the Spaniards.....	1572
21	Alkmaer, besieged by the Spaniards.....	1573
531	La Rochelle, besieged by Henry III.....	1573
330	Leyden, a celebrated siege.....	1574
336	Livron, besieged by Henry III. of France....	1574
350	Maestricht, besieged by the Spaniards.....	1576
350	Maestricht, besieged by Prince of Parma....	1579
142	Cahors, besieged by Henry IV. of France.... May 5,	1580
689	Tournai, besieged by Prince of Parma	1581
40	Antwerp, besieged by French.....Jan. 17,	1583
40	Antwerp, besieged by Spaniards..... Aug. 17,	1585
103	Bergen-op-zoom, besieged by Spaniards,.....	1585
559	San Domingo, taken by the English.....	1586
667	Vachtendonck, besieged by the Spaniards....	1588
444	Paris, Death of Henry III..... July 22,	1589
336	Lisieux, taken by Henry IV. of France	1589
26	Anet, victory of Henry IV. of France.....	1590
318	Laon, captured by Henry IV.....	1594
264	Glenlivit, Huntley and Argyle	1594
141	Cadiz, besieged by the English ..... June 12,	1596
106	Bommel, besieged by the Spaniards..... May,	1599
62	Athenry, Irish and English	1599
433	Ostend, besieged by the Spaniards.....	1601
433	Ostend, surrendered to Spaniards..... Sept. 9,	1604
103	Bergen-op-zoom, besieged by the Spaniards ..	1622
273	Heidelberg, besieged by Tilly.....	1622
81	Bagdad.....	1625
532	La Rochelle, besieged by the Cardinal de Richelieu.....	1627
319	Leipsic, Gustavus Adolphus and Tilly. Sept. 7,	1631
843	Lutzen, Gustavus Adolphus slain ..... Nov. 6,	1632

PAGE		A. D.
351	Maestricht, besieged by the Prince of Orange,	1632
417	Nordlingen, Swedes aud Allies,	1634
81	Bagdad, besieged by Amurath IV,	1634
401	Nancy, taken by Louis XIII,	1634
473	Pequot Hill, English and Indians, June 5,	1637
353	Magdeburg, taken and sacked by Tilly,	1637
81	Bagdad, besieged by Amurath IV,	1638
235	Edgehill Fight, defeat of the Earl of Essex, Oct. 23,	1642
390	Leipsic, Protestants and Imperialists, Nov. 2,	1642
474	Perpignan, taken by Louis XIII,	1642
602	Stratton, Edward Waller defeated, May 16,	1643
410	Newbury, Charles I. and Parliamentary army Sept. 20,	1643
410	Newark, besieged by Parliamentary troops,	1643
362	Marston Moor, Charles I. defeated, July 3,	1644
410	Newbury, Charles I. and Parliamentary army Oct. 27,	1644
400	Mowbray, Parliament troops defeated,	1644
230	Dundee, English and Scots,	1645
19	Alford, Royalists defeated by Covenanters,	1645
407	Naseby, Charles I. defeated, June 14,	1645
569	Selkirk, Montrose defeated,	1645
410	Newark, surrendered to the Scots, May 11,	1646
230	Dungan Hill, English and Irish,	1647
570	Senneffe, Prince of Condé and the Confederates, Aug. 11,	1647
227	Drogheda, besieged by Cromwell,	1649
229	Dunbar, Oliver Cromwell and the Scots,	1650
149	Canton, taken by the Tartars,	1650
230	Dundee, besieged by General Monk, Aug. 28,	1651
699	Worcester, Charles II. defeated, Sept. 3,	1651
474	Perth, taken by Oliver Cromwell,	1651
19	Algiers, bombarded by Admiral Blake,	1653
53	Arras, Condé and Turenne, Aug. 24,	1654
488	Praga, Poles and Swedes,	1656
83	Barranow, Poles and Swedes,	1656
231	Dunkirk, Spaniards and Allies, June 4,	1658
425	Nyeborg, Danes and Swedes,	1659
259	Frontiera, Spaniards and Portuguese,	1663
668	Valenciennes, captured by Louis XIV, March 17,	1667
640	Tournai, besieged by Louis XIV,	1667
351	Maestricht, besieged by Louis XIV, June 10,	1673
244	Fehrbellen, Swedes and Prussians,	1675
602	Sudbury, Americans and Indians, April 18,	1676
352	Maestricht, besieged by the Prince of Orange, July 19,	1676
665	Udevalla, Danes and Swedes,	1678
119	Bothwell Bridge, Covenanters and Royalists	1679
567	Sedgemoor, Lord Monmouth defeated, July 5,	1685
385	Mohacz, defeat of Turks,	1687
273	Heidelberg, taken by General Melac,	1688
337	Londonderry, besieged by army of King James II, April,	1688
95	Belgrade, besieged by the Elector of Bavaria,	1688
313	Killiecrankie, English and Scots, July 27,	1689
120	Boyne, King William and King James, July 1,	1690
171	Charleroi (Fleurus), Luxemburg and the Allies, July 1,	1690
566	Schenectady, massacre of the settlers, Feb. 8,	1691
389	Mons, besieged by Louis XIV,	1691
67	Aughrim, Irish and the English, July 12,	1691
333	Limerick, besieged by English,	1691
237	Enguien, Marshal Luxemburg and the British, Aug. 3,	1692
401	Namur, taken by Louis XIV,	1692
273	Heidelberg, taken by the French,	1693
408	Neerwindin, Marshal de Luxemburg and the English, July 29,	1693
126	Brest, besieged by English,	1694
401	Namur, taken by the English,	1695
229	Drumclog, Claverhouse defeated, June 1,	1697
81	Ballinahinch, Irish and English, June,	1698
405	Narva, Peter the Great and Charles XII, Nov. 30,	1700
401	Namur, taken by the French,	1701
350	Madras, besieged by Dahood Khan,	1702
208	Cremona, besieged by Prince Eugene,	1702
680	Warsaw, taken by Charles XII,	1703
495	Pultusk, Charles XII. and the Saxons, May 1,	1703
624	Thorn, besieged by Charles XII, Oct. 30,	1703
105	Blenheim, English and Dutch, and French and Bavarians, Aug. 2,	1704
277	Hochstadt, do. do., do. do, Aug. 2,	1704
84	Barcelona, Prince of Darmstadt slain,	1705
508	Ramillies, English and the Allies, May 23,	1706
312	Kalisk, Swedes and Poles,	1706

PAGE		A. D.
24	Almanza, French and Allies, April 9,	1707
825	Lerida, taken by the French,	1707
435	Oudenarde, Prince Eugene and Burgundians, July 11,	1708
490	Pultowa, Peter the Great and Charles XII, July 8,	1709
355	Malplaquet, Prince Engene and the Duke of Marlborough, Sept. 11,	1709
680	Villaviosa, French and Spaniards,	1710
126	Brihuega, French and Allies,	1710
600	Straslund, besieged by Charles XII,	1713
155	Cassano, Prince Eugene and Vendome,	1715
617	Temeswar, besieged by Prince Eugene,	1716
230	Dumblane (Sheriffmuir), Charles the Pretender, Nov. 12,	1715
473	Peterwardin, Prince Eugene and the Turks,	1716
385	Mokhause, besieged by the Tartars,	1717
95	Belgrade, besieged by Prince Eugene, June 19,	1717
254	Frederichshald, Charles XII. slain, Dec. 11,	1718
549	St. Sebastian, taken by the French,	1719
286	Ispahan, besieged by the Afghans,	1722
286	Ispahan, retaken by Nadir Shah,	1727
384	Milan, blockaded by Sardinians,	1733
470	Parma, Austrians and Allies, June 29,	1734
120	Bovino, Spaniards and Imperialists,	1734
434	Otchakov, besieged by the Russians,	1737
386	Molwitz, Prussians and Austrians, April 10,	1741
488	Prague, taken by the French,	1741
680	Vilmanstrant, Swedes and Russians,	1741
14	Aiguebelle, French and Spaniards,	1742
225	Dittengen, gained by George II, June 26,	1743
701	Wyoming, Delawares and Shawnees,	1743
488	Prague, taken by the Prussians,	1744
350	Madras, besieged by the French,	1744
245	Fontenoy, Allies defeated by Marshal Saxe, April 30,	1745
256	Friedburg, Frederic the Great and Allies, June 4,	1745
384	Milan, blockaded by Spaniards,	1745
640	Tournai, besieged by Louis XV,	1745
488	Prestonpans, Charles the Pretender Sept. 21,	1745
264	Gladsmuir, Charles the Pretender Sept. 21,	1745
244	Falkiek, Charles the Pretender, Jan. 18,	1746
210	Culloden, defeat of Charles the Pretender, April 16,	1746
401	Namur, taken by the French,	1746
103	Bergen-op-zoom, besieged by the French,	1747
159	Caverypauk, French and English,	1754
122	Braddock's Defeat (Fort du Quesne), July 9,	1755
433	Oswego, English and French, July,	1755
479	Pirna, Frederic the Great and the Saxons,	1756
146	Calcutta, The Black Hole, June,	1756
543	Rossbach, Frederic the Great and the Allies, Nov. 5,	1757
126	Breslau, Austrians and Prussians, Nov. 22,	1757
341	Louisburg, besieged by the English, June,	1758
630	Ticonderoga, besieged by the British, July 6,	1758
427	Oldmutz, besieged by Frederic the Great,	1758
277	Hochkirchen, Prussians and Austrians Oct. 14,	1758
252	Foet St. David, taken by the French,	1758
350	Madras, besieged by the French,	1758
545	Sagan, Prussians and Russians,	1759
103	Bergen, French and Allies, April 13,	1759
284	Minden, defeat of the French, Aug. 1,	1759
216	Cunnersdorf, Russians and Prussians Aug. 12,	1759
365	Maxen, Austrians and Prussians,	1759
250	Fort Niagara, besieged by the English, July 7,	1759
501	Quebec, besieged by the English, July 30,	1759
502	Montmorenci, English and French, July 9,	1759
508	Plains of Abraham, death of Wolfe and Montcalm, Sept. 30,	1759
504	Quebec, besieged by the French, May 18,	1760
566	Schweidnitz, captured by the Austrians,	1761
244	Almeida, taken by the English,	1762
567	Schweidnitz, besieged by the Prussians Oct. 9,	1762
702	Wyoming, massacre of the settlers, Oct. 14,	1763
566	Schellenberg, Marlborough and the Bavarians,	1764
433	Ostrak, defended against 30,000 Turks,	1768
99	Bender, besieged by the Russians,	1770
585	Silistria, besieged by the Russians,	1773
329	Lexington, Americans and English, April 19,	1775
329	Concord, Americans and English, April 19,	1775
112	Boston, invested by the Americans, April,	1775
113	Bunker's Hill, Americans and English, June 17,	1775
631	Ticonderoga, captured by Col. Ethan Allen, May 10,	1775

PAGE		A. D.
702	Wyoming, civil war among the settlers	1775
417	Great Bridge (Dismal Swamp), Americans and English, Dec. 9,	1775
504	Quebec, Montgomery slain, Dec. 31,	1775
417	Norfolk, Americans and English, Jan. 1,	1776
396	Moore's Creek Bridge, Americans and English, Feb. 27,	1776
173	Charleroi (Fleurus), French and Austrians, May 26,	1776
249	Charleston, Moultrie's defense, June 28,	1776
127	Brooklyn (Long Island), Americans and English, Aug. 27,	1776
276	Harlem Heights, Americans and English, Sept. 16,	1776
693	White Plains, Americans and English, Oct. 28,	1776
258	Fort Washington, captured by the British Nov. 16,	1776
646	Trenton, Americans and English, Dec. 25,	1776
488	Princeton, Americans and English, Jan. 3,	1777
280	Hubbarbton, Americans and English, July 7,	1777
99	Bennington Heights, Americans and English, Aug. 16,	1777
250	Fort Schuyler, besieged by the English, Aug. 6,	1777
251	Oriskany, Fort Schuyler relieved, Aug. 22,	1777
589	Bemis' Heights, Americans and English, Sept. 19,	1777
590	Stillwater, Americans and English, Oct. 7,	1777
596	Saratoga, surrender of Burgoyne, Oct. 17,	1777
124	Brandywine, Americans and English, Sept. 11,	1777
470	Paoli, Americans and English, Sept. 20,	1777
260	Germantown, Americans and English, Oct. 3,	1777
512	Red Bank, Americans and English, Oct. 22,	1777
387	Monmouth, Americans and English, June 28,	1778
705	Wyoming, massacre of the settlers, July 2,	1778
566	Schoharie, Americans and Indians, July 2,	1778
501	Quaker Hill, Americans and English, Aug. 29,	1778
179	Cheery Valley, massacre of the settlers, Nov. 11,	1778
563	Savannah, captured by the British, Dec. 29,	1778
126	Briar Creek, Americans and English, March 3,	1779
175	Charleston, besieged by the English, May 11,	1779
598	Stono Ferry, Americans and English, June 20,	1779
423	Norwalk, burnt by the British, July 12,	1799
599	Stony Point, captured by General Wayne, July 15,	1799
564	Savannah, besieged by Americans, Sept. 23,	1799
176	Charleston, besieged by the British, May 9,	1780
693	Waxhaw, massacre of Buford's men, May 29,	1780
509	Ramsour's Mills, American patriots and royalists, June 19,	1780
583	Springfield, Americans and English, June 23,	1780
271	Hanging Rock, Americans and English, Aug. 7,	1780
147	Camden, Americans and English, Aug. 15,	1780
315	King's Mountain, Americans and English, Oct. 7,	1780
201	Cowpens, Americans and English, Jan. 17,	1781
201	Cowan's Ford, Americans and English, Feb. 1,	1781
273	Haw, Americans and English, Feb. 25,	1781
266	Guilford, C. H., Americans and English, March 16,	1781
275	Hobkirk's Hill, Americans and English, April 19,	1781
250	Fort Ninety-Six, besieged by Americans, May 22,	1781
68	Augusta, besieged by Americans, May 23,	1781
290	Jamestown, Americans and English, July 9,	1781
410	New London, taken by Benedict Arnold, Sept. 5,	1781
411	Fort Griswold, captured by the British, Sept. 5,	1781
239	Eutaw Springs, Americans and English, Sept. 8,	1781
707	Yorktown, surrender of Lord Cornwallis, Oct. 19,	1781
105	Blue Licks, Americans and Indians, Aug. 19,	1782
487	Porto Novo, Hyder Ali and the British, Dec.,	1782
314	Kinburn, Russians and Turks,	1787
447	Paris, the French Revolution,	1789
523	Rimnik, Turks and the Allies,	1789
98	Belgrade, besieged by the Austrians,	1789
284	Ismail, besieged by the Russians,	1790
570	Seringapatam, besieged by the English,	1791
80	Bangalore, besieged by British, March 6,	1791
566	Savindroog, taken by the British,	1791

PAGE		A. D.
112	Bossut les Walcour,	1792
670	Valmy, French and the Allies, Sept. 28,	1792
291	Jemappes, French and Austrians, Nov. 6,	1792
640	Tournai, taken by the French, Nov. 8,	1792
401	Namur, taken by the French, Nov. 30,	1792
408	Neerwinden, French and Austrians, March 18,	1793
681	Warsaw, Poles and Russians, April 17,	1793
640	Tournai, captured by the French, April 30,	1793
347	Lyons, besieged by the French, May 29,	1793
357	Manheim, French and Allies, May 30,	1793
669	Valenciennes, besieged by the English, July 21,	1793
635	Toulon, Napoleon first distinguishes himself, Aug. 23,	1793
231	Dunkirk, besieged by the English, Sept. 5,	1793
474	Peripignan, French and Spaniards, Sept.,	1793
353	Maestricht, besieged by the French, Sept.,	1793
473	Permasin, French and Prussians, Sept. 14,	1793
335	Lisle, French and Austrians, Sept. 14,	1793
693	Maubeeg, besieged by the Austrians, Sept. 29,	1793
692	Wattignies, Austrians and French, Oct. 15,	1793
183	Cholet, Vendeans and Republicans, Oct. 17,	1793
179	Chateau Gothieke, Vendeans and Republicans Oct. 23,	1793
254	Fougieris, Vendeans and Republicans, Nov. 15,	1793
548	Saint Florent, besieged by the English,	1793
357	Mons, Vendeans and Republicans, Dec. 12,	1793
186	Coblentz, taken by the French,	1794
204	Gemblioux, French and Austrians,	1794
655	Tuscoing, French and Austrians, May 17,	1794
237	Espierres, French and Austrians, May 22,	1794
172	Charleroi (Fleurus), French and Allies, June 26,	1794
681	Warsaw, besieged by the Russians, July,	1794
120	Boxtel, French and Allies, Aug. 14,	1794
549	St. Sebastian, taken by the French,	1794
640	Tournai, besieged by the French,	1794
147	Calvi, taken by the British,	1794
618	Warsaw, Poles and Russians, Oct. 10–12,	1794
543	Roncq, French and Austrians,	1794
104	Bergen-op-Zoom, besieged by the French,	1794
389	Mons, besieged by the French,	1794
353	Maestricht, besieged by the French,	1794
357	Manheim, French and Allies, Sept. 20,	1795
53	Aenheim, Prussians and French,	1795
336	Loano, French and Austrians, Nov. 23,	1795
149	Cannstadt, General Moreau and the Austrians,	1796
390	Montenotte, French and Austrians, April,	1796
387	Mondovi, French and Sardinians, April 21,	1796
387	Lodi, French and Austrians, May 10,	1796
513	Ienchen, French and Austrians, June 28,	1796
341	Lonato, French and Austrians, Aug. 3,	1796
156	Castiglione, French and Austrians, Aug. 5,	1796
25	Amberg, French and Austrians, Aug. 24,	1796
701	Wurtzberg, French and Austrians, Sept. 3,	1796
84	Bassano, French and Austrians, Sept. 9,	1796
50	Arcola, French and Austrians, Nov. 15, 16, 17,	1796
50	Caldiero, French and Austrians,	1796
680	Villimpenta, French and Austrians,	1796
472	Pavia, captured by Napoleon,	1796
542	Rome, besieged by the French,	1796–9
384	Milan, besieged by Napoleon,	1796
417	Nonnngen, Austrians and French,	1796
357	Mantua, besieged by the French, Jan. 7,	1797
530	Rivoli, French and Austrians, Jan. 14,	1797
246	Forli, taken by the French,	1797
141	Cadore, French and the Austrians,	1797
245	Fishguard, Lord Cawder defeats French,	1797
264	Gorey, English and Irish, June 4,	1797
18	Alexandria, besieged by Napoleon,	1798
497	Pyramids, French and Turks, July 21,	1798
158	Castlebar, English and Irish, Aug. 22,	1798
434	Ofricolli, French defeat General Mack,	1798
397	Morgarten, Swiss and French,	1798
634	Tortosa, besieged by the French,	1798
298	Jaffa, besieged by Napoleon, March 13,	1798
597	Stockach, French and Austrians, March 26,	1798
84	Bardis, Turks and French, April 6,	1799
399	Mount Tabor, French and Turks, April 9,	1799
12	Adda, French and Allies, April 26,	1799
570	Seringapatam, Tippoo slain, May 4,	1799
19	Alessandria, French and Allies, May 17,	1799
714	Zurich, French and Allies, June 5,	1799
644	Trebia, French and Allies, June 19,	1799
399	Mount Tabor, French and Turks, May,	1799
9	St. Jean D'Acre, besieged by the French, May 20,	1799

PAGE		A. D.
5	Aboukir, French and Turks	July 25, 1799
357	Mantua, besieged by the Allies	July 30, 1799
423	Novi, French and Allies	Aug. 4, 1799
263	Gibraltar, besieged by French	Sept. 12, 1799
566	Savigliano, French and Austrians	Sept. 18, 1799
103	Bergen, Allies and French	Sept. 19, 1799
21	Alkmaer, Allies and French	Sept. 19, 1799
84	Bassano, French and Austrians	Oct. 2, 1799
260	Gaza, besieged by the French	1799
400	Muolta, French and Russians	1799
384	Milan, besieged by Suwarrow	1799
274	Heliopolis, French and Turks	1800
237	Engen, French and Austrians	May 2, 1800
384	Moeskirch, French and Austrians	May 5, 1800
389	Montebello, Austrians and French	June 9, 1800
359	Marengo, French and Austrians	June 14, 1800
277	Hohenlinden, French and Austrians	Dec. 3, 1800
384	Milan, besieged by Napoleon	1800
18	Alexandria, French and English	March 21, 1801
318	Lasawaree, English in India	1803
19	Alighur, taken by the English	Sept. 4, 1803
61	Assaye, Wellesley and Schindah	Sept. 23, 1803
12	Agra, English defeat Mahrattas	Oct. 10, 1803
52	Argaum, Wellesley and Schindah	Nov. 29, 1803
147	Caldiero, French and the Austrians	1805
428	Oporto, taken by the French	1805
231	Durrenstein, French and the Allies	1805
665	Ulm, surrender of General Mack	Oct. 17, 1805
68	Austerlitz, Napoleon and the Allies	Dec. 2, 1805
135	Buenos Ayres, besieged by the British	June 21, 1806
544	Saalfeld, French and Republicans	Oct. 10, 1806
292	Jena, French and Prussians	Oct. 14, 1806
64	Auerstadt, French and Prussians	Oct. 14, 1806
269	Halle, French and Prussians	Oct. 17, 1806
495	Pultusk, French and Russians	Dec. 26, 1806
127	Breslau, taken by the French	Jan. 8, 1807
240	Eylau, French and Russians	Feb. 8, 1807
223	Dantzic, besieged by the French	May 5, 1807
136	Buenos Ayres, besieged by the British	May 9, 1807
273	Heilsberg, French and Russians	June 9, 1807
256	Friedland, French and Russians	June 14, 1807
136	Buenos Ayres, defeat of the English	July 6, 1807
195	Constantinople, besieged by the English	1807
357	Kiöge, Danes and English	1807
385	Mohrungen, French and Russians	1807
585	Sieta Agnas, French and Spaniards	1808
523	Rio Seco, French and Spaniards	July 14, 1808
630	Vimiera, Wellington and the French and Spaniards	Aug. 21, 1808
549	St. Sebastian, taken by the French	Feb. 23, 1808
649	Tudela, French and Spaniards	1808
80	Barcelona, taken by the French	1808
562	Saragossa, besieged by the French	1808–9
200	Coeunna, Sir John Moore slain	Jan. 16, 1809
661	Innspruck, taken by the Tyrolese	April 10, 1809
5	Abensburg, Austrians and French	April 20, 1809
232	Echmuhl, Napoleon and the Austrians	April 22, 1809
510	Ratisbon, taken by Napoleon	April 23, 1809
428	Oporto, French and English	May 11, 1809
661	Worgl, defeat of Austrians	May 13, 1809
56	Asperne, Napoleon and Archduke Charles	May 22, 1809
58	Essling, French and Austrians	May 22, 1809
15	Alcaniz, French and Spaniards	May 23, 1809
507	Raab, Austrians and French	June 14, 1809
98	Belchite, French and Spaniards	June 18, 1809
680	Wagram, French and Austrians	July 6, 1809
616	Talavera, French and Allies	July 27, 1809
662	Brenner, Tyrolese and French	Aug. 4 to 11, 1809
662	Sterzingumons, Tyrolese and French	Aug. 11, 1809
25	Almonacid de Zorita, French and Spaniards	Aug. 11, 1809
662	Berg Isel, Duke of Danzig defeated	Aug. 13, 1809
245	Flushing, bombarded by the British	Aug. 15, 1809
662	Malek, Tyrolese and French	Oct. 16, 1809
585	Silistria, besieged by the Russians	1809
670	Valls, French and Spaniards	1809
99	Bender, stormed by the Russians	1809
325	Leeida, taken by the French	1810
184	Ciudad Rodrigo, besieged by the French	June 11, 1810
24	Almeida, besieged by the French	Aug. 15, 1810
138	Busaco, Wellington and the French	Sept. 26, 1810
94	Baza, Spaniards and French	1810
684	Tortosa, surrender of General Lille	Jan. 2, 1811
84	Barrosa, French and Allies	March 6, 1811
75	Badajoz, besieged by French	March 11, 1811

PAGE		A.D.
259	Fuentes d'Onore, French and English	May 4, 1811
24	Almeida, besieged by the French	May 16, 1811
14	Albuera, French and English	May 16, 1811
546	Saguntum, French and Spaniards	Sept. 28, 1811
55	Arroyo del Molino, English and French	Oct. 28, 1811
631	Tippecanoe, Americans and Indians	Nov. 7, 1811
617	Tarifa, besieged by the French	Dec. 20, 1811
223	Dantzic, surrendered to the Allies	Jan. 1, 1812
185	Ciudad Rodrigo, besieged by the English	Jan., 1812
77	Badajoz, besieged by the English	March, 1812
24	Almaraz, French and English	May 18, 1812
433	Ostrovno, French and Russians	July 20, 1812
557	Salamanca, French and Allies	July 22, 1812
433	Ostrovno, French and Russians	July 26, 1812
126	Brownstown, Americans and English	Aug. 5, 1812
225	Detroit, surrender of General Hull	Aug. 16, 1812
585	Krasnoi, Russians and French	Aug. 15, 1812
585	Smolensko, Russians and French	Aug. 16, 1812
109	Moskwa, French and Russians	Sept. 7, 1812
107	Borodino, French and Russians	Sept. 7, 1812
397	Moscow, burnt by the Russians	Sept. 9, 1812
136	Burgos, Castle of, besieged by the Allies	Sept. 18, 1812
426	Ogdensburg, Americans and English	Oct. 2, 1812
226	Dorogoboozh, Russians and French	Oct. 12, 1812
506	Queenstown, Americans and English	Oct. 13, 1812
355	Malo-Yaroslavetz, French and Russians	Oct. 23, 1812
585	Krasnoi, French and Russians	Nov. 17, 1812
101	Beresina, French and Russians	Nov. 26, 1812
317	Kowno, French and Russians	Dec. 13, 1812
255	Frenchtown, Americans and English	Jan. 23, 1813
426	Ogdensburg, Americans and English	Feb. 21, 1813
156	Castalla, French and the Austrians	April 13, 1813
707	York, Americans and English	April 25, 1813
344	Lutzen, French and Allies	April 30, 1813
248	Fort Meigs, Americans and English	May 1, 1813
85	Bautzen, French and Allies	May 20, 1813
269	Hampton, Americans and English	May 25, 1813
248	Fort George, Americans and English	May 27, 1813
544	Sackett's Harbor, Americans and English	May 29, 1813
598	Stony Creek, Americans and English	June 8, 1813
312	Kanth, French and Prussians	1813
566	Schellendorf, French and Prussians	1813
126	Breslau, taken by the French	1813
680	Vittobia, French and English	June 21, 1813
440	Pampeluna, French and Allies	June, 1813
203	Craney Island, English and Americans	June 22, 1813
104	Black Rock, Americans and English	July 11, 1813
498	Pyrenees, French and Allies	July 26, 1813
252	Fort Stephenson, Major Crogan's defense	Aug. 2, 1813
226	Dresden, Napoleon and the Allies	Aug. 26, 1813
312	Katzbach, French and Prussians	Aug. 26, 1813
317	Kulm, French and Allies	Aug. 30, 1813
249	Fort Mimms,	Aug. 30, 1813
561	San Marcial, French and Allies	Aug. 31, 1813
224	Denewitz, French and Allies	Sept. 6, 1813
549	St. Sebastian, besieged by the English	Sept. 8, 1813
620	Thames, Americans and English	Oct. 5, 1813
321	Mockern, Blucher and Ney	Oct. 14, 1813
320	Leipsic, French and Allies	Oct. 16–18, 1813
269	Hampton's Defeat, in Canada	Oct. 21, 1813
269	Hanau, French and Bavarians	Oct. 30, 1813
53	Arnheim, French and Prussians	Nov., 1813
205	Tullushatchee, Americans and Indians	Nov. 3, 1813
95	Beaverdams, Americans and English	Nov. 11, 1813
183	Cheyslee's Fields, Americans and English	Nov. 11, 1813
206	Talladega, Americans and Indians	Nov. 8, 1813
90	Bayonne, French and Allies	Dec. 13, 1813
250	Fort Niagara, taken by the British	Dec. 19, 1813
206	Tallapoosa, Americans and Indians	Jan. 9, 1814
206	Emucfau Americans and Indians	Jan. 22, 1814
206	Enotochopeo,	Jan. 23, 1814
207	Tohopeka, Americans and Indians	Jan. 27, 1814
129	Brienne, Napoleon and Blucher	Jan. 29, 1814
179	Champaubert, French and Allies	Feb. 10, 1814
395	Montmirail, French and Allies	Feb. 11, 12, 1814
390	Fontainebleau, French and Allies	Feb. 17, 1814
390	Montereau, French and Allies	Feb. 18, 1814
93	Orthes, French and Allies	Feb 27, 1814

PAGE		A. D.
84	Bar-sur-Aube, French and Allies	Feb. 27, 1814
244	Fere Champenoise, French and Allies	Feb. 28, 1814
104	Bergen-op-Zoom, besieged by the English	March 8, 1814
318	Laon, French and Allies	March 9, 1814
515	Rheims, Russians and French	March 13, 1814
49	Arcis-sur-Aube, French and the Allies	March 20, 1814
318	La Cole Mill, Americans and British	March 30, 1814
464	Paris, entered by the Allies	March 31, 1814
638	Toulouse, French and English	April 10, 1814
434	Oswego, Americans and English	May 5, 1814
548	St. Dizier, French and Allies	June 27, 1814
181	Chippewa, Americans and English	July 3, 1814
413	Niagara (Lundy's Lane)	July 25, 1814
247	Fort Erie, Americans and English	July 25, 1814
598	Stonington, bombarded by the British	Aug. 8, 1814
105	Bladensburg, Americans and English	Aug. 25, 1814
687	Washington, burnt by the British	Aug. 25, 1814
484	Plattsburg, Americans and English	Sept. 11, 1814
81	Fort McHenry, Americans and English	1814
81	Baltimore, Americans and English	Sept. 12, 1814
247	Fort Boyer, Americans and English	Sept. 15, 1814
472	Pensacola, taken by Gen. Jackson	Nov. 20, 1814
410	New Orleans, Americans and English	Jan. 8, 1815
333	Ligny, French and Allies	June 16, 1815
689	Quatre Bras, French and Allies	June 16, 1815
689	Waterloo, Napoleon and Wellington, June 18,	1815
690	Wavres, Grouchy and Prussians	1815
464	Paris, surrendered to the Allies	July 3, 1815
216	Curnoul, besieged by the British	Dec. 14, 1815
20	Algiers, bombarded by the English	Aug. 2, 1816
561	Santiago, battles of, in Peru	1817-1818
508	Ragdier, taken by the British	1818
623	Thermopylæ, Greeks and Turks	July 18, 1821
367	Messolonghi, Marco Bozzaris slain	1823
365	Meagui, taken by the British	1824
266	Guamaga, Spaniards and Peruvians	1824
69	Ayacucho, Spaniards and Peruvians	Dec. 9, 1824
365	Megaspelion, besieged by the Turks	1828
648	Tripolitza, besieged by the Greeks	1826
648	Tripolitza, taken by Ibrahim Pacha	1828
671	Varna, taken by the Russians	1828
81	Balkan, Turks and Russians	July 26, 1829
585	Silistria, besieged by the Russians	1829
465	Paris, French Revolution	July, 1830
266	Grochow, Poles and Russians	Feb. 19, 1831
432	Ostrolenko, Poles and Russians	Feb. 30, 1831
682	Siedlece, Poles and Russians	April 10, 1831
483	Ostrolenko, Poles and Russians	May 26, 1831
684	Wilna, Poles and Russians	June 12, 1831
685	Wilna, Poles and Russians	June 18, 1831
488	Prague, Poles and Russians	Aug., 1831
686	Warsaw, Poles and Russians	Sept. 6, 1831
44	Antwerp, besieged by the French	Dec. 8, 1832
247	Fort Dade, massacre of Major Dade and troops,	Dec., 1835
559	San Jacinto, Texans and Mexicans	April 21, 1836
104	Bilboa, besieged by the Carlists	Dec. 25, 1836
508	Ramales, Carlists defeated	1837
245	Fonterabia, defeat of the Carlists	1837
696	Windmill Point, Canadian patriots and royalists	1837

PAGE		A. D.
186	Constantina, French and Arabs	Oct. 13, 1837
397	Morella, taken by the Carlists	1838
262	Gnuznee, taken by the British	July 23, 1839
417	Nisib, Ibrahim Pacha and Turks	1839
318	Kurrochee, taken by the British	1839
149	Canton, bombarded by British	June 28, 1840
11	St. Jean d'Acre, bombarded by the English,	Nov. 3, 1840
397	Morella, taken by Espartero	1840
149	Canton, bombarded by British	Feb. 26, 1841
149	Canton, bombarded by the British	May 25, 1841
26	Amoy, bombarded by the British	Aug. 27, 1841
313	Khurd Kabool, English and Afghans	1841
268	Gundamuck, massacre of British troops	1842
396	Moodkee, British and Sikhs	1845
21	Aliwal, British and Sikhs	Jan. 28, 1846
588	Sobraon, British and Sikhs	Feb. 10, 1846
439	Palo Alto, Americans and Mexicans, May 7,	1846
513	Resaca de la Palma, Americans and Mexicans	May 9, 1846
391	Monterey, Americans and Mexicans	Sept. 24, 1846
131	Buena Vista, Americans and Mexicans	Feb. 27, 1847
672	Vera Cruz, besieged by Gen. Scott, March 26,	1847
163	Cerro Gordo, Americans and Mexicans	April 17, 1847
180	Cherubusco, Americans and Mexicans	Aug. 10, 1847
490	Puenta Nacional, Americans and Mexicans	Aug. 11, 1847
198	Contreeras, Americans and Mexicans	Aug. 18, 1847
385	Molino del Rey, Americans and Mexicans	Sept. 8, 1847
170	Chapultepec, Americans and Mexicans	Sept. 12, 1847
381	Mexico, Americans and Mexicans	Sept. 15, 1847
280	Huamaulta, Americans and Mexicans, Oct. 9,	1847
617	Stuhleweissenburg, Hungarians and Austrians	Sept. 29, 1848
618	Buda, besieged by the Hungarians	April, 1849
618	Szoregh, Hungarians and Austrians	Aug. 5, 1849
619	Temeswar, Hungarians defeated	1849
283	Isted, Danes and Slcheswck-Holsteiners	1850
427	Oltenitza, Russians and Turks	Nov. 4, 1853
312	Kalafat, Russians and Turks	March 11–16, 1854
426	Odessa, bombarded by the Allies	April 21, 1854
586	Silistria, besieged by the Russians	May 17, 1854
184	Citate, Russians and Turks	June 6, 1854
22	Alma, Russians and Allies	Sept. 20, 1854
571	Balaklava, charge of the 600	Oct. 25, 1854
571	Sevastopol, invested by the Allies	Sept. 28, 1854
283	Inkeemann, Russians and Allies	Nov. 5, 1854
237	Eupatoria, Russians and Turks	Feb. 25, 1855
577	Tchernaya, Russians repulsed	Aug. 16, 1855
578	Sevastopol, final assault	Sept. 5, 1855
237	Eupatoria, Russians and Turks	Sept. 29, 1855
312	Kars, Russians and Turks	Sept. 29, 1855
283	Ingour, Russians and Turks	Nov. 6, 1855
312	Kertch, Russians and Allies	Dec. 16, 1855
525	Rivas, Gen. Walker and Nicaraguans, June 29,	1855
527	Santa Rosa, Nicaraguans and Costa Ricans	March 20, 1856
527	Rivas, Nicaraguans and Costa Ricans, April 11,	1856
530	Massaya, Walker and Nicaraguans	Oct. 12, 1856
530	Granada, Walker and Nicaraguans	Oct. 13, 1856

ALPHABETICAL INDEX.

A.

Abares, the khan of, besieges Constantinople, 187.
Abel de Beidiers de la Gardampe, a knight of Malta, killed at the siege of Malta, 356.
Abderame, or Abderrahman, king of the Moslems, killed at the battle of Tours, 642.
Abdoulmoumen, an Arab monarch, at siege of Tunis, 650.
Abdu-er-Rahman, a Moorish chieftain at siege of Zamora, 713.
Abimelech, son of Gideon, killed at siege of Thebes in Palestine, 622.
Aboo-Melik, a Moorish chieftain, at the siege of Ronda, 543.
Abou-Obeidah enters Antioch, 27.
Abaux Aioue, captain at third siege of Constantinople, 187.
Abradates, king of Lusiana, anecdote of, 627; his death, 628.
Abrahjam, the patriarch, 314.
Abrahim Bey, at battle of Heliopolis, 274.
Abured, colonel, at Dundee, 230.
Abydenians, defeated, 6.
Accien, grandson of Malek Schah, besieged in Antioch, 28; unsuccessful attack of, on Crusaders, 30; makes a truce with Crusaders, 32; his death, 35.
Accius Varus, killed at battle of Munda, 400.
Achab, king of Palestine, at the battle of Samaria, 559.
Achæans, at Corinth, 195.
Achæan League, 197.
Achai, reduced to a Roman province, 197.
Achan, the Judean, stoned to death with his family, 14.
Achard, General, 44.
Achmet, Pacha, at Citate, 184.
Achland, Major, at battle of Bemus' Heights, 589; wounded at battle of Stillwater, 593.
Adad, king of Syria, at the siege of Samaria, 558.
Adams, Brigadier, at battle of the Alma, 24.
Adams, Sir Francis, at Waterloo, 691.
Adams, Samuel, ordered to be arrested, 329.
Adhemar, bishop, at Antioch, 30.
Admetus, a general of Alexander the Great, killed at siege of Tyre, 657.
Adrian, a magistrate of Leyden, his heroism at the siege of Leyden, 332.
Adrian, Pope, calls upon the aid of Charlemagne against Didier, king of the Lombards, 470.
Adrastus, king of the Argives, 621.
Ælius Adrianus, 300.
Æmilius, L., chosen consul of Rome, and fights Hannibal at Cannæ, 148.
Ætius, the Roman general at the siege of Orleans, 428; at battle of Châlons, 170.
Afdhal, Emir, in command of Egyptians at Arcola, 55; his sorrow and despair, 56.
Afghans, at Ghuznee, 262; at Gundamuck, 268; at Khurd Kabool, 313.
Afranius, at the battle of Pharsalia, 474.
Agamemnon, king of Mycenæ, at siege of Troy, 649.
Agesilaus, appointed to the command of the Lacedæmonian army, 326; at the battle of Mantinea, 368.
Agias, an Arcadian, killed by the Persians, 216.
Agnew, Brigadier-General, killed at Germantown, 262.
Agricola, in command of Scots, at Grampian Hills, 264.
Ahaz, king of Judah, at siege of Jerusalem, 295.
Ahenobarbus, in command of the fleet of Brutus, 477.
Ainadin, battle of, 223.
Aisquith, captain, at skirmish of Bear's Creek, 82.
Alaric, king of the Goths, at the siege of Rome, 537; besieges Rome a second time, ibid.
Alava, General, at the battle of Salamanca, 556.
Albert, Archduke of Austria, at the siege of Lisle, 335.
Albert, Constable d', slain, 70.
Albert, king of Sweden, at battle of Falköping, 244.
Albergoti, Lieutenant-General, at siege of Turin, 655.
Albigeois, crusade against the, 637.
Albinus, a Roman general at the battle of Lyons, 347; death of, 347.
Albion, king of the Lombards, at the siege of Pavia, 470.
Alburtis, Captain, killed at the siege of Vera Cruz, 672.
Alcibiades, besieges Byzantium, 189.
Alcaldes, appointed by Pizarro, at Cuzco, 216.
Alcimus, a general of Demetrius, at the siege of Rhodes, 519.
Aldebete, an officer of Cortez, at the siege of Mexico, 379.
Alexander, the Great, heroism of, at Arbela, 48; defeats Darius, ibid.; at Athens, 63; first distinguishes himself at battle of Chæronea, 167; at the battle of the Granicus, 265; at the siege of Gaza, 259; at the siege of Thebes, 621; takes Jerusalem, 296; at the siege of Tyre, 656; his cruelty, 658; visits the camp of the Athenians before the battle of Platæa, 480; at the battle of Issus, 287; at the battle of the Hydaspes, 281; divides his kingdom among his generals, 516; at Persepolis, 472.
Alexander I., Emperor of Russia, 130; at Warsaw, 680; at the battle of Dresden, 228; at Bautzen, 87; at battle of Leipsic, 320.
Alexander, or Paris, son of Priam, carries off Helena of Troy, 649.
Alexander, Prince of Wirtemberg, in command of infantry at Belgrade, 97.
Alexandrian, library destroyed, 16.
Alee, adherents of, in the battles of Seefin, 568.
Alencon, Duke of, at the siege of Pavia, 471; slain at Azincour, 70.
Alexius, son of Isaac Angelus, Emperor of Constantinople, implores succor for his father from Christian princes, 187; his cowardice, 36; crowned Emperor of Constantinople, 189; assassinated, 191.
Ali, Hyder, at the battle of Porto Novo, 487.
Ali Khan, proclaimed Viceroy of Bengal, Bahar, and Arixa, 146; puts Suraja-ul-Dowlah, the Nabob, to death, 147.
Allatus, a Syracusan, discloses scheme of Marcellus to capture Syracuse by intrigue, 615.
Allen, Mr., a clergyman, bravery of, at Bennington, 100.
Allen, General Charles, in command of British troops at Bayonne, 90.
Allen, Ethan, Col., at the capture of Ticonderoga, 631.
Allonville, General, at battle of Eupatoria, 237.
Almonte, a Mexican General, at battle of San Jacinto, 560; made prisoner, 561.
Almagro, an officer of Pizarro, 5.
Alonzo el Sabio, at the battle of Merida, 365.
Alton, General, wounded at Salamanca, 558.
Alphonso I., at Saragossa, 563.
Alphonso, a prince of the house of Burgundy, assumes the title of King of Portugal, 335.
Alphonso VI., at Toledo, 633.
Alphonso, king of Arragon, at siege of Naples, 402.
Alva, Duke of, in command of the army of Philip II., 553; at siege of Naples, 403.
Alvarado, an officer of Cortez, at battle of Ceutla, 165; cruel scheme of, at Mexico, 366; at the siege of Mexico, 375; his famous leap, 375.
Alvarez, General, in command of Mexicans in battle of Molina del Rey, 386.
Alvinzi, an Austrian general, at battle of Arcola, 51; at battle of Rivoli, 530.
Ambercrombie, General, at Ticonderoga, 630.
Ambercrombie, Col., killed at battle of Bunker's Hill, 116.
Ambercrombie, Lieutenant, at siege of Yorktown, 710.
Americans, at siege of Augusta, 68; at Baltimore, 81; at Fort McHenry, ibid.; at skirmish of Bear's Creek, 81; at Beaverdams, 94; at Bemus' Heights, 592; at Bennington Heights, 99; at Black Rock, 104; at battle of Bladensburg, 105; at battle of Blue Licks, 105; at the siege of Boston, 112; at Bunker's Hill, 112; at the battle of the Brandywine, 124; at Briar Creek, 126; at Brooklyn (Long Island), 127; at Buena Vista, 131; at Briar Creek, 126; at Brownstown, 126; at Camden, 147; at Cerro Gordo, 163; at Chapultepec, 170; at Charleston, 173; at Cherry Valley, 179; at battle of Chippewa, 181; at Chrystler's Fields, 183; at Contreras, 198; at Cowan's Ford, 201; at battle of the Cowpens, 201; at Craney Island, 203; at Detroit, 225; at battle of Eutaw Springs, 238; at Fairfield, 243; at Fort Boyer, 247; at Fort Brown, 515; at Fort du Quesne, 122; at Fort Erie, 247; at Fort Griswold, 411; at Fort George, 248; at Fort Meigs, 249; at Fort Mimms, 249; at Fort Niagara, 250; at Fort Ninety-Six, 250; at Fort Schuyler, 250; at battle of Oriskany, 251; at Frenchtown, 255; at Fort Washington, 253; at Fort Stephenson, 252; at Fort Talladega, 206; at Germantown, 260; at Guilford C. H., 266; at Hampton, 269; at Hanging Rock, 271; at Harlem Plains, 271; at battle of the Haw, 273; at Hobkirk's Hill, 275; at Hubbardton, 280; at Huamantla, 280; at Jamestown, 290; at La Cole Mill, 318; at Lexington, 329; at Mexico, 381; at Molina del Rey, 385; at Monmouth, 387; at Moore's Creek Bridge, 396; at Monterey, 391; at New London, 410; at New Orleans, 411; at Niagara (Lundy's Lane), 413; at Norfolk, 417; at Norwalk, 423; at Ogdensburg, 426; at Paoli, 470; at Palo Alto, 439; at Pequot Hill, 473; at the battle of Plattsburg, 484; at battle of Princeton, 488; at Puenta Nacional, 490; at Quaker Hill, 501; at Quebec, 504; at Queenstown, 506; at Ramsom's Mills, 509; at Red Bank, 513; at Resaca de la Palma, 513; at Sackett's Harbor, 544; at Saratoga, 592; at siege of Savannah, 562; at Schoharie, 566; at Springfield, 588; at Stillwater, 592; at Stonington, 598; at Stony Point, 599; Stony Creek, 598; at Stono Ferry, 598; at Talapoosa, 206; at Tallushatchee, 205; at battle of the Thames, 620; at Ticonderoga, 631; at Tippecanoe, 641; at Trenton, 646; at Tripoli, 648; at Vera Cruz, 672; at Waxhaw, 693; at White Plains, 693; at Windmill Point, 696; at York, 707; at Yorktown, 707.

Amanus, Admiral, of fleet of Licinius, defeated by fleet of Constantine, 140.

Amherst, Lord, at the siege of Louisburg, 341.

Amilcar, a Carthaginian general, killed at first siege of Cremona, 207.

Amilcar, at battle of Crimesus, 210.

Amilcar, Barca, a Carthaginian general, at siege of Tunis, 649.

Ampudia, General, in command of Mexicans at Monterey, 394.

Amurath I., his singular dream, and its fulfillment in his death, 156.

Amurath II., at battle of Varna, 671; besieges Belgrade, 95.

Amurath IV., at siege of Bagdad, 81; anecdote of, ibid.

Amrou, Lieutenant of the Caliph Omar, besieges Pelisium, and Alexandria, 16; destroys the Alexandrian library, ibid; razes the walls of Alexandria, 17; at the siege of Gaza, 260.

Anchiala, city of, built by Sardanapulus in one day, 287.

Angres, an Ostrogoth noble, kills Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, 170.

Andelot, brother of Coligny, at siege of Calais, 146.

André, John, Major, his capture, trial, and execution, 590.

André, a Spanish commander, at battle of Jerba, 294.

Andreken, Marshal, made prisoner at battle of Poictiers, 487.

Andrews, Colonel, at battle of Molina del Rey, 386.

Anduslu, Pacha, made prisoner at the siege of Ismael, 285.

Anecdotes, of Philip of Macedon, at Abydos, 7; of Colonel Vernon, at St. Jean d' Acre, 11; of Constantine the Great, 12; of Amrou, the Saracen, 17; of Caliph Omar, 27; of Florine, wife of Eudes I., Duke of Burgundy, 29; of Bohemond, Prince of Tarentum, 30; of the Bishop of Puy, 30; of Peter the Hermit, 37; of Arbogastes the Frank, 46; of Napoleon Bonaparte, 49; of the same, 51; of Pyrrhus, 52; of Marshal Turenne, 54; of Bonaparte and Lannes, 61; of the dog of Xantippus, 62; of Sylla, 63; of same, 64; of Darius, king of Persia, and Zopyrus, 73; of Semiramus, 75, of Colonel Ridge at siege of Badajoz, 89; of the Sultan Amurath IV. and the musician, 81; of Francis Key, the author of the "Star Spangled Banner," 82; of Croquart, 85; of Napoleon and Duroc, 89; of General Stark and the parson, at Bennington Heights, 100; of Major McGarry, at battle of Blue Licks, 106; of Napoleon, 108; of Colonel Prescott at Bunker Hill, 114; of Major Pitcairn at battle of Bunker Hill, 116; of Richard III., 119; of Philip I., of France, 120; of Otho, Emperor of Germany, 120; of William, Prince of Orange, 122; of George Washington, 123; of General Braddock, 123; of Napoleon at Brienne, 130; of Napoleon at Smolensko, 587; of General Taylor at Buena Vista, 135; of Edward III., of England, his queen, and the knights of Calais, 145; of the heroic citizens of Calais, 144; of Mary, queen of England, 146; of Asdrubal, the treacherous Carthaginian, 152; of the wife of Asdrubal, 154; of Colin Zannequin, the fisherman, 155; of Amurath I., 156; of General Talbot, 158; of Attila, king of the Huns, 169; of St. Just, commander of the French before Charleroi, 172; of Serjeant Jasper at siege of Fort Moultrie, 175; of the American deserters at Cherubusco, 181; of General Scott at Chippewa, 182; of Dandolo, Doge of Venice, 188; of Mourzoufle, 191; of Caius Marcius at Coriolli, 197; of Joan d'Arc, 188; of Colonel Washington and Tarleton, 203; of the king of Bavaria at Cressy, 205; of Edward III. at Cressy, 204; of Prince Eugene at the siege of Cremona, 209; of Xenophon and Cyrus, 213; of Hernando Pizarro and the Inca Manco, 217; of Caulah, sister of Derar, 223; of Philip the Good at Dinant, 226; of Condé and Montmorency, 239; of James II., 231; of Mohammed the Prophet, 312; of Major Ferguson at battle of King's Mountain, 315; of Archidamia, a heroic woman at the siege of Lacedæmon, 318; of Adrian, governor of Leyden, 332; of the women of Livron and Henry III, 336; of Gustavus Adolphus at battle of Lutzen, 343; of Napoleon at battle of Lutzen, 346; of Marshal d'Estrades, 352; of Mustapha Pacha and the gallant knights of Malta, 357; of Calias, a treacherous Greek, 359; of the Constable de Bourbon, 362; of Isodus, son of Phœbidas, 363; of Epaminondas, 365; of Cortez and a Mexican warrior, 371; of Montezuma, 367; of Alvarado at the battle of the Causeway, 375; of the Chevalier Bayard and the Duke of Milan, 384; of Prince Eugene and the Marquis de la Florida, 384; of Duncan at battle of Molina del Rey, 386; of General Washington and General Lee at battle of Monmouth, 388; of Cæsar at the battle of Munda, 400; of Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, at siege of Nancy, 401; of a tailor at the siege of Naples, 402; of the Duke of Alva, 403; of Charles XII. at Battle of Narva, 405, 407; of the Czarafis Artemchelon, 406; of Hannibal the Great, 410; of Colonel Ledyard and his murderer, Bromfield, 411; of Colonel Miller at battle of Niagara, 414; of Colonel Jessup and a serjeant at Niagara, 415; of Joan of Arc and Charles VII., 431; of Sir William Douglas and Hotspur, 435; of Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, 438; of Bishop Gauzlin, 441; of Henry III. and his murderer, the monk Clement, 445; of M. Foulon, 454; of Romulus Augustulus, 470; of Molac de Kercado at the siege of Pavia, 472; of Thais, an Athenian courtezan, 473; of Brutus and Cassius, 477; of Porcia, wife of Brutus, 478; of the Cardinal de Perigord before the battle of Poictiers, 486; of Edward the Black Prince, and King John of France, 487; of General Mercer, at the battle of Princeton, 489; of Peter the Great, 494; of Wolfe and Montcalm at the siege of Quebec, 503; of Count Raymond of Toulouse, 638; of Brennus and the Romans, 536; of Burbot in the defense of the mill, 532; of the Duke of Anjou, 531; of Jean Guiton, 532; of Porus and Alexander, 282; of the woman who ate her child at Jerusalem, 293; of the pig and elephant at siege of Edessa, 234; of Camillus, Dictator of Rome, 243; of the dog Mustapha at the battle of Fontenoy, 246; of Baldwin and the Prince of Edessa, 234; of Caliph Amrou, 260; of Megrel, upon witnessing the death of Charles XII., 255; of the Horatii and Curiatii, 279; of Francisco, a brave Virginian, at battle of Guilford, 268; of Philip II. of France, 264; of Charles XII., 255; of Alexander the Great at Gaza, 260; of Napoleon at Friedland, 257; of Egesimachus and Nicanor, 281; of Napoleon and Caulaincourt at battle of Hanau, 270; of Henry III. of England, 240; of Caractacus, 555; of Marshal Ney, 587; of a citizen of La Rochelle, 533; of Rutilus, a Roman officer, at the siege of Rome, 539; of Chorsamantes at the siege of Rome, 538; of Alaric, king of the Goths, 537; of the death of Count Fulci at Rome, 541; of the Hermit of Rome, 541; of the Duke of Bourbon, 541; of Trajan, a Roman officer, 539; of a Goth at the siege of Rome, 538; of Totila, king of the Goths, 540; of Azzes, a Roman officer, 539; of the Duke of Wellington, 556; of Joram, King of Palestine, and the woman of Samaria, 559; of Elijah the Prophet, 559; of Deaf Smith at the battle of San Jacinto, 560; of Lord Monmouth, 568; of Arnold von Winkelreid, 570; of Lieutenant Kidd at siege of Sevastopol, 576; of a wounded soldier at Sevastopol, 576; of Tarmut, an ally of the Romans, 589; of Sergeant Jasper at Savannah, 595; of the Hessians at the surrender of Burgoyne, 594; of Colonel Cilley at battle of Stillwater, 593; of Colonel Windham at siege of Sevastopol, 582; of Burgoyne and Gates at the surrender of Burgoyne, 596; of Peter the Hermit, 605; of Colonel Zebulon Butler, 705; of Sinan, the Jew, and Barbarossa II., the celebrated pirate, 653; of General Wayne at Stony Point, 696; of Conrad, son of Marquis of Montferrat, 661; of Vauban, a French general, at siege of Valenciennes, 668; of Nicias, commander of the Athenian army besieging Syracuse, 607; of Milo, the Crotonian Hercules, 608; of Charles XII. and his secretary, 602; of two monks at battle of St. Jacob, 548; of Archimedes, the mathematician, 616; of Timoclea, a Theban lady, 622; of Marcellus at siege of Syracuse, 614; of Col. Aves at siege of Buda, 618; of Leonidas, the Spartan, 623; of Cohorn, the engineer, 654; of Alexander the Great, 621; of Marshal de Marsin, 655; of the Green Knight, 660; of Abradates, King of Lusiana, and his wife Panthea, 627; of Eteocles and Polynices, sons of Œdipus, King of Thebes, 621; of Louis XII. at siege of Tournai, 639; of Philip VI. of France, 638; of Fontrailles, a French officer, at siege of Therouanne, 638; of Charles Martel at battle of Tours, 642; of Joan d'Arc at Troyes, 649; of Picton at Waterloo, 69; of Cato, 666; of Julius Cæsar, 667; of the Indian women in Wyoming, 701; of the Princess D'Epinoi, 639; of the Count de Serini at siege of Vienna, 676; of Edward IV. and the Lancasterian Prince of Wales, 679; of Esther, an Indian queen, 705; of Abimeleeh, son of Gideon, 672; of Andrew Jackson, 698; of a soldier at siege of Vienna, 676; of Charles II., 700; of Colonel Ethan Allen, 681.

Anello, a mason, conducts troops of Alphonso into Naples, 402.

Angelus, Isaac, emperor of Constantinople, dethroned and imprisoned by his brother, 187; reinstated, 189; his death, 191.

Angoulême, Duke d', insults Marshal Marmont, 469.

Anhalt, Prince of, at siege of Stralsund, 691.

Anjou, Duke of, at battle of Jarnac, 291.

Anne of Austria, death of, 640.

Anschieng, Bishop, conduct of, at siege of Paris, 441.

Antigonus, one of the Generals of Alexander the Great, attains great power in Macedon, 516; at siege of Tyre, 658; killed at battle of Ipsus, 284.

Antigonus, Deson, at siege of Corinth, 195.

Antiochus, king of Syria, at the battle of Raphia, 510.

Antipater, a general of Alexander the Great, 63, 621; at Cranon, 203.

Anthony, Lieutenant, at Fort Stephenson, 253.

Antony, Mark, at the battle of Philippi, 476; at the battle of Pharsalia, 474.

Ap-Thomas, Sir Rhice, 118.

Appius Claudius, at the siege of Messina, 365; at siege of Syracuse, 613.

Appolonides, deprived of his rank and occupation for opposing Xenophon, 216.

Aqueduct of Naples, used to gain admittance to that city, 401, 402.

Arabs, at Constantina, 186; at Tunis, 650–653; at battle of the Pyramids, 497; at battle of Tours, 640; at Aquileia, 46; at Jerusalem, 300; at battle of Nehawund, 402.

Araspes, a Median nobleman, at battle of Thymbra, 626.

Aratus, chief of the Achæans, forms project of taking Corinth, 195.

Arbaces, governor of Media, at siege of Nineveh, 417.

Arbogastes the Frank, assassinates Augustus, 46; his character and intrigues, ibid.; elevates Eugenius to the throne of the Empire of the West, ibid.; defeated at battle of Aquileia, 47; his death, ibid.

Arbuthnot, Admiral, at Charleston, 1780, 176.

Arc, d', see Joan.

Archelaus, a lieutenant of Mithridates, king of Pontus, heroism of, 64, at battle of Chæronea, 167; takes possession of Athens, 63.

Archimedes, the mathematician, invents machines for the defense of Syracuse, 614; killed by a Roman soldier, 616.

Archidamus, son of Agesilaus, at the battle of Leuctra, 327; at Mantinea, 363; at the siege of Platæa, 481.

Archias, a Spartan governor of Thebes, killed, 621.

Archidamia, a heroine at the siege of Lacedæmon, 318.

Arcon, Chevalier D', at siege of Gibraltar, 263.

Ardaric, king of the Gepidæ in command of the left wing of the army of Attila, at battle of Châlons, 170.

Arentschild, General, at the battle of Salamanca, 557.

Argenteau, D', General, at battle of Montenotte, 390.

Arget, kills twenty-seven of the enemy, in the siege of Odessa, with his own hand, 283.

Argives, battle of the, 52; at Argos, 52.

Argyle, Earl of, at battle of Flodden, 245.

Argyle, Duke of, at battle of Dumblane, 230.

Arimnestus, kills Mardonius, 481.

Arista, General, in command of the Mexicans at the battle of Palo Alto, 459.

Aristaphernes, a general of Darius, at the battle of Marathon, 358.

Aristides, the Athenian general, at battle of Marathon, 358; at the battle of Platæa, 480.

Aristius, 52.

Ariston, death of, 64.

Aristobulus, 296.

Armagnac, D', general at the battle of Bayonne.

Armagnacs, the, at siege of Paris, 441.

Arminius, his famous victory over the Romans under Varus, 696.

Armstrong, John, general, at battle of Germantown, 261; at Charleston, 173.

Armstrong, Major, his gallant defense of Fort McHenry, 82.

Arnold, Benedict, at Quebec, 504; wounded, 506; at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 590; his valor at the battle of Stillwater, 593; wounded, 594; his treason, 590; at New London, 410; character of, 590.

Arnold, of Winkelried, a knight of Unterwalden, slain at the battle of Sempach, 569.

Arnoul, of Rohes, chaplain of the Duke of Normandy, 304.

Arnsa, Don Joseph de, at the siege of Magdeburg, 355.

Arran, Earl of, at the battle of Pinkey, 478.

Arræs, a Persian general, in command of barbarian forces collected by Cyrus, 211.

Arsinoe, wife and sister of Ptolemy, heroism of, 510.

Artagnan, Count d', killed at the siege of Maestricht, 351.

Artapolis, the favorite of Cyrus, killed at Cunaxa, 214.

Artaxerxes, elevated to the throne of Persia, 211; at Cunaxa, 213.

Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia, sends an army against Inarus, 139.

Artemisia, widow of Mausolus of Caria, besieged by Rhodians in Halicarnassus, 515.

Artescheelon, son of the king of Georgia, taken prisoner at Narva, 406.

Arthur, Prince, killed by John of England, 544.

Artillery, used first at battle of Cressy, 204; first used at sieges, 543; enormous pieces of, cast by Mohammed, 194; a novel piece of, constructed by Carey at Wyoming, 703.

Artimisia, at the siege of Rhodes, 516; at the battle of Salamis, ibid.

Arundel, Earl of, at the siege of Paris, 442.

Assassinations, of the Duke of Guise by Poltrot, 432; of Adjutant General Duphot, 542; of Amurath I., 156; of the governors of Syracuse, 616; of Henry VI. by the Duke of Gloucester, afterward Richard III., 620; of Odoacer and his son, by Theodoric, 511; of Odenathus, king of Palmyra, by Malonis, 435; of Herod, son of Odenathus, 436; of Henry III., 446; of the Prince of Condé, 291; of James III., 562; of Ledyard, by Bromfield, 411; of the Cardinal de Lorraine, 444.

Asdrubal, revenges an insult given him by the Carthaginians, 152, 154; his wife, deserted by her husband when in danger, destroys her children and then herself, 154.

Asdrubal, brother of Hannibal, at Utica, 665; defeated and killed at battle of Metaurus, 409.

Aspasia, the mistress of Cyrus, captured by Artaxerxes, 214.

Asu, John, General, with Lincoln, 176; at battle of Briar Creek, 126.

Ashworth, General, in command of Portuguese at Bayonne, 91; wounded, 91.

Aston, Sir Arthur, at the siege of Drogheda, 229.

Astyages, king of Media, death of, 625.

Assyrians, at the battle of Ragau, 508; at Samaria, 559.

Atheling, Edgar, at siege of Jerusalem, 302.

Athenians, at Byblos, 139; at Byzantium, 139; at siege of Chæronæa, 167; at battle of Platæa, 480; at siege of Platæa, 481; at siege of Sardis, 562; at Solygia, 588; at siege of Syracuse, 603; at Torone, 637.

Atlee, Colonel, made prisoner at battle of Long Island, 129.
Athuallpa, Inca of Peru, vanquishes his brother, 159; taken prisoner by Pizarro, 161; death of, 161.
Attalus, at battle of Issus, 288.
Attila, king of the Huns, at the siege of Orleans, 428; his disastrous defeat at Châlons, 169.
Audeley, Lord, at the battle of Poictiers, 486.
Audley, Lord, a leader of the Cornish rebels, executed, 104.
Audley, Lord, commander of Lancasterian army at battle of Blorcheath, slain, 105.
Auer, Colonel, death of, 618.
Augereau, Marshal, wins battle of Castiglione, and receives title of Duke of Castiglione, 157; wounded in the battle of Eylau; at Jena, 293; at Loano, 336; at Leipsic, 320.
Augustus, Prince, at battle of Leipsic, 323.
Augustulus, Romulus, Emperor of the West, banished by Odoacer, king of the Heruli, 470.
Aulick, Captain, at siege of Vera Cruz, 673.
Aurelian, Emperor of Rome, at siege of Palmyra, 437; celebration of his "triumph," 438.
Auerpp, General, killed at battle of Mobrunger, 385.
Austrians, at Abensburg, 5; at the battle of the Adda, 11; at Alessandria, 19; at Almanza, 24; at Amberg, 25; at Amfing, 26; at Arcis-sur-Aube, 49; at Arcola, 50; at Aspern and Essling, 56; at Austerlitz, 68; at Barcelona, 84; at Bassano, 84, at Bautzen, 86; at Belgrade, 95; at Bossut-les-Walcour, 112; at Breslau, 126; at Brienne, 129; at Caldero, 144; at Caldiero, 147; at Cannstadt, 149; at Castiglione, 157; at Ceresole, 163; at Charleroi, 172; at Coblentz, 186; at Dennewitz, 224; at battle of Dresden, 226; at Eckmuhl, 232; at Engen, 237; at Espieries, 237; at battle of Friedburg, 256; at Gembloux, 260; at battle of Hanau, 269; at Hochkirchen, 277; at battle of Hohenlinden, 277; at battle of Jemappes, 291; at battle of Leipsic, 320; at siege of Lisle, 335; at battle of Loano, 335; at Bridge of Lodi, 337; at Lonato, 341; at battle of Lutzen, 342; at the siege of Magdeburg, 355; at battle of Marengo, 359; at Maxen, 365; at Moeskirch, 384; at Molwitz, 386; at siege of Mons, 389; at Montebello, 389; at Montenotte, 390; at Montereau, 391; at Morgarten, 397; at Neerwinden, 409; at Nordlingen, 417; at battle of Novi, 423; at Parma, 470; at Peterwarden, 473; at Prague, 488; at battle of Raab, 507; at Ratisbon, 510; at Renchen, 513; at Rimnik, 523; at Rivoli, 530; at Roncq, 543; at battle of Sacile, 544; at Savigliano, 566; at Schweidnitz, 567; at Sempach, 570; at Stockach, 597; take part in the Hungarian war, 618; at the Trebia, 644; at Tuscolog, 655; at Ulm, 655; at the siege of Vienna, 675; at Villeinpenta, 689; at Wattignies, 681; at Wurtzburg, 701; at Zurich, 714.
Autemarre, Gen. d', at the storming of the Malakoff, 579.
Avila, Alonzo de, an officer of Cortez, at the battle of Tabasco, 524.
Aylva, Baron d', in command of the garrison of Maestricht, 353.
Azzes, a Roman officer, wounded at the siege of Rome, 539.

B.

Babel, Tower of, 71.
Babylon, description of, 71; destruction of, 74.
Babylonians, Inslaved by Cyrus, 73; throw off Persian yoke, 74; 3,000 impaled alive by Cyrus, 75; at siege of Jerusalem, 235; at battle of Thymbra, 625.
Bacchus, Captain, at siege of Monterey, 392.
Backus, Lieutenaut, killed at battle of Sackett's Harbor, 544.
Bagrathion, Prince, at battle of the Adda, 11; of Eylau, 241; at battle of Friedland, 257; at battle of Novi, 424; at battle of the Trebia, 644; at battle of Smolensko, 586; mortally wounded at battle of Borodino, 12.
Bailey, General, at battle of Bemus' Heights, 589.
Bailey, M., Mayor of Paris, his conduct during the Revolution in France of 1789, 455.
Bailie, General, in command of Covenanters at battle of Alford, 19.
Baird, David, Sir, wounded at battle of Corunna, 200.
Baird, James, Sir, at the siege of Savannah, 563.
Balcarra, Earl of, at battle of Bemus' Heights, 589.
Baldwin, the Crusader, at siege of Jerusalem, 301; taken prisoner by the Saracens, 301.
Baldwin I., crowned Emperor of Constantinople, 192.
Baldwin II., 192.
Baldwin, brother of Godfrey the Crusader, at siege of Edessa, 234.
Balfour, William, Sir, at Edgehill Fight, 235.
Balist, an arrow from, transfixes a Goth to a tree, 538.
Balloon, made use of by the French for reconnoitering purposes, 173.
Bankhead, Colonel, at the siege of Vera Cruz, 673.
Barbarossa, Frederic, Emperor of Italy, at siege of Milan, 653.
Barbarossa II., at Algiers, 19; at siege of Tunis, 653.
Barbesieux, commander of the French at siege of Marseilles, 362.
Barbot, condemned to the galleys for his valorous defense of Lebrand, 532.
Barclay de Tolly, General, defeats troops of Bertrand, 86; at Arcis-sur-Aube, 49; at battle of Bautzen, 86; at Borodino, 109; at Brienne, 130; at Pultusk, 495; at Smolensko, 586.
Barak, at the battle in the plains of Esdraelon, 236.
Barry, Lieutenant, at siege of St. Sebastian, 553.
Barré', Colonel, wounded at Quebec, 503.
Barnard, Colonel, at Badajoz, 78; at Ciudad Rodrigo, 185.
Barnesfare, Captain, in command of the battery at Quebec which killed Montgomery, 505.
Barnes, General, at the battles of the Pyrenees, 499; wounded at Bayonne, 92.
Barney, Commodore, heroic conduct of, at Bladensburg, 105.
Bartholomey, Pierre, a priest, discovers hiding-place of the Holy Lance, 37.
Basset, Lord, at siege of Calais, 143.
Basset, Philip, at battle of Lewes, 328.
Basseville, the French envoy at Rome, massacred, 542.
Bastile, capture of the, 450.
Battel Roll, the, made by William the Conqueror after the battle of Hastings, 272.
Batteries, floating, constructed by the Chevalier d'Arcon at siege of Gibraltar, 263.
Battle, the first fully recorded in history, 621.
Baudincourt, governor of Vanconlers, his interview with Joan of Arc, 431.
Bavaria, Duke of, at battle of Blenheim, 105.
Bavarians, at Blenheim, 105; at battle of Hanau, 269; of Nordlingen, 417; of Schellenberg, 566; at siege of Vienna, 677.
Baxter, Colonel, at Fort Washington, 254.
Bayard, Chevalier, made prisoner at Milan, 384.
Baylor, Lieutenant, heroism of, at Fort Stephenson, 283.
Bayonets, when invented, 90.
Beajeau, Captain de, at battle of Fort du Quesne, 122.
Bearnais, at siege of Cahors, 143.
Beaseley, Major, at Fort Mimms, 249.
Beaumonoir, Marshal of, killed in battle of the Thirty, 85.
Beauvais, Bishop of, singular bravery of at battle of Bouvines, 120.
Beck, General de, at siege of Schweidnitz, 517.
Beckwith, General, at battle of Hampton, 269.
Beresford, General, in command of British at Buenos Ayres, 135.
Begarnd, Sieur, massacred after the capture of the Bastile, 452.
Berkley, Admiral, defeated at Brest, 126.
Beggars, King of the, 31.
Belesis, governor of Babylon, at siege of Nineveh, 417.
Belknap, Lieutenant, at battle of Palo Alto, 439.
Belgians, at Dinant, 226.
Belisarius, the Roman general, called to the defense of Constantinople, 186; at siege of Naples, 401; at siege of Ravenna, 512; succors Rimini, 523; at siege of Rome, 538; repeoples Rome, and repulses Tortila, 540; his character, 511.
Bellegarde, General, at battle of Novi, 424; at Aspern and Essling, 57.
Belshazzar, king of Babylon, terrified by a vision, 77; killed by the Persians, 73.
Bem, General, takes part in the Polish Revolution, 681; espouses the cause of the Hungarians, 618; wounded at battle of Temeswar, 619.
Bembeug, Anhalt, Prince, at battle of Stockach, 598.
Bembro, killed, 85.
Benbeck, Deist, lords of, at the battle of Ransbeck, 510.
Beneventum, Prince of, at siege of Naples, 402.
Benningsen, General, at battle of Eylau, 242; of Friedland, 257; of Heilsburg, 274; of Mohrungen, 385; of Pultusk, 495.

Berg, Major, at the battle of Pultowa, 492.
Beresford, General, at battle of Albuera, 15; at Bayonne, 90; at Salamanca, 557; wounded, 558; at Pultowa, 492; at Olevenza, 76.
Bermier, General, destroys fortifications of Almeida, 25.
Bernadotte, Prince of Ponte Corvo, afterward Charles XIV., King of Sweden, at battle of Austerlitz, 68; at battle of Auerstadt, 57; at battle of Charleroi, 172; of Dennewitz, 224; of Halle, 269; of Mohrungen, 385.
Bernard, de, St. Vallier, at siege of Jerusalem, 307.
Bernard, Duke of Weimar, at battle of Lutzen, 343; of Nordlingen, 417.
Berry, Duke de, rebels against his brother, Louis XI., 443.
Bertrand, General, at battle of Leipzic, 321; at Bautzen, 88; at Lutzen, 344.
Bertrand, of St. Giles, at Tripoli, 648.
Berthier, Alexander, General, at Rome, 542.
Berthier, M., son-in-law of M. Foulon, his death, 455.
Berwick, Duke of, at battle of Almaraz, 24.
Berwick, Marshal, at siege of St. Sebastian, 550.
Beruret, General, at the storming of the Malakoff, 580.
Bessieres, Marshal, Duke of Istria, at battle of Austerlitz, 68; of Asperne and Essling, 57; at battle of Rio Seco, 523; killed, 344.
Bessus, a Roman governor, cupidity of, 539.
Betis, commander of Gaza, cruelly put to death by Alexander, 259.
Beveen, Prince of, at Belgrade, 97.
Beyeen, Prince, at battle of Breslau, 126.
Bey, Achmet, defeated at Constantina, 186.
Bey, Rustem, General, killed at battle of Enpatoria, 287.
Bey, Skender, Colonel, at battle of Citate, 104.
Bicetre, castle of (formerly Wicestre), pillaged, 442.
Biddack, Captain, burnt alive by the Indians, 705.
Bigod, Hugh, at the battle of Lewes, 329.
Bird, Lieutenant-Colonel, killed at battle of Germantown, 262.
Bisemberg, a mountain in Austria, 57.
Bishop, Colonel, killed at Black Rock, 104.
Bissel, Colonel, at battle of Buena Vista, 132.
Black Hole of Calcutta, 146.
Blake, General, at battle of Alcaniz, 15; at Belchite, 99; at Baza, 94; at Rio Seco, 523; at siege of Saguntum, 547.
Blake, Admiral, his expedition to Algiers, 19.
Blenheim, battle of, called by the Germans and French, the battle of Hochstadt, 277.
Blois, Count de, the standard-bearer of the Crusaders, his desertion, 36.
Blount, Walter, Sir, killed at the battle of Shrewsbury, 584.
Blucher, Marshal, at battle of Auerstadt, 65; of Bautzen, 87; of Brienne, 129; his imminent danger, 129; at battle of Jena, 292; at Katzbach, 312; of Laon, 318; of Moekern, 321; of Lutzen, 344; of Ligny, 688; of Waterloo, 692.
Boabdil, king of the Moors, defeated by the Spaniards, 261.
Boadicea, Queen of the Iceni, her defeat and death, 106.
Boestler, Colonel, defeated at battle of Beaverdams, 95.
Bogue Forts, at Canton, taken by the English, 149.
Bohemond, Prince of Tarentum, a Crusader, at siege of Antioch, 28; his barbarous expedient to prevent the enemy's spies from entering his camp, 29; defeats Sultans of Aleppo and Damascus, and takes city of Harem, 30; defeated by Saracens, ibid.; slighted by Baldwin, Prince of Edessa, 32; quarrels with the chiefs of the Crusaders, 32; his jealousy, and his stratagem to take Antioch, 32; wounded, 36.
Bohm, Henry de, killed by Robert Bruce in single-handed combat, 83.
Boiroimhe, Brian, king of Ireland, defeated at battle of Clontarf, 186; his death, ibid.
Bombs, invented by Venloo, 667.
Bomilcar, a general of Carthage, at siege of Syracuse, 616.
Bon, General, at St. Jean d'Acre, 10; at the battle of the Pyramids, 399; at battle of Mount Tabor, 399; killed, 11.
Bonami, General, made prisoner at battle of Borodino, 110.
Bonaparte, Jerome, at battle of Waterloo, 690.
Bonaparte, Joseph, in command of the city of Paris, 464; appointed ambassador to Rome, 542; at battle of Talavera, 616.
Bonchamps, General, at battle of Cholet, 183.
Boniface, Marquis of Montferrat, instructs Alexius, emperor of Constantinople, in the art of war, 190.
Bonnet, General, wounded, 557.
Bonneval, General, at the siege of Paris, 443.
Bonnevet, Admiral, his heroic conduct at the siege of Pavia, 471; his death, 472.
Boone, Daniel, with his son, at the battle of Blue Licks, 105.
Boscha, General, in command of the army of Nicaragua at the battle of Rivas, 525.
Boscawen, Admiral, at the siege of Louisburg, 341.
Boroia, Cæsar, killed at Mendovia, 365.
Borosdin, General, at battle of Borodino, 109.
Bose, General, at battle of Guilford Court House, 268.
Bosquet, General, at the storming of the Malakoff, 578; wounded, 579.
Bothwell, Earl of, at battle of Flodden, 245.
Bougainville, General de, at siege of Quebec, 503.
Bourbakie, General, wounded at the storming of the Malakoff, 580.
Bourbon, Constable de, at siege of Marseilles, 362.
Bourbon, Duke of, killed at the siege of Rome, 541; funeral obsequies of, 542.
Bourbons, 94; at siege of Rome, 541.
Bourchier, Sir Thomas, joins army of the Earl of Richmond, at Bosworth Field, 118.
Bourdonnaye, General, at the siege of Tournai, 640.
Boulogne, Earl of, valor of, at battle of Bouvines, 120.
Bowles, Colonel, at battle of Buena Vista, 132.
Boyd, General, at siege of Gibraltar, 263.
Boyd, General, at battle of Chrystler's Fields, 183.
Bozzaris, Marco, killed at battle of Messolonghi, 366.
Brabant, Duke of, slain at Azincour, 70.
Braddock, General, his defeat and death, 122.
Branchi, General, at battle of Dresden, 226; of Montereau, 391.
Bradshaw, Colonel, at Ticonderoga, 630.
Brandon, Sir William, standard bearer of the Earl of Richmond, slain by Richard III., 119.
Brandon, Captain, at battle of Ramsom's Mills, 509.
Bragg, Captain, at battle of Buena Vista, 133; at siege of Monterey, 392.
Brahe, General, at the battle of Lutzen, 342.
Brant, Joseph, an Indian Sachem, joins British army, 250; at siege of Fort Schuyler, 251.
Brass, Corinthian, origin of, 197.
Bravo, General, at battle of Chapultapec, 171.
Breckenbridge, Captain, wounded at battle of Rivas, 528.
Bremoi, General, wounded, 346.
Bremer, Sir George, at Canton, 149.
Brenniere, General, at battle of Salamanca, 556.
Brennus, at siege of Rome, 536; defeated by Camillus, 536; in command of the Gauls at the siege of Clusium, 534.
Brentano, General, at the siege of Schweidnitz, 567.
Breten, General, killed at storming of the Malakoff, 579.
Breteuil, Baron, appointed President of Finance of France, 448.
Bretons, in the battle of the Thirty, 85.
Breton, Cape, falls into the hands of the English, 342.
Breyman, Colonel, at battle of Bemus' Heights, 589; of Bennington Heights, 99; mortally wounded, 594.
Bricketts, General, at battle of Bemus' Heights, 589.
Bridge, famous one, of Prince of Parma, at Antwerp, 42.
Brierfield, Colonel, killed at battle of Ramillies, 509.
Brissac, Duke of, at siege of Paris, 447.
Britons, defeated by Romans, 106; at battle of Crayford, 203; of Shropshire, 584.
Brock, Isaac, General, at Detroit, 225; killed at Queenstown, 506.
Brockenbury, Sir Robert, killed at Bosworth Field, 119.
Broglio, Marshal, appointed French Minister of War, 443.
Bromfield, Major, murders Colonel Ledyard, after the capture of Fort Griswold, 441.
Brompton, battle of, 126.
Brooke, Colonel, in command of British in attack on Fort McHenry, 82.
Brooks, Major, at battle of Bunker's Hill, 113.
Brooks, Captain, at battle of Chapultepec, 171.
Brooks, Colonel, at battle of Bemus' Heights, 589.
Brown, Colonel, at Augusta, 67; at Hanging Rock, 271; at Eutaw Springs, 239.
Brown, General, at battle of Alkmaer, 22.
Brown, Sir George, General, wounded at battle of the Alma, 24.
Brown, Christian, Captain, at Schoharie, 566.
Brown, Lieutenant-Colonel, at siege of Burgos, 188.
Brown, General, at battle of Chippewa, 181; at siege of Fort Erie, 248; at battle of Lundy's Lane, 247; of Ogdensburg, 427; of Sackett's Harbor, 544; of Niagara, 414.

Brown, Major, his gallant defense of Fort Brown in Mexico, 513; his death, 514.
Bruce, David, king of Scotland, invades England, 232; made prisoner at the battle of Durham, ibid.
Bruce, Edward, besieges castle of Stirling, 83; killed at battle of Dundalk, 230.
Bruce, Robert, the "hero-king" of Scotland, at battle of Bannockburn, 83; at battle of Dundalk, 230.
Brunet, General, killed at the siege of Sevastopol, 576.
Brunswick, Duke of, wounded at battle of Auerstadt, 66; killed at battle of Quatre-Bras, 689.
Brutus, in command of Corinthians at battle of Solygia, 588.
Brutus, Marcus, at the battle of Philippi, 477; his death, 478.
Buchan, Earl of, at battle of Dunbar, 229.
Buche, Captai d', at the battle of Poictiers, 486.
Bucker, Lieutenant, at battle of Buena Vista, 133.
Buford, Colonel, massacre of his troops at Waxhaw, 693.
Bugawourth, General, at Borodino, 109.
Burgoyne, Lieutenant-Colonel, wounded at siege of St. Sebastian, 553.
Burgoyne, General, 99; arrives in America, 112; at battle of Bemus' Heights, 590; surrender of, at Saratoga, 596.
Burgundians, at siege of Baza, 94; at battle of Châlons, 170; at siege of Compiegne, 197; at siege of Dinant, 226; of Laon, 318; of Liege, 332; at battle of Morat, 396; at siege of Nancy, 401; of Paris, 441; of Troyes, 649.
Burleson, Colonel, at the battle of San Jacinto, 560.
Butler, John, General, at battle of Guilford Court House, 266.
Butler, Colonel, at Stony Point, 599.
Butler, Major-General, at siege of Monterey, 502.
Butler, John, Colonel, at siege of Fort Schuyler, 251; his conduct in the valley of the Wyoming, 704.
Butler, Walter N., his incursion into Cherry Valley, 179.
Butler, Zebulon, Captain, his conduct in the valley of the Wyoming, 703.
Buyson, De, General, wounded at Camden, 147.
Buzes, Governor of Edessa, cupidity and treachery of, 233.
Byng, General, at the battle of the Pyrenees, 500.
Byron, Lord, his "Childe Harold" quoted, 396.
Byzantines, defend themselves against Alcibiades, 139; decree a crown of gold to Athens, 140.

C.

Cabrera, General, at the battle of Morella, 397.
Caen, General de, at battle of Hohenlinden, 279.
Cæsar, Julius, at Alexandria, 15; defeats army of Ptolemy Bacchus, king of Egypt, 16; at the siege of Marseilles, 362; at battle of Munda, 400; at battle of Pharsalia, 474; at siege of Rimini, 523; at siege of Utica, 666; at battle of Zela, 713.
Cadwallader, Lambert, Colonel, at the attack on Fort Washington, 254.
Cadwallader, John, General, at battle of Monmouth, 387.
Cadwallader, General, at battle of Chapultepec, 171; at Mexico, 382; at battle of Molino del Rey, 385; at Contreras, 199.
Cairo, fall of, 223.
Caleb, the "Sword of God," defeats the Romans, 223.
Calias, cupidity of, after the battle of Marathon, 359.
Callicrates, a Spartan, kills Epaminondas, 364.
Calverly, made prisoner by the Bretons, 85.
Calvinus, Dominitus, defeated at sea by fleet of Brutus and Cassius, 477.
Calvo, Count, at the siege of Maestricht, 352.
Cameron, General, at Bayonne, 92.
Cameron, Captain, killed at Savannah, 563.
Camels, used at battle of Thymbra, 626.
Camillus, Furius, defeats the Gauls,535; at war with the Falerii, 243; at siege of Veii, 671.
Campans, General, wounded at battle of Borodino, 109; wounded at Leipsic, 324.
Campbell, Sir Colin, at battle of the Alma, 24.
Campbell, Sir John, killed, 575.
Campbell, Colonel, at the siege of Quebec, 506.
Campbell, Colonel, at battle of Cerro-Gordo, 164.
Campbell, Colonel, sent with British troops into Georgia, 175; at siege of Savannah, 563.
Campbell, Thomas, the poet, his ode to Hohenlinden, 279.
Campbell, William, Colonel, of Virginia, at battle of Eutaw Springs, 239; of Guilford, 267; of Hobkirk's Hill, 276; of King's Mountain, 315; wounded, 240.
Campo-Basso, Count of, treachery of, at Nancy, 401.
Camulogenes, in command of the Gauls, and killed in the defense of Paris, 440.
Camville, Nichola, 334.
Canaanites, at the siege of Jericho, 294; at the battle of Esdraelon, 236.
Canadians, at battle of Bennington, 99; of Bemus' Heights, 590; at Fort du Quesne, 122; of La Cole Mill, 318; at Schenectady, 566.
Candocier, John, mayor of La Rochelle, his conduct during a siege of that city, 521.
Cannon, first employed in battle, 204; first used at sieges, 543; enormous cannon founded by Mohammed II., 194; leathern cannon constructed by Gustavus Adolphus, 318; portable cannon used at battle of Leipsic, 318; novel piece constructed by Carey of Wyoming, 703.
Canrobert, General, at battle of Alma, 23.
Canute, king of Denmark, wounded in single combat by Edmund Ironsides, 25.
Capliers, Count de, at siege of Vienna, 676.
Capius, a friend of Sylla, sent to receive the treasures of the temple of Delphi, 63.
Cappadocia, defiles of, 29.
Caracalla, emperor of Rome, orders a general massacre at Alexandria, 16.
Caractacus, made prisoner at battle of Shropshire, 584; anecdote of, 585.
Carbo, at the siege of Rome, 537.
Cardigan, Lord, at battle of Balaklava, 571.
Cardonna, Pierre de, 403.
Carew, Sir George, at siege of Cadiz, 141.
Carlists, at battle of Fonterabia, 245; of Ramales, 508; of Sieta Aguas, 585.
Carlton, Colonel, wounded at Quebec, 503.
Carroll, General, at battle of Enotochopeo, 207; of New Orleans, 413.
Carrocio, the sacred car of the Milanese, described, 155.
Cartaux, General, at battle of Toulon, 634.
Cartel, for the exchange of prisoners, first example of in history, 516.
Carthage, ancient, description of, 150; contrasted with ancient Rome, 536.
Carthaginians, at siege of Agrigentum, 18; defend their city against the Romans, 149; at Cannæ, 148; at siege of Carthagena, 156; of Crimesus, 209; of Hymera, 282; of Motya, 399; at battle of the Metaurus, 409; of Placencia, 479; at siege of Rome, 536; of Saguntum, 545; of Seliuntum, 569; of Syracuse, 613; of Tarentum, 617; at battle of Thrasymenus, 624; of Ticinus, 629; of the Trebia, 643; at siege of Tunis, 649; of Utica, 665; at battle of Zama, 711.
Cartismandan, queen of Brigantes, 585.
Cass, Lewis, Colonel, at the surrender of Detroit, 225.
Cassander, a Macedonian prince, conspires against Antigonus, 516.
Cassius, Caius, at battle of Philippi, 476; his death, 477.
Castles, ancient, detailed description of their defenses, 334.
Castor and Pollux, 649.
Caswell, General, at battle of Camden, 147; of Moore's Creek Bridge, 396.
Cato, of Utica, 667; his death, 667.
Caulah, sister of Derar, made prisoner, 223.
Caulaincourt, General, his valor at the battle of Bautzen, 89; at battle of Hanau, 270; killed, 111.
Cavadez, king of Persia, repulsed at Edessa, 233.
Celestial Horsemen, seen by Crusaders at Antioch, 39.
Censorinus, Marcius, Roman consul, advances against Carthage, 150.
Cephicus, a river, drawn from its channel by Sylla, 168.
Cepio, Roman consul, avarice of, 637; takes city of Toulouse, 637.
Ceres, temple of, at Syracuse, plundered by the Carthaginians, 613.
Cervantes, author of "Don Quixote," wounded at Lepanto, 325.
Chabrey, Louisa, her interview with Louis XVI., 458.
Chæroneans, at the siege and battle of Cheronea, 168.
Chalier, a revolutionary commissioner at Lyons, condemned to death, 347.
Chalil, Sultan, at siege of Tyre, 661.
Chalons, Jean de, Prince of Orange, at siege of Paris, 441.
Chambers, General, at Fort Stephenson, 252.
Champeaux, General, at battle of Marengo, 360.
Championnet, General, defeats army of General Mack, 542.

Chandos, Sir John, at the battle of Poictiers, 486.
Chandler, General, made prisoner at Stony Creek, 598.
Charlemagne, the Great, takes Barcelona, 84; subdues Lombardy and dethrones Didier, 470; destruction of his rear-guard at the pass of Roncesvalles, 543.
Charles I., of England, 362; at Edgehill Fight, 235; at battle of Naseby, 407; of Newbury, 410; of Stratton, 602.
Charles II., of England, forms a league with Philip IV., 231; his defeat at Worcester, and his remarkable escape, 701.
Charles II., of Spain, 640; Charleroi named in honor of, 171.
Charles IV., of Spain, compelled by Napoleon to restore sword of Francis I., 472.
Charles V., of France, rewards the Rochellois for recapturing their city, 531; at siege of St. Dizier, 548.
Charles V., Duke of Lorraine, at siege of Vienna, 677.
Charles V. (of Spain), emperor of Germany, his conduct toward Francis I., of France, 472; aids Muley Hassan against Barbarossa II., 653; his expedition to Algiers, 19; urges the Duke of Bourbon against Clement VII., 541; abdication of, 553.
Charles VI., of France, civil wars of, 441; signs Treaty of Troyes, 429.
Charles VII., of France, disinherited by Treaty of Troyes, 429; favored by citizens of Compiegne against the Duke of Burgundy, 197; lays siege to Castillan, 157; at battle of Fornovo, 246; crowned at Rheims, 470; enters Troyes in triumph, 649; at siege of Paris, 443; his indifference to the fate of Joan of Arc, 197.
Charles IX., causes the massacre of St. Bartholomew, 444.
Charles X. (Gustavus), at battle of Barranow, 84; of Praga, 488.
Charles X., of France, abdication of, 469.
Charles XII., king of Sweden, 99; at battle of Narva, 404; defeated at Pultowa, 492; at battle of Pultusk, 495; killed at siege of Fredericshald, 255; at siege of Thorn, 624; at Strasburd, 600; at Warsaw, 680.
Charles XIV., see Bernadotte.
Charles, Duke of Anjou, at Benevento, 99; at siege of Messina, 366; his cruelty, the origin of the Sicilian Vespers, 435; at battle of Tazliacozzo, 616; at siege of Tunis, 652.
Charles, Archduke of Austria, at battle of Asperne, 59; at battle of Caldiero, 147; of Cannstadt, 149; of Neerwinden, 409; of Ratisbon, 510; at Zurich, 714.
Charles, Archduke of Austria, defeated at battle of Almanza (1707), 24.
Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, at the siege of Beauvais, 94; the storming of Liege, 332; at battle of Morat, 396; killed at siege of Nancy, 401; at siege of Paris, 443.
Charles le Gros, cowardice of, at siege of Paris, 441.
Charles Martel, his prowess at battle of Tours, 641.
Charles the Pretender, at battle of Culloden, 210; of Falkirk, 244; of Prestonpans, 488.
Charon, a Theban, at siege of Thebes, 621.
Charolais, Count, at siege of Paris, 443.
Chartellar, General, at battle of the Trebia, 644.
Chasse, General, at Antwerp, 44; at Waterloo, 691.
Chastellar, General, at battle of Dresden, 226.
Chatres, Stephen, Count de, at Antioch, 28.
Chatres, Duke of (afterward Louis Philippe), at battle of Jemappes, 292; at Neerwinden, 409; at Valmy, 670.
Chauncey, Isaac, Captain, at the capture of York, 707.
Chavagnac, Governor of New Castle, in Naples, killed by the explosion of a mine, 403.
Cheeseman, Captain, killed at Quebec, 506.
Chernicheff, General, killed at battle of Hanau, 270.
Cheyne, Sir John, vanquished by Richard III. on Bosworth Field, 119.
Chevy Chase, ballad of, 435.
Chew, Judge, house of, occupied by British at battle of Germantown, 261.
Children, formed into bands, and incited to fight in miniature battle, 31; kindness of, to wounded soldiers, at Bautzen, 89; massacred by Romans in Carthage, 154; take part in defense of Constantinople, 195; massacred at Dundee, 230; of Christian parentage, detained prisoners by the Saracens, after the capitulation of Jerusalem, 311; deplorable fate of, at Lincoln, 335; massacred at Mans, 357; assist in the defense of Messina, 366; in the defense of Rhodes, 522; of Tyre, 661; of Vienna, 675; made prisoners at Vienna, 679.
Childs, Colonel, at siege of Monterey, 395; at battle of Palo Alto, 439.
Chilians, at battle of Chocabuco, 561; of Maypu, 562.
Chinese, defend Canton, against the English, 149.
Chorsamantes, one of the guards of Belisarius, his valor at the siege of Rome, 538; killed, 539.
Chosroes, king of Persia, invades Egypt, 16; besieges Antioch, 26; at siege of Edessa, 238; surprises Pelusium, 16; takes Alexandria, ibid.; beheaded by order of his son, ibid.
Christian II., treachery of, at siege of Stockholm, 598.
Christina, queen of Denmark, at Stockholm, 598.
Christina, Gyllenstierna, her heroic conduct at siege of Stockholm, 598.
Churches, respected by the Goths in Rome, 537; spared by the army of Philip II., 556.
Cilley, Colonel, at battle of Bemus' Heights, 589; of Stillwater, 593.
Cimon, the Athenian, at battle of the Eurymedon, 238.
Cinna, at siege of Rome, 537.
Cities burnt. Antioch, 27; Charlestown, 115; Carthage 154; Cassel, 156; Beaupereau, 183; Fairfield, 248; Liege, 333; London, 106; Lyons, 349; Moscow, 397; New London, 410; Norfolk, 418; Norwalk, 423; Persepolis, 472; Ramales, 509; Rome, 535–536; Sardis, 562; Washington, 687.
Clairborne, General, 206.
Clark, Sir Francis, aide-de-camp to Burgoyne, killed, 594.
Clark, Colonel, at Mexico, 382.
Clark, Joseph, his account of the death of General Hugh Mercer, 489.
Clark, Mrs. Sarah, her kindness to General Mercer after his wound at Princeton, 489.
Clarence, Duke of, concerned in the murder of the Prince of Wales, 620.
Claudius, Emperor of Rome his treatment of Caractacus, the British chief, 585; at the battle of Naissus, 404.
Clausel, General, at Bayonne, 90; at battle of the Pyrenees, 498; of Salamanca, 557; wounded, 558.
Clavershouse, defeated at battle of Drumclog, 229.
Clay, General, at siege of Fort Meigs, 249.
Clay, Lieutenant-Colonel, son of Henry Clay, killed at battle of Buena Vista, 135.
Clay Grenades, invented by Baron de Kielmansegge, 677.
Clearchus, the Lacedæmonian, in command of the Greeks at battle of Cunaxa, 211; killed by the Persians, 216.
Clement, Albric, at St. Jean d'Acre, 9.
Clement, Jacques, a Dominican priest, the assassin of Henry III., 445.
Clement III., Pope, places himself at disposal of Charles V., 541.
Cleombrotus, king of Lacedæmonia, killed at battle of Leuctra, 327.
Clemenus, king of Sparta, at the battle of Selasia, 568.
Cleon, an Athenian general, at siege of Torone, 634.
Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, 16.
Cleret, valet of Louis XVI., his fidelity to his master, 461.
Clermont, Marshal, killed at battle of Poictiers, 487.
Cleveland, Col., at battle of King's Mountain, 315.
Clifford, Sir Convers, at siege of Cadiz, 141.
Clifford, Lord, kills Lord Fitzwalter, and is killed by Lord Falconbridge at battle of Towton, 642.
Clifford, Lord, slain at battle of St. Albans, 547.
Clinton, George, General, 127–173.
Clinton, Sir Henry, arrives at Boston after the battle of Bunker's Hill, 112; makes preparations to attack Charleston by sea and land, 174; arrives on coast of Georgia, with British fleet, 176; advances against Charleston, 176; at battle of Monmouth, 387; at Stony Point, 599; at battle of Whiteplains, 693.
Clinton, James, Col., at battle of Yorktown, 709.
Clinton, Lord, at the battle of Pinkey, 478.
Clinton, General, at battle of Castalla, 156; of Orthes, 93; of Salamanca, 557.
Clitus, preserves life of Alexander the Great, 265.
Clive, Col., his operations in India, 146.
Clodio I., at siege of Tournai, 638.
Cloelia, a Roman maiden, heroism of, 534.
Clovis, the founder of the French monarchy, 441.
Clusium, siege of, 534.
Coburg, Prince of, at battle of Charleroi, 172; of Neerwinden, 409.
Cockburn, Admiral, at Hampton, 269.
Cochran, General, at Baltimore, 81.
Codrington, Sir E., at the assault of the Great Redan, at siege of Sevastopol, 582.

Coffee, General, at the battle of New Orleans, 411; of Tallapoosa, 206; of Tallushatchee, 205; heroism of, 207; wounded, 205.
Coffin, Captain, at the battle of Eutaw Springs, 239.
Colbert, General, at the battle of Raab, 508.
Coldburn, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the battle of Orthes, 93.
Coldwell, Captain, 705.
Cole, General, at the battle of the Pyrenees, 499; wounded at Salamanca, 558.
Colli, General, in command of Sardinians at battle of Mondovi, 387.
Colligni, Admiral, at the battle of St. Quintin, 554; made prisoner, 556.
Collier, Admiral, at Stony Point, 599.
Colloredo, General, at the battle of Dresden, 226.
Collyer, Captain, killed at the siege of St. Sebastian, 553.
Colville, at Badajoz, 78.
Cominius, Consul of Rome, at Coriolli, 197.
Commenus, Isaac emperor of Cyprus, laden with silver chains, by Richard II., 8.
Condé, Prince of, at Arras, 53; made prisoner at battle of Dreux, 229; at battle of Enghien, 237; of Senneffe, 570; assassinated at battle of Jarnac, 291.
Conner, Commodore, co-operates with General Scott in the siege of Vera Cruz, 673.
Conner, Captain, at battle of Buena Vista, 132.
Conon, of Montaign, at Jerusalem, 307.
Conrad III., Emperor of Germany, at the siege of Damascus, 223.
Conrad IV., Emperor of Germany, at the siege of Naples, 616; battle of Tazliacozzo, 616.
Conrad, son of the Marquis de Montferrat, at the siege of Tyre, 660.
Constable, Sir Marmaduke, at battle of Flodden, 245.
Constantine, the Great, at battle of Adrianople, 12; at the siege of Marseilles, 362; besieges Byzantium, 140; at the battle of Turin, 654.
Constantine, Emperor of Constantinople, his noble reply to Mahomet II., 194; his death, 194.
Constantine, the Grand Duke, at battle of Heilsburg, 273; his brutality excites a revolution in Poland, 681; his death, 682.
Constantine, son of the Emperor Heraclius, his attempt to assassinate the Caliph Omar, 29.
Constantinople, fall of, 194; state of in 1453, 193.
"Convention," the, orders General Doppet to reduce Lyons by fire and sword, 348.
Conway, General, at battle of the Brandywine, 125; of Germantown, 261
Cook, General, at battle of Bemus' Heights, 590.
Cooke, General, 205.
Coote, Sir Eyre, at the battle of Porto Novo, 487.
Cope, Sir John, at battle of Prestonpans, 488.
Copts, at battle of the Pyramids, 497.
Corbineau, General, valor of, 101; rescues Napoleon from imminent peril, 130.
Coriolanus, Caius Marcius, raises the siege of Rome on the entreaties of his mother, 534.
Corny, M., at the capture of the Hotel des Invalides, 459.
Cornish Rebels, defeated at Blackheath, 104.
Cornwallis, Lord, 137–173; at Bangalore, 81; at the battle of the Brandywine, 124; of Camden, 147; of Castlebar, 153; at Charlestown, 178; at battle of Guilford, 266; of Jamestown, 290; of Monmouth, 388; of Trenton, 647; his surrender at Yorktown, 709.
Cortez, Fernando, 366; sets sail from Cuba with a force intending to invade Mexico, 523; his standard, ibid.; attacked by the natives at Tabasco, 524; at battle of Tzompach, 661; invades Mexico, 631; receives envoys from Montezuma, 632; defeats Tlascalans, 633; at the battle of the defile, 223; of Ceucla, 165; subdues Montezuma, 161; advances against the Spaniards under Narvaez, at Cempoalla, and gains a complete victory, 151, 162; in Mexico, 367; wounded, 369; the battle of the Bridges, 371; at the battle of the Causeway, 372; of Otumba, 427; at siege of Mexico, 427.
Cossacks, at the passage of the Beresina, 102; at battle of Borodino, 107; of Brienne, 129; of Eylau, 241; of Hanau, 270; of Kertch, 312; of Malo-Yaroslavetz, 355; at siege of Ismail, 284; at battle of Pultowa, 495; of Smolensko, 586; of the Trebia, 644.
Costa Ricans, at the battles of Rivas, 527; of Santa Rosa, 526.
Cotton, Sir Stapleton, at the battle of Salamanca, 557.
Courtenay, Robert de, 193.
Couston, General, wounded at the storming of the Malakoff, 579.
Courtrai, siege of, 588.
Couthon, Commissioner, at the siege of Lyons, 349.
Covenanters, at battle of Alford, 19; of Bothwell Bridge, 119; of Drumclog, 229.
Covington, General, killed at battle of Chrystler's Fields, 183.
Covered Way, first used, 107.
Cox, Colonel, killed at the battle of Oriskany, 251.
Cranch, a British officer at the siege of Badajoz, 80.
Craterus, an officer of Alexander the Great, at battle of Cranon, 203; of the Hydaspes, 281; of Issus, 288.
Crawford, General, 25; at battle of Busaco, 139; at siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, 185.
Crealock, Captain, at the assault of the Great Redan at Sevastopol, 582.
Crenan, Marquis de, mortally wounded, 208.
Creutz, General, at the battle of Pultowa, 491.
Crequi, at the siege of Paris, 443.
Crispinus, Consul of Rome, at the siege of Syracuse, 615.
Crispus, son of Constantine the Great, in command of his father's fleet, 140; defeats the fleet of Licinius, 140.
Croats, at the battle of Leutzen, 342.
Crockett, David, Colonel, killed at the Alamo, 559.
Croenus, a general of Alexander the Great, at battle of the Hydaspes, 281; of Issus, 288.
Cresus, king of Lydia, his great wealth, 625; declares war against the Medes and Persians, 628; at the battle of Sardis, 562; of Thymbra, 626.
Croghan, Major, his heroic defense of Fort Stephenson, 252; promoted, 253.
Croi, Duke of, at the battle of Narva, 404.
Cromston, Baron de, at the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom, 104.
Cromwell, Oliver, the "Protector," captures city of Berwick, 104; at the siege of Drogheda, 229; at the battle of Dunbar, 229; sends troops into Flanders, 231; at the battle of Marston Moor, 363; of Naseby, 407; at Perth, 474; at battle of Worcester, 700.
Croquet, made prisoner by the Bretons, 85.
Crosier. Napoleon's aide-de-camp, killed at St. Jean d'Acre, 9.
Cross, Holy, taken by Persians from Jerusalem, 300.
Crotonians, at the siege of Sybaris, 602.
Cruger, John, Colonel, at the battle of Eutaw Springs, 239; at siege of Fort Ninety-Six, 250.
Crusaders, at the siege of Antioch, 27; at battle of Ascalon, 55; before Constantinople, 187; at the siege of Damascus, 223; of Edessa, 234; of Jerusalem, 301; character of the, 308; at siege of Nice, 416; of Tripoli, 648; of Tunis, 650.
Cuesta, General, at the battle of Rio Seco, 523.
Cuitlahua, brother of Montezuma, elevated to the throne of Mexico, 367; killed by Cortez at the battle of Otumba, 427.
Culpepper Battalion, at Norfolk, 418.
Cummin, of Badenoch, at battle of Falkirk, 244.
Cumberland, Duke of, in command of royalists at battle of Culloden, 210; at battle of Fontenoy, 246.
Cunningham, Major, at the battle of the Cowpens, 201.
Currial, General, at the battle of Haynau, 270.
Curnington, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the siege of Yorktown, 709.
Curtis, a soldier at the battle of San Jacinto, anecdote of, 560.
Cyaxares, king of Media, 625; joins in revolt against the king of Assyria, 417; at the battle of the Halys, 269.
Cynægirus, brother of the poet Æschylus, killed at battle of Marathon, 358.
Cyrus, king of Persia, besieges Babylon, 71; turns the channel of the river Euphrates, 72; at battle of Sardis, 562; of Thymbra, 626.
Cyrus, son of Darius, king of Persia, appointed commander of the Persian army, 625; revolts against his brother, Artaxerxes, king of Persia, 211; slain at the battle of Cunaxa, 213.
Czerwiky, General, killed at the battle of the Tchernaya, 578.

D.

Daood Khan, at the siege of Madras, 253.
Dacres, Lord, at battle of Flodden, 245; of Solway Moss, 585.
Dade, Major, massacred with his troops by the Indians, 247.

Daggerworth, Sir Thomas, 84.
D'Allemagne, General, at the battle of Lodi, 337.
Dalmatians, conquered by Amurath I., 156.
Dames, a Mussulman, defeated in single combat by Nestorius, a Roman, 27.
Damippus, sent as an envoy of the Syracusans to the Macedonians, made prisoner by the Romans, 615.
Dammartin, Count de, at battle of St. Jacob, 548.
Danbury, General, defeats Cornish rebels, 104.
Dandelot, brother of Admiral Colligni, at the battle of St. Quintin, 554; made prisoner, 556.
Dandolo, Doge of Venice, at the siege of Constantinople, 188.
Danes, at battle of Alney, 25; of Clontarf, 186; at Constantinople, 188; at battle of Hemmingstedt, 275; of Flensborg, 245; of Instedt, 283; of Kiöge, 317; of Luncarty, 342; of Nyeborg, 425; of Stockholm, 598; of Straslund, 601; of Udevalla, 665.
Daniel, the Prophet, interprets the vision to Belshazzar, 72.
Dardanelles, castle of, constructed by Mohammed II., 193.
Daremont, General, killed at Constantina, 186.
Darius I., king of Persia, ascends the Persian throne, 73; besieges Babylon, 73; his cruelty, 74; his army defeated by the Greeks at Marathon, 358.
Darius III., king of Persia, at the battle of the Granicus, 265; his magnificent line of march before the battle of Issus, 286; his disastrous defeat, 287; his wife made prisoner, 289; defeated at Arbela, 47.
Darmstadt, General, killed at siege of Barcelona, 84.
Datis, a general of Darius I., defeated at battle of Marathon, 358.
Daum, Count, at the battle of Hochkirchen, 567; at Vienna, 676.
Daum, Marshal, at the siege of Schweidnitz, 567.
David, king of the Jews, at the siege of Jerusalem, 295.
David, king of Scotland, at battle of the Standard, 589.
Davidson, William, General, killed at the battle of Cowan's Ford, 201.
Davie, William, Major, at the battle of Ramsour's Mills, 509.
Davis, Colonel, at the battle of Buena Vista, 135.
Davoust, Marshal, at the battle of Austerlitz, 68; of Aspern, 59; of Auerstadt, 64; wounded at Borodino, 109; at battle of Eckmuhl, 232; of Eylau, 243; of Heilsberg, 273; in command of the army for the defense of Paris, 464; at the battle of Smolensko, 586.
De or D'. Names with these prefixes may be found under the initials of their adjuncts, as, for D' Albert, see Albert; De Heister, see Heister, etc.
Dead, the plain of the, 470.
Dearborn, Major, made prisoner at Quebec, 506; at battle of Bemus' Heights, 590.
Deborah, the Prophetess, at the battle in the plains of Esdraelon, 256.
Dehac, a Mussulman, defeats Nestorious, a Roman, in single combat, 27.
Delalauerde, Sir Thomas, executed, 588.
Delancy, General, 467.
Delmas, General, at battle of Leipsic, 324.
Delor, Renard, murdered by the Flemish rebels, 156.
Delzon, General, in command of Italians at Borodino, 111; at the battle of Malo-Yuroslavetz, 355.
Dembinski, General, takes part in the Polish Revolution, 634; defeated, 618.
Demetrius, son of Antigonus, at the battle of Gaza, 259; of the Hydaspes, 282; of Ipsus, 283; at the siege of Rhodes, 516; of Tyre, 658.
Demetrius, a Roman, taken prisoner and laden with chains by the Goths, 658.
Demosthenes, the Athenian general at the siege of Syracuse, 609; taken prisoner, 612; his death, 613.
Demosthenes, the Orator, his reply to Python, 167; his timidity on the battle-field, 167.
Denizoff, Orloff, General, at the battle of Hanau, 270.
Denmark, liberated from the dominion of Sweden, 425.
Dennison, Colonel, 705.
Derfelden, General, at battle of Novi, 425.
Des Essarts, Prevot, at the siege of Paris, 442.
Desgardens, General, wounded at the battle of Eylau, 242.
Des Graviers, General, killed at the battle of Salamanca, 558.
Dessaix, General, killed at the battle of Marengo, 361; at the battle of the Pyramids, 497.
Devries, Hubert, a squire of Henry of Anjou, preserves his master's life, 531.
Devon, Earl of, made prisoner and beheaded, 643.
Diaz, Rodrigo, at Toledo, 633.
Dickinson, Philemon, General, at the battle of Monmouth, 387.
Dickinson, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the siege of Vera Cruz, 672.
Dictral, General, killed at the battle of Mondovi, 387.
Didier, king of the Lombards, at the siege of Pavia, 470.
Diebitch, General, establishes the fearful battery of the Beresina, 101; at the passage of the Balkan, 81; at battle of Grochow, 266; in command of the Russian army in Poland, 681; his death, 682.
Dieu et mon Droit, 264.
Dillon, Count, at the siege of Savannah, 565.
Dimick, Major, at the battle of Contreras, 199.
Dimoclus, the Syracusan commander, at siege of Syracuse, 604.
Dinar, Viscount de, at Jerusalem, 302.
Diocles, at Corinth, 195.
Diocletian, emperor of Rome, besieges Alexandria, 16.
Dionysius, defeats Carthaginians, 613; at the siege of Motya, 399.
Dionysius, the Younger, at Syracuse, 618.
Divers, employed at the siege of St. Jean d' Acre, 9.
Doazon, M., a captain of the Paris militia, 460.
Doctoroff, General, at the battle of Borodino, 109; of Malo-Yaroslavetz, 355.
Dog, that of Xantippus, 62; anecdote of the dog, Mustapha, at battle of Fontenoy, 246.
Dolly, Quamino, a negro guide, 563.
Dominitus, at the battle of Pharsalia, 474.
Donop, Colonel, at Bordentown, 647; at battle of Red Bank, 512; killed, 513.
Donaldson, Lieutenant, at the battle of Buena Vista, 134.
Doppet, General, ordered by the "Convention" to reduce Lyons by fire and sword, 348.
Doria, Roger, Admiral, at the siege of Massena, 366.
Doenberg, 67.
Dorokhoff, General, killed, 355.
Dorrance, Colonel, 705.
Dorset, Earl of, taken prisoner, 26.
Douglass, Captain, at the siege of Fort Erie, 248.
Douglass, Sir James, killed, 88.
Douglass, Sir William, killed, 435.
Douglass, Regent of Scotland, killed, 269.
Douza, John, the Latin poet, 330.
Dowlet Row Sinclea, defeated by the English, 318.
Downie, Captain, killed at the battle of Plattsburg, 485.
Dracut, Pacha, besieges Malta, 356.
Drake, Sir Francis, at the siege of San Domingo, 559.
Drinkwater, Captain, his history of the siege of Gibraltar, 264.
Drucar, Chevalier de, 342.
Drum, Captain, at the battle of Chapultepec, 171.
Drummond, General, at the battle of Oswego, 434; of Niagara, 414.
Drummond, Colonel, at the siege of Fort Erie, 247.
Drummond, Captain, killed at the battle of Windmill Point, 696.
Druot, General, at the battle of Hanau, 270; of Leipsic, 320; of Lutzen, 346.
Dubois, General, at the battle of Charleroi, 172.
Dubourg, Herbert, his brave defense of Dover, 226.
Du Camas, Colonel, killed at battle of Inkermann, 572.
Duchesne, General, at the battle of Monteran, 391.
Duckworth, Admiral, his expedition to Constantinople, 195.
Dudley, Colonel, mortally wounded at Fort Meigs, 289.
Dudley, Lord, made prisoner, 105.
Dufay, Godemar, governor of Tournai, 638.
Dugua, General, at the battles of the Pyramids, 497.
Duhesme, General, at the battle of Brienne, 130.
Dulac, General, at the storming of the Malakoff, 579.
Dumas, Mathieu, Count, at the siege of Yorktown, 710.
Dumbrowsky, General, at battle of the Trebia, 644.
Dumont, General, at Waterloo, 690.
Dumourier, 291, 346, 409, 684.
Duncan, Ensign, at Fort Stephenson, 253.
Duncan, Major, at Mexico, 882; at battle of Palo Alto, 439; of Molino del Rey, 585.
Dundas, Admiral, at the bombardment of Odessa, 426.
Dundas, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the battle of Jamestown, 291.
Dundas, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the siege of Yorktown, 708.
Dundee, of Claverhouse, at the battle of Killiecrankie, 313.
Dunmore, Lord, at Norfolk, 417.

Dunois, at Caen, 141; at Orleans, 432.
Dupiet, Adjutant-General, assassinated at Rome, 542.
Duras, Charles, at the siege of Naples, 402.
Dureng, General, killed at the siege of Straslund, 602.
Durkee, Colonel, 702.
Durutte, General, at the battle of Leipsic, 324; of Raab, 507.
Duroc, General, Duke of Fruili, killed, 89; monument ordered to his memory by Napoleon I., 90.
Dutch, at Almanza, 24; at Antwerp, 41: at Bayonne, 90; at Bergen-op-Zoom, 103; at Blenheim, 105; at Bommel, 107; at Boxtel, 120; at the battle of the Boyne, 121; at Cadiz, 141; at Charleroi, 172; at Fontenoy, 246; at Gibraltar, 263; at Haarlem, 268; at Leyden, 330; at Maestricht, 352; at Namur, 401; at Ostend, 433; at Vachtendonck, 667; at Waterloo, 691.
Dyer, the famous one of Cardinal de Richelieu, 532.
Dymock, Captain, killed at the battle of the Ingour, 283.
Dyer, Lieutenant-Colonel, at Fort Talladega, 206.

E.

Earth and Water, the demand of, a token of demanding submission, 622.
Earthquake, account of one that occurred during the battle of Thrasymenus, 624.
Eaton, General, at the battle of Guilford Court House, 266.
Eclipse of the moon, during the siege of Syracuse, 610.
Eclipse of the sun, during the battle of the Halys, 269; before the siege of Jerusalem, 309.
Ecclesiastics, regiment of, formed at Paris, 446.
Edinburg, taken by Cromwell, 230.
Edmund Ironsides, of England, defeats Canute in single-handed combat, 25; murdered, 25.
Edward I., king of England, 229; at the siege of Brechin, 126; accepts the challenge of the Count of Châlons to a friendly tournament, 171; at the battle of Evesham, 240; of Falkirk, 244; of Lewes, 328; captures city of Perth, 474; at the siege of Tunis, 652.
Edward II., king of England, 230; at the battle of Bannockburn, 82.
Edward III., king of England, invades France, 141; lays siege to Calais, 143; his cruel conditions to the citizens of Calais, 145; anecdote of, ibid.; at the battle of Cressy, 203; invades Scotland, 232; at the battle of Hallidon Hill, 269; his generous treatment of his prisoner, John II., of France, 46; at siege of Rheims, 515; of Tournai, 638; his character, 638.
Edward IV., king of England, at the battle of Barnet, 84; his coronation, 643; at the battle of Tewkesbury, 619; of Towton, 642.
Edward VI., 312.
Edward, of Caernarvon, son of Edward I., first Prince of Wales, 653.
Edward, the Black Prince, at the siege of Limoges, 333; at the battle of Poictiers, 486; his generous treatment of John II., of France, 487; at the siege of Romorantin, 543.
Effingham, Lord High Admiral, at the siege of Cadiz, 141.
Egesimachus, his death, 281.
Eggleston, Major, in command of Americans at Augusta, 63; at the battle of Eutaw Springs, 239.
Egmont, Count, at the battle of St. Quintin, 555.
Egyptians, at St. Jean d' Acre, 11; at Alexandria, 15; at Azoth, 70; at the battle of Darik, 223; at the siege of Gaza, 269; of Jerusalem, 295; destroyed in the Red Sea, 513; at the battle of Thrymbra, 626.
Elam, king of, 314.
Elbee, General d', at the battle of Cholet, 183.
Elbert, Colonel, at the siege of Savannah, 563.
Eleazer, the Zealot, 297.
Elephants, at the siege of Agrigentum, 14; of Argos, 52; of Carthage, 149; at the battle of Cynocephalæ, 221; at the siege of Edessa, 234; at the battle of the Hydaspes, 281; of Issus, 283; of Raphia, 510; taken over the Alps by Hannibal, 546; at the battle of Thrasymenus, 624; of the Trebia, 644; of Zama, 712.
Elijah, the Prophet, 559.
Elizabeth, queen of England, imprisons Mary, queen of Scots, 318.
Ellershausen, General, at the siege of Schweidnitz, 567.
Elliot, Sir William, at the siege of Gibraltar, 263.
Elliott, Colonel, at Fort Stephenson, 252.
Elliott, Susanna, Mrs., presents flag to the South Carolina Regiment, 565.
Emanuel, Duke of Savoy, at the battle of St. Quintin, 554.
Emerson, William, chaplain of the American army, 117.
Engelbert, of Tournay, at the siege of Jerusalem, 307.
Enghien, Duke d', killed at the battle of St. Quintin, 555.
English, at St. Jean d' Acre, 8; at Agra, 12; at Aiguillon, 14; at Albuera, 15; at Alexandria, 18; at Alighur, 19; at Algiers, 19; at Aliwal, 21; at Alkmær, 21; at the Alma, 22; at Almanza, 24; at Almaraz, 24; at Almeida, 25; at Alney, 25; at Alnwick, 25; at Amoy, 26; at Aneram, 26; at Anet, 00; at Anjou, 26; at Antioch, 29; at Arguam, 52; at Arroyo del Molino, 55; at Assaye, 61; at Aughrim, 67; at Augusta, 67; at Azincour, 69; besiege French in Badajoz, 76; take fortress of Olivenza, 76; atrocities committed at Badajoz by English soldiers, 80; at Bangalore, 81; attack on Baltimore. 81; at Fort McHenry, 81; at Bannockburn, 82; at Barnet, 84; at Barrosa, 84; at Bayonne, 90; defeated by the Bretons, 85; at Baza, 94; at Beaverdams, 94; at Belgrade, 95; at Bennington Heights, 99; at Bergen-op-Zoom, 103; at Bergen-op-Zoom, 104; at Berwick, 104; at Blackheath, 104; at Black Rock, 104; at Bladensburg, 105; at Blenheim, 105; at Bloreheath, 105; besieged in Boston by Americans, 112; at Bunker's Hill, 113; at Bosworth Field, 118; at Bothwell Bridge, 119; at Boulogne, 120; at battle of Bouvines, 120; at Boxtel, 120; at the Boyne, 120; troops of Braddock defeated by French, 123; at the Brandywine, 124; besiege Brechin, 126; at Brest, 126; at Briar Creek, 127; at Brooklyn (Long Island), 127; at Brownstown, 126; at Buenos Ayres, 135; at Burgos, 137; at Busaco, 138: at the siege of Cadiz, 141: at battle of Caen, 141; at siege of Calais, 143; of Calvi, 147; at Camden, 147; at Canton, 149; at Caslatta, 156; at Castlebar, 158; at Caverypauk, 159: at Châlons, 172; at Charleston, 173; at Chippewa, 181; at Chrystler's Fields, 183; at Constantinople, 195; at Compeigne, 197, at Corunna, 200; at Cowan's Ford, 201; at Cowpens, 201; at Cranev Island, 303; at Cressy, 203; at Curnoll, 216; at Detroit, 225; at Dittengen, 225; at Dunbar, 229; at Dumblane, 230; at Dundalk, 230; at Dundee, 230; at Dungan Hill, 230; at Dunkirk, 231; at Durham, 232; at Edgehill Fight, 235; at Enghien, 237; at Espierres, 237; at Evesham, 240; at Fairfield, 243; at Falkirk, 244; at Flodden Field, 245; at Fontenoy, 245; at Formigny, 246; at Fort Boyer, 247; at Fort Erie, 247; at Fort George, 249; at Fort Niagara, 250; at Fort Ninety-six, 250; at Fort Schuyler, 250; at Oriskany, 251; at Fort Stephenson, 252; at Fort Washington, 253; at Freteval, 256; at Fuentes de Onore, 259; at Germantown, 260; at Ghuznee, 262, at Gibraltar, 263; at Gisors, 264; at Gorey, 264; at Guilford Court House, 266; at Hallidon Hill, 269; at Hampton, 269; at Hanging Rock, 271; at Harlem Plains, 271; at Hastings, 271; at Hexham, 275; at Hobkirk's Hill, 275; at Hubbardton, 290; at the Ingour, 283; at Inkerman, 283; at Jamestown, 290: at Kars, 312; at Kertch, 312; at Khurd Kabool, 313; at King's Mountain, 315; at Klüge, 317; at Laon, 318; at Lassawaree, 318; at Laval, 318; at Lewes, 328; at Lexington, 329; at Ligny, 689; at Limoges, 333: at Lincoln, 333; at Lisbon, 335; at Lisieux, 336; at Londonderry, 338; at Loudon Hill, 341; at Louisburg, 341: at Madras, 350; at Mans, 357; at Marston Moor, 363; at Mayenne, 365; at Mergui, 365; at Monmouth, 387; at Montereau, 391; at Moodkee, 396; at Mowbray, 400; at Namur, 401; at Naseby, 407; at Neerwinden, 408; at Newark, 410; at Newbury, 410; at New London, 411; at Fort Griswold, 411; at New Orleans, 411; at Norfolk, 417; at Norwalk, 423; at Odessa, 426; at Ogdensburg, 426; at Oporto, 428; at Orleans, 429; at Orthes, 93, 432; at Oswego, 433; at Otterburn, 434; at Pampeluna, 440; at Paris, 464; at Paoli, 470: at Parma, 470; at Patay, 470; at Pensacola, 473; at Perth, 474; at Pinkey, 478; at Plattsburg, 484; at Poictiers, 486; at Portsmouth, 487; at Porto Novo, 487; at Prestonpans, 488; at Princeton, 488; at the Pyrenees, 498; at Quaker Hill, 501; at Quatre Bras, 689; at Quebec, 503; at Queenstown, 506; at Rajdeer, 508; at Ramillies, 509; at Red Bank, 513; at Rennes, 513, at Rheims, 515; at La Rochelle, 532; at Sackett's Harbor, 544; at St. Alban's, 547; at St. Florent, 549; at St. Sebastian, 549: at St. Quintin, 554; at Salamanca, 556; at San Domingo, 559; at San Marcial, 561; at Savannah. 563; at Savindroog, 566; at Senneffe, 570; at Seringapatam, 570; at Sevastopol, 571; at Shrewsbury. 584; at Sobraon, 588; at Solway Moss, 588; at Springfield, 588; at second battle of the Spurs, 588; at Stamford, 588; at battle of the Standard, 589; at battle of Bemus' Heights, 589; at Saratoga, 594; at Stillwater, 592; at Stonington, 598; at Stone Perry, 598; at Stony Creek, 598; at Stony Point, 599; at Stratton, 602; at Talavera, 616; at Tarifa, 617; at Tewkesbury, 619; at the Thames, 620; at Therouanne, 624–638; at Ticonderoga, 630; at Toulon, 635; at Toulouse, 638; at Towton, 643; at Trenton, 646; at Vimeira, 680; at Washington, 687; at Waterloo, 689; at Waxhaw, 693; at White Plains, 693; at Windmill Point, 696; at Worcester, 699; at York, 707; at Yorktown, 708.

Enns, a chief of the Isaurians, at the siege of Rome, 539.

Entragues, Chevalier d', at Cremona, 208.

Epaminondas, the Theban, at the battle of Leuctra, 327; of Mantinea, 363; his heroism, 364; his death, ibid.

Epicydes, an Athenian general, 623; at Syracuse, 613.

Epinoi, Princess d', her valiant conduct at the siege of Tournai, 639.

Erbillon, General, at the battle of the Tchernaya, 578.

Erginus, the Corinthian, 195.

Erlon, Count d', at battle of Bayonne, 91; of the Pyrenees, 498; of Waterloo, 690.

Ernest, Pierre, at the siege of Vachtendonck, 667.

Erskine, General, 127; at the battle of Trenton, 648.

Esmonde, Captain, at the siege of Sevastopol, 575.

Espartero, General, assisted by several British ships-of-war, defeats Carlists, at the siege of Bilboa, 164; at the battle of Morella, 397; of Ramales, 508.

Essex, Earl of, at the siege of Cadiz, 141; at Edgehill Fight, 235.

Estaing, Count d', in command of the French fleet, 175; at the siege of Savannah, 564; wounded, ibid.; in command of the National Guard of Versailles, 456.

Esther, an Indian Queen, her cruelty to prisoners, 705.

Estonville, D', 69.

Eteocles, son of Œdipus, king of Thebes, engages in single combat with his brother, Polynices, in which both are slain, 621.

Eu, Count of, Constable of France, made prisoner at Caen, 141.

Euclides, brother of Cleomenus, at the battle of Selasia, 568.

Eudes, Count, at the siege of Paris, 441; at the battle of Tours, 642.

Eugene (Beauharnais), Prince, at the battle of Borodino, 109; of Leipsic, 320; of Lutzen, 344; of Raab, 507; of Sacile, 544.

Eugene, Prince, of Savoy, at the battle of Blenheim, 105; of Cassano, 155; at siege of Cremona, 208; at the battle of Malplaquet, 355; at siege of Milan, 384; of Mons, 389; at the battle of Oudenarde, 435; of Peterwardin, 473; at the siege of Temeswar, 617; of Turin, 654.

Eugenius, the Rhetorician, made Emperor of the West, by Arbogastes, 46; defeated by Theodosius, 47; his death, ibid.

Eupirates, the river, 72.

Eurybiades, in command of Grecian fleet, 623.

Eurylochus, slain at the battle of Olpæ, 427.

Eurymedon, at the siege of Syracuse, 609; his death, 610.

Eustache, brother of Godfrey of Bouillon, the Crusader, at the siege of Jerusalem, 302–306.

Euthydemus, at the siege of Syracuse, 608.

Evans, General, at Fonterabia, 245.

Eyers, Lord, killed, 26.

Eyrard, of Preysaic, a Crusader, at Jerusalem, 307.

Ewing, General, at the battle of Trenton, 647.

Exacestes, in command of the fleet of Rhodes, defeated by Demetrius, 518.

Exmouth, Lord, Admiral, at Algiers, 20.

Eyre, Colonel, killed at Fort Griswold, 411.

Eyre, Major-General, at the siege of Sevastopol, 575.

F.

Fabius, Consul of Rome, at the siege of Tarentum, 617.

Fairfax, Sir Thomas, at the battle of Marston Moor, 363; of Naseby, 407.

Falconberg, Lord, kills Lord Clifford at the battle of Towton, 643.

Falls, Captain, at the battle of Ramsom's Mills, 509.

Falstoffe, Sir John, at the siege of Orleans, 430.

Famines, of Agrigentum, 13; of Antioch, 29; of Athens, 62–64; of Byzantium, 140; of Callahorra, 143; of Calais, 143; of Jerusalem, 295, 298; of Kars, 312; of Leyden, 33?; of Londonderry, 340; of Lyons, 349; of Naples, 402; of Paris, 446; of Ravenna, 511; of La Rochelle, 532; of Rome, 537, 539; of Samaria, 559; of Tunis, 649.

Fannings, Lieutenant, at the battle of Sackett's Harbor, 544.

Farjaux, Governor, at the siege of Maestricht, 351.

Farusbourg, siege of, 548.

Faustus, Cornelius, son of Sylla, 296.

Febiger, Christian, Colonel, at Stony Point, 599.

Ferdinand, Archduke of Austria, at the battle of Nordlingen, 417.

Ferdinand IV., of Spain, takes Gibraltar, 263.

Ferdinand V., king of Castile and Arragon, at the siege of Grenada, 264; wrests Naples from France, 403; at the siege of Ronda, 543.

Ferey, Colonel, mortally wounded, 558.

Fergent, Alain, Duke of Brittany, at siege of Jerusalem, 302.

Fellahs, at the battle of the Pyramids, 497.

Fellows, General, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 589.

Ferguson, Major, at the battle of King's Mountain, 315; killed, 316.

Ferte, Marshal de la, at Arras, 54.

Ferrand, General, at siege of Valenciennes, 668.

Ferrars, Lord of Chartlery, slain in Bosworth Field, 119.

Fessart, Albert de, a Swiss knight, at the battle of St. Jacob, 548.

Feuillade, Marshal, at the siege of Valenciennes, 668.

Feversham, General, at the battle of Sedgemoor, 567.

Fielden, Major, at the siege of Sevastopol, 575.

Finlay, Captain, at the battle of Guilford Court House, 268.

Finnlanders, at the battle of Leipsic, 332; of Lutzen, 343.

Fire, balls of, seen in the sky by the Crusaders, 39.

Fire-Pots, used at the siege of Edessa, 233; at Jerusalem, 306.

Fire-Ships, 60, 610.

Fire Worshipers, 300.

Fishback, General, at the battle of Citate, 184.

Fitzwalter, Lord, killed by Lord Clifford, 642.

Flag, Union, first unfurled over American camp, 117.

Flails, armed with iron balls, 56.

Flaminius, Titus Quintius, appointed a consul of Rome, 221.

Flaminus, Caius, the Roman consul, at the battle of Thrasymenus, 624; killed, 625.

Flaminus, Roman consul, at battle of the Adda, 11.

Flanders, Count of, at Constantinople, 187; at Jerusalem, 312.

Flanders, Earl of, wounded and made prisoner at battle of Bouvines, 120.

Flank Movement, of Napoleon, first successful application of, 336.

Fleming, Captain, killed at the battle of Princeton, 489.

Flemings, at Antwerp, 41; at Arras, 53; at Cassel, 156; at Lisbon, 335; at Maestricht, 350; at the first battle of the Spurs, 588; at the siege of Valenciennes, 667; of Westrooseberke, 693.

Flesselles, M. de, killed at the storming of the Bastile, 452.

Fletcher, Sir R., Lieutenant-Colonel, wounded at the siege of St. Sebastian, 550; killed, 553.

Fletcher, Colonel, killed at Badajoz, 77.

Fleury, Colonel de, at Stony Point, 600.

Florine, daughter of Eudes I., Duke of Burgundy, her death, 29.

Floyd, General, 205; wounded, 206.

Flue, Louis de, commander of the Swiss Guards at Paris, 450.

Fontrailles, his stratagem at the siege of Terouanne, 638.

Ford, Colonel, at the battle of Guilford, 268; mortally wounded at Hobkirk's Hill, 276.

Fordyce, Captain, at the battle of Trenton, 647.

Forey, General, at the battle of Inkerman, 572.

Forster, General, at the battle of Novi, 424; of the Trebia, 645.

Forsythe, Major, at Ogdensburg, 427; at York, 707.

Fort Brown, defense of, 514.

Fort Niagara, condition of, during the American Revolution, 250.

Fortescue, Sir Faithful, at Edgehill Fight, 235.

Foster, Captain, at the battle of Molino del Rey, 386.

Foulon, M., appointed Intendant of the French navy, 448; his character and death, 454.

Foulquet, Bishop, his treachery, 637.

Foy, General, at the battle of Bayonne, 91; of Busaco, 139; of Salamanca, 558; of Waterloo, 690.

France, state of, in the time of Louis XIV., 531.

Franceschi, General, at the battle of Corunna, 200.

Francis I., emperor of Austria, at the battle of Leipsic, 320.

Francis I., of France, at the battle of Marignan, 361; at the siege of Marseilles, 362; of Pavia, 471; made prisoner by the Spaniards, 472.

Francis II., of France, 40.

Francis, Duke of Anjou, created sovereign of the Netherlands 40; besieges Antwerp, 40.

Francis Albert, Duke, at battle of Lutzen, 343.

Francis, Duke of Guise, at the siege of Naples, 408.

Francis, of Lorraine, at the siege of Pavia, 471.

Francis, Colonel, 702; killed at battle of Hubbardton, 280.

Francisco, a brave Virginian, his feats at the battle of Guilford, 268.

Francisco, an officer of Cortez, 165.

Frankish Empire, divided between the sons of Louis le Debonnaire, 245.

Franklin, John, Captain, 706.

Franks, at the battle of Châlons, 170; of Roncesvalles, 543; of Tours, 641.

Fraser, General, at the battle of Corunna, 137.

Fraser, Lieutenant, at the siege of Burgos, 137.

Fraser, General, at battle of Bemus' Heights, 589; mortally wounded at second battle of Stillwater, 593.

Franquet, commander of Burgundian army, made prisoner by Joan d'Arc, 197.

Frederic Augustus I., king of Saxony, at the battle of Leipsic, 325.

Frederic I. (Barbarossa), emperor of Germany, at the battle of Bassano, 155.

Frederic II. (the Great), 85, 566; at the battle of Cunnersdorf, 216; of Friedburg, 256; at the siege of Oldmutz, 427; at the battle of Pirna, 479; of Prague, 488; of Rossbach, 543.

Frederic William III., king of Prussia, at the battle of Auerstadt, 65; at siege of Straslund, 601; at battle of Leipsic, 320.

Frederic IV., king of Denmark, at the siege of Straslund, 601.

Frederic, General, killed at the battle of Leipsic, 324.

Frederic, Archduke of Austria, 13, 22; made prisoner at Amfing, 26.

Freibourg, Baron de, killed at the siege of Cremona, 209.

Friere, General, at Baza, 94.

French, at Abensburg, 5; at Aboukir, 5; at St. Jean d' Acre, 8, 9; at the Adda, 11; at Aiguebelle, 14; at Aiguillon, 14; at Albuera, 15; at Alexandria, 18; at Alcaniz, 15; at Allessandria, 19; at Alkmaer, 21; at the Alma, 22; at Almanza, 24; at Almaraz, 24; at Almeida, 25; at Almonacid, 25; at Amberg, 25; at Anjou, 26; at Antioch, 27; at Antwerp, 40, 43; at Arcis-sur-Aube, 49; at Arcola, 50; at Arguam, 52; at Arnheim, 53; at Arras, 53; at Arroyo del Molino, 55; at battles of Aspern and Esslinz, 56; at Auerstadt, 64; at Austerlitz, 68; at Azincour, 69; besiege Badajoz, 75; take fortress of Oliverza, 75; besieged in Badajoz by English, 76; generosity to wounded English soldiers, 77; take Barcelona, 84; at Bardis, 84; at Barrosa, 84; at Bar-sur-Aube, 84; at Bassano, 84; at Bautzen, 86; defeat Prussians, near Weissig, 86; at Bayonne, 90; at Baza, 94; besieged in Beauvais, by Charles the Bold, 94; at Belchite, 98; at Benevento, 99; at the passage of the Beresina, 101; at Bergen, 102; at Bergen-op-Zoom, 103; at Blenheim, 105; at Borodino, 107; at Bosent-les-Walcour, 112; at Bolongne, 120; at Bonvines, 120; at Boxtel, 120; at the Boyne, 121; defeat Braddock, 123; at Breslau, 126; at Brest, 126; at Briluega, 126; at Brienne, 129; at Burgos, 136; at Busaco, 138; at siege of Burgos, 136; at Busaco, 139; at Cadore, 141; at Caen, 141; at Cahors, 142; at Calais, 143; at Caldiero, 147; at Canustadt, 149; at Cassel, 156; at Castala, 156; at Castiglione, 157; at Castillon, 157; at Castlebar, 158; at Caverypauk, 159; at Ceresole, 163; at Charleroi, 171; at Châlons, 171; at Champaubert, 179; at Chateau Gothiere, 179; at Cholet, 183; at Ciudad Rodrigo, 184; at Coblentz, 186; at Constantina, 186; at Constantinople, 188; at Corunna, 200; at Courtral, 688; at Cressy, 203; at Cremona, 208; at Dantzic, 223; at Dennewitz, 224; at Dorogaboozh, 226; at Dresden, 226; at Eckmuhl, 232; at Engen, 237; at Espierres, 237; at Eupatoria, 237; at Eylau, 240; at Fere Champenoise, 244; at Fontenoy, 245; at Forli, 246; at Formigny, 246; at Fornovo, 246; at Fort Niagara, 250; at Fort Saint David, 252; at Fougieres, 254; at Friedland, 256; at Fuentes de Onore, 259; at Gaza, 260; at Gembloux, 260; at Gibraltar, 263; at Halle, 269; at Heidelburg, 273; at Heliopolis, 273; at Heilsberg, 273; at Hohenlinden, 277; at Inkerman, 283; at Jaffa, 290; at Jemappes, 291; at Jena, 292; at Kanth, 312; at Katsbach, 312; at Kowno, 317; at Krasnoi, 585; at Kulm, 317; at Laon, 318; at Laval, 318; at Leipsic, 320; at Mochern, 321; at Lerida, 325; at Liege, 332; at Ligny, 333, 688; at Limoges, 333; at Lisieux, 336; at Lisle, 335; at Livron, 336; at Loano, 336; at Lodi, 337; at Lonato, 341; at Lonisburg, 341; at Lutzen, 344; at Lyons, 347; at Madras, 350; at Malo-Yaroslavetz, 355; at Malplaquet, 355; at Mannheim, 357; at Mans, 357; at Mantua, 357; at Marcians, 359; at Marengo 359; at Marignan, 361; at Messina, 366; at Milan, 384; at Minden, 384; at Moeskirch, 384; at Mohrungen, 385; at Mockern, 384; at Mons, 389; at Montebello, 389; at Montenotte, 390; at Montereau, 391; at Montmirail, 395; at Morgarten, 397; at Mount Tabor, 399; at Muolta, 400; at Namur, 401; at Nancy, 401; at Naples, 4 3; at Neerwinden, 409; at Nordlingen, 417; at Novi, 423; at Oporto, 428; at Orthes, 93; at Ostrovno, 433; at Oswego, 433; at Otricolli, 434; at Pampeluna, 440; at Paris, 465; at Parma, 470; at Patay, 470; at Pavia 471; at Permasin, 473; at Perpignan, 474; at Poictiers, 486; at Portsmouth, 487; at Prague, 488; at Pultusk, 495; at the Pyramids, 497; at the Pyrences, 498; at Quatre Bras, 689; at Quebec, 503; at Raab, 507; at Ratisbon, 511; at Renchen, 513; at Rennes, 513; at Rhelms, 515; at Rio Seco, 523; at Rivoli, 530; at La Rochelle, 531; at Roncq, 543; at Rossbach, 543; at Saalfeld, 544; at Sacile, 544; at Saguntum, 547; at St. Dizier, 548; at St. Florent, 548; at St. Jacob, 548; at St. Sebastian, 549; at St. Quintin, 554; at Salamanca, 556; at San Marcial, 561; at Saragossa, 562; at Savigliano, 566; at Schellendorf, 566; at Schenectady, 566; at Senneffe, 570; at Sevastopol, 571; at Inkerman, 572; at Tchernaya, 577; at Sieta Agnas, 585; at Smolensko, 585; at Krasnoi, 585; at battles of the Spurs, 588; at Stockach, 597; at Talavera, 616; at Tarifa, 617; at Therouanne, 624; at Ticonderoga, 630; at Toulon, 634; at Tortosa, 634; at Toulose, 638, at Tournai, 540; at the Trebia, 644; at Tudela, 649; at Turin, 654; at Tuscoing, 655; at Ulm, 665; at Valls, 670; at Valmy, 676; at Villaviosa, 680; at Villimpenta, 680; at Waterloo, 689; at Wesmoosebeke, 693; at Wattignies, 693; at Wavres, 693; at Wurtzburg, 701; at Yorktown, 708; at Zurich, 714.

French Revolutions, of 1789, 447; of 1830, 465; of 1848, 469.

Friant, General, at the battle of Heliopolis, 275; at Auerstadt, 66; killed at Waterloo, 692.

Fribourg, siege of, 246.

Friday, an unlucky day, 310.

Fronde, the war of the, 447.

Frossard, General, at the storming of the Malakoff, 580.

Fry, Colonel, at the battle of Rivas, 527.

Fugueres, killed at Aboukir, 1.

Fulvius, the Roman Consul, besieges Ambracia, 25.

Furius, Lucius, at the battle of the Adda, 11; at the siege of Cremona, 207.

Furstemberg, Prince, at the battle of Leipsic, 323; killed at the battle of Stockach, 598.

G.

Gage, Thomas, General, in command of British in Boston, 112; his expedition against Concord, 329; his conduct toward the inhabitants of Boston, 112; holds council of war before battle of Bunker's Hill, 113.

Gage, Lieutenant-Colonel, wounded at the battle of Fort du Quesne, 128.

Gaines, Captain, at battle of Eutaw, 239.

Gaines, General, at the siege of Fort Erie, 247.

Galezier, M., appointed Comptroller-General of France, 448.

Galgacus, in command of Picts at battle of the Grampian Hills, 264.

Gall, De, General, at battle of Bemus' Heights, 589.

Gallitzen, General, at the battle of Friedland, 257; of Krasnoi, 587.

Gallus, at battle of Chæronea, 168.

Galway, Lord, defeated at Almanza, 24.

Gansevoort, Peter, Colonel, at the siege of Fort Schuyler, 251.

Gardner, Colonel, mortally wounded at battle of Bunker's Hill, 164.

Gardner, Lieutenant, at the battle of Cerro Gordo, 164.

Garland, Colonel, at Mexico, 382; at battle of Molino del Rey, 385; at the siege of Monterey, 392.

Garratt, Major, 705.

Gascons, at battle of Roncesvalles, 543.
Gaston, of Bearn, at Jerusalem, 302.
Gates, Horatio, General, at battle of Bemus' Heights, 589; in command of the Americans at Camden, 147; at the battles of Saratoga and Stillwater, 589; his conduct toward Arnold, 590; his interview with General Burgoyne, 596.
Gaucort, De, 69.
Gauls, at the battle of Cannæ, 148; at Cremona, 207; at the siege of Paris, 440; of Rome, 535; defeated by Hannibal, 546; at the battle of Thrasymenus, 625; of the Trebia, 643.
Gautemozin, emperor of Mexico, his heroic defense of his capital, 378; put to the torture by Cortez, 381.
Gauzlin, Bishop, killed at the siege of Paris, 441.
Gawbaa, Sir Peter, at the battle of Pinkey, 479.
Geese, save Rome, 535.
Gems, taken by the Crusaders, 40.
Gerard, Marshal, at Agra, 12; at Antwerp, 43; at battle of Brienne, 130; of Borodino, 109; at the battle of Lutzen, 345; wounded, 346; takes part in the French Revolution, 467.
Gerard, of Rousillon, at Jerusalem, 307.
Gerbaut, valor of, 441.
Gelon, a Syracusan general, at the siege of Hymera, 282.
Germans, at Aquileia, 46; at Argentaria, 52; at Arras, 54; at Bouvines, 120; at Bayonne, 91; at Burgos, 138; at Cassano, 155; at Charlerol, 172; at Constantinople, 188; at Cremona, 208; at Fleubourg, 245; at Leipsic, 318; at Lutzen, 342; at Paris, 448; at St. Quintin, 554; at the battle of the Spurs, 588; of Tours, 642; at Vienna, 677; their victory over the Romans under Varus, 696.
Geoffrey, of Charni, at Calais, 144.
George II., in command of Allies at the battle of Dettingen, 225.
Ghebellines, of Pavia, at the battle of Marcinago, 359.
Ghent, men of, at Westroosebeke, 693.
Guori, Sultan, at battle of Darik, 223.
Giambelli, the famous Italian engineer, invents the "infernal machine," 42.
Gibbon, James, Lieutenant, at the storming of Stony Point, 600.
Gibbs, General, wounded at the battle of New Orleans, 413.
Gibraltar, description of, 262.
Gibraltar, Little, 635.
Gibson, Captain, at the siege of Fort Erie, 248.
Gi-en-zwa-tak, 705.
Gielgod, General, killed, 684.
Gieta, Colonel, wounded at the battle of Pultowa, 492.
Gimat, Colonel, at the siege of Yorktown, 709.
Gimberghen, Lords of, at the battle of Ransbeck, 510.
Ginkell, General, at Aughrim, 67; at Limerick, 333.
Girty, Simon, 105.
Gist, Major, noble conduct at the battle of Long Island, 129.
Giulay, General, at Arcis-sur-Aube, 49; at Asperne, 57; at Brienne, 130; at Dresden, 226; at Leipsic, 321.
Gladiators slain at the triumph of Aurelian, 483.
Glazier, Colonel, at the siege of Savannah, 565.
Glengarey, a Celtic chief, at the battle of Killiecrankie, 313.
Gloucester, Earl of, nephew of Edward IV., slain at Bannockburn, 83.
Glover, General, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 589; of White Plains, 695.
Godfrey III., of Belgium, 510.
Godfrey, the Crusader, at Antioch, 27; his valor, 30; at Jerusalem, 302.
Godryas, a general of Cyrus, at Babylon, 71.
Goethe, the poet, his record of the sensations he experienced at the battle of Valmy, 670.
Gol, an officer of the Armagnacs, at the siege of Paris, 442.
Gold, immense quantities of, taken by the Crusaders, 40.
Gold of the Holy Sepulcher, converted into coin, 309.
Goldsmiths' shops in Rome, put up at auction by Hannibal, 536.
Gollowin, Count, at the battle of Pultowa, 491.
Gomez, Ruy, confidential minister of Philip II., 554.
Gomoreau, the kings of, 314.
Gondian, Captain, endeavors to save Louis XVI., 460.
Gongylus, a Corinthian officer, at the siege of Syracuse, 606.
Gonsalvo, a general of Ferdinand V., at siege of Naples, 403.
Gordon, Lord, killed at the battle of Alford, 19.
Gorgey, Arthur, General, takes part in the Hungarian revolution, 618.
Gorman, Major, at the battle of Buena Vista, 132.
Gormy, General, at the battle of Marston Moor, 363.
Gortchakoff, Prince, at the battle of Borodino, 107; of Friedland, 257; of Heilsburg, 273; of the Trebia, 644.
Gortschakoff, Prince, at the battle of Kalafat, 312; in command of the Russians at the siege of Sevastopol, 577.
Goths, at Aquileia, 46; at the battle of Châlons, 383; at the siege of Milan, 383; at battle of Naissus, 404; at the siege of Ravenna, 511; of Rome, 537; of Saragossa, 562; at the battle of Sarnus, 562; of Tagina, 616; at the siege of Toledo, 633.
Gough, Sir Hugh, at Canton, 149; at the battle of Sobraon, 588.
Gourgaud, rescues Napoleon from imminent peril, 130.
Graham, Sir Thomas, at the battle of Barrosa, 84; at the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom, 164; of St. Sebastian, 549; at the battles of the Pyrenees, 499.
Grant, General, 124, 127.
Gray, Sir Thomas, concerned in the murder of Prince Arthur, 620.
Gray, Lieutenant, killed at the battle of Rivas, 529.
Gregory VII., Pope, at the siege of Rome, 541.
Gregg, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the battle of Bennington, 100.
Greeks, at the siege of Byblos, 139; of Constantinople, 188; at the battle of Cranon, 203; 13,000, engaged by Cyrus of Persia, 211; retreat of the 10,000, 216; at the battle of the Granicus, 265; at the siege of Hymera, 282; at the battle of Issus, 288; of Mantinea, 363; of Megaspellon, 365; at Missolonghi, 366; of Nisib, 417; of Thermopylæ, 622; at Tripolitza, 648; at the siege of Troy, 649.
Greek Fire, 9.
Greene, Christopher, Colonel, the "Hero of Red Bank," 512.
Greene, Nathaniel, General, at the battle of the Brandywine, 125; at battle of Long Island, 127; of Bunker's Hill, 114; of Eutaw Springs, 238; rewarded with a gold medal, 240; at the siege of Fort Ninety-Six, 250; at the battle of Guilford Court House, 266; of Hobkirk's Hill, 276; of Monmouth, 389; of Springfield, 588; of Trenton, 646.
Green, Lieutenant, 527.
Green Knight, The, 661.
Greenwood, Mr., wounded at Ciudad Rodrigo, 186.
Grenades, 667.
Grenier, General, at the battle of the Adda, 11; of Hohenlinden, 273; of Raab, 507; of Wurtzburg, 701.
Grenouilly, Rigoult de, Rear Admiral, at the siege of Sevastopol, 579.
Grey, General, at the battle of Germantown, 260; of Paoli, 470.
Grey, Lord, at the battle of Pinkey, 479.
Griswold, Fort, taken by the English, 411.
Gribeaunel, an engineer, 567.
Grillets, General, 12.
Grouchy, General, at Borodino, 109; at Hohenlinden, 277; at Novi, 424; at Raab, 507; at Wavres, 698.
Groves, Sacred, of Athens, 65.
Grovac, Major, at the battle of the Tchernaya, 578.
Guelfs, of Milan, at the battle of Marcinago, 359.
Guiscard, the Norman, 541.
Guise, Duke de, at the siege of Calais 145; killed at the siege of Orleans, 432.
Guise, Duke de, assassinated, 444.
Guiton, Jean, Mayor of La Rochelle, his valor, 582.
Guitri, De, 69.
Guizot, M., takes part in the French Revolution of 1830, 467.
Gunby, Colonel, at the battle of Guilford, 268; of Hobkirk's Hill, 276.
Gundechilde, wife of Baldwin, 234.
Gurth, brother of Harold II., killed at the battle of Hastings, 272.
Gustavus Adolphus the Great, at the battle of Leipsic, 318; killed at the battle of Lutzen, 343; his tomb preserved by Napoleon I., 344.
Gylippus, a Spartan general, at the siege of Syracuse, 606.

H.

Hachcett, Joan, the heroine, in the defense of Beauvais, 94.
Haddick, General, at the battle of Marengo, 360; at the siege of Schweidnitz, 567.

Hafiz, Pacha, at the battle of Nisib, 417.
Hagner, Captain, at the battle of Chapultepec, 171.
Halicarnassus, siege of, 516.
Halket, Sir Peter, killed at the battle of Fort du Quesne, 123.
Hall, Colonel, at Fort Talladega, 206.
Halse, Colonel, at the battle of Salamanca, 558.
Halyattes, king of Lydia, his kindness to the Scythians, 269.
Hamelin, Admiral, at the bombardment of Odessa, 426.
Hamer, General, at the siege of Monterey, 394.
Hamilcar, the Carthaginian general, at the battle of Hymeria, 282; killed, 283.
Hamilcar, the Carthaginian general, 614; at the siege of Syracuse, 615; death of, 616.
Hamilton, Alexander, General, at Yorktown, 709; at White Plains, 695.
Hamilton, Brigadier, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 589.
Hamilton, Robert, in command of Covenanters, at the battle of Drumclog, 339.
Hamilton, General, at the battle of Pultowa, 491.
Hammel, General, at the battle of Raab, 508.
Hampton, Wade, Colonel, at the battle of Eutaw Springs, 239.
Hampton, General, his defeat, 269.
Hancock, John, 329.
Hand, Colonel, at the battle of Trenton, 647; at White Plains, 695.
Hannibal the Great, defeats the Romans at the famous battle of Cannæ, 148; at the battle of Placencia, 479; besieges Rome, 536; at the siege of Saguntum, 545; crosses the Alps, 546; at the battle of Lake Thrasymenus, 624; his speech to his troops before the battle of Ticinus, 629; gains a great victory on the banks of the Trebia, 643; his despair on hearing of the defeat and death of his brother, Asdrubal, 110; his interview with Scipio, 711; defeated at the great battle of Zama, 712.
Hannibal, son of Gisco, at the siege of Selinuntum, 569.
Hanno, the Carthaginian general, 13.
Hanoverians, at the battle of Fontenoy, 246.
Hardin, Colonel, at the battle of Buena Vista, 132; killed, 135.
Hardin, Captain, at the battle of Ramsom's Mills, 509.
Harney, Colonel, at the battle of Cerro Gordo, 164.
Harold II., defeated and slain at the battle of Hastings, 272.
Harrah, Count, at the siege of Belgrade, 97.
Harris, General, at the siege of Seringapatam, 570.
Harris, Colonel, at the siege of Charleston, 176.
Harrison, William Henry, General, at the siege of Fort Meigs, 249; at the battle of the Thames, 631; of Tippecanoe, 631.
Hartley, Captain, 706.
Harvey, Colonel, at the battle of Salamanca, 557.
Haskill, Colonel, at the battle of Cerro Gordo, 164.
Haslet, Colonel, at the battle of Long Island, 128; of White Plains, 695; of Princeton, 488; killed, 489.
Hastings, Lord, concerned in the murder of the Prince of Wales, 620.
Hawes, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the battle of Hobkirk's Hill, 276.
Hawley, General, at the battle of Falkirk, 244.
Hay, the founder of the Errol family, at the battle of Luncarty, 342.
Hays, Colonel, at the siege of Monterey, 329.
Haytians, at the siege of San Domingo, 559.
Hayman, Captain, wounded at the siege of Sevastopol, 575.
Haynau, General, at the siege of Temeswar, 617.
Heath, General, at Bear Creek, 82; at the battle of White Plains, 694.
Hederwick, Captain, at the siege of Burgos, 137.
Heister, General de, 127.
Helena of Troy, abducted by Alexander, or Paris, son of Priam, 649.
Helepolis, an enormous machine, invented by Demetrius, described, 518.
Hendelet, General, wounded at the battle of Eylau, 242.
Henderson, Colonel, at the battle of Eutaw Springs, 239.
Henderson, Colonel, killed at the battle of New Orleans, 413.
Henderson, General, at the siege of Monterey, 392.
Hengurst, the Saxon, defeated at Crayford, 208.
Henley, Major, killed at Montressor's Island, 695.
Henry II., king of France, at war with Spain, 554.
Henry III., king of England, compelled to fight against his own cause, and wounded at the battle of Evesham, 240; at the battle of Lewes, 327; made prisoner, 328.
Henry III., king of Germany and Italy, at the siege of Rome, 541.
Henry III., of France, disgracefully repulsed by women at Livron, 336; his character, 445; at the siege of La Rochelle, 531; causes the massacre of the Leaguers, 444; his excesses, 445; assassinated by the monk Clement, 446.
Henry IV., king of England, at the battle of Shrewsbury, 584; at the siege of Laon, 318.
Henry IV., of France, proclaimed king, 446; defeats the Leaguers, 26; his valor at the siege of Cahors, 142; at the siege of Listenx, 336; of Paris, 447.
Henry V., of England, invades France, 69, 429.
Henry VI., king of England, 338; at the battle of St. Albans, 547; wounded, ibid.; at the battle of Towton, 642; declared king of France by Treaty of Troyes, 429; murdered, 620.
Henry VII. (the Earl of Richmond), defeats Richard III. in Bosworth Field, 119.
Henry VIII., king of England, at the siege of Bolougne, 120; of Therouanne, 638.
Henry, son of David I., of Scotland, at the battle of the Standard, 589.
Henry, brother of Peter the Cruel, at the battle of Naxera, 408.
Henry, brother of the Count of Flanders, at Constantinople, 188.
Henzi, General, in command of the garrison of Buda, 618; his death, ibid.
Heraclius, emperor of the East, 300; treachery of, 16; at the siege of Damascus, 223.
Herbert, Sir Walter, 118.
Hercules, the Pillars of, 263.
Herbois, Collot d', his cruelty, 349.
Herkimer, General, at the battle of Oriskany, 250.
Herle, at the siege of Macstricht, 350.
Hermocrates, at the siege of Syracuse, 605.
Herod the Great, at the siege of Jerusalem, 296; rebuilds Samaria, 559.
Herod, son of Odenathus, killed by Mallonis, 435.
Herrick, Colonel, at the battle of Bennington Heights, 100.
Herrings, the battle of the, 430.
Hesse-Homberg, Prince Leopold of, 346.
Hesse-Philipstadt, Prince of, 103.
Hessians, at the battle of Bennington, 99; of the Brandywine, 124; of Brooklyn (Long Island), 127; their brutality, 128; at the siege of Charleston, 178; at the battle of Dittingen, 225; at the siege of Fort Washington, 253; at the capture of Fort Griswold, 411; at the battle of Guilford, 267; of Germantown, 262; of Hubbarton, 280; of Monmouth, 388; of Red Bank, 512; at Savannah, 563; at the battles of Bemus' Heights, Stillwater, and Saratoga, 594; anecdote of, 596; at battle of Trenton, 646; of White Plains, 693.
Hewett, Captain, 704.
Hexapylum, the celebrated gate of Syracuse, 603.
Hiero, of Syracuse, at the siege of Messina, 365.
Hill, Sir Rowland, at Badajoz, 77; at the battle of Bayonne, 91; of Orthes, 93; of the Pyrenees, 501.
Hill, Colonel, at the battle of Hubbarton, 280.
Hill, Lord, 55; at the battle of Almaraz, 24.
Hilliers, Baraguay d', at Asperne and Essling, 57; at the battle of Raab, 507.
Himilco, at the siege of Syracuse, 613.
Hindman, Colonel, 415.
Hippocrates, 613, 615.
Hitchcock, Colonel, at the battle of Princeton, 489.
Hockley, George W., Colonel, at the battle of San Jacinto, 560.
Hog's Island, skirmish of, 113.
Hofer, the Tyrolean Hero, 661.
Hohenloie, Count, General, 41; at the battle of Auerstadt, 64; of Jena, 292; of Saalfeld, 544.
Hohenstauffen Dynasty, termination of, in Italy, 616.
Hohenzollern, General, at the battle of Asperne, 57; of Eckmuhl, 232.
Holakoo, at the siege and sack of Bagdad, 81.
Holmes, Lieutenant, at the siege of Burgos, 137.
Holstein, Duke of, at battle of Hemmingstadt, 275.
Holy Lance, the, found at Antioch, 37; borne in the final battle of Antioch, by Raymond, 38.
Holy Sepulchre, the, 309.
Homberg, Hesse, Prince of, wounded at the battle of Leipsic, 323.
Homer, his narration of the siege of Troy, 649.

Hoorne, General, at the battle of Pultowa, 491.
Hope, Sir John, General, at the battle of Bayonne, 90; wounded, 94; at the battle of Corunna, 200; of Salamanca, 558.
Horatii and Curatii, 279.
Horatius, Cocles, destroys bridge over the Tiber, and swims that river, 533.
Hornsby, General, at Granada, 529.
Hortensius, a Lieutenant of Sylla, at the battle of Chæronea, 168.
Hosea, king of Israel, made prisoner, 559.
Hotham, Commodore, in command of the English fleet, 175.
Hotspur (Lord Percy), at the battle of Oudenard, 434; killed at the battle of Shrewsbury, 584.
Hotza, General, at the battle of Wurtzburg, 701; of Zurich, 714.
Houston, Sam, General, at the battle of San Jacinto, 559; wounded, 560.
Howard, Colonel, at the battle of Hobkirk's Hill, 276; at Bear Creek, 81.
Howard, John Eager, at the battle of the Cowpens, 201.
Howard, Sir Edward, at the battle of Flodden, 245.
Howard, Lord, at the battle of Flodden, 245.
Howard, Thomas, Lord, at the siege of Cadiz, 141.
Howe, George, Lord, slain at Ticonderoga, 630.
Howe, Richard, Lord, admiral of the British fleet for America, arrives at Staten Island, 127; at the battle of White Plains, 84.
Howe, Robert, General, at the battle of Long Island, 127; at the siege of Savannah, 175, 563.
Howe, Colonel, at Norfolk, 418.
Howe, Sir William, arrives in America, 112; in command of the British troops in Boston, 118; at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 114; wounded, 116; evacuates Boston, 118; arrives at Staten Island, 127; at the siege of Fort Washington, 253; at the battle of Germantown, 260; of Red Bank, 512.
Hueston, Captain, killed at the battle of Rivas, 528.
Huger, Isaac, General, at the siege of Charleston, 178; at the battle of Guilford, 267; of Hobkirk's Hill, 276; at Savannah, 563, 565.
Huger, Captain, 385.
Hugh the Great, 39.
Hugh of St. Paul, at Jerusalem, 307.
Huguenots, erect Fort Carolina in Florida, 247; defeated by the Spaniards, ibid.; at the battle of Jarnac, 291; at the siege of La Rochelle, 531; of Orleans, 432; of Paris (St. Bartholomew's night), 446; of Valenciennes, 667.
Huel, Isaac, General, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 589; his conduct at Detroit, 225.
Human flesh, eaten at Athens, 64.
Humbert, M., at the storming of the Bastile, 451.
Humbert, General, in command of the French army in Ireland, 158.
Hume, Lord, at the battle of Flodden, 245.
Humieres, Marshal, at the siege of Valenciennes, 668.
Hungarians, conquered by Amurath I., 156; at the battle of Engen, 237; of Mohacz, 385; of Nicopolis, 416; of Temeswar, 617; of Varna, 671.
Hungarian Revolution, origin of, 617.
Hungerford, Sir Walter, 118.
Hungerford, Lord, made prisoner, and executed at Hexham, 275.
Huniades, John, a Hungarian general, at the battle of Varna, 671.
Huns, at the battle of Châlons, 169; at the siege of Constantinople, 186; of Nantes, 401; of Orleans, 428.
Hunter, Captain, at Fort Stephenson, 253.
Huntingdon, Earl of, taken prisoner, 26.
Huntley, Earl of, at the battle of Glenlivet, 264.
Hyder Ali, 570.
Hyperides, the orator, his bravery, 202; put to death by Antipater, 203.
Hyrcanus, son of Simon Maccabeus, at the siege of Samaria, 559.

I.

Ibelin, Balean, d', his heroism, 310.
Iberians, at the battle of Aquileia, 46.
Ibrahim Pacha, at the battle of Nisib, 417; of Megaspelion, 365; of Tripolitza, 648.
Ich Dien, 205.
Irton, Oliver Cromwell's son-in-law, at the battle of Naseby, 408.
Imilcon, at the battle of Motya, 399.
Imaz, General, at Badajoz, 77.
Inarus, declares himself king of Egypt, 139.
India, conquered by the English, 570.
Indians, at the battle of Beaverdams, 95; of Bennington, 99; of Blue Licks, 105; of Brownstown, 126; of Fort du Quesne, 122; of Fort Schuyler, 281; of Cherry Valley, 179; of Fort Talladega, 206; of Tallushatchee, 205; at Detroit, 225; at Fort Meigs, 249; at Fort Erie, 248; at Fort Mimms, 249; at Fort Niagara, 250; at the battle of Oriskany, 221; of Norfolk, 417; of Oswego, 434; of Pequot Hill, 473; massacre the settlers of Schenectady, 566; at Schohaire, 566; at Bemus' Heights, 590; at Sudbury, 602; at battle of the Thames, 620; of Tippecanoe, 631.
Infernal Machines, invented and first used by Giambelli, at Antwerp, 42; description of, 42.
Inquisition, in Flanders, celebrated confederation against, 667.
Ioukinna, a Saracen chieftain, at the siege of Tyre, 659.
Irish, at the battle of Athenry, 62; of Aughrim, 67; of Ballinahinch, 81; of Bannockburn, 83; of the Boyne, 121; of Castlebar, 158; of Clontarf, 186; of Dundalk, 230; of Dungan Hill, 230; of Gorey, 264; of Limerick, 333; at the siege of Londonderry, 340.
Iron Bridge, at Antioch, 39.
Iron Chains, stretched across the Dardanelles, 193.
Irving, Washington, his history of the siege of Granada, 265.
Isidore, Cardinal, Pope's legate at Constantinople, 193.
Islenief, General, at the siege of Ismail, 284.
Ismail, Pacha, at the battle of Citate, 184.
Israel, the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, ended, 559.
Israelites, at the siege of Ai, 14; at the battle of Esdraelon, 236; at the siege of Jericho, 294; of Jerusalem, 295; their safe passage through the Red Sea, 513; at the siege of Samaria, 559.
Istekhar-Eddanlah, at Jerusalem, 301.
Italians, at the siege of Antwerp, 41; at the battle of Arras, 53; defeated by Barclay, 86; at the battle of Borodino, 111; of Lutzen, 344.

J.

Jabin, king of Canaan, his death, 237.
Jackson, Andrew, General, his conduct during the Creek war, 205; at the battle of Fort Talladega, 206; of Tohopeka, 207; of New Orleans, 411; of Pensacola, 473; at the battle of Waxhaw, 693.
Jackson, Colonel, at battle of Bemus' Heights, 590; of White Plains, 695; of Montressor's Island, ibid.
Jael, the wife of Heber, kills Sisera, 237.
Jalognes, Marshal, at the siege of Castillon, 157.
James I., of Scotland, murdered at Perth, 474.
James II., of England, at the battle of the Boyne, 67; defeated by army of William III., 123; his narrow escape at the battle of Dundalk, 231; at the siege of Londonderry, 357; his conduct in regard to Lord Monmouth, 567.
James III., of Scotland, defeated at the battle of Sauchie Burn, 562; his death, ibid.
James IV., king of Scotland, at the battle of Flodden, 244; killed, 245.
Jamieson, Colonel, 178.
Jasper, Serjeant, his heroism at the siege of Fort Moultrie, 175; mortally wounded at Savannah, 565; anecdote of, ibid.
Jean IV., at the siege of Mons, 389.
Jellachich, General, his conduct in the Hungarian war, 617.
Jeremiah, the Prophet, at the siege of Jerusalem, 296.
Jerusalem, description of, 301; destruction of, 296, 299; falls into the hands of the Mohammedans, 311.
Jessup, Major, at the siege of Fort Erie, 248; at the battle of Niagara (Lundy's Lane), 415; wounded, 416.
Jews, at the siege of Kaibar, 312; at the siege of Jerusalem, 296; burnt alive, 308.
Jezid, a Saracen captain, at the siege of Tyre, 659.
Joan of Arc, the "Maid of Orleans," at the siege of Orleans, 431; wounded, 432; at the siege of Paris, 442; wounded, 443; at the battle of Patay, 470; at the siege of Troyes, 649; defeats Burgundians, 649; at the siege of Compeigne, 196; made prisoner, 197; her sufferings, trial, and death, 198.
Joan, first queen of Naples, excommunicated by Pope Urban V., 402.
Joan, Countess Dowager of Hainault, 638.
Joab, at the siege of Jerusalem, 295.
Joachim, king of Jerusalem, 295.
John, Archduke of Austria, at the battle of Hohenlinden, 277; of Kulm, 317; of Raab, 507; of Sacile, 544.
John, King of England, 120, 226, 544.

JOHN, of Guscala, chief of the Zealots, 297.
JOHN II., of France, made prisoner at the battle of Poictiers, 487.
JOHN GEORGE, of Saxony, at the first battle of Leipsic, 318.
JOHN GEORGE III., of Saxony, at Vienna, 677.
JOHN, of Procida, plans the Sicilian Vespers, 435.
JOHN, Lord Birmingham, at the battle of Dundalk, 230.
JOHNSON, Lieutenant-Colonel, at Stony Point and Fort Fayette, 599.
JOHNSON, James, Colonel, at the battle of the Thames, 620.
JOHNSON, Sir John, in command of the British army at the siege of Fort Schuyler and the battle of Oriskany, 281.
JOHNSON, Richard M., Colonel, at the battle of the Thames, 619; wounded, 620.
JOHNSON, Lieutenant, at Fort Stephenson, 253.
JOHNSON, Sir William, at Fort Niagara, 250.
JOINVILLE, Prince de, a noble of Louis IX., at the siege of Tunis, 650.
JONES, Colonel, made prisoner at the battle of Dungan Hill, 230.
JONES, Lieutenant, made prisoner at the siege of St. Sebastian, 550.
JONES, Commodore, made prisoner, 411.
JONES, Captain, at the battle of Stillwater, 590.
JORAM, son of Achab, at the siege of Samaria, 559.
JOSEPH, Lord, a leader of the Cornish rebels, executed, 104.
JOSEPHUS, the Historian, at the siege of Jerusalem, 298.
JOSHUA, at the siege of Ai, 14; of Jericho, 294.
JOUBERT, General, at the battle of Montenotte, 391; at Rivoli, 530; killed at the battle of Novi, 424.
JOURDAN, Marshal, at the battle of Charleroi, 172; of the Pyrenees, 498; at the siege of St. Sebastian, 549; at the battle of Stockach, 597; of Talavera, 616; of Wattignies, 692; of Wurtzburg, 701.
JUAN, Don, 231.
JUDLONOWSKI, General, at Vienna, 678.
JUDAH, the tribe of, 295.
JUPITER BELUS, temple of, in Babylon, 71; destroyed by the Persians, 74.
JULIAN, the Apostate, 441.
JUSTINA, empress of Italy, 45.
JUSTINIAN, a Genoese, at Constantinople, 193.
JUSTINIAN I., emperor of the East, 512.
JUNOT, General, at the battle of Nazareth, 10; of Borodino, 109; of Lonato, 341; of Smolensko, 536.

K.

KAIM, General, at the battle of Marengo, 360.
KAINS, William de, at Lincoln, 334.
KAITAISOFF, General, at Borodino, 111; killed, 112.
KALB, Baron de, in command of right wing of American army at Camden, 147; his death, 148.
KAMENSKOI, General, at the battle of Hellsburg, 273.
KARSUROFF, General, 49.
KEANE, Lord, at the siege of Ghuznee, 262.
KEANE, General, wounded at the battle of New Orleans, 413.
KEINMAYER, General, at the battle of Hohenlinden, 277.
KELLERMAN, General, at the battle of Dresden, 226; of Leipsic, 320; at Lyons, 347; of Marengo, 360; of Valmy, 670.
KELLY, John, Colonel heroism of, 490.
KEMPT, General, at Badajoz, 78; at the battle of Waterloo, 691.
KERCADO, Molac de, killed, 472.
KET, the Tanner, defeated and executed, 313.
KEWEN, Colonel, at the battle of Rivas, 528.
KEY, Francis, author of "The Star-spangled Banner," 82.
KHALED, an Arabian chieftain, at the siege of Jerusalem, 300.
KICHMATTER, a Swiss knight, wounded at the battle of St. Jacob, 549.
KIDD, Lieutenant, killed while striving to save a wounded soldier, 576.
KIELMANSEGGE, invents clay grenades and a powder mill, 677.
KILBURN, Lieutenant, at the battle of Buena Vista, 133.
KIRBY, Captain, at the battle of Molino del Rey, 386.
KIRGENER, General, 89.
KIRKWOOD, Captain, at the battle of Guilford Court House, 267.
KIRK, General, at the siege of Londonderry, 338.
KLEBER, General, at the battle of Charleroi, 172; of Heliopolis, 273; of Mount Tabor, 399; of Mans, 357.

KLEIST, General, at the battle of Leipsic, 323; of Bautzen, 88.
KLENAU, General, at the battle of Dresden, 226; of Leipsic, 320.
KNIGHTS OF ST. JOHN, capture Rhodes, 520.
KNOWLTON, Thomas, Colonel, killed at the battle of Harlem Plains, 694.
KNOX, General, at Stony Point, 600; at Yorktown, 709.
KNIPHAUSEN, General, at the battle of Lutzen, 342.
KNYPHAUSEN, General, in command of the Hessians, at the battle of the Brandywine, 124; in command of the garrison of New York, 176; at the siege of Fort Washington, 253; at the battle of Monmouth, 388; at Springfield, 588; at White Plains, 695.
KOLLOWRATH, General, at the battle of Hohenlinden, 278; of Stockach, 598.
KONOWNITSYN, General, at the battle of Borodino, 110.
KOSCIUSKO, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 589; at Fort Ninety-six, 256; at Warsaw, 681.
KOSSUTH, Louis, Governor of Hungary, 618.
KREMLIN, the, at Moscow, 355.
KRAY, General, at the battle of Engen, 237; at the siege of Mantua, 357; at the battle of Moeskirch, 384; of Novi, 424; of Wurtzburg, 701.
KUTUSON, General, at the siege of Ismail, 285.
KWAN, a Chinese admiral, killed, 149.

L.

LABARRE, a French quartermaster, at the siege of Valenciennes, 669.
LABEDOYERE, General, at the siege of Ratisbon, 510.
LABIENUS, a lieutenant of Julius Cæsar, at the siege of Paris, 440.
LABORDE, General, at the battles of Corunna, 200.
LACEDÆMONS, see SPARTANS.
LA COUE, Marshal, at the siege of Vienna, 677.
LADIES FRENCH, the, at the siege of Marseilles, 362.
LADISLAUS, king of Hungary, at the battle of Varna, 671.
LAFAYETTE, Gilbert Morthier, Marquis de, at the battle of Brandywine, 124; wounded, 125; at the battle of Jamestown, 291; of Monmouth, 387; at the siege of Yorktown, 709; takes part in the French Revolution of 1789, 449; nominated Vice-President of the Council, and appointed Commander-in-chief of the National Guard of Paris, 453; his interview with Louis XVI., 460; takes part in the French Revolution of 1830, 467.
LA FEUILLADE, Duke de, at the siege of Turin, 654.
LA FLORIDA, Marquis, his heroic answer to Prince Eugene, 384.
LA GUESLE, aids in the assassination of Henry III., 446.
LA HARPE, General, at the battle of Montenotte, 390.
LAHOUSSAYE, General, at the battle of Corunna, 200.
LAKE, Lord, at the battle of Lasawaree, 318.
LALLY, at the siege of Madras, 350.
LAMACHUS, an Athenian general, killed, 606.
LAMAN, Colonel, at the battle of San Jacinto, 560.
LAMB, Colonel, at the siege of Yorktown, 709.
LAMBERT, General, at the battle of New Orleans, 413.
LAMBESQ, Prince, 448.
LAMETH, Charles de, Count, wounded at Yorktown, 709.
LANCASTER, Duke of, at the siege of Rennes, 513.
LANCASTRIANS, at the battle of Hexham, 275; of St. Albans, 547; of Tewkesbury, 619; of Towton, 643; of Bloreheath, 105; of Wakefield, 680; of St. Albans, second battle, 547; of Stamford, 588; of Barnet, 84;
LANDERO, General, at the siege of Vera Cruz, 674.
LANE, General, at the battle of Buena Vista, 132.
LANGDALE, Sir Marmaduke, at the battle of Naseby, 408.
LANGERON, Count de, takes part in the French Revolution of 1789, 455; at the battle of Leipsic, 324.
LANGUEVILLE, Duke of, made prisoner, 555.
LANNES, Marshal, at the battle of Aboukir, 1; wounded at St. Jean d' Acre, 16; wounded at Arcola, 51; at the battle of Asperne, 56; mortally wounded, 60; his dying words, 61; at the battle of Austerlitz, 68; of Eckmuhl, 232; of Friedland, 257; of Hellsberg, 273; his generous treatment of the body of his enemy, Prince Louis, 292; at the battle of Jena, 293; of Saalfield, 544; of Marengo, 360; created Duke of Montebello, 389; at the battle of Pultusk, 495; of Ratisbon, 511; at the siege of Saragossa, 562.
LANNOI, Viceroy of Naples, at the siege of Pavia, 471.
LAPAS, a Greek chief, at the battle of Thermopylæ, 624.
LA PUCELLE, Jean, see JOAN.
LARCHEJAQUELIN, Henri de, General, at the battle of Chateau Gothiere, 179; of Cholet, 183; of Mans, 357; wounded, ibid.

La Rosiere, M., 450.
La Salle, Marquis de, takes part in the French Revolution of 1789, 449; at the battle of Rivoli, 530.
Lascaris, Theodore, 188.
Lasci, Marshal de, at the siege of Ismail, 285.
Latimer, Colonel, at the battle of Stillwater, 590.
Latins, at Constantinople, 188.
Latrielle, the naturalist, anecdote of, 455.
Laudon, General, at the siege of Schweidnitz, 566.
Launay, Marquis de, governor of the Bastile, 450; his heroic defense of that fortress, 451; his death, 452.
Laurens, Colonel, at the siege of Yorktown, 709.
Laurie, Major, killed at the siege of Burgos, 137.
Lauriston, General, 86; at the battle of Bautzen, 88; of Busaco, 139; of Leipsic, 320; of Lutzen, 344.
La Vega, General, made prisoner at the battle of Resaca de la Palma, 514.
Lawrence, Major, at Fort Boyer, 247.
Lawson, General, at the battle of Guilford, 267.
Lawson, Colonel, at the battle of Niagara, 414.
Leaguers, the, take Lisieux, 336.
Learned, General, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 589.
Leavenworth, Colonel, at the battle of Chippewa, 182; of Niagara, 414.
Le Bœuf, General, at the storming of the Malakoff, 579.
Lechelle, General, at the battle of Chateau Gothiere, 179; of Cholet, 183.
Le Clerc, Bussy, governor of the Bastile, 445.
Le Clerc, General, at the battle of Rivoli, 530.
Le Coe, General, at the battle of Bayonne, 91; wounded, 92.
Lecourb, General, at the battle of Muolta, 400; of Moeskirch, 384.
Leda, mother of Castor and Pollux, 649.
Ledyard, Colonel, murdered by Major Bromfield, 411.
Lee, Charles, General, at Charleston, 173; at battle of Monmouth, 387; his singular conduct, 388; court-martialed, 389.
Lee, Henry, Major (afterward General), at the battle of Eutaw Springs, 238; of Guilford, 266; of the Haw, 273.
Lefebvre, General, at the battle of Charleroi, 172; of Jena, 293; at Paris, 445; at Schweidnitz, 567.
Le Grand, General, at the battle of Asperne, 60; of Heilsberg, 273.
Lege, de, 461.
Leith, taken by Cromwell, 230.
Leith, General, at the battle of Busaco, 139; of Salamanca, 557; wounded, 558.
Leitch Major, killed, 694.
Le Marchant, General, at the battle of Salamanca, 557.
Lemoine, General, at the battle of Novi, 424.
Lenarmont, General, at the battle of Friedland, 258.
L' Enfant, Major, at the siege of Savannah, 565.
Lennezergues, General de, killed, 503.
Lennox, Earl of, at the battle of Dunbar, 229; of Flodden, 245.
Leo X., Pope, preaches a crusade against Raymond, Count of Toulouse, 637.
Leofwin, brother of Harold II., slain at the battle of Hastings, 272.
Leon, Velasquez de, an officer of Cortez, at the battle of the Causeway, 373; of Cempoalla, 162.
Leonard, Captain, at Fort Niagara, 250.
Leonidas, a noble Spartan, his virtue, valor, and glorious death, 623.
Leontidas, a Spartan tyrant, killed in Thebes, 621.
Leopold William, Archduke of Austria, at the battle of Leipsic 320.
Leopold, of Austria, at battle of Morgarten, 397.
Leopold, Prince of Hesse-Homberg, killed at the battle of Lutzen, 346.
Lepers, 559.
Leslie, General, at the battle of Dunbar, 229; of Selkirk, 569.
Leslie, Norman, General, heroism of, 26.
Leslie, Captain, killed at the battle of Princeton, 489.
Leslie, Captain, at Norfolk, 417.
Leslie, General, at the battle of Guilford, 267; of Harlem Heights, 694; of White Plains, 695.
Letourco, General, at the battle of Eylau, 241; of Mount Tabor, 399.
Letpald, brother of Godfrey of Bouillon, at the siege of Jerusalem, 307.
Leva, Antonio de, at the siege of Pavia, 471.
L' Evans, Sir de, at the battle of the Alma, 23.
Levenhaupt, General, at the battle of Pultowa, 491.
Levering, Captain, 81.
Levi, General de, at the siege of Quebec, 504.
Lewachou, General, at the battle of Leipsic, 320.
Lewis, Colonel, at Frenchtown, 255.
Leyden, city of, description of, 330.
Liancourt, Duke of, 458.
Library, of Alexandria, 16; of Tripoli, 648.
Lichtenstein, General, at the battle of Hohenlinden, 273; of Novi, 425; of the Trebia, 645.
Lichtenstein, Prince, at the siege of Temeswar, 619.
Licinius, emperor, defeated by Constantine the Great, at Adrianople, 12; his fleet defeated, 140; his humiliation and death, 140.
Liegeois, the, at the battle of Montenachen, 390.
Ligney, Captain de, at the battle of Fort du Quesne, 461.
Ligni, Prince de, at the siege of Ismail, 285.
Lilleboem, General, at the battle of Arras, 54.
Lilli, General, his shameful surrender of Tortosa, 634.
Linbelfing, a page of Gustavus Adolphus, mortally wounded in the defense of his master, 343.
Lincoln, Benjamin, General, appointed Commander of the American army in the South, 175; at the siege of Savannah, 564; his operations on Lake George, 589; wounded at the battle of Stillwater, 594.
Lincoln, the fair of, 335.
Lindsay, Earl of, mortally wounded at Edgehill Fight, 235.
Liniero, a French officer in the Spanish service, takes Montevideo, 136.
Liprandi, General, at the battle of Balaklava, 571.
Lisle, Lord, son of General Talbot, killed at the siege of Castillon, 158.
Littington, Colonel, at the battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 396.
Littlehalls, Colonel, at Oswego, 434.
Livingston, Henry, General, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 590.
Livingston, James, General, 590.
Livius, M., Roman Consul, at the battle of Metaurus, 410.
Lobau, Count, at the battle of Lutzen, 346.
Lochiel, a Celtic chief, at the battle of Killiecrankie, 313.
Locke, Colonel, of Rowan, at the battle of Ramsom's Mills, 509.
Lockyee, Captain, captures an American flotilla, 411.
Logan, General, at the battle of Blue Licks, 105.
Loheac, Marshal, at the siege of Castillon, 157.
Lombard Monarchy, extinction of, 470.
Londoners, 3000 slain at the battle of Lewes, 328.
Longinus, his death, 488.
Lorge, General, at the battle of Corunna, 200.
Lorges, Marshal, at the siege of Valenciennes, 668.
Loring, Major, at the battle of Cerro Gordo, 164.
Lorraine, Duke of, at the siege of Antioch, 28; of Jerusalem, 306.
Lorraine, Duke of, at Mohaczs, 385.
Lorraine, Prince of, at the battle of Moeskirch, 384.
Lorraine, Cardinal de, assassinated, 444.
Losme, Marquis de, 450; killed, 452.
Louis I. (Le Debonnaire), at the siege of Tortosa, 634; his sons at the battle of Fontenoy, 245.
Louis VII., of France, at the siege of Damascus, 228.
Louis VIII., 226.
Louis IX., of France, his ardent sympathy with the Crusaders, 650; at the siege of Tunis, 651; his death, 652.
Louis XI., engages in a war with Charles the Bold, 94; at the siege of Liege, 332; of Paris, 443; of Perignan, 443; at the battle of St. Jacob, 548; ransoms Queen Margaret, 620.
Louis XII., at the siege of Therouanne, 624; of Tournai, 639.
Louis XIII., his troops at the siege of Nancy, 401; captures Perignan, 474; at the siege of La Rochelle, 532.
Louis XIV., invades the Netherlands, 237; at the siege of Maestricht, 351; of Mons, 389; his troops, at Namur, 40; his character, 639; at the siege of Tournai, 640; plans the siege of Turin, 654; at the siege of Valenciennes, 668.
Louis XV., 104; at the siege of Tournai, 640.
Louis XVI., his conduct during the French Revolution, 448; his reception by the people of Paris, 454; his trial by the Convention, 461; sentenced to death, 462.
Louis XVIII., makes his public entrance into Paris, 465.
Louis Philippe I., king of the French, elevated to the throne of France, 469. See Chartres.
Louis, Duke of Bavaria, 26.

Louis, Frederic, Prince, killed at the battle of Saalfield, 544.
Louis, de, condemned to death, 197.
Louis, king of Hungary, killed, 385.
Louis, of Mousson, at the siege of Jerusalem, 307.
Louis Napoleon, emperor of France, 469.
Lourmel, General de, killed at the battle of Inkerman, 572.
Louvois, General, at the siege of Valenciennes, 668.
Lowell, Ralph, 338.
Lowendahl, Count de, lays siege to Bergen-op-Zoom, 103; made Marshal of France, 104.
Loyes, General, at the battle of Moeskirch, 384.
Lubervie, General, at the battle of Waterloo, 690.
Lubomiski, Prince, at the siege of Vienna, 677.
Lucan, Lord, at the siege of Sevastopol, 572.
Lucas, General, at the battle of Marston Moor, 363.
Lucullus, Consul of Rome, 26.
Ludovic, Duke of Milan, his interview with Chevalier Bayard, 384.
Lumsden, governor of Dundee, killed, 230.
Lundie, Colonel, 121.
Lundohn, Marshal, at the siege of Belgrade, 98.
Lusignan, General, at the battle of Rivoli, 530.
Luther, Lieutenant, wounded at the battle of Palo Alto, 440.
Luxemborg, Marshal, at the battle of Charleroi, 172; of Enghien, 237; of Neerwinden, 408; at the siege of Valenciennes, 668.
Luzeac, Marquis de, at the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom, 104.
Lynch, Colonel, at the battle of Guilford, 267.
Lycophron, a Corinthian general, killed, 588.
Lysander, at Athens, 62.
Lysicles, the Athenian general, his valor, 167.
Lysimachus, the Macedonian, conspires against Antigonus, 516; at the battle of Ipsus, 283.

M.

McAedle, Captain, at the battle of Rivas, 527.
McArthur, Major, at the battle of the Cowpens, 202.
McArthur, Colonel, at the surrender of Detroit, 225.
McCall, Colonel, at the battle of the Cowpens, 202.
McCall, Captain, at the battle of Resaca de la Palma, 514.
Macdonald, Marshal, at the battle of Arcis, 50; of Bautzen, 86; of Hanau, 270; of Katzbach, 312; of Leipsic, 320; of Lutzen, 345; of Otricolli, 434; of the Trebia, 644.
Macdonald, an Irish officer, at the siege of Cremona, 209.
Macdonald, Colonel, at the battle of King's Mountain, 315.
McDonald, Donald, General, at the battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 396.
Macdonald, Serjeant, death of, 175.
McDonough, Commodore, at the battle of Plattsburg, 485.
McDougal, General, in command of West Point, 599; at the battle of Germantown, 261; of White Plains, 695.
McDowell, Captain, at the battle of Ramsom's Mills, 509.
McDowell, Charles, Colonel, at the battle of the Cowpens, 201.
Macedonians, at the siege of Abydos, 6; at the battle of Arbela, 47; at the siege of Corinth, 195; at the battle of the Issus, 287; of the Hydaspes, 281; of Pharsalia, 568; of Selasia, 568; at the siege of Thebes, 621; of Tyre, 656.
McFarland, Major, at the battle of Niagara, 414.
McGarry, Major, his heroism, at the battle of Blue Licks, 105.
Machines of War, 306, 518, 523, 614, 627.
Mack, General, at the battle of Otricolli, 434; defeated by the French, 542; his conduct at Ulm, 665.
Mackall, General, at Mexico, 383.
Mackay, General, at the battle of Killiecrankie, 313.
McKavett, Captain, killed at the siege of Monterey, 394.
McKee, Colonel, at the battle of Buena Vista, 132; killed, 135.
McKensie, Captain, at the battle of Chapultepec, 171.
Mackenzie, General, at the battle of Castalla, 156.
McKinnon, General, at the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, 176; killed, 185.
McIntosh, Colonel, killed at the battle of Molino del Rey, 385.
McIntosh, General, at the siege of Savannah, 565.
McIntosh, Lieutenant-Colonel, 529.
McLeod, Captain, killed at the battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 396.
McLeod, Captain, at the battle of Guilford, 267.
M'Mahon, General, at the storming of the Malakoff, 579.
McNeil, Major, at the battle of Chippewa, 182; of Niagara, 414.
Macunne, General, 138, 506.
Madison, Major, at the battle of Frenchtown, 256.
Maele, Louis, Count de, at the battle of Westroosebeke, 688.
Maelonis, murders his uncle, Odonathus, 436; killed by order of Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, 436.
Magaw, Colonel, at the siege of Fort Washington, 254.
Mago, brother of Hannibal the Great, at the siege of Carthagena, 15; at the battle of Cannæ, 147; dispatched to Carthage with the news of the victory, 148; at the battle of the Trebia, 643.
Mayo, Captain, at the siege of Vera Cruz, 673.
Mahon, Captain, at the battle of Rivas, 528.
Mahoney, Captain, at the siege of Cremona, 209.
Mahomet, see Mohammed.
Mahomet II., the Great, 194; at the siege of Constantinople, 192; constructs Castle of Dardanelles, 193; at the siege of Rhodes, 520; his death, ibid.
Mahomet, Ibn Abdallah, king of Morocco, at the battle of Novas de Toloso, 408.
Mahmoud, of Ghiznee, at the siege of Meerut, 365.
Makow, General, at the battle of Mobrungen, 385.
Maillard, Stanislaus, 452.
Maitland, Colonel, at the siege of Savannah, 564; at the battle of Stono Ferry, 598.
Malakoff, capture of the, 578.
Malcolm, king of Scotland, slain, 25.
Malcolm's Cross, 25.
Malesherbes, Counselor of Louis XVI., 461.
Malta, knights of, 356.
Mamelon, capture of the, at the siege of Sevastopol, 574.
Mancinus, Lieutenant of Piso, at the siege of Carthage, 151; rescued from imminent danger by Scipio, 152.
Mancius, a general of Demetrius, at the siege of Rhodes, 519.
Manco, Inca of Peru, 217.
Manfred, king of Naples, slain at Benevento, 99.
Mandizable, General, 75.
Manecho, the Spanish governor of Badajoz, killed, 75.
Manrenus, at Argentaria, 52.
Manlius, Consul of Rome, at the siege of Carthage, 150.
Manners, Major, at Ciudad Rodrigo, 176.
Manny, Sir Walter, at the siege of Calais, 143, 145.
Mansfield, Major, at the siege of Monterey, 392.
Mansfield, Colloredo, Count, 41; at the battle of Kulm, 317.
Marc Antony, 47. See Antony.
Marceau, General, at the battle of Charlerol, 172; of Mans, 357.
Marcellus, Consul of Rome, 613.
Marcellus, brother of Maximus, 45.
Marcius, Caius, 477; his bravery at the siege of Coriolli, 197.
Mardonius, a lieutenant of Xerxes, king of Persia, at the battle of Platæa, 479; killed, 481.
Marechaud, General, at the battle of Busaco, 139.
Marre, Earl of, at the battle of Dunbar, 229.
Margaret, queen of England, at the battle of St. Albans, 548; of Tewkesbury, 619; made prisoner, and confined in the Tower of London, 620; ransomed by Louis XI. of France, 620.
Margaret, queen of Denmark, 244.
Marguerite of Austria, Duchess of Parma, her conduct in regard to the Inquisition of Flanders, 667.
Maria Louisa, 464.
Maria Theresa, 640.
Marina, Donna, 631, 632.
Marius, at the siege of Rome, 536.
Marlborough, Duke of, at the battle of Blenheim, 105; of Mons, 339; of Ramillies, 509.
Marle, Count de, killed, 70.
Marmont, Marshal, at the siege of Badajoz, 77; at the battle of Bautzen, 87; of Brienne, 130; of Dresden, 226; of Hanau, 271; of Leipsic, 323; of Lutzen, 345; of Marengo, 360; of Paris, 464; appointed commander of the garrison of Paris (in 1830), 465; his plan for the defense of the city, 466; at the battle of Salamanca, 506; wounded, 557.
Marolles, General de, killed at the storming of the Malakoff, 508.
Maroto, General, at the battle of Ramales, 508.
Marshal, H., Colonel, at the battle of Buena Vista, 132.

Marshal, Lieutenant, wounded at the siege of St. Sebastian, 553.
Massin, Marshal de, at the siege of Turin, 654; wounded and made prisoner, 655; his death, ibid.
Martigny, Count, at the siege of Belgrade, 96.
Martin, Governor, of North Carolina, 396.
Martinegere, de, the inventor of the method of detecting mining operations, 522.
Martel, Charles, see Charles.
Martel, a Norman knight, at the battle of Hastings, 272.
Mary (Tudor), queen of England, 146, 554.
Mary, queen of Scots, 318.
Masistius, a Persian general, killed, 480.
Mason, John, Captain, at the battle of Pequot Hill, 473.
Mason, Captain, at the battle of Molino del Rey, 385.
Mason, Captain, at the battle of Rivas, 528.
Massacres, of Abydos, 7; of Agrigentum, 14; of Ai, 14; of Alexandria, 16; of Antioch, 27; of Athens, 27; of the Alamo, 560; of Bagdad, 81; of Berwick, 104; of London, 106; of Bolougne, 120; of Byzantium, 140; of Caen, 141; of Carthage, 154; of Caxamalca, 160; of the two hundred virgins, 17; of Cherry Valley, 179; of Cholet, 183; of Constantinople, 195; of Corinth, 197; of Tobopeka, 207; of Cremona, 208; after the battle of Culloden, 211; of 8000 citizens of Dinant, 226; of the garrison of Drogheda, 229; of Dundee, 230; of Fort Carolina, 247; of Major Dade and his troops in Florida, 247; of the Americans in Frenchtown, 256; of Fort Mimms, 249; of Gaza, by order of Alexander, 260; of the Protestants at Harlem, 268; of the English at Gundamuck, 268; of Hymera, 283; of Ispahan, 286; of the Turks at Jaffa, by order of Napoleon, 290; of the Assyrians at Jerusalem, 295; of Jerusalem, 296; of the Jews, by Herod the Great, 296; of the Jews who had swallowed gold, 298; of the Saracens in Jerusalem, 308; of the English at Khurd Kabool, 313; of Liege, 332; of Lincoln, 334; of the Saracens in Lisbon, 335; of Lyons, 349; of Maestricht, 350; of Mans, 357; of the Mexican nobles by Alvarado, 367; of the Mexicans by Cortez, 381; of the inhabitants of Naples, 402; of the Christians in Jerusalem, 500; of Ismail, 286; of Tunis, 653; of the Americans at Paoli, 470; of the Americans at Fort Griswold, 511; of the Huns in Orleans, 429; of the French in Palmero, commonly called the "Sicilian Vespers," 435; of Palmyra, 438; of St. Bartholomew, 444; of the Indians at Pequot Hill, 474; of the Scots after the battle of Pinkey, 479; of the Persians after the battle of Platæa, 481; of the Plataeans after the surrender of Platæa, 484; of Rebastens, 508; of the Roman senators by the Gauls, 535; of the Gauls in Rome, 535; of the Romans, 537; of the Mexicans, 561; of Schenectady, 566; of Selinuntum, 569; of Stockholm, 598; of the Sybarites, 603; of the Macedonians, 621; of Toulon, 636; of the Lancasterians, after the battle of Towton, 643; of Tyre, 655; of Cholula, 661; of the Poles, 681; of Colonel Buford's men at Waxhaw, 693; of Wyoming, 705.
Massena, Marshal, at the battle of Almeida, 28; of Arcola, 51; of Asperne, 56; of Bassano, 84; of Busaco, 139; of Caldiero, 147; of Castiglione, 157; at the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, 184; at the battle of Loano, 336; of Montenotte, 390; of Mucita, 400; of Rivoli, 530; created Duke of Rivoli, ibid.; at the battle of Stockach, 597; of Zurich, 714.
Massigli, General, at the siege of Belgrade, 95; killed, 96.
Mathias, son of Theophilus, Pope, 297.
Mathas, a seditious Carthaginian general, at Troyes, 649; his death, 650.
Matilda, daughter of Henry VI., 333.
Matthew, of Montmorency, at the siege of Constantinople, 188.
Matthews, General, at the siege of Fort Washington, 254; at the battle of Germantown, 262.
Maubourg, Latour, at the battle of Bautzen, 86; of Dresden, 226; of Friedland, 258; of Leipsic, 320; wounded, 321.
Maule, Sir Thomas, slain, 126.
Maurice, Prince, 107.
Maurice, General, at the battle of the Tchernaya, 578.
Mausoleum, origin of the word, 515.
Mausolus, king of Caria, subdues Rhodes, 515; his death, and the splendid monument erected to his memory by his widow, ibid.
Mawhood, Colonel, at the battle of Princeton, 488.
Maxentius, defeated by Constantine, 654.
Maximilian, Emanuel, elector of Bavaria, at the siege of Vienna, 677.
Maximilian, Count of Staremburg, at the siege of Belgrade, 97.
Maximian, Hercules, at the siege of Marseilles, 362.
Maximus, Emperor of the West, his death, 46.
Maxwell, William, 124; at the battle of Monmouth, 387.
May, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the battle of Buena Vista, 132; at the siege of Monterey, 392; his gallant charge at Resaca de la Palma, 514.
Mayence, General, defeated at Aret, 26.
Mayenne, Duke de, at the siege of Paris, 445.
Mayrau, General, killed at the siege of Sevastopol, 576.
Mazens, a Persian general, at Arbela, 48.
Mazeppa, General, at the battle of Pultowa, 493.
Meade, Lieutenant, at the siege of Monterey, 392.
Meander, an Athenian officer, at the siege of Syracuse, 608.
Mechlin, Lords of, at the battle of Rannsbeck, 510.
Mechlenberg Strelitz, Prince, killed at the battle of Lutzen, 256.
Medes, at the siege of Babylon, 71; at the battle of Chæronea, 168; of Halys, 269; of Ragan, 508.
Medinaceli, a Spanish commander, at the battle of Jerba, 294.
Medino, Duke of, 141.
Meeks, Lieutenant, at the siege of Fort Stephenson, 253.
Meerfeld, General, at the battle of Leipsic, 321; of Stockach, 597.
Megrel, a French engineer, at the siege of Frederickshald, 54.
Meigs, Colonel, at the storming of Stony Point, 599.
Melac, General, his cruelty at Heidelburg, 273.
Melas, General, at the battle of the Adda, 12; of Marengo, 359; of Novi, 425; of the Trebia, 644.
Mellinet, General, wounded at the storming of the Malakoff, 580.
Mellobrandes, at the battle of Argentaria, 52.
Melon, Viscount de, the "Carpenter," 29, 86.
Menelaus, king of Sparta, chosen husband by Helena of Troy, 649.
Menon, General, at the battle of Buena Vista, 134.
Menon, of Thessaly, 211; his death, 216.
Mentas, Sir Peter, at the battle of Pinkey, 479.
Menzikoff, Prince, at the battle of Pultowa, 491.
Mercer, Hugh, General, at the battle of Trenton, 646; of Princeton, 487; killed, 488.
Mercer, Colonel, at Oswego, 433; killed, 434.
Mercer, Fort, 512.
Merci, General, at the siege of Belgrade, 97.
Merle, General, at the battle of Corunna, 200.
Mermet, General, at the battle of Corunna, 200.
Merle, General, killed at the battle of Busaco, 139.
Meseballs, a eunuch, anecdote of, 214.
Metellus, consul of Rome, 196.
Metezan, Louis, at the siege of La Rochelle, 532.
Methuen, Chevalier, at the siege of Turin, 655.
Metsko, General, killed at the battle of Dresden, 228.
Mexicans, at the battle of Buena Vista, 131; of Ceutla, 165; of Cerro Gordo, 165; of Chapultepec, 171; of Contreras, 198; of Huamantla, 28; at the siege of Mexico, 366; of Molino del Rey, 385; at the siege of Monterey, 391; at the battle of Otumba, 427; of Palo Alto, 439; of Puenta Nacionale, 490; of Resaca de la Palma, 513; of Fort Brown, 515; of San Jacinto, 559; at the siege of Vera Cruz, 672.
Mexico, description of the ancient city of, 366.
Mifflin, Fort, 512.
Migrel, M., anecdote of, 255.
Miguel, Don, his cause favored by the inhabitants of Oporto, 428.
Milanese, at the battle of Cassano, 155; of Fornovo, 246.
Milardowitch, General, at the battle of Bautzen, 86; of Novi, 425; of Krasnoi, 387.
Miles, Colonel, at the battle of Long Island, 128.
Miller, Colonel, at the siege of Fort Erie, 248; of Fort Meigs, 249; at the battle of Niagara, 414.
Miller, Captain, at the siege of Monterey, 391.
Milo, the Crotonian, at the siege of Sybaris, 603.
Millard, Henry, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the battle of San Jacinto, 560.
Miltiades, in command of the Greeks, at the battle of Marathon, 358.
Miltocythes, the Thracian, surrenders himself to the king of Persia, 215.
Mindarus, slain at the battle of Cyzicum, 220.
Mines, invented by Peter of Navarre, 408; a method of detecting, invented by De Martinegere, 522.
Minercius, killed at the battle of Cannæ, 148.

Mingetodt, Colonel, killed at the battle of Red Bank, 513.
Miomandre, M., wounded in Paris, 459.
Mirabeau, Count de, takes part in the French Revolution of 1798, 458.
Miranden, General, at the battle of Neerwinden, 409.
Mitchell, Colonel, at Oswego, 434.
Mithridates, king of Pontus, 63; at the battle of Zela, 713.
Mitrouski, General, at the battle of Arcola, 51.
Moawinyah, adherents of, at the battles of Seefin, 568.
Mohammed, 16; at the siege of Kaibar, 312, poisoned by Zainab, ibid.
Molitor, General, 57; at the battle of Moeskirch, 384.
Moissac, a French cornet, his heroism, 669.
Mokun, William, 333.
Moncey, General, at the battle of Sieta Agnas, 585.
Moncrief, Colonel, at Charleston, 173; at Savannah, 564.
Monckton, Colonel, killed at the battle of Monmouth, 389.
Monckton, General, shot at Quebec, 503.
Mondragon, General, at the siege of Antwerp, 41.
Monestier, a French officer, his death, 669.
Monk, General, takes the city of Berwick, 104, at Dundee, 230.
Monier, General, at the battle of Marengo, 360.
Monroe, James, wounded at the battle of Trenton, 647.
Monroe, Major, at the battle of Buena Vista, 134.
Monmouth, Duke of, son of Charles II., at the battle of Bothwell, 119; assumes to the throne of England, 567; made prisoner at the battle of Sedgemoor, 567; his execution, ibid.
Monsel, Philip, made prisoner, 531.
Montague, Archbishop of Sens, his character, 442.
Montaign, General, at the battle of Charleroi, 172.
Montalivet, in Paris, 464.
Montbrun, General, at the battle of Borodino, 110, killed, 111; at the battle of Raab, 508.
Montcalm, Marquis de, at Oswego, 433; at the battle of Montmorenci, 502; killed at Quebec, 503; at Ticonderoga, 630.
Montecuculi, General, at the siege of Belgrade, 97.
Montemarle, M., takes part in the French Revolution of 1830, 468.
Montespan, the mistress of Louis XIV., 640,
Montesquieu, the murderer of the Prince of Condé, 291.
Montezuma, emperor of Mexico, subdued by Cortez, 161; his death, 369.
Montluc, a young French officer, his gallant conduct at the siege of Marseilles, 362.
Montferrat, Marquis de, at the siege of Constantinople, 188; made prisoner at the battle of Tiberias, 661.
Montfort, Simon, Earl of Leicester, his character, 637; a leader of the Crusade against the Albigeois, ibid.; defeats Count of Toulouse, ibid.; his disgraceful death, 637.
Montfort, Simon, Earl of Leicester, son of the above, gains the battle of Lewes, 328; killed at the battle of Evesham, 240.
Montfort, Guy de, son of the Earl of Leicester, at the battle of Lewes, 328.
Montfort, Henri de, 328.
Montgomery, at the battle of Hastings, 272.
Montgomery, Richard, General, at the siege of Louisburg, 341, at the siege of Quebec, 505; killed, 506.
Montgomery, Major, killed at Fort Griswold, 411.
Montigny, Captain, 45.
Montmorency, Constable of France, made prisoner at the battle of Dreux, 229; at the battle of St. Quintin, 554; wounded and made prisoner, 555.
Montpelier, William de, at the siege of Jerusalem, 302.
Montpensier, Duke de, made prisoner at the battle of St. Quintin, 555.
Montrose, Marquis de, 19; at the battle of Selkirk, 569.
Moore, James, Colonel, at the battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 396.
Moore, James, Captain, at the battle of Princeton, 489.
Moore, John, Colonel, at the battle of Ramsour's Mills, 509.
Moore, Major, killed at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 115.
Moore, Sir John, killed at the battle of Corunna, 201.
Moors, at the siege of Baza, 90; of Granada, 264, at the battle of Merida, 365; at the siege of Moxacar, 400, at the battle of Navas de Tolosa, 408; at the siege of Ronda, 543, of Saragossa, 562; of Toledo, 633; of Tortosa, 634; of Tunis, 650; at the battle of Zamora, 713.
Mora, President of Costa Rica, 527.
Morales, General, governor of the garrison of Vera Cruz, 674.
Morand, General, at the battle of Auerstadt, 66.
Moreau, General, defeated by Suwarrow, 19; at the battle of Cannstadt, 149; of Dresden, 227; killed, 228; at the battle of Engen, 237; of Moeskirch, 384; of Novi, 425; of Permasin, 473; of Renchen, 513.
Moreno, Colonel, at the siege of Monterey, 394.
Moret, General, wounded, 557.
Morgan, Captain, an English officer at the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom, 101
Morgan, Major-General, at the siege of Dundalk, 230, at the battle of Dunkirk, 231
Morgan, Daniel, General, at the battle of the Cowpens, 201; of Monmouth, 387; of Stillwater, 589, at the siege of Quebec, 505, made prisoner, 506.
Morgan, General, at the battle of New Orleans, 411.
Morland, General, at the battle of Borodino, 109.
Morlot, General, at the battle of Charleroi, 173.
Morris, Major, killed at the battle of Princeton, 489.
Morris, Captain, of the British ship Bristol, wounded, 174.
Morrison, Colonel, at the battle of Chrystler's Fields, 138.
Morrison, Major, at the battle of Buena Vista, 134.
Mortier, General, at the siege of Badajoz, 75, at the battle of Bautzen, 89; of Brienne, 130; of Friedland, 257; of Heilsberg, 273; of Leipsic, 322; of Lutzen, 346; at Moscow, 355; at the battle of Muolta, 400; of Paris, 464, of Saragossa, 562.
Mortimer, Roger, his barbarous treatment of the body of Simon de Montfort, 240.
Mosa, an officer of Cortez, at the battle of Centla, 166.
Moses, the Prophet, 513.
Mosquito Fleet, the, 673.
Motterouge, General, at the storming of the Malakoff, 579.
Moulac, anecdote of, 508.
Moulder, William, Captain, at the battle of Princeton, 489.
Mourad Bey, at the battle of the Pyramids, 497.
Mouravieff, General, at the siege of Kars, 312.
Moultrie, Fort, 174.
Moultrie, William, Colonel, his gallant defense of Fort Moultrie, 174.
Mourzoufle, the assassin of Alexius, 19.
Mouthoion, General, killed at the battle of Asperne, 59.
Mowbray, Philip de, surrenders the Castle of Stirling, 83.
Muhlenburg, General, at the storming of Stony Point, 599.
Muley-Hassan, king of Tunis, implores the aid of Charles V., against Barbarossa, 563; at the siege of Tunis, ibid.
Mulgrave, Lord, at the siege of Toulon, 635.
Mummius, appointed Consul of Rome, 196; at the siege of Corinth, 197.
Muiron, Napoleon's side-de-camp, killed, 51.
Murena, an officer of Sylla, at the battle of Chæronea, 168.
Murat, Marshal, at the battle of Austerlitz, 68; of Aboukir, 1; of Borodino, 107; of Castalla, 156; of Dresden, 228; of Eylau, 241; of Friedland, 256; of Heilsberg, 273; of Leipsic, 320; of Mount Tabor, 399; of Ostrovno, 433; of Krasnoi, 585; of Smolensko, 586.
Murfey, Major, at the storming of Stony Point, 599.
Murray, Captain, at the siege of Londonderry, 338.
Murray, Earl of, Regent of Scotland, 318.
Murray, General, at the battle of Montmorenci, 502.
Murillo, General, at the battle of the Pyrenees, 500.
Murviedro, the ancient Saguntum, 545.
Musgrave, in command of the English at the battle of Solway Moss, 588.
Musgrave, Colonel, at the battle of Germantown, 261.
Mustapha, a general of Soliman the Magnificent, his valor at the siege of Rhodes, 522; ordered to be shot by Soliman, 523.
Mustapha, Kara, Grand Vizier, at the siege of Vienna, 675.
Mustapha, a dog, anecdote of, 246.
Mutius, Scævola, his heroic conduct when put to the torture, 534.

N.

Nansouty, General, at the battle of Borodino, 110; of Friedland, 258; of Hanau, 270, of Leipsic, 324.
Napier, Sir William, his history of the Peninsular War, 562.
Napier, Major, leads the storming party at the siege of Cindad Rodrigo, 185; killed, 186.

Napoleon Bonaparte, at the battle of Abensburg, 1; of Aboukir, 1; at the siege of St. Jean d' Acre, 9; of Alexandria, 18; his expedition into Egypt, 19; at the battle of Arcis-sur-Aube, 49; his heroic conduct, 51; at the battles of Asperne and Essling, 56, his interview with Marshal Launes, 61, at the battle of Austerlitz, 68, his massacre of the fugitives after that battle, 69, at the battle of Bassano, 84, of Bautzen, 86; his imminent peril, 88; orders a monument to be erected to the memory of Duroc, 90, at the passage of the Berisina, 101; at the battle of Borodino, 107, of Brienne, 129; anecdote of, 130; at the battle of Castiglione, 137; of Dresden, 228, of Eckmuhl, 282; of Eylau, 241, of Friedland, 256, of Hanau, 269; in imminent peril, 270; at the battle of Heliopolis, 273; of Heilsburg, 274, at Jaffa, 290; at the battle of Jena, 293; of Laon, 318; of Leipsic, 320, of Ligny, 688; of Lodi, 337; of Lonato, 341; his letter of consolation to the wife of Marshal Bessieres, 344; at the battle of Lutzen, 344; at the siege of Mantua, 357; at the battle of Marengo, 359, of Mondovi, 387; of Montebello, 390; of Montereau (Fontainebleau), 391, of Montmirail, 396; of Mount Tabor, 399; at Fontainebleau, 464; deposed, 464; his return from Elba, 464; at the siege of Pavia, 472, causes the sword of Francis I. to be restored, 472, at the battle of the Pyramids, 497; at the siege of Ratisbon, 510; wounded, 511, at the battle of Rheims, 515; of Rivoli, 530; at Rome, 542; at Smolensko, 585; sent to St. Helena, 465; at the siege of Toulon (where he first distinguished himself), 635; at the battle of Waterloo, 691.

Narses, 540; at the battle of Tagina, 616.

Narvaez, sent by Velasquez, to Mexico, to seize Cortez as a rebel, 161; defeated by Cortez, 161; wounded and made prisoner, 162.

National Badge of France insulted, 456.

Natzmar, Don Bruno, Colonel, at the battle of Rivas, 527.

Neal, Captain, killed at the battle of Princeton, 489.

Neboplassar, revolts against the Assyrian king, 417.

Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, 71; at the siege of Jerusalem, 295; at the battle of Ragan, 508.

Neckar, M., 448, 449, 450.

Negropont, Baliiff of, one of the knights of Malta, killed, 357.

Negroes, heroism of, 417.

Nehemiah, rebuilds fortifications of Jerusalem, 296.

Nelson, Thomas, Governor of Virginia, at the siege of Yorktown, 709; his valor and patriotism, 710.

Nemours, Duke de, at the siege of Paris, 446.

Nepos, emperor of the West, abandons his throne, 470.

Neriglissir, king of Babylon, engages in a war with the Medes and Persians, 625, killed, 626.

Nero, emperor of Rome, 296.

Nero, C. Claudius, Consul of Rome, at the battle of the Metaurus, 409.

Nestorius, a Roman soldier, anecdote of, 27.

Nevers, Count of, slain at the battle of Azincour, 70.

Nevers, Duke of, son of Louis IX., his death, 651.

Nevers, Count de, his rashness at the battle of Nicopolis, 416.

Newerofskoi, General, at the battle of Borodino, 109; of Krasnoi, 586; of Smolensko, 586.

Newmarsh, Major, at the battle of the Cowpens, 202.

Ney, Marshal, 49, 86; at the battle of Borodino, 109; of Brienne, 130; of Busaco, 139; erects monument over the remains of Sir John Moore, 201; at the battle of Dennewitz, 224; of Dresden, 226; of Eylau, 241; of Friedland, 257; of Heilsburg, 273; of Hohenlinden, 278; of Jena, 293; of Kowno, 317; of Mockern, 321; of Lutzen, 344; of Krasnoi, 585, of Smolensko, 586; of Quatre Bras, 689; of Waterloo, 691.

Nicanor, a Macedonian general, at the battle of Issus, 288; killed, 281.

Nicaragua, sketch of Walker's expedition into, 525.

Nicetas, the historian, 191.

Nicholas, emperor of Russia, 681.

Nicholls, Colonel, at Fort Boyer, 247.

Nichols, Colonel, at the battle of Bennington Heights, 100.

Nicias, the Athenian general, at the siege of Syracuse, 603; his celebrated despatch from Syracuse to Athens, 607; made prisoner, 612; his death, 613.

Nicias, son of Nicerotus, at the battle of Solygia, 588.

Nicurches, an Arcadian, killed by the Persians, 215

Nief, General, at the storming of the Malakoff, 580.

Niel, General, at the storming of the Malakoff, 573.

Night of the Sacrifices, in Paris, 454.

Nightingale, Florence, Miss, 572.

Niketie, General, at the battle of Brienne, 130.

Ninus I., king of Assyria, at the siege of Bactra, 74.

Ninus II., at the siege of Nineveh, 417

Nitocris, mother of Belshazzar, king of Babylon, 73.

Nixon, General, at the battle of Stillwater, 595.

Noailles, Marshal, at the battle of Dittengen, 225.

Nochte Tiste, 373.

Norfolk, Duke of, slain, 119.

Noricaemes, Seigneur de, at the siege of Valenciennes, 667.

Normand, Captain, at the siege of La Rochelle, 532.

Normandy, Duke of, 27, 302.

Normans, at the battle of Hastings, 271, at the siege of Nantes, 401; at Palermo, 435; at Paris, 441; at Rouen, 543; at Troyes, 649.

Northampton, Marquis of, defeated by Ket the Tanner, 313.

Northmen, the, take the city of Boulogne, 120, their battles on the Western continent, 418.

Northumberland, Earl of, at the battle of St. Albans, 547; of Shrewsbury, 584; of Towton, 642, slain, 642.

Nostitz, Count, at the battle of Leipsic, 320.

Nothilda, wife of Richard the Lion Heart, 363.

Nott, General, at the battle of Ghuznee, 202.

Noyer, Miles de, at the siege of Cassel, 156.

Nuaroff, General, at the battle of Friedland, 257

Numidians, at Agrigentum, 13; at the battle of Cannæ, 148; at Carthage, 149, at the battle of the Trebia, 642; at Utica, 665; at the battle of Zama, 712.

Nuns, 193; murdered at St. Jean d'Acre, 13.

O.

Oak of Reformation, 313.

O'Brien, Captain, at the battle of Buena Vista, 183.

Octavius, at the battle of Philippi, 476.

Odenathus, king of Palmyra assassinated, 436.

Odoacer, king of the Heruli, reduces the Empire of the West, 479; his valorous defense of Ravenna, 511; his death, ibid.

O'Donnell, Carlos, Don, General, at the battle of the Pyrenees, 498; at the siege of Saguntum, 547

Odyssus, at the battle of Thermopylæ, 623.

Œdipus, king of Thebes, 621.

Ogden, Amos, Captain, 702.

Ogden, Nathan, brother of Amos Ogden, 703.

Ogilvie, Captain, at the battle of Queenstown, 507.

O'Hara, General, at the battle of Cowan's Ford, 201, of Guilford, 207; wounded, 208.

O'Hara, General, at the siege of Toulon, 634; wounded, 635.

Oil, Boiling, 9, 302, 429.

Oise, son of Hengrist, at the battle of Crayford, 203.

Olid, Christoval de, an officer of Cortez, 162, 375.

Olivenza, fortress of, 75.

Olsoofief, General, at the battle of Brienne, 129; of Montmirail, 396.

Olympia, Temple of, at Syracuse, 604.

Olympiodorus, at the battle of Platæa, 480.

Omar, Caliph, 27; at the siege of Jerusalem, 300.

Omar Pachia, at the battle of the Ingour, 283; of Oltenitza, 427.

O'Neil, Major, at the battle of Rivas, 527.

Oracle of Delphi, 62.

Orange, Prince of, at the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom, 103.

Ordaz, Diego de, an officer of Cortez, 166, 374.

Ordnance, see Artillery.

O'Regan, Captain, 122.

Orestes, 470.

Orlando Furioso, and Innamorato, 543.

Orleans, Duke of, at the siege of Turin, 654.

Orleans, Maid of, see Joan

Ornano, General, at the battle of Borodino, 110.

Orthes, battle of, 93.

Osma, Bishop of, intercedes with Charles V. for Francis I., 472.

Ossuary, the, a monument of bones at Morat, 396.

Ostermann, Tolstoy, Count, at the battle of Eylau, 241, of Kulm, 317; of Ostrovno, 433; of Pultusk, 495.

Otho, emperor of Germany, his heroism at the battle of Bouvines, 120.

Ostrogoths, foundation of the kingdom of in Italy, 511.

Oswald, Eleazar, Colonel, at the battle of Monmouth, 388.

Ott, General, at the battle of the Adda, 11, of Marengo, 359; of Montebello, 390; of Novi, 424, of the Trebia, 644, of Tuscoing, 655.

Oudinot, Marshal, 15; at the battle of Bar-sur-Aube, 84; at the passage of the Beresina, 101; at the battle of Bautzen, 86; of Brienne, 130; of Friedland, 259; of Leipsic, 320; of Lutzen, 344; of Montereau, 391.

Ouvaroff, General, at the battle of Borodino, 110.
Ovalle, General, at the battle of Sieta Agnas, 585.
Oxathres, brother of Darius, king of Persia, at the battle of Issus, 289.
Oxen, 55, 538.

P.

Pack, General, at the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, 185; at the battle of Salamanca, 557.
Packenham, Sir Edward, at the battle of New Orleans, 412; killed, 413.
Packenham, General, at the battle of Salamanca, 558.
Page, Captain, mortally wounded at the battle of Palo Alto, 439.
Pager, General, at the battle of Corunna, 200.
Pahlen, General, 50; at the battle of Brienne, 129.
Palæologus, Constantine, emperor of Constantinople, 193.
Palæologus, Michael, 193.
Palafax, General, at Saragossa, 562.
Palfi, Marshal, at the siege of Belgrade, 96.
Palmyra, destruction of, 438.
Pancratius, the Armenian, at the siege of Edessa, 234.
Pantithea, wife of Abradates, 627.
Pappenheim, Count, at the battle of Leipsic, 318; of Lutzen, 342; killed, 343.
Paris, or Alexander, son of Priam, abducts Helen of Troy, 649.
Paris, University of, 198.
Paris, Colonel, at the battle of Oriskany, 256.
Parker, Hyde, Commodore, 175, 563.
Parker, Sir Peter, Admiral, 173.
Parma, Prince of, at the siege of Antwerp, 40; of Bergen-op-Zoom, 103; of Maestricht, 350; of Tournai, 639.
Parmenio, a general of Alexander the Great, at the battle of Arbela, 43; of Issus, 289; of the Granicus, 265.
Partonneaux, General, 101.
Paskiewitch, General, at the battle of Borodino, 110; in command of the Russian army in Poland, 684.
Pasitilidas, governor of Torone, made prisoner, 634.
Patterson, General, at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 114; of Stillwater, 589.
Patterson, General, at the siege of Vera Cruz, 672.
Paul of Cilicia, his gallant conduct, 540.
Paul IV., Pope, at war with Philip II., 553; troops of at the siege of Naples, 403.
Paulinus, the Roman general, defeats Boadicea, queen of the Iceni, 106.
Pausanius, the Grecian general, at the battle of Platæa, 480.
Pavia, Aimeny de, his treachery, 144.
Paysieux, Colonel de, his conduct at the siege of Paris, 441.
Pearce, Colonel, at the capture of York, 707.
Peck, General, at the battle of Busaco, 139.
Pedregal, the, in Mexico, 198.
Pedro, Don, of Arragon, at the siege of Messina, 368.
Peel, Captain, wounded at the siege of Sevastopol, 576.
Pegion, General, made prisoner at the battle of Lonato, 341.
Pekah, king of Israel, at the siege of Jerusalem, 295.
Pelet, Raymond, at the siege of Jerusalem, 307.
Pelissier, General, at the siege of Sevastopol, 573; at the storming of the Malakoff, 574.
Pellefort, Marquis de, killed at the storming of the Bastile, 452.
Pelopidas, the Theban, at the battle of Tegyræ, 326; in command of the Sacred Band, at the battle of Leuctra, 327; at the siege of Thebes, 327.
Peloponnesian War, commencement of the, 481.
Pembroke, Earl of, at the battle of St. Quintin, 554.
Pembroke, Marshal of England, at the battle of Lincoln, 334.
Pencader, skirmish at, 124.
Penn, Richard, governor of Pennsylvania, 703.
Penn, William, 702.
Pennefeather, General, at the battle of the Alma, 24.
Perche, Count de, killed at the battle of Lincoln, 335.
Percy Lord (Hotspur), see Piercy.
Percy, Lord, 127; at the siege of Fort Washington, 254; at the battle of Harlem Heights, 694; of White Plains, 696.
Peri, a lieutenant of Soliman II., at the siege of Rhodes, 521.
Perigord, Cardinal de, endeavors to prevent the battle of Poictiers, 486.
Perry, Commodore, co-operates with General Scott in the siege of Vera Cruz, 673.
Persians, at the siege of Alexandria, 16; of Antioch, 26; at the battle of Arbela, 47; of Artimisium 55; at the siege of Athens, 62; of Babylon, 72; of Bagdad, 81; of Bedlis, 95; at the battle of Byblos, 139; of Cunaxa, 212; at the siege of Edessa, 233; at the battle of the Granicus, 265; of Issus, 287; at the siege of Jerusalem, 300; at the battle of Marathon, 358; of Nehawund, 409; of Platæa, 480; of Sardis, 562; of Thymbra, 625; of Thermopylæ, 622.
Peruvians, at the battle of Ayacucho, 69; at the siege of Cuzco, 216; at the battle of Guamanza, 266.
Pescara, Marquis de, at the siege of Marseilles, 362; of Pavia, 471.
Peterborough, Earl of, at the siege of Barcelona, 84.
Peter the Cruel, at the battle of Naxera, 408.
Peter the Great, emperor of Russia, at the battle of Narva, 404; of Pultowa, 491; his elation after the defeat of Charles XII., 494.
Peter the Hermit, his conduct at the siege of Antioch, 29; sent to the camp of the Saracens, and unsuccessfully exhorts them to peace, 37; urges the Crusaders to battle, 38; his conduct at the siege of Jerusalem, 305.
Peter of Navarre, the inventor of mines, at the siege of Naples, 403.
Peyronney, Captain, killed at the battle of Fort du Quesne, 123.
Phamoeas, a Carthaginian, 150.
Pharaoh and his hosts destroyed in the Red Sea, 513.
Pharnabazus, a Peloponnesian general, at the battle of Cyzicum, 220.
Pharnaces, at the battle of Zela, 713; his death, 714.
Philibert Emanuel, Duke of Savoy, at the battle of St. Quintin, 554.
Philidas, a Theban, at the siege of Thebes, 621.
Philip I., king of France, his heroic conduct at the battle of Bouvines, 120.
Philip II., Augustus, of France, at the siege of St. Jean d' Acre, 8; at the battle of Freteval, 256; of Gisors, 264; at Lisieux, 336.
Philip II., of Spain, 444; at war with Pope Paul IV., 553; endeavors to introduce the Inquisition into Flanders, 667.
Philip III., of France, at the siege of Tunis, 652.
Philip IV., of France, his measures to meet the invasion of France by the English, 141; advances to the relief of Calais, 143; his death, 640.
Philip VI., of France, at the siege of Cassel, 155; at the battle of Cressy, 203; at the siege of Tournai, 638.
Philip of Macedon, 220; at the siege of Abydos, 6; of Byzantium, 140; of Chæronea, 167; at the battle of Cynoscephalæ, 221; at Thebes, 621.
Philip, son of John II. of France, at the battle of Poictiers, 486.
Philip the Bold, his death, 474.
Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, at the siege of Dinant, 226; at the siege of Mons, 389.
Philip, a Spartan governor of Thebes, killed, 621.
Philip, an Indian king, 602.
Philippa, queen of Edward III., raises an army to repulse David of Scotland, 232.
Phillipon, General, his heroic defense of Badajoz, 77.
Philips, Major-General, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 589.
Philopœmen, at the battle of Selasia, 568.
Philotas, a general of Alexander the Great, 621.
Photis, his conduct at the siege of Antioch, 32.
Phocion, an Athenian, at Byzantium, 140.
Phraortes, king of Media, defeated at the battle of Ragan, 507; his death, 508.
Pichegru, General, at the siege of Manheim, 357; of Tournai, 640.
Pickens, Andrew, Colonel, at the battle of the Cowpens, 202.
Picton, General, at the siege of Badajoz, 77; wounded, 80; at the battle of Orthes, 93; of Busaco, 139; of the Pyrences, 499; of Quatre Bras, 690; wounded, 691; at the battle of Waterloo, 691; killed, ibid.
Picts, at the battle of the Grampian Hills, 264.
Pierce, Franklin, General, at the battle of Cherubusco, 180.
Piercy, Harry (Hotspur), at the battle of Otterburn, 434; made prisoner, 435; at the battle of Shrewsbury, 533; killed, 584.
Piercy, Sir Robert, at the battle of Bosworth, 118; killed, 119.

Pigeons, carrier, employed at the siege of St. Jean d'Acre, 9.
Pigot, General, in command of the British at Bunker's Hill, 144; at the battle of Quaker Hill, 504.
Pike, Captain, at the battle of Buena Vista, 133.
Pike, General, at the capture of York, 706; killed, 707.
Pillow, General, at the battle of Cerro Gordo, 164; of Chapultepec, 170; wounded, 171; at the battle of Contreras, 199; at the siege of Vera Cruz, 672.
Pinkney, Charles Cotesworth, in command of Fort Moultrie, 176.
Pipee, Count, at the battle of Pultowa, 492.
Pio, Ludivico, at the siege of Barcelona, 84.
Piso, Calpurnius, Consul of Rome, at the siege of Carthage, 151.
Pitcairn, Major, in command of the British at the battles of Concord and Lexington, 329; at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 115; killed, 116.
Pitt, William, the British statesman, 501.
Pius VI., Pope, 542.
Pizarro, Francisco, his invasion of Peru, 159; his conduct toward the Inca Athuallpa, 160; at the battle of Caxamalca, 160; wounded, 161; at the battle of Puna, 496.
Pizarro, Juan, brother of Francisco, 217, 219, 220.
Pizarro, Hernando, brother of Francisco, at the siege of Cuzco, 220.
Plagues, of Leyden, 332; of Jerusalem, 295; of Rome, 537; of Syracuse, 613, 616; of Tunis, 651.
Platæa, destruction of, 484.
Plato, Jean Baptiste, the famous engineer, 42.
Platoff, General, at the battle of Eylau, 241.
Plunkett, Colonel, 703.
Poison, used at the siege of Ravenna, by Belisarius, 511.
Poland, account of the Revolutions in, 681.
Pole, Lord, brother of the Earl of Suffolk, at the siege of Orleans, 430.
Pole, Richard de la, at the siege of Pavia, 471.
Poles, at the battle of Barranow, 84; of Czenstochow, 222; of Grochow, 266; of Kalisk, 312; of Novi; 424; of Ostrolenka, 433; of Praga, 488; of Pultowa, 493; at the siege of Vienna, 677; of Warsaw, 681; at the battle of Wilna, 696.
Polignac, Prince, his conduct during the French Revolution of 1830, 467.
Polk, Colonel, at the battle of Eutaw Springs, 239.
Poltrot, a Calvinist, assassinates the Duke of Guise, 432.
Polynices, son of Œdipus, king of Thebes, slain in single combat, 621.
Polysemidos, his victory over the Romans, 8.
Polytechnic School of Paris, take part in the French Revolution of 1830, 466.
Pomeroy, General, at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 114.
Pompeius, Sextus, 478.
Pompey the Great, 362; at the siege of Calagurris, 143; of Jerusalem, 296; at the battle of Munda, 400; of Pharsalia, 474; his death, 476.
Pompey, a negro spy, at the storming of Stony Point, 599.
Poniatowsky, Prince at the battle of Borodino, 108; of Leipsic, 230; killed, 325.
Poniatowsky, Prince, at the battle of Pultowa, 492.
Ponsonby, Sir William, at the battle of Waterloo, 691.
Ponteves, General de, at the storming of the Malakoff, 579; wounded, 580.
Pontius, Count of Tubali, at the siege of Tyre, 659.
Poor, General, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 589.
Pope, Lieutenant, at the siege of Monterey, 392.
Popham, Sir Home, at Buenos Ayres, 136.
Porcia, wife of Brutus, her death, 478.
Porsenna, king of Clusium, 533.
Porter, General, at the siege of Fort Erie, 248; of Fort George, 248; at the battle of Lundy's Lane, 414.
Porter, Major-General, at the battle of Marston Moor, 363.
Portraits of the kings of France, a chronological series of, destroyed, 442.
Portuguese, at the battle of Almeida, 25; at the siege of Badajoz, 75; at the battle of Bayonne, 90; at the siege of Burgos, 137; at the battle of Busaco, 139; at Ciudad Rodrigo, 185; at the battle of Frontierra, 279; at the siege of St. Sebastian, 552; at the battle of Salamanca, 556; of San Marcial, 561.
Porus, king of India, at the battle of the Hydaspes, 280; made prisoner, 281; his interview with Alexander the Great, 282.
Potemkin, Lieutenant-General, at the siege of Ismail, 284.
Pot Grenades, 607.
Potter, Colonel, killed at the battle of Princeton, 489.
Powell, Brigadier, at the battles of Stillwater, 589.
Praetiod, General, at the battle of Raab, 507.
Praslin, Marquis de, at the siege of Cremona, 208.
Prescott, William, Colonel, his heroism at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 113, 114.
Preston, Hon. S. T., his address at King's Mountain, quoted, 315.
Prevost, Augustine, General, 175, 176, 563, 564, 598.
Prevost, Sir George, in command of the British forces at the battle of Plattsburg, 484.
Prevost, Sir James, at the battle of Sackett's Harbor, 541.
Prevost, Lieutenant-Colonel, 126.
Priarius, king of the Germans, killed at the battle of Argentaria, 52.
Prideaux, General, 501; killed at Fort Niagara, 250.
Primus, a lieutenant of Vespasian, at the siege of Cremona, 208.
Prisch, General, at the battle of Leipsic, 323.
Proctor, General, at the siege of Fort Meigs, 249; at the battle of Frenchtown, 255; at the assault on Fort Stephenson, 252; at the battle of the Thames, 620.
Proserpine, temple of, at Syracuse, plundered by the Carthaginians, 613.
Protheus, governor of Thebes, 621.
Proxenus, at the battle of Thymbra, 211; killed by the Persians, 216.
Provera, General, at the battle of Arcola, 51.
Prussians, at the battle of Auerstadt, 64; of Bautzen, 85; of Weissig, 86; of Breslau, 126; of Brienne, 129; of Cunnersdorf, 216; of Dennewitz, 224; of Dresden, 226; of Friedberg, 251; of Halle, 269; of Hochkirchen, 277; of Jena, 292; of Kanth, 312; of Katzbach, 312; of Kulm, 317; of Laon, 318; of Leipsic, 320; of Ligny, 688; of Mockern, 322; of Lutzen, 344; of Malen, 365; of Molwitz, 386; of Montereau, 391; of Montmirail, 396; at the siege of Paris, 464; at the battle of Permasin, 473; of Pirna, 479; of Prague, 488; of Rossbach, 543; of Saalfield, 544; of Sagan, 545; of Schellendorf, 566; at the siege of Schweidnitz, 567; of Straslund, 601; of Thorn, 624; at Warsaw, 681; at the battle of Waterloo, 691; of Wavres, 693.
Psammetichus, at the siege of Azoth, 70.
Ptolemy I., king of Egypt, at the battle of Gaza, 259; of Issus, 259; of Raphia, 510.
Ptolemy XI., of Egypt, at the siege of Alexandria, 15; defeated by Cæsar, and drowned in crossing the Nile, 16.
Pulaski, Casimir, Count, at the siege of Charleston, 176; at the battle of Germantown, 262; at the siege of Savannah, 564; killed, 565.
Pulci, Count, his death, 541.
Punic War, the first, commenced, 366; origin of the second, 545; commencement of the third, 150.
Putnam, Israel, General, at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 127; at Brooklyn, 116.
Puy, Bishop of, at the siege of Antioch, 28, 30.
Pyle, Colonel, at the battle of the Haw, 273.
Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, at the siege of Lacedæmon, 318; of Argos, 52; his ignominious death, ibid.

Q.

Quailes, Captain, at the battle of Enochopes, 207.
Quasdanovitch, General, at the battle of Rivoli, 530.
Quitman, General, at the battle of Chapultepec, 171; at Mexico, 382; at the siege of Monterey, 382; of Vera Cruz, 672.
Qxtlilxochitt, Prince of Tezcuco, at the siege of Mexico, 378.

R.

Raeffskoi, General, at Smolensko, 586.
Raglan, Lord (Fitzroy Somerset), at the battles of the Pyrenees, 499; at the battle of the Alma, 22; at the siege of Sevastopol, 572; his death, 576.
Raieffsky, General, 49.
Rambard of Orange, at the siege of Jerusalem, 302.
Rajewskoi, General, at the battle of Borodino, 109.
Rall, Colonel, at the battle of White Plains, 695; of Fort Washington, 254; at the battle of Trenton, 646; killed, 647.
Raimbaud, General, killed, 10.
Ramiro II., at the siege of Zamora, 713.
Rampon, Colonel, at the battle of Alexandria, 18; of Montenotte, 390.
Ramsay, Colonel, at the battle of Monmouth, 388.
Ramsay, Captain, at the siege of Monterey, 392.

RAMSAY, Sir James, at Edgehill Fight, 235.
RANSOM, Lieutenant, at the battle of Contreras, 199; of Chapultepec, 170; killed, 171,
RANSOMS, of Caen, 141; of Athualipa, Inca of Peru, 161; of the prisoners at Antioch, 233; of Rome, 537; of the Carthaginians, 613; of the citizens of Toulon, 636.
RAPE of the Sabine women, 533.
RAPP, General, at the battle of Borodino, 109.
RATCLIFFE, Sir Richard, killed at the battle of Bosworth Field, 119.
RAWDON, Francis, Lord, at the battle of Camden, 147; of Hobkirk's Hill, 275.
RAWLING, Colonel, at the siege of Fort Washington, 254.
RAYMOND, of St. Giles, at the siege of Antioch, 28, 30, 38.
RAYMOND, of Toulouse, the Crusader, his heroism at the siege of Jerusalem, 302, 304.
RAYMOND, Count of Toulouse, besieged in Toulouse, 637; defeated and compelled to fly, ibid.; his death, 638.
READ, General, killed at the battle of the Tchernaya, 578.
REED, Colonel, at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 114; of Princeton, 488.
REGNIER, General, at the battle of Busaco, 139; of Heliopolis, 275; of Leipsic, 323; of the Pyramids, 497.
REGULUS, commander of the Roman army, made prisoner by the Carthaginians, 150.
REHOBOAM, son of David, at the siege of Jerusalem, 295.
REILLE, General, at the battles of the Pyrenees, 500; of Waterloo, 690.
RENE, of Anjou, at the siege of Naples, 402; of Nancy, 491.
RENSCHILD, General, at the battle of Pultowa, 491; made prisoner, 492.
RETREATS, of the Athenians from Syracuse, 393; of Napoleon from Moscow, 397; of the 10,000 Greeks, 403; of Charles XII. to Bender, 493.
REUSS, Prince of, at the battle of Hanau, 269.
REVEL, Count de, at the battle of Cremona, 208.
REYNOLDS, Lieutenant, at the battle of Buena Vista, 133.
REYNOLDS, Major, at the battle of New Orleans, 412.
REYNOLDS, a general of Cromwell, in Flanders, 231.
REZIN, king of Syria, at the siege of Jerusalem, 295.
RHODES, Captain, killed at the siege of St. Sebastian, 553.
RHODIANS, at the siege of Halicarnassus, 515; their obstinate defense of Rhodes, against Demetrius, 56.
RHESSACES, a Persian General, his encounter with Alexander the Great, at the battle of the Granicus, 265.
RIALL, General, at the battle of Chippewa, 181; in command of the British, at the battle of Niagara, 413.
RIBAS, Admiral, at the siege of Ismail, 284.
RIBEAUMONT, Sir Eustace de, his single combat with Sir Walter Many, 145, RICARD, General, at the battle of Leutzen, 346.
RICHARD I. (the Lion Hearted), in command of the Crusaders at the siege of St. Jean d' Acre, 8; at the battle of Gisors, 264.
RICHARD III., of England, concerned in the murder of the Prince of Wales, 620; at the battle of Tewkesbury, 619; the supposed murderer of Henry VI., 620; at the battle of Bosworth Field, 118; slain, 119.
RICHARDS, Colonel, 357.
RICHARDS, Lieutenant, at Algiers, 21.
RICHELIEU, Cardinal de, plans the siege of La Rochelle, 532.
RICHELIEU, Duke de, Colonel, at the siege of Ismail, 285.
RICHENPANSE, General, at the battle of Engen, 237; of Moeskirch, 385; of Hohenlinden, 277.
RIDGE, Colonel, killed at the siege of Badajoz, 80.
RIDGELY, Lieutenant, at the siege of Monterey, 393; at the battle of Palo Alto, 439; in command of Ringgold's battery at the battle of Resaca de la Palma, 514.
RIEDFESEL, Baron de, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 589; of Hubbarton, 280.
RIESCH, General, at the battle of Hohenlinden, 278.
RILEY, General, at the battle of Cerro Gordo, 164; of Contreras, 199.
RINGGOLD, Major, killed at the battle of Palo Alto, 439.
RINGS of gold, 149.
RIPLEY, Major, at the siege of Fort Erie, 247; at the battle of Niagara, 415; of Chippewa, 181.
RIVAS, President of Nicaragua, his abdication, 529.
RIVET, General, killed at the storming of the Malakoff, 579.
ROANE, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the battle of Buena Vista, 134.
ROBBINS, a Texan soldier, at the battle of San Jacinto, anecdote of, 560.
ROBERT, of Flanders, the Crusader, at the battle of Ascalon, 55; at the siege of Antioch, 28; of Jerusalem, 305.
ROBERT, of Normandy, the Crusader, at the battle of Ascalon, 55; at the siege of Antioch, 28, 29; of Jerusalem, 305.
ROBERT, Earl of Gloucester, 333.
ROBERTS, Colonel, at the siege of Savannah, 563.
ROBERTS, Colonel, at Fort Talladega, 206.
ROBESPIERRE, 463.
ROBINSON, General, wounded at the battle of Bayonne, 92.
ROCCA, Major, at the siege of Schweidnitz, 566.
ROCEAVINA, General, at the battle of Montenotte, 390; wounded, ibid.
ROCHAMBEAU, Count de, at the siege of Yorktown, 708.
ROCHE, General, at the battle of Castalla, 156.
ROCHELLOIS, the, their heroic defense of La Rochelle, 531.
ROCHEMBEAU, General, killed at the battle of Leipsic, 323.
ROCKETS, first used in war, 324.
RODZIWILL, General, at the battle of Grochow, 266.
ROGER, of St. Lary-Bellegrade, defeated disgracefully by women, 336.
ROGERS, Captain, at the battle of Buena Vista, 132.
ROGERS, Major, at the battle of Rivas, 528.
ROGUET, General, at the battle of Krasnoi, 587.
ROLAND, the brave knight of Charlemagne, killed at the battle of Roncesvalles, 543; his song sung by the troops of William at the battle of Hastings, 272.
ROMANS, at the siege of Agrigentum, 13; of Alexandria, 16; at the battle of Ambracia, 25; of Amisus, 26; at the siege of Antioch, 27; at the battle of Aquileia, 45; of Aradus, 47; of Argentaria, 52; at the siege of Argos, 52; of Athens, 63; defeat Queen Boadicea, 106; at the siege of Byzantium, 140; at the battle of Cannæ, 148; at the siege of Carthage, 149; of Carthagena, 154; at the battle of Chæronea, 168; of Chalons, 169; at the siege of Constantinople, 186; of Corinth, 196; of Coriolli, 197; of Cremona, 207; of Edessa, 233; of Jerusalem, 296; at the battle of Lyons, 347; at the siege of Marseilles, 362; of Messina, 365; at the battle of Munda, 400; at the siege of Naples, 401; at the battle of Naissus, 404; of the Metaurus, 409; at the siege of Orleans, 429; of Paris, 440; of Pavia, 470; at the battle of Pharsalia, 474; of Philippi, 476; of Placencia, 479; at the siege of Rome, 533, 534; at the battle of Sarnus, 562; of Shropshire, 584; at the siege of Syracuse, 613; at the battle of Tagina, 616; at the siege of Tarentum, 617; at the battle of Thrasymenus, 624; of Ticinus, 629; of Toledo, 633; at the battle of the Trebia, 643; at the siege of Utica, 665; of Veii, 671; at Winnefeld (defeat of Varus), 696; at the battle of Zama, 711; of Zela, 713.
ROME, Ancient, contrasted with Carthage, 536.
ROMANA, General, his death, 70.
ROMULUS, Augustulus, Emperor of the West, 470.
RONAULT, Marshal de, 95.
RONCESVALLES, the pass of, 498.
ROOKE, Sir George, at the siege of Gibraltar, 263.
ROOS, General, at the battle of Pultowa, 491.
ROQUELAURE, at the siege of Cahors, 142.
ROSEN, Marshal, at the siege of Londonderry, 340.
ROSENBERG, General, at the battle of Essling, 58; of Eckmuhl, 232; of the Trebia, 644.
ROSS, General, at the capture of Washington, 687; at the battle of Baltimore, 81; killed, 82.
ROSS, Lord, made prisoner at the battle of Hexham, and executed, 275.
ROUBAIS, Marquis de, at the siege of Antwerp, 41.
ROUNDHEAD, an Indian chief, at the battles of Frenchtown, 255.
RUBICON, the passage of the, by Cæsar, 523.
RUCHEL, General, at the battle of Auerstadt, 64; of Jena, 292; wounded, 294.
RUDETZKY, General, 618.
RUDLEE, Captain, at the battle of Rivas, 528.
RUDOLPH, Captain, at the battle of Eutaw Springs, 239.
RUKOWENA, Lieutenant Field-Marshal, at the siege of Temeswar, 619.
RUPERT, Prince, at Edgehill Fight, 235; at the battle of Marston Moor, 363; of Naseby, 408.
RUSCA, General, at the battle of the Trebia, 644.
RUSSELL, Colonel, 205.
RUSSIANS, at the battle of the Adda, 11; of Alkmaer, 21; of the Alma, 22; of Arcis-sur-Aube, 49; of Austerlitz, 68; of Balaklava, 571; at the passage of the Balkan, 81; at the battle of Bar-sur-Aube, 84; at Bender, 99; at the Beresina, 101; at the battle of Borodino, 107; of Brienne, 129; of Champaubert, 179; of Citate, 184; of Cummersdorf, 216; of Dorogobooch, 226; of Dresden, 226; of Eupatoria, 237; of Eylau, 240; of Friedland, 256; of Grochow, 266; of Heilsberg, 273; of the Ingour, 283; of Inkerman, 283; at the siege of Ismail, 284; of Kalafat, 312; of Kars, 312; at the battle of Kinburn, 314; of Kowno, 317; of Krasnoi, 585; of Kulm, 317; of Leipsic, 320; of Lutzen, 344; of Malo Yaroslavitz, 355; at Mantua, 357; at the battle of Mobrungen, 385; of Montereau, 391; of Montmirail, 395; of Muolta, 400; of Narva, 404; of Novi, 423; at Odessa, 426; at the battle of Oltenitza, 427; of Ostrovno, 433; of Otchakov, 434; of Pultowa, 491; of Rheims, 515; of Rimnik, 528; of Sagan, 545; at the siege of Sevastopol, 571; of Silistria, 585; at the battle of Smolensko, 585; of the Tchernaya, 577; take part in the Hungarian war, 618; at the battle of the Trebia, 644; at Varna, 671; at Vilmanstrand, 680; at Warsaw, 681; at the battle of Wilna, 696.

Rutherford, General, at the battle of Ramsour's Mills, 509.

Rutilus, killed at the siege of Rome, 539.

Rutledge, Edward, 173, 176, 177.

S.

Sabae, a Persian general, at the siege of Jerusalem, 300.

Sabienus, a Roman noble, killed at the battle of Munda, 400.

Sabines of Cures, at the siege of Rome, 533.

Sabine Women, rape of the, 533.

Sacken, General, at the battle of Borodino, 130; of Eylau, 241; of Montmirail, 396; at the battle of Pultusk, 495.

Sacken, Osten, General, at the battle of Eupatoria, 237.

Sacred Band, the, at the battle of Tegyræ, 326; at Leuctra, 327.

Sadler, Sir Ralph, at the battle of Pinkey, 479.

Saint-Agnau, Bishop, his zeal at the siege of Orleans, 428.

Saint-Aldegonde, Mayor of Antwerp, his heroism, 41.

St. Andre, Marshal, made prisoner at the battle of St. Quintin, 55.

St. Arnaud, Marshal, at the battle of the Alma, 22; his death, 571.

Saint Bartholomew, massacre of, 444.

St. Clair, General, at the battle of Princeton, 488.

St. Cyr, General, at the battle of Asperne, 54; of Engen, 237; of Heilsburg, 273; of Novis, 424; of Stockach, 597; of Valls, 670.

St. Fremont, Lieutenant-General, at the siege of Turin, 655.

St. Hillaire, General, at the battle of Asperne, 54; mortally wounded, 61; of Heilsberg, 273.

St. John, knights of, 520.

St. Lazare, house of, in Paris, 448.

St. Ledger, General, at the siege of Fort Schuyler, 251; at the battle of Oriskany, 252.

St. Mark, the great standard of, 188.

St. Martin, Captain, at the siege of Cahors, 142.

St. Nicholas, the patron saint of Russia, 407.

St. Paul, Count de, at the siege of Paris, 442.

St. Pierre, Eustace de, a citizen of Calais, his noble conduct, 144.

St. Pol, Count de, at the siege of Constantinople, 188.

Saint Pol, General, killed at the storming of the Malakoff, 580.

St. Priest, General, at the battle of Borodino, 109; wounded, 110.

Saint Ruth, General, killed at the battle of Aughrim, 67.

Saladin, the Saracen, 18; at the siege of St. Jean d'Acre, 8; his character, 309; at the siege of Jerusalem, 310; his generosity, 311; at the siege of Tyre, 660.

Salamanazar, king of Assyria, at the siege of Samaria, 559.

Salamis, the sea-battle of, 559.

Salazar, General, executed by order of General Walker, 529.

Salbrai, Losme, an officer of the Bastile, massacred, 452.

Salignac, Baron de, at the siege of Cahors, 142.

Salin, General, at the battle of the Trebia, 644.

Salisbury, Earl of, defeats Lancasterians at the battle of Blorcheath, 105.

Salisbury, Earl of, at the battle of Poictiers, 486.

Salisbury, Montague, Earl of, at the siege of Orleans, 429; killed, 430.

Salisbury, Earl of, defeated and made prisoner in single combat, by the Bishop of Beauvais, 120.

Sallaffus, Curtius, burnt alive, 47.

Salles, General, at the storming of the Malakoff, 578.

Sally, M., in command of the French at Fort St. David, 252.

Salt, sowed by Barbarossa on the ruins of Milan, 384.

Salter, Captain, at the battle of Rivas, 528.

Sambuca, the, a machine prepared by Marcellus, at the siege of Syracuse, 614.

Samaria, rebuilt, and named Sevasta, in honor of Augustus, 559.

San Augustin, city of, 198.

Sanders, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the battle of Rivas, 527.

Sanders, Captain, at the siege of Monterey, 392.

Sandor, Nagy, General, at the siege of Temeswar, 618.

Sandoval, Gonzala de, a general of Cortez, at the battle of Cempoalla, 162; in the battles in the city of Mexico, 372; at the battle of the Causeway, 374; at the siege of Mexico, 375.

Sangiban, king of the Alani, suspected of treachery, 170.

San Martin, General, at the battle of Chacabuco, 561; of Maypu, 562.

Santa Anna, Antonio Lopez de, General, 198; in command of the Mexicans at the battle of Buena Vista, 182; at the battle of Cerro Gordo, 163; at the battle of San Jacinto, 559; made prisoner by the Texans, 561.

Sapor, king of Persia, his death, 437.

Saracens, at the siege of St. Jean d'Acre, 8; of Alexandria, 16; of Antioch, 27; at the battle of Ascalon, 55; at the siege of Gaza, 260; of Jerusalem, 300; of Lisbon, 335; of Rhodes, 520; of Rome, 541; at the battle of Roncesvalles, 543; at the siege of Saragossa, 562; at the battle of Tours, 640; at the siege of Tiiin, 650; of Tyre, 658.

Saracus, king of Assyria, his death, 417.

Sardanapalus, king of Assyria, builds cities of Taurus and Anchiala, in one day, 287; his luxurious manner of living, 416; his death, 417.

Sardinians, at the battle of Mondovi, 387; of the Tchernaya, 577; at the siege of Sevastopol, 573.

Savary, General, at the battle of Heilsberg, 273.

Savoy, king of, 14.

Saxe, Marshal, at the battle of Fontenoy, 245; at the siege of Maestricht, 353.

Saxon Monarchy in England, fall of, 272.

Saxons, at Crayford, 203; at the battle of Fontenoy, 245; of Friedberg, 256; at the siege of Lisieux, 336; at the battle of Pirna, 479; of Pultusk, 495; at the siege of Straslund, 601; of Vienna, 677.

Scammel, Colonel, at the battle of Stillwater, 589.

Scarrit, Lieutenant, at the siege of Monterey, 393.

Schah-Culi, a musician, anecdote of, 81.

Scheffer, Colonel, at the battle of Trenton, 647.

Scherer, General, at the battle of Loano, 336.

Schlessinger, Louis, Colonel, defeated at Santa Rosa, 527.

Schindah, chief of the Mahrattas, 52, 61.

Schomberg, General, killed at the battle of the Boyne, 122.

Schomberg, Marshal, at the siege of Valenciennes, 668.

Schwartzenberg, Prince, at the battle of Arcis-sur-Aube, 49; wounded at the battle of Bar-sur-Aube, 82; at the battle of Dresden, 226; of Leipsic, 320.

Schweikowsky, General, 424.

Schuyler, General, 99, 504.

Scipio Africanus, appointed Consul of Rome, 150; at the siege of Carthage, 151; of Carthagena, 144; first distinguishes himself at the battle of Ticinus, 630; at the siege of Utica, 665; his interview with Hannibal, 711; defeats Hannibal in the battle of Zama, 712.

Scipio Publius Cornelius, father of Scipio Africanus. Consul of Rome, 546; at the battle of Ticinus, 629; wounded and made prisoner, ibid.; rescued by his son, 630.

Scipio Publius Æmilianus, sent into Spain, 546.

Scipio Cornelius Metellus, at the battle of Pharsalia, 474.

Scots, at the battle of Alnwick, 25; of Ancram, 26; of Bannockburn, 83; of Berwick, 104; of Bothwell Bridge, 119; of Dunbar, 229; of Dunblane, 230; of Durham, 233; of Falkirk, 243; of Flodden, 245; of Glenlivit, 264; of Grampian Hills, 264; of Hallidon Hill, 269; of Killieerankie, 313; of Langside, 318; of London Hill, 341; of Luncarty, 342; of Marston Moor, 363; of Pinkey, 478; of Prestonpans, 488; of Sauchie Burn, 562; of Selkirk, 569; of Solway Moss, 583; of the Standard, 589.

Scott, Winfield, General, at the battle of Cerro Gordo, 163; of Chapultepec, 171; of Cherubusco, 180; of Chippewa, 181; of Contreras, 199; of Fort George, 248; captures the city of Mexico, 382; at the battle of Niagara (Lundy's Lane), 415; wounded, 416; of Queenstown, 507; his invasion of Mexico, 672; reconnoiters the city and castle of Vera Cruz, 673; commences the siege of Vera Cruz, 673; his reply to the consuls of the neutral powers at Vera Cruz, 674; his despatch announcing the result of the siege, 674.

Scott, Captain, of the British ship-of-war Experiment, wounded, 175.

Scott, Martin, Major, killed at the battle of Molino del Rey, 386.

Scythes, back-handled, invented and used at the siege of Maestricht, 352; chariots armed with, described, 168, 213.

Scythians, at the battle of Chæronea, 168; of Chalons, 170; of the Halys, 269.

Sebastiani, General, at the siege of Antwerp, 14; at the battle of Arcis-sur-Aube, 49; of Hanau, 270; of Leipsic, 320.

Seclandorf, Marshal, at the siege of Belgrade, 97.

Seleucus, a Macedonian general, conspires against Antigonus, 516; at the battle of Ipsus, 283.

Servogel, General, at the battle of St. Jacob, 548.

Schleswick-Holsteines, at the battle of Instadt, 283.

Selim Pacha, General, killed, at the battle of Eupatoria, 237.

Semiramis, queen of Assyria, 75.

Semmes, Lieutenant, at the siege of Mexico, 382.

Sempronius, Longus, Consul of Rome, 545; at the battle of the Trebia, 643.

Sennacherib, king of Assyria, at the siege of Jerusalem, 295.

Serbs, at the battle of Kossovo, 317.

Serginus, a Roman Tribune, at the siege of Veii, 671.

Serini, Count de, valor of, at the siege of Vienna, 676.

Serrurier, General, at the battle of the Adda, 11; of Castiglione, 157; of Loano, 336.

Sertorius, at the siege of Rome, 537.

Servians, incited to insurrection, 617.

Servilius, at the battle of Thrasymenus, 624; of Cannæ, 147; killed, 148.

Sevastopol, description of, after the siege, 583.

Severus, emperor of Rome, at the siege of Byzantium, 140; of Lyons, 347.

Sevier, John, Colonel, at the battle of King's Mountain, 315.

Sevire, Lieutenant, wounded at the assault of the Great Redan, 582.

Seymour, Edward, Lord, at the battle of Pinkey, 479.

Shah Abbas, the Great, at the siege of Ispahan, 286.

Shah Nadir, at the siege of Ispahan, 286.

Sheaffe, General, at York in Canada, 707.

Shelby, Isaac, Colonel, at the battle of King's Mountain, 315.

Shields, General, at the battle of Cerro Gordo, 164; wounded, 165; at the battle of Chapultepec, 170; wounded, 171; at the battle of Cherubusco, 181; of Contreras, 199; at Vera Cruz, 672.

Sheffield, Lord, killed, 313.

Sheremetoff, General, at the battle of Pultowa, 492.

Sherman, Colonel, at the battle of San Jacinto, 560.

Sherman, Captain, at the battle of Buena Vista, 133.

Ship, Ensign, at the siege of Fort Stephenson, 253.

Shippen, Captain, at the battle of Princeton, 489.

Shishak, king of Egypt, at the siege of Jerusalem, 295.

Shover, Captain, at the battle of Buena Vista, 132; of Palo Alto, 439.

Short, Colonel, killed, at the assault on Fort Stephenson, 253.

Shrewsbury, Earl of, at the siege of Therouanne, 624.

Shurley, General, at the battle of Oswego, 433.

Sibley, Captain, at the battle of Cherubusco, 181.

Sicon, Prince of Beneventum, at the siege of Naples, 402.

Sicilian Vespers, the, 366, 425.

Sigismund, king of Hungary, at the battle of Nicopolis, 416.

Sikhs, at the battle of Aliwal, 21; of Moodkee, 396; of Sobraon, 588.

Silenes, son of Odoacer, killed, 511.

Simmonds, Colonel, at the battle of the Ingour, 283.

Simon Maccabeus, 559.

Simon, Patriarch of Jerusalem, 302.

Simon, son of Gioras, 297.

Simpson, General, in command of the English, at the siege of Sevastopol, 577.

Sinan, the Jew, intercedes for Christian slaves at Tunis, 653.

Sinclair, Oliver, at the battle of Solway Moss, 588.

Single Combats. Edmund Ironsides and Canute the Great, 25; Nestorius and Dames, 27; Dehac and Nestorius, ibid.; Earl of Salisbury and the Bishop of Beauvais, 120; Edward III. and Sir Eustace de Ribeaumont, 145; Captain Waldron and a French officer, 157; Colonels Washington and Tarleton, 203; Artaxerxes and Cyrus, 214; Sir Henry Piercy and Sir William Douglas (Chevy Chase), 435; Polynices and Eteocles, 621.

Sirocco, or hot wind, 148.

Sisera, the captain of the army of Jabin, defeated at Esdraelon, 236; assassinated by Jael, wife of Heber, 237.

Skippen, General, at the battle of Naseby, 408.

Skrzynecki, General, takes part in the Polish Revolution, 681.

Skulls, pyramid of, in the island of Jerba, 294.

Slaves, inhuman treatment of, at the siege of Constantinople, 193; Christian slaves at Tunis, 653; treachery of two, 63.

Slipenbak, General, at the battle of Pultowa, 491.

Slocum, John, Captain, killed at the battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 396.

Small, Major, at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 115.

Smallwood, Colonel, at the battle of Long Island, 128; of Camden, 147; of Germantown, 260.

Smettan, General, at the battle of Auerstadt, 65; killed, 66.

Smith, Captain, made a baronet for his valor at Edgehill Fight, 235.

Smith, Captain, kills Colonel Stuart, at the battle of Guilford, 268; at the siege of Savannah, 563.

Smith, Colonel, at the battle of Lexington, 329.

Smith, Lieutenant, at the battle of Contreras, 199.

Smith, Deaf, at the battle of San Jacinto, 560.

Smith, P. F., General, at the battle of Chapultepec, 171; of Contreras, 199; at the siege of Vera Cruz, 674.

Smith, General, at Baltimore, 81.

Smith, Colonel, at Fort Mifflin, 512.

Smith, Sir Sidney, at the siege of St. Jean d' Acre, 9; of Toulon, 636.

Sobieski, John, of Poland, his order of battle at Vienna, 678; his triumphal entrance into Vienna, 679.

Socrates of Achæa, defeated by Cyrus, 211; killed by the Persians, 216.

Sodom, the kings of, 314.

Sodowitch, General, at the siege of Ismail, 284.

Soissons, Bishop of, at the siege of Constantinople, 192.

Solaberry, Colonel de, 269.

Soliman II., the Magnificent, at the battle of Mohacz, 385; his character, 520; at the siege of Rhodes, 521; of Temeswar, 617; of Vienna, 675.

Solis, Don Ferdinand de, 54.

Sombreuil, M., Governor of the Hotel des Invalides, 450.

Somerset, Edward, Lord, at the battle of Salamanca, 557.

Somerset, Fitzroy, see Raglan.

Somerset, Duke of, at the battle of Hexham, 275; made prisoner and executed, ibid.

Somerset, Duke of, at the battle of Pinkey, 478; slain at the battle of St. Albans, 547.

Somerset, Duke of, at the battle of Tewkesbury, 619.

Somerset, Duke of, captured with 4000 troops by Dunois in Caen, 141.

Somerset, Earl of, at the battle of Anjou, 26.

Sophronius, Patriarch of Jerusalem, 300.

Sorbier, General, at the battle of the Borodino, 109.

Sorbonne, the, 445.

Soreas, John, a Huguenot leader, killed, 668.

Sorel, Agnes, mistress of Charles VII., 430.

Sotalces, king of Thrace, at the battle of Issus, 288.

Souham, General, at the battle of Stockach, 597; of Tuscoing, 655.

Soult, Marshal, at the battle of Albuera, 15; of Austerlitz, 68; at the siege of Badajoz, 75; at the battle of Bautzen, 88; of Bayonne, 90; at the siege of Baza, 94; at the battle of Corunna, 200; of Eylau, 241; of Heilsberg, 273; of Jena, 293; of Pampeluna, 440; of the Pyrenees, 498; of San Marcial, 561; of Stockach, 597; of Toulouse, 638.

Spalding, Captain, 706.

Spaniards, at the battle of Abaucay, 5; of Aiguebelle, 14; of Algiers, 19; at Antwerp, 41; at Arras, 53; at Barrosa, 84; at Bayonne, 90; at Baza, 94; at Belchite, 98; at Bergen-op-Zoom, 103; at Bilboa, 104; at Bommel, 107; at Bovino, 120; at Buenos Ayres, 135; at Cannæ, 148; at the battle of Castalla, 156; invade Peru, under Pizarro, 159; at the battle of Cempoalla, 162; of Ceuta, 165; of Charleroi, 172; at the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, 184; of Cuzco, 216; of Fort Carolina, 247; at the battle of Frontiera, 263; at the siege of Gibraltar, 263; of Granada, 264; at the battle of Guamanza, 266; at the siege of Haarlem, 268; of Lepanto, 325; at the siege of Leyden, 330; of Maestricht, 350; at the battle of Merida, 365; at Mexico, 375; at the siege of Mons, 389; of Naples, 403; at the battle of Otumba, 427; at the siege of Oporto, 428; of Ostend, 433; of Pavia, 471; at Pensacola, 473; at the battle of Perignan, 474; of Puna, 496; of the Pyrenees, 500; of Ramales, 509; of Rio Seco, 523; of Rio Tobasco, 523; at the siege of Saguntum, 547; at the battle of St. Quintin, 554; of San Marcial, 561; at Saragossa, 562; at the battle of Chacabuco, 561; of Maypu, 562; of Sieta Agnas, 585; at Toledo, 633; at Tortosa, 634; at Toulon, 635; at the battle of Tudela, 649; of Tzompach, 661; at the siege of Valenciennes, 667; at the battle of Valls, 670; of Villaviosa, 680.

Sparre, General, 491.

Spartans, at the battle of Artemisium, 55; at the siege of Athens, 62; at the siege of Lacedæmon, 318; at the battle of Tegyræ, 326; of Leuctra, 327; of Platæa, 480; at the siege of Platæa, 481; at the battle of Selasia, 563; at the siege of Syracuse, 608; of Thebes, 621; at the battle of Thermopylæ, 623.

Spartan Women, heroism of, 318.

Specht, General, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 589.

Speedlove, Major, at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 116.

Spencer, General, at the battle of Busaco, 139.

Spezzicasco, Marino, a gentleman of Naples, assists Alphonso in the capture of that city, 403.

Splitlog, an Indian chief, at the battle of Frenchtown, 255.

Spinola, General, at the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom, 103; at the siege of Ostend, 433.

Sponis, at Belgrade, 98.

Spurs, 8000 taken from vanquished knights, 588.

Stafford, Sir Sidney, bombards St. Jean d'Acre, 11.

Stafford, Earl of, wounded at the battle of St. Albans, 547; killed at the battle of Tewkesbury, 584.

Staie, Earl of, at the battle of Dittingen, 225.

Stanhope, Lord, at the battle of Brihuega, 126.

Stanley, Sir Edward, at the battle of Flodden, 245.

Stanley, Sir William, at the battle of Bosworth Field, 119.

Stanley, Lord, at the battle of Bosworth Field, 119.

Stapleton, General, wounded at the battle of Salamanca, 553.

Starenberg, Count de, at the siege of Vienna, 676; wounded, ibid.

Stark, General, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 589; of Bennington Heights, 99; anecdote of, 100; at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 114.

Steen, Captain, at the battle of Buena Vista, 132.

Stephen, Count of Chatres, 36.

Stephen, Count of Blois, 9; at Constantinople, 188.

Stephen of England, 333; made prisoner by William de Kaims, 334.

Stephens, General, at the battle of the Brandywine, 124.

Stephens, Colonel, at the battle of the Brandywine, 126.

Stephen, the Physician, 233.

Steon, Edric, murders Edmund Ironsides, 25.

Stenau, General, in command of the Saxons, at the battle of Pultusk, 495.

Steuben, General, at the siege of Yorktown, 709.

Stevens, Edward, General, at the battle of Camden, 147; of Guilford, 267; of Norfolk, 418; of Trenton, 646.

Stevens, Ebenezer, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the siege of Yorktown, 709.

Stewart, Colonel, at the battle of Monmouth, 388.

Stewart, John, Major, at the storming of Stony Point, 600.

Stewart, Lazarus, at Wyoming Valley, 702.

Stirling, Lord, Major-General, at the battle of the Brandywine, 125; at the battle of Long Island, 128; made prisoner, 129; at the siege of Fort Washington, 254; at the battle of Monmouth, 388; of Trenton, 646.

Stith, Lieutenant, at the battle of Rivas, 528.

Stockwell, Lieutenant, at the siege of Fort Schuyler, 252.

Stoffler, General, at the battle of Cholet, 188.

Stone, Lieutenant, at the battle of Chapultepec, 171.

Strozzi, a Catholic general, held at bay with his troops by one man, 532; his cruelty, 532.

Strange, Lord, son of Lord Stanley, 118.

Stratagems, of Sylla, at the battle of Chæronea, 168, of Belisarius at the siege of Constantinople, 186; of Aratus at the siege of Corinth, 195, of Clearchus, 212; of Mancho, the Peruvian Inca, 217; of Alcibiades, at the battle of Cyzicum, 220; of James II., to effect his escape at the battle of Dunkirk, 231, of Alexander the Great, at the battle of the Hydaspes, 281; singular one of Admiral Boisot, at the siege of Leyden, 331; of the Liegeois, at the siege of Liege, 332; of the Spaniards, at the siege of Maestricht, 350, of Appius Claudius, at the siege of Messina, 365, cruel and unsuccessful one of Rosen, at the siege of Londonderry, 340; of Belisarius, at the siege of Paris, 440, of Pescara, at the siege of Pavia, 471, of the garrison of Platæa, 483; of Artemisia, widow of Mausolus, 516; of John Candocier, Mayor of La Rochelle, 531; of Nicias, at the siege of Syracuse, 603; of Hermocrates, 612; of Marcellus, 615; of Bishop Foulquet, 637; of Fontrailles, a French officer, at the siege of Therouanne, 638; of Washington, 708.

Strato, death of, 478.

Streicker, General, 81.

Stuart, General, at the siege of Seringapatam, 570.

Stuart, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the battle of Eutaw Springs, 238; killed at the battle of Guilford, 268.

Suchet, Marshal, at the battle of Alcaniz, 15; of Belchite, 99; of Castalla, 156; of Lerida, 325; of Saalfeld, 544; at the siege of Saguntum, 547.

Sucie, General, at the battle of Guamanza, 266.

Suffolk, Earl of, at the siege of Orleans, 430.

Suffolk, Earl of, at the battle of Poictiers, 486.

Sullivan, General, at the battle of the Brandywine, 125; in command of the Americans in Brooklyn, 127; at the battle of Long Island, 129; of Germantown, 260; of Quaker Hill, 501.

Suliman Pacha, in command of the Turks, at the battle of the Alma, 23.

Sulpicius, Publius, 536; at the battle of Octolophos, 221.

Sumner, Major, at the battle of Cerro Gordo, 164; of Molino del Rey, 386.

Sumter, Thomas, General, at the battle of Hanging Rock, 271.

Suwarrow, General, at the battle of the Adda, 11; defeats Moreau, 19; at the siege of Ismail, 284; at the battle of Kinburn, 314; of Mnolta, 400; of Novi, 423, of Rimnik, 523; of the Trebia, 644; at Warsaw, 681.

Swedes, at the battle of Barranow, 84; of Falköping, 244; of Fehrbellen, 244; at the siege of Fredericshald, 245; at the battle of Leipsic, 318; of Lutzen, 342; of Narva, 404; of Nyeborg, 425; at the siege of Oldmutz, 427; at the battle of Pultowa, 491; of Pultusk, 495; of Stockholm, 598; at the siege of Thorn, 624; at the battle of Udevalla, 665; of Vilmanstrand, 680.

Sweno, Prince, son of the king of Denmark, his heroic conduct and death, 29.

Swiss, at the siege of Antwerp, 40; of Bergen-op-Zoom, 104; at the battle of Marignan, 361; of Morgarten, 397; of Morat, 396; of Praga, 488; of St. Jacob, 548; of Sempach, 569; of Zurich, 714.

Swineton, Sir Allan, 26.

Sword Fight, 233.

Sybarites, their luxurious and indolent manner of living, 602.

Sylla, at the siege of Athens, 63; despoils the temple of the Delphi, 63; his brutal treatment of the priests of Athens, 64; defeats army of Mithridates, king of Pontus, at Chæronea, 167; at the siege of Rome, 536.

Symonds, Colonel, at the battle of Bennington Heights, 100.

Syphax, king of Numidia, at the siege of Utica, 665.

Syracuse, description of the ancient city, 603.

Sysigambis, mother of Darius, king of Persia, made prisoner by Alexander of Macedon, 289.

T.

Talbot, Geoffrey, 333.

Talbot, General, killed at the siege of Castillon, 158.

Talbot, Sir Gilbert, his conduct at the battle of Bosworth, 118.

Tallard, Marshal, made prisoner at the battle of Blenheim, 105.

Talleyrand, Prince, 464.
Talon, General, at Paris, 464.
Tancred, the Crusader, his conduct at Jerusalem, 301.
Tancred's Tower, 305.
Tandy, Napper, the Irish insurgent, 158.
Tappin, his famous defense of Maestricht, 350.
Tardivet, du Repaire, M., 459.
Tarentines, at the siege of Tarentum, 617.
Tarif, (Eben Zarca,) erects a fortress on the Rock of Gibraltar, 263.
Tarleton, Banastre, Colonel, at the skirmish of Biggin's Bridge, 173; at the battle of the Cowpens, 201; at the battle of Waxhaw, 693; at the siege of Yorktown, 708.
Tarmut, wounded, at the siege of Rome, 539.
Tarpeia, the Traitress, her death, 533.
Tarpeian Rock, the, 533.
Tarquin the Superb, at the siege of Rome, 533.
Tartars, at the siege of Canton, 149; of Mokhause, 385.
Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," 304.
Tate, Captain, at the battle of the Cowpens, 201.
Tatnall, Commander, at the siege of Vera Cruz, 673.
Taucarville, Count de, made prisoner at the battle of Caen, 141.
Tauenzein, General, defeated by Bernadotte, 292.
Taurus, city of, built in one day by Sardanapulus, 287.
Taylor, Captain, at the battle of Cherubusco, 180.
Taylor, Zachary, General, at the battle of Buena Vista, 131; anecdote of, 135; at the siege of Monterey, 391; of Palo Alto, 439; of Resaca de la Palma, 514.
Tchichagoff, General, at the passage of the Beresina, 101.
Tecumseh, the Indian sachem, at the siege of Fort Meigs, 249; at the massacre of Fort Mimms, 249; at Fort Stephenson, 252; killed at the battle of the Thames, 620.
Teedyuscung, an Indian sachem, his death, 702.
Tegyræ, battle of, 326.
Teraplitz, General, at the passage of the Beresina, 101.
Teias, declared king of the Goths, 616; his death, 562.
Teligni, Governor of Theroüanne, 624.
Telly, a Sybarite, at the siege of Sybaris, 602.
Temple of Jerusalem, destruction of, 299.
Tenbroeck, General, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 589.
Terror, Reign of, 463.
Texans, at the battle of San Jacinto, 560.
Tezid, son of the Caliph Moavias, at the siege of Constantinople, 187.
Thais, an Athenian courtezan, the mistress of Ptolemy, causes the destruction of Persepolis, 473.
Thebans, at the battle of Tegyræ, 326; of Leuctra, 327; at the siege of Thebes, 622; of Platæa, 481.
Theilman, General, at the battle of Wavres, 693.
Themistocles, the Athenian, 62, 287, 358, 623.
Theodelbert, king of Austrasia, at the siege of Milan, 383.
Theodoric the Great, at the siege of Ravenna, 511.
Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, at the siege of Orleans, 423; slain at the battle of Châlons, 170.
Theodosius, emperor of the East, 16; at the battle of Aquileia, 46.
Theroüanne, Bishop of, at the siege of Paris, 443.
Thirty, battle of the, 85.
Thiers, M., takes part in the French Revolution, of 1830, 467.
Thomas, John, General, at the siege of Boston, 116.
Thomiere, General, at the battle of Salamanca, 553.
Thomson, Colonel, at the siege of Charleston, 173.
Thor, the war-god of the Scandinavians, 612.
Thornton, Colonel, at the battle of New Orleans, 413.
Three Musketeers, the foundation of a scene in, 532.
Thuringians, at the battle of Châlons, 170.
Tigris, the river, a tradition of, 417.
Tilly, Count, his cruelty, 273; at the battle of Leipsic, 318; wounded, 319; his barbarity at the siege of Magdeburg, 353.
Tilsit, peace of, 259.
Timoclea, a Theban lady, her revenge on the violater of her honor, 622.
Timoleon, the Corinthian, at the battle of Crimesus, 209.
Timour the Tartar, at the siege of Ispahan, 286; of Meerut, 365.
Tintenia, wins the praise of valor, 85.
Tippoo Saib, killed at the siege of Seringapatam, 570.
Tiriot, Jean, at the siege of La Rochelle, 532.
Tissaphernes, a Persian general, causes Cyrus to be arrested for treason, 311; his barbarity and treachery 215.
Titus, son of Vespasian, at the siege of Jerusalem, 297.
Todd, Captain, at the battle of Blue Licks, 105.
Todleben, the Russian engineer, at the siege of Sevastopol, 571.
Toledo, son of the Duke of Alva, at the siege of Harlem, 268.
Tollendall, Lally, Count, 453.
Tolmidas, the Athenian, at the battle of Chæronea, 167.
Tone, Wolfe, the celebrated Irish leader, his death, 159.
Tonnere, Clermont, Marquis, 458.
Tormasof, General, at the battle of Krasnoi, 587.
Torismond, declared king of the Visigoths, on the field of Châlons, 170.
Torres Vedras, the lines of, described, 638.
Totstenson, General, at the battle of Leipsic, 320.
Totila, king of the Goths, at the siege of Naples, 402; of Rome, 539, 540; killed at the battle of Tagina, 616.
Totten, Colonel, at the siege of Vera Cruz, 675.
Touckoff, General, at the battle of Borodino, 119; killed, 112.
Toulon, description of, 634.
Tournaments, of the Crusaders, 30; of the English and French, 171.
Tournay, a French soldier, breaks the locks and bolts of the Bastile, 450.
Tours, battle of the, Arab account of, 640.
Townshend, General, at the battle of Montmorency, 502; at Quebec, 503.
Towson, Lieutenant, at the battle of Chippewa, 182; at the siege of Fort Erie, 247.
Trælich, General, at the battle of Novi, 421.
Tragan, the Roman, wounded, 539.
Trail, Major, at the battle of Buena Vista, 133.
Traitors, Benedict Arnold, 590; Asdrubal, the Carthaginian, 152; Count of Campo-Basso, 401; Buzes, governor of Edessa, 233; Mourzoufle, grand chamberlain of Alexius, 191; Aimeny, de Pavia, 144; Colonel de Paysieux, 441; Phamæas, the Carthaginian, 150; Phirous, 34.
Travis, Lieutenant, 418.
Tremouille, Louis de la, killed at the siege of Pavia, 472.
Trépézze, a French officer, at Ticonderoga, 630.
Tremel, General, at the battle of Hanau, 271.
Triballians, conquered by Amurath I., 156.
Trigg, Captain, at the battle of Blue Licks, 105.
Triplet, Captain, at the battle of the Cowpens, 201.
Trochu, General, wounded at the storming of the Malakoff, 579.
Trojan War, the, 648.
Troluk, General, at the battle of Asperne, 60.
Trouchet, a councillor of Louis XVI., 461.
Troutpetre, Colonel, in the retreat of Charles XII., after the battle of Pultowa, 493.
Troyes, Bishop of, at Constantinople, 192.
Troyes, Treaty of, 429.
True Cross, wood of the, 9.
Trumbull, Colonel, at the siege of Savannah, 563.
Tryon, Governor, at Fairfield, 243; at Norwalk, 423.
Tufton, Sir Lewis, at the battle of Cressy, 203.
Tullus Hostillus, 279.
Tunis, description of, 650.
Turenne, Marshal, at the siege of Arras, 53; at the battle of Dunkirk, 231; of Enghien, 237; at the siege of Tournai, 640.
Turks, at the battle of Aboukir, 5; at the siege of St. Jean d' Acre, 9; at Alexandria, 17; at the battle of the Alma, 23; at the siege of Antioch, 27; at the battle of Ascalon, 55; at the siege of Bagdad, 81; at the passage of the Balkan, 81; at the siege of Belgrade, 95; at the siege of Cassovia, 156; at the battle of Citate, 184; at the siege of Constantinople, 193; at Damascus, 223; at the battle of Darik, 223; of Eupatoria, 237; of Heliopolis, 273; of the Ingour, 283; of Jeerba, 294; at Jaffa, 290; at Jerusalem, 307; at Kalafat, 312; at Kars, 312; at the siege of Kaibar, 312; at Kertch, 312; at Kinburn, 314; at the battle of Kassovia, 317; at Lepanto, 325; at Mohacz, 385; of Mount Tabor, 399; of Megaspellon, 365; of Messolonghi, 366; at the battle of Nicopolis, 416; of Nisib, 417; of Oltenitza, 427; at the siege of Ostrok, 433; at Otranto, 434; at the battle of Peterwardin, 473; of the Pyramids, 497; at the siege of Rhodes, 521; at the battle of Rimnik, 523; at the siege of Sevastopol, 571; of Silistria, 585; at the siege of Temeswar, 617; at the battle of Thermopylæ, 623; at the siege of Tunis, 653; of Tyre, 661; at the battle of Varna, 671; at the siege of Vienna, 675.

TURPIN, chronicle of, 543.
TUSCANS, at the battle of Marcians, 359.
TUTSCHAKOFF, General, at the battle of Eylau, 241.
TUXILES, a general of Mithridates, at the battle of Chæronea, 168.
TWIGGS, General, at the battle of Cerro Gordo, 164; of Cherubusco, 189; of Contreras, 199; at the siege of Monterey, 392; of Vera Cruz, 672.
TYRCONNEL, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 121.
TYNDARUS, king of Sparta, father of Castor and Pollux, 649.
TYRE, description of the city of, 659.

U.

UDEVALLA, battle of, 665.
ULM, surrendered by General Mack, 665.
ULYSSES, at the siege of Troy, 649.
URIAIS, nephew of Vitiges, at the siege of Milan, 383.
URBAN VI., Pope, excommunicates Jean I., queen of Naples, 402.
URBAN, General d', at the battle of Salamanca, 556.
UTICA, besieged by the Romans under Cæsar, 661.

V.

VALENCIA, General, in command of the Mexicans at the battles of Contreras, 199.
VALENCE, General, at the battle of Valmy, 670.
VALENCE, William de, at the battle of Lewes, 329.
VALENTINIAN, emperor of the West, his death, 46.
VALENTINERS, a Roman officer, heroism of, 538.
VALESQUEZ, Governor of Cuba, 161, 524.
VALLETTE, Jean de la, Grand Master of the Knights of Malta, 356.
VAN ARTEVELDE, Peter, leader of the revolted Men of Ghent, killed, 693.
VAN COURTLANDT, General, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 590.
VANDAMME, General, at the battle of Kulm, 317; of Ligny, 688; at the siege of Paris, 465.
VANDELEUR, General, at the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, 185.
VANDERMAERS, General, killed, 561.
VANDREUIL, Governor-General of Canada, 504.
VANE, Sir Ralph, at the battle of Pinkey, 479.
VAN RENSSELAER, Solomon, Colonel, wounded at the battle of Queenstown, 506.
VAN RENSSELAER, Stephen, General, at the battle of Queenstown, 506.
VAN SLYKE, Captain, at the battle of Oriskany, 251.
VARGOS, a general of Philip II., at the siege of Macstricht, 350.
VARNER, Sir Edward, slain at Edgehill Fight, 235.
VARRO, C. Terentius, Consul of Rome, at the battle of Cannæ, 148.
VARRUS, defeated by Arminius, 696.
VAUBAN, General, at the siege of Turin, 654; of Valenciennes, 668.
VAUDEMONT, Count de, killed at the battle of Azincour, 70.
VAUGHAN, Adjutant, killed at the battle of Buena Vista, 134.
VAUGHAN, General, 173, 599.
VENDEANS, at the battle of Château Gothiere, 179; of Cholet, 188; of Fougieres, 254; of Mans, 357.
VENDOME, Duke de, at the battle of Bribuega, 126; of Cassano, 155.
VENDOME, General, at the battle of Villaviosa, 680.
VENETIANS, at the siege of Constantinople, 188; of Tyre, 659.
Veni, Vidi, Vici, Cæsar's celebrated dispatch, 711; applied to Napoleon, 511.
VENLDO, the inventor of bombs, 667.
VERDIER, General, at the battle of Castiglione, 157.
VERE, Sir Francis, at the siege of Cadiz, 141.
VERMANDOIS, Count de, at the siege of Antioch, 28.
VERNOR, a heroic French officer, killed at St. Jean d'Acre, 11.
VERSAILLES, palace of, 456.
VERSEY, General, at the siege of Temeswar, 618.
VESPASIAN, elevated to the imperial throne of Rome, 207, 297.
VESSELS transported over land, by Cortez, 375; by Mahomet II., 194.
VETURIA, mother of Coriolanus, preserves Rome, 534.
VIAL, General, at the battle of the Pyramids, 497; killed at the battle of Leipsic, 323.
VICTOR, Marshal, at the battle of Barrosa, 84; of Bautzen, 86; his heroism at the fearful passage of the Beresina, 101; at the battle of Dresden, 226; of Hanau, 270; of Leipsic, 320; of Marengo, 359; of Montebello, 390; of Montereau, 391; of Tarifa, 617; of Talavera, 616; of the Trebia, 644.
VIENNA, description of, 675.
VIENNA, John of, in command of the garrison of Calais, 143.
VILLA-HERMOSA, Duke of, at the siege of Maestricht, 352.
VILLAIRD, Foulques de, Grand Master of the Knights of St. John, conquers Rhodes, 520.
VILLARS, Marshal, at the battle of Malplaquet, 355.
VILLEBOI, Marshal de, made prisoner at Cremona, 208.
VILLEHARDOUIN, the Historian, at Constantinople, 189.
VILLEMAIR, M., takes part in the French Revolution of 1830, 467.
VILLIERS, de l'Isle-Adam, Grand Master of the Knights of St. John, at the siege of Rhodes, 521.
VINCENT, General, at Fort George, 248.
VINTON, Captain, at the siege of Monterey, 395.
VIOMENIL, Baron de, at the siege of Yorktown, 708.
VIRGINS, two hundred tortured and massacred, 171.
VIRGINIUS, at the siege of Veii, 671.
VISIGOTHS, at the battle of Châlons, 170.
VITIGES, king of the Ostrogoths, at the siege of Ravenna, 511; of Rimini, 523; of Rome, 527; anecdote of, ibid.
VIVIAN, General, made prisoner at the battle of Kertch, 312.
VOLSCIANS, at the siege of Rome, 534; defeat the Romans, 197.
VON WINKELREID, Arnold, a brave knight, killed at the battle of Sempach, 570.

W.

WADSWORTH, Samuel, killed at Sudbury, 602.
WALCOTT, General, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 589.
WALES, Prince of, son of Henry VI., his death, 620.
WALKER, General, wounded at the siege of Badajoz, 80.
WALKER, Captain, killed, 280.
WALKER, William, General, sketch of his expedition into Nicaragua, 525.
WALKER, Mr., a clergyman, his conduct at the siege of Londonderry, 338.
WALLACE, Sir William, at the battle of Falkirk, 244.
WALLACHIANS, conquered by Amurath I., 156.
WALLENSTEIN, Albert, Duke of Friedland, at the battle of Lutzen, 343.
WALLIS, General, at the battle of Zurich, 714.
WALTON, Colonel, wounded at Savannah, 563.
WALWORTH, Captain, at the capture of York, 707.
WARD, General, at the siege of Boston, 112; at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 114.
WARREN, Joseph, Dr., his heroism and death at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 116.
WARREN, Major, at Saltillo, 132.
WARREN, Sir John Borlase, 158.
WARRENE, Earl, at the battle of Dunbar, 229; of Lewes, 329.
WARNER, General, at the battle of Bennington, 99; of Bemus' Heights, 589; of Hubbardton, 280.
WARTENSLEBEN, General, at the battle of Amfing, 25; of Auerstadt, 65.
WARWICK, Earl of, at the battle of Poictiers, 486.
WARWICK, Earl of, defeats Ket the Tanner, 313.
WARWICK, Earl of, at the battle of Barnet, 84.
WASHINGTON, George, General, 173, 127; elected commander-in-chief of the American army, 116; his march from Boston to New York, 118; at the battle of Fort du Quesne, 123; anecdote of, ibid.; at the battle of the Brandywine, 121; witnesses the fall of Fort Washington, 254; at the battle of Germantown, 260; of Guilford, 267; of Monmouth, 387; of Princeton, 488; plans the capture of Stony Point, 599; at the battle of Trenton, 646; of White Plains, 695; anecdote of, 694; at Harlem Heights, 694; his advance to Yorktown, 708; at the siege of Yorktown, 709.
WASHINGTON, William A., Colonel, 178; at the battle of the Cowpens, 201; his encounter with Colonel Tarleton, 202; at the battle of Eutaw Springs, 239; wounded, 240; at the battle of Guilford, 267; of Hobkirk's Hill, 276; of Trenton, 647.

WASHINGTON, Captain, at the battle of Buena Vista, 132.
WATERLOO, description of the field of, 690.
WATERS, Captain, at the battle of Rivas, 527.
WATRIN, General, at the battle of Montebello, 390.
WATTEVILLE, General de, at Oswego, 434.
WATTS, Lieutenant, at the battle of Chippewa, 182.
WAYNE, Anthony, General, at the battle of the Brandywine, 126; of Germantown, 260; of Jamestown, 291; of Monmouth, 387; of Paoli, 470; at the capture of Stony Point, 599; wounded, 600.
WEATHERSFORD, the Indian sachem, defeated by General Clairborne, 206.
WEBBER, Major, at the battle of Rivas, 528.
WEBSTER, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the battle of Camden, 147; at Charleston, 178; at the battle of Guilford, 267; at the capture of Stony Point, 599.
WEBSTER, Captain, at the battle of Buena Vista, 132; at the siege of Monterey, 392.
WEIMAR, General, killed at the battle of the Tchernaya, 573.
WELLES, Sir Robert, made prisoner at the battle of Stamford, and executed, 588.
WELLINGTON, Duke of (Arthur Wellesley), at the battle of Arguam, 53; of Assaye, 61; at the siege of Badajoz, 77; at the battle of Bayonne, 90; at the siege of Burgos, 137; of Ciudad Rodrigo, 184; proclaimed Duke of Ciudad Rodrigo, and created an Earl, 186; at the battle of Kiöge, 317; at the siege of Oporto, 428; at the battle of Orthes, 432; of the Pyrences, 499; at the siege of St. Sebastian, 551; at the battle of Salamanca, 556; wounded, 558; his celebrated lines of Torres Vedras described, 633; at the battle of Toulouse, 638; of Talavera, 616; of Quatre Bras, 689; of Waterloo, 691.
WELSH, the last battle of the, 395.
WEMMEL, Lords of, at the battle of Ransbeck, 510.
WENLOCK, Lord, killed by the Duke of Somerset, 619.
WENTWORTH, Lord, at the siege of Calais, 145.
WESSERMÆL, Lords of, at the battle of Ransbeck, 510.
WESSON, General, at the battle of Bemus' Heights, 590.
WEST, Empire of the, its fall, 470.
WESTERMAN, General, at the battle of Mans, 357.
WHEELER, Captain, at the battle of Buena Vista, 134.
WHIPPLE, General, at the battle of Stillwater, 589.
WHITE, General, 205.
WHITE, Major, wounded at the battle of Molino del Rey, 386.
WHITELOCK, General, in command of English troops at Buenos Ayres, 136.
WHITE TOWER, capture of the, at Sevastopol, 574.
WICESTRE, castle of, pillaged, 442.
WINDISCHGRATZ, Prince, his conduct during the Hungarian war, 618.
WILD, Prevost of Liege, killed, 332.
WILKESBARRE, 703.
WILKINSON, General, at the battle of La Cole Mill, 318.
WILLET, Colonel, at the battle of Oriskany, 251.
WILLIAM I., of England, surnamed the Conqueror, at the battle of Hastings, 272; captures the city of Mans, 357.
WILLIAM III., of England, wounded at the battle of the Boyne, 122; defeats army of James II., 122; at the battle of Enghien, 237; captures the city of Limerick, 339; at the siege of Namur, 401; at the battle of Neerwinden, 498; of Senneffe, 570.
WILLIAM of Tyre, 303.
WILLIAM of Nassau, Prince of Orange, surnamed Taciturn, 667.
WILLIAM RUFUS, of England, 25.
WILLIAMS, Major, killed at the battle of Bunker's Hill, 116.
WILLIAMS, Major, made prisoner, at the battle of Stillwater, 593.
WILLIAMS, Colonel, at the battle of Guilford, 267; of Eutaw Springs, 299; of Hobkirk's Hill, 276.
WILLIAMS, James, Colonel, at the battle of King's Mountain, 315.
WILLIAMS, Captain, at the siege of Monterey, 392.
WILLIAMS, General, at the siege of Kars, 312.
WILMOT, Lord, at the battle of Edgehill, 235.
WILLOUGHBY, Lord, at the battle of Cressy, 203.
WILLOUGHBY, Lord, made prisoner at the battle of Edgehill, 235.
WILSON, Admiral, at Calcutta, 146.
WILTSHIRE, Earl of, made prisoner and executed, 643.
WINCHESTER, General, at the battle of Frenchtown, 255.
WINDHAM, Colonel, killed in the assault on the Great Redan, at Sevastopol, 581.
WINSTON, Major, at the battle of King's Mountain, 315.
WINTER, General, at Baltimore, 81; made prisoner at the battle of Stony Creek, 598.
WINTERS, Lieutenant, at the battle of Rivas, 528.
WINZINGERODE, General, at the battle of Lutzen, 344; made prisoner at Moscow, 355.
WIETEMBERG, Prince Royal of, at the battle of Arcis-sur-Aube, 49; of Brienne, 150; of Halle, 269; made prisoner at the battle of Pultowa, 492.
WITTGENSTEIN, Count de, 101; wounded, 84; at the battle of Castalla, 156; of Lutzen, 344; of Montereau, 391.
WOLFE, General, at the siege of Louisburg, 341; at the battle of Montmorenci, 502; killed at the siege of Quebec, 503.
WOLSEY, Bishop of Tournai, 639.
WOMEN, heroism of, at the siege of Antioch, 41; women of Arcadia defeat the Spartans, 49; their kindness to the wounded at the battle of Bautzen, 89; their heroism at Beauvais, 94; at Carthage, 150; at the siege of Constantinople, 195; drowned at Cholet, 183; made prisoners at Damascus, 223; massacred at Dundee, 230; heroism of the Spartan women, 318; deplorable fate of women at Lincoln, 334; ply their distaffs on the walls of Livron, during a siege of that town, and repulse the French, 336; their heroism at the siege of Londonderry, 339; placed before troops as a rampart, and become warriors, at the siege of Maestricht, 350; massacred at Mans, 357; take part in the defense of Marseilles, 362; at the siege of Messina, 366; at the siege of Orleans, 429; at Paris, 456; rape of the Sabine women, 533; their valor at the siege of Rhodes, 522; dishonored and immolated at Rome, 537; take part in the defense of Selinuntum, 569; at the siege of Tortosa, 634; of Tyre, 661; of Vienna, 675; killed by their husbands at Vienna, 679.
WOOD, Colonel, at the siege of Monterey, 392.
WOODFORD, Captain, at Norfolk, 417.
WOOL, General, at the battle of Buena Vista, 131; of Queenstown, 507.
WOOSTER, General, at Quebec, 506.
WORTH, General, 198; at the battle of Chapultepec, 171; of Cerro Gordo, 164; of Chippewa, 182; at Mexico, 382; at the battle of Molino del Rey, 385; at the siege of Monterey, 392; of Vera Cruz, 672.
WORTLEY, Stuart, Major, at the siege of Sevastopol, 576.
WREDE, Marshal, 49; at the battle of Brienne, 130; of Hanau, 269; wounded, 271.
WRIGHT, Major, at the battle of Molino del Rey, 385.
WRIMPFFEN, General, at the capture of the Malakoff, 580.
WUKASSOWITCH, General, 11.
WURMB, General, at the siege of Burgos, 138.
WURMSER, General, at the battle of Bassano, 84; at Castiglione, 157; at the siege of Mannheim, 357.
WYNKOOP, Colonel, at the battle of Cerro Gordo, 164.
WYOMING, the valley of the, sketch of its settlement, 701.

X.

XANTIPPUS, the Spartan, 149.
XENOPHON, the Historian, at the battle of Cunaxa, 213; leads the famous retreat of the 10,000 Greeks, 216.
XERXES, king of Persia, 282, 516; ascends the Persian throne, 622; invades Greece, ibid.; his passage of the Hellespont, ibid.; his forces enumerated, 622; at the battle of Thermopylæ, 623; his inhuman treatment of the body of Leonidas, 623; at the battle of Salamis, 516.
XICOTENCALL, a Mexican noble, 224; 661.

Y.

YEA, Colonel, at the battle of the Alma, 23; killed at the storming of the Malakoff, 574.
YELL, Colonel, at the battle of Buena Vista, 132; killed, 134.
YEO, Sir James, at Oswego, 434; at the battle of Sackett's Harbor, 544.
YOLAND, of Arragon, queen of Sicily, her visit to Joan d' Arc, 431.
YORK, Lieutenant-Colonel, at the battle of Jamestown, 291.

0 018 460 930 7